While every effort has been made to ensure the reliability of the information presented in this publication, St. James Press does not guarantee the accuracy of the data contained herein. St. James Press accepts no payment for listing; and inclusion of any organization, agency, institution, publication, service, or individual does not imply endorsement of the editors or publisher. Errors brought to the attention of the publisher and verified to the satisfaction of the publisher will be corrected in future editions.

This publication is a creative work fully protected by all applicable copyright laws, as well as by misappropriation, trade secret, unfair competition, and other applicable laws. The authors and editors of this work have added value to the underlying factual material herein through one or more of the following: unique and original selection, coordination, expression, arrangement, and classification of the information.

All rights to this publication will be vigorously defended.

Copyright © 2000
St. James Press
27500 Drake Rd.
Farmington Hills, MI 48331-3535

All rights reserved including the right of reproduction in whole or in part in any form.

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data
International dictionary of films and filmmakers / editors, Tom Pendergast, Sara Pendergast.—4th ed.
   p. cm.
791.43’03—dc2100-064024 CIP

Cover photograph—David Cronenberg courtesy the Kobal Collection

Printed in the United States of America

St. James Press is an imprint of Gale Group
Gale Group and Design is a trademark used herein under license
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>EDITORS’ NOTE</td>
<td>vii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BOARD OF ADVISERS</td>
<td>ix</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>CONTRIBUTORS</td>
<td>xi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>LIST OF ENTRANTS</td>
<td>xiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>DIRECTORS</td>
<td>1</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>PICTURE ACKNOWLEDGMENTS</td>
<td>1111</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NOTES ON ADVISERS AND CONTRIBUTORS</td>
<td>1115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>NATIONALITY INDEX</td>
<td>1127</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>FILM TITLE INDEX</td>
<td>1133</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
EDITORS’ NOTE

This is a revised edition of the 2nd volume of the International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, which also includes Volume 1, Films, Volume 3, Actors and Actresses, and Volume 4, Writers and Production Artists. The book comprises more than 483 entries, consisting of a brief biography, a complete filmography, a selected bibliography of works by and about the entrant, and a critical essay written by a specialist in the field. There are 66 entrants new to this edition. Most of the entries from the previous edition have been retained here; all entries have updated filmographies and bibliographies; and many entries have updated critical essays. Since film is primarily a visual medium, the majority of entries are illustrated, either by a portrait or by a representative still from the entrant’s body of work.

The selection of entrants is once again based on the recommendations of the advisory board. It was not thought necessary to propose strict criteria for selection: the book is intended to represent the wide range of interests within North American, British, and West European film scholarship and criticism. The eclecticism in both the list of entrants and the critical stances of the different writers emphasizes the multifarious notions of the cinema, and indeed of the various entrants’ role within it. On the vexing question of authorship in the cinema, it is to be hoped that this volume is properly seen in the context of a series which also focuses on the contribution to the cinema or actors and actresses (Volume 3), along with screenwriters, cinematographers, editors, animators, composers, and other production artists (Volume 4), as well as the individual films themselves (Volume 1).

Thanks are due to the following: Nicolet V. Elert and Michael J. Tyrkus at St. James Press, for their efforts in preparing this collection for publication; Michael Najjar, for his tireless efforts in researching the entries; our advisers, for their wisdom and broad knowledge of international cinema; and our contributors, for their gracious participation. We have necessarily built upon the work of the editors who have preceded us, and we thank them for the strong foundation they created.

A Note on the Entries

Non-English language film titles are given in the original language or a transliteration of it, unless they are better known internationally by their English title. Alternate release titles in the original language(s) are found within parentheses, followed by release titles in English (American then British if there is a difference) and translations. The date of a film is understood to refer to its year of release unless stated otherwise.

In the list of films in each entry, information within parentheses following each film modifies, if necessary, then adds to the subject’s principal function(s). The most common abbreviations used are:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Abbreviation</th>
<th>Description</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>an</td>
<td>animator</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>assoc</td>
<td>associate</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>asst</td>
<td>assistant</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>chor</td>
<td>choreographer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>d</td>
<td>director</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ed</td>
<td>editor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>exec</td>
<td>executive</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>mus</td>
<td>music</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ph</td>
<td>cinematographer or director of photography</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>pr</td>
<td>producer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>prod des</td>
<td>production designer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>ro</td>
<td>role</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>sc</td>
<td>scenarist or scriptwriter</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The abbreviation “co-” preceding a function indicates collaboration with one or more persons. Other abbreviations that may be used to clarify the nature of an individual film are “doc”—documentary; “anim”—animation; and “ep”—episode. A name in parentheses following a film title is that of the director. A film title in boldface type indicates that complete coverage of that film may be found in the International Dictionary of Films and Filmmakers, Volume 1: Films.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Dudley Andrew</th>
<th>Susan K. Larsen</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Jeanine Basinger</td>
<td>Audrey T. McCluskey</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ronald Bergan</td>
<td>Ib Monty</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lewis Cole</td>
<td>Gary Morris</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gary Crowdus</td>
<td>Dan Nissen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert von Dassanowsky</td>
<td>Julian Petley</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jack C. Ellis</td>
<td>Christopher Pickard</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Susan Felleman</td>
<td>Dana B. Polan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ben Gibson</td>
<td>Paul Shields</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Douglas Gomery</td>
<td>Frank P. Tomasulo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rajko Grlic</td>
<td>Leonardo Garcia Tsao</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robyn Karney</td>
<td>Aruna Vasudevan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philip Kemp</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
CONTRIBUTORS

Charles Affron
Mirella Jona Affron
Dudley Andrew
Roy Armes
José Arroyo
Erik Barnouw
Jeanine Basinger
John Baxter
Birgit Beumers
Audie Bock
DeWitt Bodeen
David Bordwell
Ronald Bowers
Stephen E. Bowles
Stephen Brophy
Geoff Brown
Robert Burgoyne
Julianne Burton
Fred Camper
Ross Care
Michel Ciment
Elizabeth Cline
Cynthia Close
Tom Conley
Samantha Cook
Kevin J. Costa
R. F. Cousins
Tony D’Arpino
Gertraud Steiner Daviau
Pamala S. Deane
Charles Derry
Wheeler Winston Dixon
Susan Doll
Robert Dunbar
Raymond Durgnat
Rob Edelman
Robert Edmonds
Jack C. Ellis
Gretchen Elsner-Sommer
Patricia Ereens
Mark W. Estrin
Quentin Falk
Greg Faller
Rodney Farnsworth
Howard Feinstein
Susan Felleman
Leslie Felperin
Lilie Ferrari
Theresa FitzGerald
Manuel Dos Santos Fonseca
Alexa Foreman
Saul Frampton
Frances Gateward
Tina Gianoulis
Jill Gillespie
Verina Galessner

Douglas Gomery
Justin Gustainis
Patricia King Hanson
Stephen L. Hanson
Ann Harris
Louise Heck-Rabi
Ellie Higgins
Kevin Hillstrom
Kyoko Hirano
Judy Hoffman
Deborah H. Holdstein
Guo-Juin Hong
Robert Horton
Vivian Huang
Stuart M. Kaminsky
Joel Kanoff
Robyn Karney
Dave Kehr
Philip Kemp
Satti Khanna
Tammy Kinsey
Katherine Singer Kovács
Audrey E. Kupferberg
Joseph Lanza
Samuel Lelièvre
James L. Limbacher
Richard Lippe
Kimball Lockhart
Janet E. Lorenz
Glenn Lovell
Ed Lowry
G. C. Macnab
Elaine Mancini
Roger Manvell
Gina Marchetti
Gerald Mast
John McCarty
Vacláv Merhaut
Russell Merritt
Lloyd Michaels
Joseph Milicia
Norman Miller
Ib Monty
James Morrison
John Mraz
William T. Murphy
Ray Narducy
Dennis Nastav
Kim Newman
Bill Nichols
Dan Nissen
Clea H. Notar
Linda J. Obalil
Daniel O’Brien
John O’Kane

Liam O’Leary
Vladimir Opela
Dayna Oscherwitz
R. Barton Palmer
Robert J. Pardi
Richard Peña
Julian Petley
Duncan J. Petrie
Françoise Pfaff
Gene D. Phillips
Zuzana Mirjam Pick
Dana B. Polan
Richard Porton
Victoria Price
Lauren Rabinovitz
Maria Racheva
Herbert Reynolds
Chris Routledge
E. Rubinstein
Marie Saeki
Curtis Schade
Lilian Schiff
Steven Schneider
H. Wayne Schuth
Michael Selig
David Shipman
Ulrike Sieglohr
Charles L. P. Silet
Scott Simmon
P. Adams Sitney
Josef Skvorecký
Anthony Slide
Edward S. Small
Eric Smoodin
Cecile Starr
Bob Sullivan
Karel Tabery
Richard Taylor
J. P. Telotte
John C. Tibbetts
Doug Tomlinson
Andrew Tudor
Blažena Uroššiková
Ravi Vasudevan
Dorothea Verdaasdonk
 Ginette Vincendeau
Mark Walker
James M. Welsh
Dennis West
M. B. White
Colin Williams
Bill Wine
Rob Winning
Jessica Wolff
Robin Wood
LIST OF ENTRANTS

Percy Adlon
Chantal Akerman
Robert Aldrich
Woody Allen
Pedro Almodóvar
Robert Altman
Santiago Alvarez
Lindsay Anderson
Theodoros Angelopoulos
Kenneth Anger
Michelangelo Antonioni
Michael Apted
Gregg Araki
Denys Arcand
Gillian Armstrong
Dorothy Arzner
Timothy Asch
Hal Ashby
Alexandre Astruc
Richard Attenborough
Bille August
Claude Autant-Lara

Lloyd Bacon
John Badham
Bruce Baillie
Juan Antonio Bardem
Boris Barnet
Paul Bartel
Evgeni Bauer
Mario Bava
Jacques Becker
Jean-Jacques Beineix
Marco Bellocchio
Maria Luisa Bemberg
Shyam Benegal
Robert Benton
Bruce Beresford
Ingmar Bergman
Busby Berkeley
Claude Berri
Bernardo Bertolucci
Luc Besson
Kathryn Bigelow
Fernando Birri
Bertrand Blier
August Blom
Budd Boetticher
Peter Bogdanovich
John Boorman
Lizzie Borden
Frank Borzage
Roy and John Boultling
Stan Brakhage
Kenneth Branagh
Catherine Breillat
Robert Bresson
Albert Brooks
Mel Brooks
Tod Browning
Luis Buñuel

Charles Burnett
Tim Burton
Michael Cacoyannis
James Cameron
Jane Campion
Frank Capra
Léos Carax
Marcel Carné
John Carpenter
John Cassavetes
Renato Castellani
Alberto Cavalcanti
Claude Chabrol
Youssef Chahine
Charles Chaplin
Chen Kaige
Benjamin Christensen
Věra Chytilová
Michael Cimino
Souleymane Cissé
René Clair
Shirley Clarke
Jack Clayton
René Clement
Henri-Georges Clouzot
Jean Cocteau
Joel Coen
Martha Coolidge
Francis Ford Coppola
Roger Corman
Constantin Costa-Gavras
Wes Craven
Charles Crichton
John Cromwell
David Cronenberg
George Cukor
Michael Curtiz
Joe Dante
Jules Dassin
Delmer Davies
Emile De Antonio
Basil Dearden
Philippe de Broca
Fernando De Fuentes
Jean Delannoy
Cecil B. De Mille
Jonathan Demme
Jacques Demy
Brian De Palma
Maya Deren
Vittorio de Sica
Carlos Diegues
Edward Dmytryk
Stanley Donen
Mark Donskoi
Doris Dorrie
Alexander Dovzhenko
Carl Theodor Dreyer
Germaine Dulac

E.A. Dupont
Marguerite Duras
Julien Duvisier
Allan Dwan
Clint Eastwood
Atom Egoyan
Sergei Eisenstein
Jean Epstein
Jean Eustache
Zoltán Fábri
Rainer Werner Fassbinder
Safi Faye
Paul Fejős
Federico Fellini
Emilio Fernández
Abel Ferrara
Louis Feuillade
Jacques Feyder
David Fincher
Robert Flaherty
Victor Fleming
Robert Florey
John Ford
Milos Forman
Willi Forst
Bill Forsyth
Bob Fosse
John Frankenheimer
Sidney Franklin
Stephen Frears
Martin Frič
Fridrik Thor Fridriksson
William Friedkin
Samuel Fuller
István Gaál
Abel Gance
Luis García Berlanga
Sergei Gerasimov
Haile Gerima
Pietro Germi
Terry Gilliam
Jean-Luc Godard
Sara Gómez
Claude Goretta
Heinosuke Gosho
Edmund Goulding
Peter Greenaway
Jean Grémillon
John Grierson
D. W. Griffith
Ruy Guerra
Yilmaz Güney
Tomás Gutiérrez Alea
Alice Guy
Patricio Guzmán
Bert Haanstra
Lasse Hallstrom
Susumi Hani
Hal Hartley
Howard Hawks
Todd Haynes
Josef Heifitz
Astrid and Bjarne Henning-Jensen
Cecil Hepworth
Werner Herzog
Walter Hill
Alfred Hitchcock
Holger-Madsen
Agnieszka Holland
Tobe Hooper
Hou Hsiao-Hsien
Ron Howard
John Huston
Kon Ichikawa
Tadashi Imai
Shohei Imamura
Rex Ingram
Otar Ioseliani
Juzo Itami
Joris Ivens
James Ivory
Peter Jackson
Miklós Jancsó
Derek Jarman
Jim Jarmusch
Humphrey Jennings
Norman Jewison
Jaromil Jireš
Roland Joffé
Neil Jordan
Jean-Marie Gaston Kaboré
Karel Kachyňa
Ján Kadár
Nelly Kaplan
Raj Kapoor
Lawrence Kasdan
Philip Kaufman
Aki Kaurismäki
Helmut Käutner
Jerzy Kawalerowicz
Elia Kazan
Buster Keaton
Abbas Kiarostami
Krzysztof Kieślowski
King Hu
Keisuke Kinoshita
Teinosuke Kinugasa
Alexander Kluge
Masaki Kobayashi
Barbara Kopple
Alexander Korda
Zoltan Korda
Grigori Kozintsev
Stanley Kramer
Stanley Kubrick
Lev Kuleshov
Akira Kurosawa
Diane Kurys
Emir Kusturica
Gregory La Cava
John Landis
Fritz Lang
Claude Lanzmann
Alberto Lattuada
Frank Launer and Sidney Gilliat
Richard Leacock
David Lean
Patrice Leconte
Paul Leduc
Ang Lee
Spike Lee
Jean-Pierre Lefebvre
Mike Leigh
Claude Lelouch
Paul Leni
Sergio Leone
Mervyn Leroy
Richard Lester
Barry Levinson
Albert Lewin
Jerry Lewis
Marcel L’Herbier
Richard Linklater
Miguel Littin
Ken Loach
Pare Lorentz
Joseph Losey
Ernst Lubitsch
George Lucas
Sidney Lumet
Louis Lumière
David Lynch
Alexander MacKendrick
Dušan Makavejev
Mohsen Makhmalbaf
Terrence Malick
Louis Malle
Nils Malmros
Djibril Diop Mambety
Rouben Mamoulian
Joseph L. Mankiewicz
Anthony Mann
Michael Mann
Chris Marker
Gregory Markopoulos
John Kennedy Marshall
Albert and David Paul Maysles
Leo McCarey
Meherb Khan
Jonas Mekas
Jean-Pierre Melville
Jiri Menzel
Mára Mézsáros
Russ Meyer
Oscar Micheaux
Nikita Mikhalkov
Lewis Milestone
Claude Miller
George Miller
Vincenzo Minnelli
Kenji Mizoguchi
Nanni Moretti
Errol Morris
Paul Morrissey
Robert Mulligan
F. W. Murnau
Mira Nair
Gregory Nava
Jan Nemec
FredNiblo
Mike Nichols
Manoel de Oliveira
Ermanno Olmi
Max Ophüls
Nagisa Oshima
Idrissa Ouédraogo
Yasujiro Ozu
G. W. Pabst
Marcel Pagnol
Alan J. Pakula
Euzhan Palcy
Sergei Paradzhanov
Alan Parker
Gordon Parks
Pier Paolo Pasolini
Giovanni Pastrone
Sam Peckinpah
Arthur Penn
Nelson Pereira dos Santos
Wolfgang Petersen
Elio Petri
Dadasaheb Phalke
Maurice Pialat
Lupu Pick
Roman Polanski
Sydney Pollack
Abraham Polonsky
Gillo Pontecorvo
Edwin S. Porter
Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger
Otto Preminger
Yakov Protazanov
Vsevolod Pudovkin
Bob Rafelson
Sam Raimi
Yvonne Rainer
Man Ray
Nicholas Ray
Satyajit Ray
Carol Reed
Rob Reiner
Karel Reisz
Jean Renoir
Alain Resnais
Tony Richardson
Leni Riefenstahl
Marlon Riggs
Arturo Ripstein
Martin Ritt
Jacques Rivette
Glauber Rocha
Nicolas Roeg
Alexander Rogozhin
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Directors</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Eric Rohmer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>George A. Romero</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jörgen Roos</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Francesco Rosi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roberto Rossellini</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert Rossen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paul Rotha</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jean Rouch</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alan Rudolph</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raúl Ruiz</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Walter Ruttmann</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Helma Sanders-Brahms</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mark Sandrich</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jorge Sanjinés</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carlos Saura</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Claude Sautet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Sayles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Franklin J. Schaffner</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fred Schepisi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Schlesinger</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Volker Schlöndorff</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ernst B. Schoedsack</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paul Schrader</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Werner Schroeter</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joel Schumacher</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ettore Scola</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Martin Scorsese</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ridley Scott</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Susan Seidelman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ousmane Sembene</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mrinal Sen</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mack Sennett</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coline Serreau</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Larisa Shepitko</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jim Sheridan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kaneto Shindo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Masahiro Shinoda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Don Siegel</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joan Micklin Silver</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Singleton</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert Siodmak</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Douglas Sirk</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alf Sjöberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victor Sjöström</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jerzy Skolimowski</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kevin Smith</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Steven Soderbergh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fernando E. Solanas and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Octavio Getino</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Humberto Solas</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Todd Solondz</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Penelope Spheeris</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Steven Spielberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John M. Stahl</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wolfgang Staudte</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>George Stevens</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mauritz Stiller</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Whit Stillman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Oliver Stone</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Henri Storck</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jean-Marie Straub and</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Danièle Huillet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Preston Sturges</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hans-Jurgen Syberberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Istvan Szabó</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alain Tanner</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Quentin Tarantino</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andrei Tarkovsky</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frank Tashlin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jacques Tati</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bertrand Tavernier</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paolo and Vittorio Taviani</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andre Téchiné</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tian Zhuangzhuang</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leopoldo Torre Nilsson</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jacques Tourneur</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maurice Tourneur</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jan Troell</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>François Truffaut</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Edgar Ulmer</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roger Vadim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gus Van Sant</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stan Vanderbeek</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jaco Van Dormael</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Agnès Varda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paul Verhoeven</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dziga Vertov</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>King Vidor</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jean Vigo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Luchino Visconti</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Josef von Sternberg</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Erich von Stroheim</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lars von Trier</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Margarethe von Trotta</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andrzej Wajda</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Raoul Walsh</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vincent Ward</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Andy Warhol</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Waters</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lois Weber</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter Weir</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jiří Weiss</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orson Welles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>William Wellman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wim Wenders</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lina Wertmüller</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James Whale</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert Wiene</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Billy Wilder</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert Wise</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Frederick Wiseman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Woo</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Edward D. Wood, Jr.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>William Wyler</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Xie Jin</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Edward Yang</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Kozabura Yoshimura</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Krzysztof Zanussi</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Franco Zeffirelli</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Robert Zemeckis</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mai Zetterling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zhang Yimou</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Fred Zinnemann</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
ADLON, Percy

Nationality: German. Born: Munich, 1 June 1935; great-grandson of founder of the famed Hotel Adlon, Berlin. Education: Studied art history, literature, and theater, with a degree in acting, in Munich. Family: Married Eleonore, a frequent collaborator on his films; son: Felix, film writer-director. Career: Created documentaries for Bayerischer Rundfunk (Bavarian Broadcasting), 1970–1984; directed his first feature film, Céleste, 1981. Awards: Bavarian Film Award (Germany) for Best Director, for Fünf letzte Tage, 1983; Berlin Film Critics Ernst Lubitsch Award for Best Comedy, 1987, Bavarian Film Award for Best Screenplay, 1988, and Césars (France) for Best European Film and Best Foreign Film, 1989, all for Out of Rosenheim; Bavarian Film Award for Best Director, for Salmonberries, 1992; Brussels International Festival of Fantasy Films (Belgium) Silver Raven for Younger and Younger, 1994.

Films as Director:

1978 Der Vormund und sein Dichter (The Guardian and the Poet) (for TV)
1979 Herr Kischott (for TV)
1980 Céleste (+ sc)
1981 Fünf letzte Tage (Five Last Days) (+ sc)
1982 Die Schaukel (The Swing) (+ sc)
1983 Zuckerbaby (Sugarbaby) (+sc)
1984 Herschel und die Musik der Sterne (Herschel and the Music of the Stars) (for TV) (+ sc)
1987 Out of Rosenheim (Bagdad Café) (+ co-sc, pr)
1988 Rosalie Goes Shopping (+ sc, pr)
1989 Salmonberries (+ sc)
1988 Younger and Younger (+ co-sc, co-pr)
1989 In der glanzvollen Welt des Hotel Adlon (The Glamorous World of the Adlon Hotel; Hotel Adlon) (for TV) (+ sc)
1999 Die Straußkiste (Forever Flirt) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1997 Eat Your Heart Out (Felix Adlon) (pr)

Publications

By ADLON: articles—

On ADLON: articles—

On ADLON: films—

* * *

Roughly a decade older than his more renowned compatriots in the German New Cinema, Percy Adlon began making feature films more than a decade after the remarkable early works of Werner Herzog, Wim Wenders, and Rainer Werner Fassbinder. If ultimately he has created a body of work more conventional than those of his younger contemporaries, he has still achieved a handful of works which remain important and distinctive, particularly for their mixture of cool detachment and genuine compassion for lonely eccentrics.

Following a long career in Bavarian television, largely in documentary work, Adlon received immediate international notice with Céleste, his first feature. Based upon a memoir by Marcel Proust’s maidservant, the film patiently records the title character’s daily activities, or more frequently her stasis, as she sits waiting for Monsieur to ring for his daily coffee—or for help if seized by an asthma attack. The film is a kind of study in restraint—not only Céleste’s but the filmmaker’s, as he seeks visual and emotional variety within a restricted environment. Most of the drama is set in Proust’s apartment, but there are occasionally montages (handsomely composed shots, empty of people) of elegant apartment façades in Paris, or the writer’s vacation beach in Normandy, or bleak, wintry vistas in Céleste’s native village. Occasionally Céleste (Eva Mattes) addresses the camera directly; at other times her flashback-memories of a livelier, party-going Proust (Jurgen Arndt) weave in and out of the more somber present time of the narrative. Fragmented bursts of Franck’s String Quartet punctuate silences otherwise broken only by a clock ticking or an occasional cough from the master’s cork-lined bedroom; the music unexpectedly becomes live when a string quartet performs (still in fragments of music) privately for Proust and Céleste.

Obsession is a common-enough preoccupation of modernist film, but Adlon often explores devotion—not without ironic perspective or quirky humor, but never with the derision of more cynical filmmakers. Céleste, for example, is devoted but not remotely doglike or pathetically spinsterish. She appears to have a satisfactory relationship with her husband, Proust’s manservant; and she is not obsequious, as Adlon establishes in an early flashback when, as a new servant, she... refuses to use the third person (as in “Will Monsieur be having his coffee now?”), though she also cannot accept his invitation to call him Marcel. Her visible grief over his death, which concludes the film, raises the question that much of the film has seemed to ask: Is the word “friendship” appropriate for this relationship?

Less well known outside Germany but no less accomplished than Céleste is Five Last Days, which with quiet power presents just what the title alludes to: the five last days in the life of a young freedom fighter, beginning with her arrest for spreading anti-Nazi propaganda and ending with her being taken off to be hanged. The setting, again a restricted one, is Gestapo headquarters in Munich: its front office, interrogation rooms and, especially, Sophie’s bedroom in a cavernous basement area. No torture or even especially callous behavior is shown, but the menace of the place is palpable—groaning basement sounds, sinister empty spaces, barking guard dogs. Again Adlon uses a striking variety of shots within confined areas but this is not a dry, academic exercise in camera placement. Rather, the film, like Céleste, is centered upon a growing friendship, here between Sophie and her older roommate Else, a long-term prisoner. The nuances of the performances, and once again an austerity in film style matching the emotional restraint of the women, make this film among Adlon’s finest achievements. A touching lengthy scene in which the two women and a couple of male inmates are allowed by the guard to have a party in their room with some smuggled treats is superbly executed.

Sugarbaby, which increased Adlon’s fame abroad, is filled with the sort of droll eccentricity for which he became known in America, as well as introducing his discovery, Marianne Sagebrecht, in a leading role. This film too is highly stylized, but far from austere, with its extravagant lighting scheme—neon pinks and blues, occasional slashes of gold or ghastly greens—and long takes in which the camera meanders a bit away from the actors, to the left and right in ever-wider drifts without ever quite leaving them. The tale leans toward the fantastic: a depressed, overweight funeral-parlor worker, 38, in an instant falls in love with a handsome young U-Bahn driver, 25, spies on him, seduces him with candy bars while his wife is out of town, and has night after night of fantastic sex with him until the wife beats her up on a disco floor. The film’s last shot, with Marianne (as the character is named) on a subway platform proffering a candy bar to an unknown figure, or to no one, is in itself highly stylized, an abstraction of her plight.

A major part of Sugarbaby’s success is its ability to present Marianne’s dogged pursuit of the subway driver with alternating... amused detachment (e.g., their motorcycle ride) and serious compassion (a take of over nine minutes in which Marianne tells her lover about her earlier life of suffering and grief) without ever seeming to condescend. Another part is Sagebrecht’s understated performance, memorable even in small details like her first saying “Zuckerbaby” to herself in a hushed voice, as if it were a revelation. At only one point does the comedy cross over into John Waters-style campy melodrama (rather than, say, Fassbinderish degradation), when the wife viciously attacks Marianne on the dance floor and leaves her writhing in misery, while no one makes a move to stop the violence.
(A couple of Adlon’s later films have strikingly Watersesque mo-moments: the loony family acting hyper-normal at the dinner table and around the TV in Rosalie Goes Shopping, and the cartoonish lady with whom the older Mr. Younger has noisy sex in Younger and Younger.)

Sugarbaby’s success led to Adlon’s making a film in the United States, premiered in Germany as Out of Rosenheim and released in the States, somewhat shortened, the next year as Bagdad Café. It is certainly Adlon’s only film to be turned into an American TV series, though without his participation. The trajectory of the plot is a bit predictable—two exceedingly dissimilar individuals become both friends and business partners—but films about women’s friendships were relatively rare in 1988, and the pair were vividly impersonated by Marianne Sagebrecht, as an ever mildly astonished echt-Bavarian (stranded in the Mohave Desert with little to her name other than a feathered hat and her husband’s lederhosen), and CCH Pounder, as a constantly exasperated and short-tempered African American owner of the cafe where Jasmin seeks shelter, then employment. Some of the supporting characters may be a little calculatedly oddball, but Jack Palance’s Rudy, a cowboyish ex-Hollywood scenic painter who senses Jasmin’s inner beauty and celebrates in oils her outward softness, is a memorable figure; the role revived the actor’s career.

Yellow filters give the film a markedly different color scheme than Sugarbaby’s, but some camera setups of near-expressionistic styliza-tion recall the previous film. More impressively original are Adlon’s camera movements to connect the spookily empty desert spaces with the oddly cozy cafe, as in one lengthy tracking shot with assorted characters drifting on and offscreen across the dusty parking lot, and several shots following the boomerang thrown by a young vagabond, always taking us back to the cafe. The director also makes repeated use of Bob Telson’s haunting soundtrack song, “I’ll Be Calling You.”

Adlon’s second American film, Rosalie Goes Shopping, in which a German immigrant wife (Sagebrecht again) develops petty credit fraud into major capitalist enterprise, has its supporters, but the comic characters are rather one-note (particularly in comparison to the leads in Bagdad Café), and the confessional scenes with Rosalie’s appalled priest (Judge Rheinhold) are rather too predictable.

Subler and more lingering in the imagination is Salmonberries, the last of Adlon’s trilogy of films about German women making life for themselves in the United States. Friendship is once again the theme, but the couple is even unlikelier, and certainly less comical, than the pair in Bagdad Café: an East German woman (Rosel Zech) whose husband was slain as they attempted to cross the border to the West and who is now living an embittered life as an Alaskan librarian; and a half-Inuit orphan (the singer k.d. lang, who also contributes to the soundtrack) searching for the secret of her birth. Again Adlon secures a memorable performance from a non-professional, here lang as the shy but fierce-tempered orphan for whom the librarian is at first only a tool for researching her strange name (Kotzebue) and origin, but later, on a trip to Berlin, the object of a hopeless sexual attraction.
Adlon makes excellent use of another extreme environment—the snowy wastes of the Alaskan tundra—and has at least one scene of unforgettable beauty, when we see the librarian’s bedroom, a shrine slowly lit not by stained glass but by row upon row of jars of her berry jam against the windows. Memorable in an altogether different way is the Berlin hotel sequence in which the librarian tries to explain to Kotzebue why she cannot have a love affair with her: we see fragments of a night-to-dawn session, each a separate shot with its own striking camera placement, separated by fades to black.

The cleverly titled Younger and Younger returns to the cartoonishness of Rosalie in its tale of a philandering storage facility manager who becomes haunted by the ghost of his neglected wife. It does boast an extravagant performance by Donald Sutherland as the elder Younger—and a remarkable makeup job on Lolita Davidovich, who starts out as a middle-aged frump but as a ghost becomes younger and more luminous in every scene. But there is less of a truly distinctive visual scheme than in any of the earlier features, and some of the minor characters are rather palely conceived.

Following the film’s commercial failure and the limited distribution of Salmonberries, Adlon seems to have retired, except for a short feature that was clearly a personal project, involving as it does his actual family and American movies. Combining documentary footage with staged scenes, In der glanzvollen Welt des Hotel Adlon is a biography of his uncle Louis Adlon (played by Percy’s son Felix), who grew up in the family hotel but lived in Hollywood in the 1920s, had affairs with stars of the day (e.g., Pola Negri, played by Céleste’s Eva Mattes), and returned to Berlin only after World War II, as a
Hearst correspondent, to reminisce among the ruins of the hotel.

While Adlon may have other projects at hand, the film serves presently as a moving capstone to the career of someone who seems to have found his calling only in middle age and whose work took him to an oddly German-inflected America before leading back home.

—Joseph Milicia

AKERMAN, Chantal

film school, Brussels, 1967–68; studied at Université Internationale Oberhausen festival, 1971; lived in New York, 1972; returned to

Films as Director:
1968 Saute ma vie
1971 L’Enfant aimé
1972 Hotel Monterey; La Chambre
1973 Le 15/18 (co-d); Hanging out Yonkers (unfinished)
1974 Je tu il elle
Chantal Akerman

1975  Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles
1977  News from Home
1978  Les Rendez-vous d’Anna
1980  Dis-moi
1982  Toute une nuit (All Night Long)
1983  Les Années 80 (The Golden Eighties) (co-sc); Un Jour pina a demandé
1984  L’Homme à la valise; J’ai faim, j’ai froid (episode in Paris vu par . . . 20 ans après); Family Business; New York, New York Bis
1987  Seven Women, Seven Sins (co-d)
1988  Un jour Pina m’a demandé
1989  Histoires d’Amérique: Food, Family, and Philosophy/American Stories
1991  Nuit et jour
1992  Contre l’oubli
1993  D’est (+ sc); Moving In (Le Déménagement)
1994  Portrait of a Young Girl at the End of the 1960s in Brussels (+ sc)
1996  Chantal Akerman by Chantal Akerman; Un divan à New York (A Couch in New York) (+ sc)
1999  Sud (South) (+ sc)
2000  La Captive (The Captive) (+ sc)

Publications

By AKERMAN: books—

By AKERMAN: articles—

Interview with C. Alemann and H. Hurst, in Frauen und Film (Berlin), March 1976.
Interview in Inter/View (New York), February 1985.
Interview in Filmihullu, no. 4, 1991.
Interview in EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), July 1992.
Interview in Séquences (Haute-Ville), July-August 1997.

On AKERMAN: book—

On AKERMAN: articles—

Bergstrom, Janet, in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1978.
Seni, N., in Frauen und Film (Berlin), September 1979.

Films as Producer:

1998  Fifty Fifty (sup pr, sup dir)

... *= *

At the age of fifteen Chantal Akerman saw Godard’s Pierrot le fou and realized that filmmaking could be experimental and personal. She dropped in and out of film school and has since created short and feature films for viewers who appreciate the opportunity her works provide to think about sounds and images. Her films are often shot in real time, and in space that is part of the characters’ identity.

During a self-administered apprenticeship in New York (1972–73) shooting short films on very low budgets, Akerman notes that she learned much from the work of innovators Michael Snow and Stan Brakhage. She was encouraged to explore organic techniques for her personal subject matter. In her deliberately paced films there are long takes, scenes shot with stationary camera, and a play of light in relation to subjects and their space. (In Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles, as Jeanne rides up or down in the elevator, diagonals of light from each floor cut across her face in a regular rhythm.) Her films feature vistas down long corridors, acting with characters’ backs to the camera, and scenes concluded with several seconds of darkness. In Akerman films there are hotels and journeys, little conversation. Windows are opened and sounds let in, doors opened and closed; we hear a doorbell, a radio, voices on the telephone answering machine, footsteps, city noises. Each frame is carefully composed, each gesture the precise result of Akerman’s directions. A frequent collaborator is her sensitive cameraperson, Babette Mangolte, who has worked with Akerman on such works as Jeanne Dielman, 23 Quai du Commerce, 1080 Bruxelles, News from Home, and Toute une nuit. Mangolte has also worked with avant guardists Yvonne Rainer, Marcel Hanoun, and Michael Snow.

Plotting is minimal or non-existent in Akerman films. Old welfare clients come and go amid the impressive architecture of a once splendid hotel on New York’s Upper West Side in Hotel Monterey. New York City plays its busy, noisy self for the camera as Akerman’s voice on the sound track reads concerned letters from her mother in Belgium in News from Home. A young filmmaker travels to Germany to appear at a screening of her latest film, meets people who distress her, and her mother who delights her, and returns home in Les Rendez-vous d’Anna. Jeanne Dielman, super-efficient housewife, earns money as a prostitute to support herself and her son. Her routine breaks down by chance, and she murders one of her customers.

The films (some of which are semi-autobiographical) are not dramatic in the conventional sense, nor are they glamorized or eroticized; the excitement is inside the characters. In a film which Akerman has called a love letter to her mother, Jeanne Dielman is seen facing the steady camera as members of a cooking class might see her, and she prepares a meatloaf—in real time. Later she gives herself a thorough scrubbing in the bathtub; only her head and the motion of her arms are visible. Her straightening and arranging and smoothing are seen as a child would see and remember them.

In Toute une nuit Akerman displays her precision and control as she stages the separate, audience-involving adventures of a huge cast of all ages that wanders out into Brussels byways on a hot, stormy night. In this film, reminiscent of Wim Wenders and his wanderers and Marguerite Duras’s inventive sound tracks, choreography, and sense of place, Akerman continues to explore her medium using no conventional plot, few spoken words, many sounds, people who leave the frame to a lingering camera, and appealing images. A little girl asks a man to dance with her, and he does. The filmmaker’s feeling for the child and the child’s independence can’t be missed.

Akerman’s Moving In, meanwhile, centers on a monologue delivered by a man who has just moved into a modern apartment. A film of “memory and loss,” according to Film Comment, he has left behind “a melancholy space of relations, relations dominated by his former neighbors, a trio of female ‘social science students’.”

—Lillian Schiff

ALDRICH, Robert

Films as Director:

1953 The Big Leaguer (+ co-pr); Apache; Vera Cruz (Holmberg) (1st asst-d);
1954 World for Ransom (+ co-pr); The Big Knife (+ pr)
1955 Kiss Me Deadly (+ pr); The Big Knife (+ pr)
1956 Autumn Leaves; Attack! (+ pr)
1957 The Garment Jungle (un-credited)
1959 The Angry Hills; Ten Seconds to Hell (+ co-sc)
1961 The Last Sunset
1962 Sodoma e Gomorra (Sodom and Gomorrah); Whatever Happened to Baby Jane? (+ pr)
1963 Four for Texas (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1964 Hush . . . Hush, Sweet Charlotte (+ pr)
1966 Flight of the Phoenix (+ pr)
1967 The Dirty Dozen
1968 The Legend of Lylah Clare (+ pr); The Killing of Sister George (+ pr)
1969 Too Late the Hero (+ pr, co-sc)
1971 The Grissom Gang (+ pr)
1972 Ulzana’s Raid
1973 Emperor of the North (The Emperor of the North Pole)
1974 The Longest Yard (The Mean Machine)
1975 Hustle (+ co-pr)
1977 Twilight’s Last Gleaming; The Choirboys
1979 The Frisco Kid
1981 All the Marbles (California Dolls)

Other Films:

1945 The Southerner (Renoir) (1st asst-d)
1946 The Story of G.I. Joe (Wellman) (1st asst-d); Pardon My Past (Fenton) (1st asst-d); The Strange Love of Martha Ivers (Milestone) (1st asst-d)
1947 The Private Affairs of Bel Ami (Lewin) (1st asst-d); Body and Soul (Rossen) (1st asst-d)
1948 Arch of Triumph (Milestone) (1st asst-d); So This Is New York (Fleischer) (1st asst-d); No Minor Vices (Milestone) (1st asst-d)
1949 Force of Evil (Polonsky) (1st asst-d); The Red Pony (Milestone) (1st asst-d); A Kiss for Corliss (Wallace) (1st asst-d)
1950 The White Tower (Tetzlaff) (1st asst-d); Teresa (Zinnemann) (pre-production work)
1951 The Prowler (Losey) (1st asst-d); M (Losey) (1st asst-d); Of Men and Music (Reis) (1st asst-d); New Mexico (Reis) (1st asst-d)
1952 Abbott and Costello Meet Captain Kidd (Lamont) (1st asst-d); Limelight (Chaplin) (1st asst-d); The Trio: Rubinstein, Heifetz and Piatigorsky (Million Dollar Trio) (Dassin) (1st asst-d); The Steel Trap (Stone) (pr supervision)
1953 Whatever Happened to Aunt Alice? (pr)
1957 The Ride Back (pr)
1969 The Stone (pr)

Publications

By ALDRICH: articles—

Interview with George Fenin, in Film Culture (New York), July/August 1956.
Interview with Joel Greenburg, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1968/69.
“Impressions of Russia,” in Action (Los Angeles), July/August 1971.
“Up to Date with Robert Aldrich,” interview with Harry Ringel, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1974.

On ALDRICH: books—

Micha, Rene, Robert Aldrich, Brussels, 1957.
Salizzato, Claver, Robert Aldrich, Florence, 1983.

On ALDRICH: articles—

Silver, Alain, “Mr. Film Noir Stays at the Table,” in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.
Silver, Alain, “Kiss Me Deadly: Evidence of a Style,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1975.

* * *

Despite a commercially respectable career both within the studio system and as an independent producer-director, Robert Aldrich remains an ill-appreciated, if not entirely bothersome presence for most American critics. Andrew Sarris did praise Aldrich in 1968 as “one of the most strikingly personal directors of the past two decades”; yet, for the most part, it has remained to the French and the English to attempt to unravel the defiant quirkiness of Aldrich’s career. Only the otherworldly Kiss Me Deadly, which Paul Schrader unequivocally dubbed “the masterpiece of film noir,” has received anything like the attention it deserves on this side of the Atlantic; yet the film is quite indicative of the bitter ironies, bizarre stylistics, and scathing nihilism characteristic of most of Aldrich’s work.

In bringing Mickey Spillane’s neo-fascist hero Mike Hammer to the screen, Kiss Me Deadly plays havoc with the conventions of the hardboiled detective, turning the existential avenger into a narcissistic materialist who exploits those around him for the benefit of his plush lifestyle. In an outrageous alteration of the novel’s plot, Hammer becomes a modern neanderthal whose individualism is revealed as insanity when it causes him to botch a case involving a box of pure nuclear energy and thus the fate of the world. The result is a final shot of a mushroom cloud rising from a California beachhouse, consuming both Hammer and the bad guys. Only at this extreme and this distance in time has Aldrich’s acute sense of irony impressed itself upon a liberal critical establishment whose repugnance to the surfaces of his films has usually served as an excuse for ignoring their savage, multi-layered critiques of Hollywood genres and American ideology.

The extremity of Aldrich’s reinterpretations of the Western in Ulzana’s Raid, of the war movie in Attack!, of the cop film in The Choirboys, and of the women’s melodrama in Autumn Leaves betrays a cynicism so bitter that it could only arise from a liberal sensibility utterly disillusioned by an age in which morality has become a cruel joke. In fact, the shattering of illusions is central to Aldrich’s work, and it is a powerfully self-destructive process, given the sweetness of the illusions and the anger of his iconoclasm. In Whatever Happened to Baby Jane?, a gothic horror film whose terms are explicitly the hideous realities hidden beneath the sugar-coating of the entertainment industry, Aldrich virtually defines the genre of camp, offering derisive laughter as the only alternative to an unbearably absurd cosmos. This sense of black comedy (which Aldrich shares with, and developed at the same time as, Hollywood contemporary Stanley Kubrick) has frequently been responsible for the volatile relationship his films have had with popular audiences. Given the context of a life-and-death prison football game in The Longest Yard, Aldrich was able to enlist the audience in the hero’s bitter laughter in the face of a triumphant totalitarian authority. But when he adopted the same black humor toward the scandalous chicanery of the marginally psychotic cops in The Choirboys, he angered almost everybody, not the least of whom was the novel’s author, Joseph Wambaugh.

Turned in an introspective direction, Aldrich’s acid sensibility resulted in an intensely discomforting, stylistically alienated version of Clifford Odets’s Hollywood-hating The Big Knife and the madly ambitious The Legend of Lylah Clare, an 8–1/2 cm Vertigo far too complex by any Hollywood standard. When turned outward toward the world at large, that same sensibility was responsible for a downbeat, disheartening masterpiece like the much-maligned Hustle, a film that succeeds better than almost any other in summing up the moral displacement and emotional anguish of the whole decade of the 1970s.

At his most skillful, Aldrich could juggle ideologically volatile issues so well that his most popular film, The Dirty Dozen, made during the politically turbulent period of the Vietnam War, played equally well to hawks and doves. Its story of death row prisoners exploited by the military bureaucracy into participation in a suicide raid, where they are to attack a chateau, slaughtering both German officers and civilians, seemed explicitly antithetic in its equation of heroism and criminality and its critique of the body-count mentality.
of a morally corrupt system. Yet, The Dirty Dozen still managed to emerge as a gung-ho war movie in the best Hollywood tradition. The multiple contradictions of the film’s stance are nowhere clearer than in its climactic scene, where Aldrich has black athlete Jim Brown re-create one of his famous touchdown runs in order to set off an underground holocaust explicitly paralleled to Auschwitz.

In a far less popular film, the revisionist western Ulzana’s Raid, Aldrich does confront the horrors of Vietnam with a nearly intolerable accuracy via the properly bloody metaphor of a cavalry company using West Point tactics to fight a band of Apache guerilla warriors. The film relentlessly refuses to diminish the brutality of the red man; even as it demonstrates the poverty of the white man’s Christian idealism. The result is perhaps the first western ever to cast America’s doctrine of Manifest Destiny in explicitly colonial terms.

More than any other mainstream director, Aldrich insisted on presenting the radical contradictions of American ideology. If we adopt a stance not nearly as cynical as his own in most of his films, we might observe that his capacity to do so has frequently resulted in sizable profits. Yet it is also important to remember that, while Stanley Kubrick (whose 1950s films bear striking stylistic and thematic similarities to those of Aldrich) found it necessary to retreat to England, reducing his output to two or three films a decade, Aldrich chose to fight it out in Hollywood, where his capacity for moneymaking allowed him the space to vent his own personal anger at the compromises we all must make.

—Ed Lowry

ALLEN, Woody

Nationality: American. Born: Allen Stewart Konigsberg in Brooklyn, New York, 1 December 1935. Education: Attended Midwood High School, Brooklyn; New York University, 1953; City College (now City College of the City University of New York), 1953. Family: Married 1) Harlene Rosen, 1954 (divorced); 2) Louise Lasser, 1966 (divorced); 3) Soon-Yi Previn, 1997; one daughter, Bechet Dumaine; also maintained a thirteen-year relationship with actress Mia Farrow, 1979–92; one son, Satchel, and two adopted children, one son, Moses, and one daughter, Dylan). Career: Began writing jokes for columnists and television celebrities while still in high school; joined staff of National Broadcasting Company, 1952, writing for such television comedy stars as Sid Caesar, Herb Shriner, Buddy Hackett, Art Carney, Carol Channing, and Jack Paar; also wrote for The Tonight Show and The Garry Moore Show; began performing as stand-up comedian on television and in nightclubs, 1961; hired by producer Charles Feldman to write What’s New, Pussycat?, 1964; production of his play Don’t Drink the Water opened on Broadway, 1966; wrote and starred in Broadway run of Play It Again, Sam, 1969–70 (filmed 1972); began collaboration with writer Marshall Brickman, 1976; wrote play The Floating Light Bulb, produced at Lincoln Center, New York, 1981. Awards: Sylvania Award, 1957, for script of The Sid Caesar Show; Academy Awards (Oscars) from the Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences for Best Director and Best Original Screenplay (co-recipient), New York Film Critics Circle Award, and National Society of Film Critics Award, all 1977, all for Annie Hall; Britis Academy Award and New York Film Critics Award, 1979, for Manhattan; Academy Award for Best Original Screenplay, New York Film Critics Award, and Los Angeles Film Critics Award, all 1986, all for Hannah and Her Sisters. Agent: Rolls and Joffe, 130 W. 57th Street, New York, NY 10009, U.S.A. Address: 930 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10021, U.S.A.

Films as Director, Scriptwriter, and Actor:

1969 Take the Money and Run
1971 Bananas (co-sc)
1972 Everything You Always Wanted to Know about Sex but Were Afraid to Ask 1973 Sleeper
1975 Love and Death
1977 Annie Hall (co-sc)
1978 Interiors (d, sc only)
1979 Manhattan (co-sc)
1980 Stardust Memories
1982 A Midsummer Night’s Sex Comedy
1983 Zelig
1984 Broadway Danny Rose
1985 The Purple Rose of Cairo (d, sc only)
1986 Hannah and Her Sisters
1987 Radio Days (role as narrator)
1988 September (d, sc only); Another Woman (d, sc only)
1989 Crimes and Misdemeanors; “Oedipus Wrecks” episode in New York Stories
1990 Alice (d, sc only)
1992 Shadows and Fog; Husbands and Wives
1993 Manhattan Murder Mystery
1994 Bullets over Broadway (d, co-sc only); Don’t Drink the Water (for TV)
1995 Mighty Aphrodite
1996 Everyone Says I Love You
1997 Deconstructing Harry 1998 Celebrity
1999 Sweet and Lowdown
2000 Small Time Crooks

Other Films:

1965 What’s New, Pussycat? (sc, role)
1966 What’s up, Tiger Lily? (co-sc, assoc pr, role as host/narrator); Don’t Drink the Water (play basis)
1967 Casino Royale (Huston and others) (role)
1972 Play It Again, Sam (Ross) (sc, role)
1976 The Front (Ritt) (role)
1987 King Lear (Godard) (role)
1991 Scenes from a Mall (Mazursky) (role)
1997 Liv Ullmann scener fra et liv (Hambro) (narrator); Cannesyles 400 coups (Nadeau—for TV) (as himself); Just Shoot Me (for TV) (role)
Woody Allen on the set of Radio Days

1998  Waiting for Woody (as himself); The Imposters (role); Antz (Darnell, Guterman) (role); Wild Man Blues (Kopple) (as himself)
2000  Picking up the Pieces (Arau) (role); Company Man (Askin, McGrath) (role); Ljuset håller mig sällskap (Light Keeps Me Company) (Nykvist) (role)

Publications

By ALLEN: books—

Don’t Drink the Water (play), 1967.
Play It Again, Sam (play), 1969.
Death: A Comedy in One Act and God: A Comedy in One Act (plays), 1975.
The Floating Lightbulb (play), New York, 1982.

Four Films of Woody Allen (Annie Hall, Interiors, Manhattan, Stardust Memories), New York, 1982.

By ALLEN: articles—

Interview with Silvio Bizio, in Empire (London), August 1990.

Interview with A. DeCurtis, in Rolling Stone, 16 September 1993.

Interview with Studs Terkel, in Four Decades with Studs Terkel, audiocassette collection of interviews with various figures (recorded between 1955 and 1989), HighBridge Company, 1993.

Interview with Olivier De Bruyn, in Positif (Paris), February 1999.

By ALLEN: television interviews—

Interview with Morley Safer, broadcast on the 60 Minutes television program, Columbia Broadcasting System, 13 December 1987.

Interview with Steve Croft, broadcast on the 60 Minutes television program, Columbia Broadcasting System, 22 November 1992.

On ALLEN: books—

On ALLEN: articles—

“Woody Allen Section,” of Film Comment (New York), May-June 1986.

On ALLEN: film—

* * * *

Woody Allen’s roots in American popular culture are broad, laced with a variety of European literary and cinematic influences, some of them (Ingmar Bergman and Dostoevsky, for example) paid explicit homage within his films, others more subtly woven into the fabric of his work from a wide range of earlier comic traditions. Allen’s genuinely original voice in the cinema recalls writer-directors like Buster Keaton, Charlie Chaplin, and Preston Sturges, who dissect their portions of the American landscape primarily through comedy. In his creative virtuosity Allen also resembles Orson Welles, whose visual and verbal wit, though contained in seemingly non-comic genres, in fact exposes the American character to satirical scrutiny. Allen’s landscape, though, is particular, being that of Manhattan, its generally middle-class inhabitants and their culture and neuroses, of which he is the cinema’s great chronicler, much as Martin Scorsese is that of New York City’s underbelly.

More often than not, Allen has appeared in his own films, resembling the great silent-screen clowns who created, then developed, an ongoing screen presence. However, Allen’s film persona depends upon heard dialogue and especially thrives as an updated, urbanely hip, explicitly Jewish amalgam of personality traits and delivery methods associated with comic artists who reached their pinnacle in radio and film in the 1930s and 1940s. The key figures Allen plays in his own films puncture the dangerous absurdities of their universe and guard themselves against them by maintaining a cynical, even misogynistic, verbal offense in the manner of Groucho Marx and W. C. Fields, alternated with incessant displays of self-deprecation akin to the cowardly, unhandsome persona established by Bob Hope in, for example, his Road series.

Allen’s early films emerge logically from the sharp, pointedly exaggerated jokes and sketches he first wrote for others, then later delivered himself as a stand-up comic in clubs and on television. As with the early films of Buster Keaton, most of Allen’s early works depend on explicit parody of recognizable genres. Even the films of his pre-Annie Hall period, which do not formally rely upon a particular genre, incorporate references to various films and directors as commentary on the specific targets of social, political, or literary satire: political turbulence of the 1960s via television news coverage in Bananas; the pursuit by intellectuals of large religious and philosophical questions via the methods of Tolstoy and Dostoevsky in Love and Death; American sexual repression via the self-discovery... guarantees offered by sex manuals in Everything You Always Wanted to Know about Sex. All these issues reappear in Allen’s later, increasingly mature work, repeatedly revealing the anxiety of comedy that is cerebral in nature, dependent even in its occasional sophomoric moments upon an educated audience that responds to his brand of self-reflexive, literary, political, and sexual humor. But Allen distrusts and satirizes formal education and institutionalized discourse which, in his films, lead repeatedly to humorless intellectual preening. “Those who can’t do, teach, and those who can’t teach, teach gym,” declares Alvy Singer in Annie Hall. No character in that film is treated with greater disdain than the Columbia professor who smugly pontificates on Fellini while standing in line waiting to see The Sorrow and the Pity. Allen inflicts swift, cinematically appropriate justice. In Manhattan, Yale, a university professor of English, bears the brunt of Allen’s moral condemnation as a self-rationalizing cheat who is far “too easy” on himself.

In Annie Hall, his Oscar-winning breakthrough film, Allen, the writer (with Marshall Brickman) recapitulates and expands on his emerging topics but removes them from the highly exaggerated apparatus of his earlier parodies. Alvy Singer (Allen) and Annie Hall (Diane Keaton in her most important of several roles for Allen) enact an urban-neurotic variation on the mismatched lovers of screwball comedy, set against a realistic New York City mise-en-scène but slanted away from farce and toward character analysis.

Annie Hall makes indelible the Woody Allen onscreen persona—a figure somehow involved in show business or the arts and obsessive about women, his parents, his childhood, his values, his terror of illness and death; perpetually and hilariously taking the mental temperature of himself and everyone around him. Part whiner, part nebbish, part hypochondriac, this figure is also brilliantly astute and consciously funny, miraculously irreverent to women—for a while—particularly (as in Annie Hall and Manhattan) when he can serve as their teacher. This developing figure in Allen’s work is both comic victim and witty victimizer, a moral voice in an amoral age who repeatedly discovers that the only true gods in a godless universe are cultural and artistic—movies, music, art, architecture—a perception pleasurably reinforced visually and aurally throughout his best films. With rare exceptions—Hannah is a notable one—this figure at the film’s fadeout appears destined to remain alone, enabling him, by implication, to continue functioning as a sardonically detached observer of human imperfection, including his own. In Annie Hall, this characterization, despite its suffusion in angst, remains purely comic but Allen becomes progressively darker—and harder on himself—as variants of this figure emerge in the later films.

Comedy, even comedy that aims for the laughter of recognition based on credibility of character and situation, rests heavily on exaggeration. In Zelig, the tallest of Woody Allen’s cinematic tall tales, the central figure is a human chameleon who satisfies his overwhelming desire for conformity by physically transforming himself into the people he meets. Zelig’s bizarre behavior is made visually believable by stunning shots that appear to place the character of Leonard Zelig (Allen) alongside famous historical figures within actual newsreel footage of the 1920s and 1930s.

Shot in Panavision and velvety black-and-white, and featuring a Gershwin score dominated by “Rhapsody in Blue,” Manhattan reiterates key concerns of Annie Hall but enlarges the circle of participants in a sexual la ronde that increases Allen’s ambivalence toward the moral terrain occupied by his characters—especially by Ike Davis (Allen), a forty-two-year-old man justifying a relationship with a seventeen-year-old girl (Mariel Hemingway). By film’s end she has become an eighteen-year-old woman who has outgrown him, just as Annie Hall outgrew Alvy Singer. The film (like Hannah and Her Sisters later) is, above all, a celebration of New York City, which Ike, like Allen, “idolize[s] all out of proportion.”

In the Pirandellian The Purple Rose of Cairo, the fourth Allen film to star Mia Farrow, a character in a black-and-white film-within-the-film leaps literally out of the frame into the heroine’s local movie theatre. Here film itself—in this case the movies of the 1930s—both distorts reality by setting dangerously high expectations, and makes it more bearable by permitting Cecilia, Allen’s heroine, to escape from her dismal Depression existence. Like Manhattan before it, and Hannah and Her Sisters and Radio Days after it,The Purple Rose of Cairo examines the healing power of popular art.

Arguably Allen’s finest film to date, Hannah and Her Sisters shifts his own figure further away from the center of the story than he had ever been before, treating himself as one of nine prominent characters in the action. Allen’s screenplay weaves an ingenious taping around three sisters, their parents, assorted mates, lovers, and friends (including Allen as Hannah’s ex-husband Mickey Sachs). A Chekhovian exploration of the upper-middle-class world of a group of New Yorkers a decade after Annie Hall, Hannah is deliberately episodic in structure, its sequences separated by Brechtian title cards that suggest the thematic elements of each succeeding segment. Yet it is an extraordinarily seamless film, unified by the family at its center; three Thanksgiving dinner scenes at key intervals; an exquisite color celebration of an idyllic New York City; and music by Cole Porter, Rodgers and Hart, and Puccini (among others) that italicizes the genuinely romantic nature of the film’s tone. The most optimistic of Allen’s major films, Hannah restores its inhabitants to a world of pure comedy, their futures epitomized by the fate of Mickey Sachs. For once, the Allen figure is a man who will live happily ever after, a man formerly sterile, now apparently fertile, as is comedy’s magical way.

Arguably his most morally provocative and ambiguous film, Crimes and Misdemeanors further marginalizes—and significantly darkens—the figure Woody Allen invites audiences to confuse with his offscreen self. The self-reflexive plight of filmmaker Cliff Stern (Allen) alternates with the central dilemma confronted by ophthalmologist Judah Rosenthal (Martin Landau), a medical pillar of society who bears primary, if indirect, responsibility for the murder of his mistress (Anjelica Huston). Religious and philosophical issues present in Allen’s films since Love and Death achieve a new and serious resonance, particularly through the additional presence of a faith-retaining rabbi gradually (in one of numerous Oedipal references in Allen’s work) losing his sight, and a Holocaust survivor-philosopher who preaches the gospel of endurance—then commits suicide by (as his note prosaically puts it) “going out the window.” In its pessimism, diametrically opposed to the joyous Hannah and Her Sisters, Crimes and Misdemeanors posits a universe utterly and disturbingly devoid of poetic justice or moral certainty. The picture’s genuinely comic sequences, usually involving Cliff and Alan Alda as his fatuous producer brother-in-law (“‘Comedy is tragedy plus time!’”) do not contradict the fact that it is Allen’s most somber major film, a comedy-melodrama that in its final sequence crosses the brink to the level of domestic tragedy. Here, the Allen figure is not only alone, as he has been in the past, but alone and in despair. In entirely contrasting visual ways, Alice and Shadows and Fog exhibit immediately recognizable Allen concerns in highly original fashion. A glossy, airy, gently satiric modern fairy tale, Alice implicitly functions as Allen’s most open love letter to Mia Farrow. Her idealized title character searches for meaning in a yuppiefied New York City.
Eventually, she finds it by leaving her husband, meeting Mother Theresa, and, especially, by discovering that her two children offer her the only genuine vehicle for romance in this romantic comedy mangue. The film’s final shot displays a glowing Alice joyfully pushing them on playground swings as two former women friends, in voice-over dialogue, bemoan her self-selected maidless and nannyless condition, one which the film clearly intends us to embrace.

In Shadows and Fog, Allen employs a specific cinematic genre more directly than at any time since the 1970s. His homage to German Expressionism, Shadows and Fog is shot in black and white in a manner deliberately reminiscent of the films of Pabst, Lang, and Murnau. That visual style and the placement at the film’s center of a distinctly Kafkaesque hero (played by Allen) combine to make Shadows and Fog Allen’s most overtly “European” and wryly metaphysical film since Interiors fourteen years earlier. Not surprisingly, Shadows and Fog was greeted with criticisms much more favorably in Europe than in the United States, but left audiences on both continents less than satisfied.

As Chekhov’s forgiving spirit energizes the comic tone of Hannah and Her Sisters, so the playwright August Strindberg’s hostility controls the dark marital terrain of Husbands and Wives. Strindbergian gender battles frequently appear in earlier Allen films, but they are more typically rescued back from the precipice by comedy. Allen’s partial attempt to attribute comic closure to Husbands and Wives pleases but inadequately convinces. While the film (which might have been more accurately titled Husbands, Wives, and Lovers) is often extremely funny, its portrait of two deteriorating marriages is as corrosive as anything in the Allen canon. Husbands and Wives contains other elements long present in Allen’s films: multiple storylines, a deliberately episodic structure covering a period of about a year, and the involvement of a central character, Gabe Roth (played by Allen), with a woman (Juliette Lewis) young enough to be his daughter. Unlike Ike Davis’s relationship with Tracy in Manhattan, however, this one is consummated—and concluded—with only a kiss.

Despite the presence of familiar material, Husbands and Wives shows Allen continuing to break new ground, particularly in the film’s technical virtuosity. The frequent use of a hand-held camera reinforces the neurotic, darting, unpredictable behavior of key characters. Moving beyond his use of title cards to provide Brechtian distancing in Hannah and Her Sisters, Allen here employs a documentary technique to punctuate the main action of the film. The central characters and a minor one (the ex-husband of Judy Roth, the woman played by Mia Farrow) are individually interviewed by an off-screen male voice, which appears to function simultaneously as documentary recorder of their woeful tales and as therapist to their psyches. These sequences are inserted periodically throughout the film, as the interviewees speak directly to the camera—and therefore to us, thus forcing the audience to participate in the filmmaker-interviewer’s role as therapist.

Husbands and Wives deserves a place alongside Hannah and Her Sisters and Crimes and Misdemeanors as representing Allen’s most textured and mature work to date. But the film’s visual and thematic pleasures have been obscured by audience desire to see in Husbands and Wives the spectacle of art imitating life with a vengeance; and, in fact, Husbands and Wives does contain uncanny links to the Allen-Farrow breakup even though the film was completed before their relationship came to a dramatic and controversial end, attended by a blaze of publicity that further alienated those audiences not addicted to Allen and narrowed his already selective audience base in the United States.

The type of ethical dilemma which occupies such a central place in the Allen canon (and which usually finds its most articulate definition in the mouths of characters played by Allen himself) appeared to have tumbled out of an Allen movie and onto worldwide front pages. (“Life doesn’t imitate art; it imitates bad television,” says Allen’s Gabe Roth in Husbands and Wives.) In 1992, shortly before the release of Husbands and Wives, Allen’s romantic relationship with Soon-Yi Previn, Mia Farrow’s twenty-one-year-old adopted daughter, was discovered by her mother, who made the fact public. Furious and ugly charges and countercharges ensued, resulting in Allen’s loss of custody of his three children a year later, while the legal wrangling continued unabated for some considerable time. It is not too fanciful to suggest that Allen’s personal crisis accounted for what, on the one hand, has appeared to be a search for new directions—imaginative, even experimental—and on the other hand, a loss of focus and a diminished coherence of goal and vision.

Nonetheless, in the eight-year period following the release of Husbands and Wives, Allen, undaunted by personal tragedy and adverse publicity, continued to work steadily, but the collected films of this period are less easy to pigeon-hole or analyze and have mostly been something of a disappointment to fans and a puzzle to several critics. He reverted firmly to his distinctive comic universe with Don’t Drink the Water, adapted from his early Broadway play and first shown in America on network television; Manhattan Murder Mystery, a comedy-mystery in the manner of The Thin Man films and the Mr. and Mrs. North radio and television series, with Diane Keaton (replacing Mia Farrow, who was originally scheduled to play Allen’s wife) and Alan Alda; the breathtakingly cruel and brilliantly funny Bullets over Broadway, set in the 1920s/1930s and satirizing the marriage of theater and the underworld that was a staple of so many late 1920s and early 1930s films. At the center is a playwright (John Cusack) grappling with his first Broadway production and becoming involved with a flamboyantly fey actress (Dianne Wiest). The character could be considered as an emblem for a younger Allen, but the film as a whole is richly comical and sad in its behind-the-scenes portrait of Broadway life and work, as well as awesome in its sense of period and its gentle parody of theatrical and underworld stereotypes. Mighty Aphrodite again tempts audiences to see elements of Allen’s life reflected in the central plot issue of child adoption, but, with its parodies of Greek tragedy and its broadly satiric array of characters, the film rarely strays from its identification as genuine Allen comedy. These 1990s films reveal yet again why so many actors want to work with Allen: Dianne Wiest won her second supporting actress Oscar for her role in an Allen film for Bullets over Broadway (her first was for Hannah); and Mira Sorvino won the same award for Mighty Aphrodite the following year.

But, while Allen’s primary response to the tarnish on his personal reputation has been to keep making films, it might be suggested that he now needs to pause for thought and regain some perspective as to the motive force behind them. The four since Mighty Aphrodite have evidenced the lack of sure-footedness referred to above. His evident desire to spot and utilize talented actors, known and unknown, coincides with a rash of screenplays so heavily populated as to blur the central characters, leaving audiences with far less to engage with than hitherto. The least successful, and perhaps most seriously troubled internally, of the last four of the 1990s is Deconstructing Harry, relentlessly and unattractively self-referential, and looking for its humor in fantasy and fantastical situations which have a certain farcical crudity in contrast to Allen’s usually penetrating verbal wit. Celebrity, miscasting Kenneth Branagh in the central role that Allen would once have played, is not without its pleasures, but fails to cohere; Sweet and Lowdown, visiting the territory of Allen’s other great love—jazz—is ambitious, entertaining, and boasts a wonderful performance from Sean Penn. If it is neither quite interesting nor quite funny enough, it is nonetheless endlessly inventive, and as good a jazz film as any in evoking the ethos of its subject. Arguably the clearest success of the four, its virtues criminally misunderstood by all but the cognoscenti, is Everyone Says I Love You, in which a now wispily aging Woody co-stars himself with the ravishing Julia Roberts, pushing the boundaries of his earlier collected oeuvre that invited us to accept his seemingly unlikely appeal for women, and almost self-parodying the nebbish aspects of his screen persona. The film, unusually, broadens Allen’s physical landscape, setting the core of the Allen-Roberts romance in Venice (a city that features significantly in Barbara Kopple’s documentary following Woody and his band—and his wife Soon-Yi—on a European tour) and climaxing in Paris. Too long, structurally undisciplined, and a bit of a rag-bag it may be, but Everyone Says I Love You is a blissful homage to the Hollywood musical, knowing and affectionate.

Allen has always denied that his film persona is related to his own, although it is often justifiably difficult for us to believe that. “Is it over? Can I go now?” asks Gabe Roth of the off-screen interviewer in the final shot of Husbands and Wives. Divorced from his wife, Gabe is now alone, but he chooses to be. Gabe may not be happy—rarely is any character played by Woody Allen ever actually happy—but, unlike Clifford Stern at the end of Crimes and Misdemeanors, Gabe is decidedly not in despair. Neither, hopefully, is Woody Allen. It is clear that the fertile imagination, while perhaps floundering to find a new form, is intact, and the comic spirit still present. To the question “Whither now?” must come the answer “Who knows?” But whatever path he treads in the future, Woody Allen has proved one of the few auteurs of the American cinema worthy of the over-used term, and it may well be that his great masterwork is yet to spring from the autumn of his years.

—Mark W. Estrin, updated by Robyn Karney

ALMODÓVAR, Pedro

Nationality: Spanish. Born: Calzada de Clatrava, La Mancha, Spain, 1951 (some sources say 1947). Career: Moved to Madrid and worked for National Telephone Company, 1967; wrote comic strips and articles for underground magazines; joined independent theatre group Los Goliardos and started making Super-8 films with them, 1974; first feature, Pepi, Luci, Bom released 1980; also a rock musician, has written music for his own films. Awards: Glauber Rocha Award for Best Director, Rio Film Festival, and Los Angeles Film Critics Association “New Generation” Award, 1987, for Law of Desire; National Society of Film Critics Award, special citation for originality, 1988; Venice International Film Festival best screenplay award, National Board of Review of Motion Pictures best foreign film, New York Film Critics Circle best foreign film, and Felix Award for best young film, all 1988, and Academy Award nomination for best foreign film, Orson Welles Award for best foreign-language film, both 1989, all for Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown. Agent: El Deseo SA, 117 Velázquez, Madrid, Spain.

Films as Director:

1974 Dos putas, o, Historia de amor que termina en boda (Two Whores, or, A Love Story that Ends in Marriage) (Super-8); La caída de Sodoma (The Fall of Sodom) (Super-8)
1975 Homenaje (Homage) (Super-8)
1976 La estrella (The Stars) (Super-8)
1977 Sexo va: Sexo viene (Sex Comes and Goes) (Super-8); Complementos (shorts)
1978 Folle, folle, folleme, Tim (Fuck Me, Fuck Me, Fuck Me, Tim) (Super-8, full-length); Salome (16mm)
1980 Pepi, Luci, Bom y otras chicas de montón (Pepi, Luci, Bom and Lots of Other Girls) (+ sc)
1982 Laberinto de pasiones (Labyrinth of Passions) (+ sc, + pr, role)
1983 Entre tineblas (Into the Dark; The Sisters of Darkness) (+ sc, song)
1984 Qué me hecho yo para merecer esto? (What Have I Done to Deserve This?) (+ sc)
1986 Matador (+ sc); La ley del deseo (Law of Desire) (+ sc, score, song)
1988 Mujeres al borde de un ataque de nervios (Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown) (+ sc, + pr)
1990 Atame! (Tie Me up, Tie Me Down!) (+ sc)
1991 Tacomes lejanos (High Heels) (+ sc, song)
1993 Kika (+ sc)
1995 Le flor de mi secreto (The Flower of My Secret) (+ sc)
1997 Carne trémula (Live Flesh) (+ sc, role as himself)
1999 Todo sobre mi madre (All about My Mother) (+ sc)

!Pedro Almodóvar
Films as Producer:

1993 Acción mutante (Mutant Action)
1996 Mi nombre es sombra ...

Publications

By ALMODOVAR: books—

El sueno de la razon (short stories), Madrid, 1980.
Patty Diphusa y otros textos (Patty Diphusa and Other Writings), Barcelona, 1991.

By ALMODOVAR: articles—

Interview in Contracampo (Madrid), September 1981.
Interview with J. C. Rentero, in Casablanca (Madrid), May 1984.
“Pleasure and the New Spanish Mentality,” an interview with Marsha Kinder, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1987.
Interview in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1988.
Interview in Films and Filming (London), June 1989.
Interview in Inter/View (New York), January 1990.
Interview in City Limits (London), 5 July 1990.
“Perche il melodrama,” an interview with E. Imparato, in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), April 1992.
Regular column as “Patty Diphusa” in La Luna (Madrid).
Interview in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1997.

On ALMODOVAR: books—

On ALMODOVAR: articles—

Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Fall 1987.

Pedro Almodóvar is more than the most successful Spanish film export since Carlos Saura. At home, the production of Almodóvar’s films, their premiers, and the works themselves are surrounded by scandal, and the Spanish popular press examines what the director eats, the qualities he looks for in a lover, and his weight fluctuations in a fashion normally reserved for movie stars and European royalty. Abroad, the films have surprised those with set notions of what Spanish cinema is or should be; Almodóvar’s uncompromising incorporation of elements specific to gay culture into mainstream forms with wide crossover appeal has been held up as a model for other gay directors to emulate. The films and Almodóvar’s creation of a carefully cultivated persona in the press have meshed into “Almodóvar,” a singular trademark. “Almodóvar” makes the man and the movies interchangeable even as it overshadows both. The term now embodies, and waves the flag for, the “New Spain” as it would like to see itself: democratic, permissive, prosperous, international, irreverent, and totally different from what it was in the Franco years.

Almodóvar’s career can be usefully divided into three stages: a marginal underground period in the 1970s, during which he personally funded and controlled every aspect of the shoestring-budgeted, generally short films, and which culminated in Pepi, Luci, Bom y otras chicas de montón, his feature film debut; the early to mid-1980s, during which he was still writing and directing his increasingly costly though still low-budget films, but for other producers and with varying degrees of state subsidization; and, from The Law of Desire in 1986, a period in which he reverted to producing his own films, which now benefitted from substantial budgets (by Spanish standards), top technicians, and maximum state subsidies. Though critical reaction to his work has varied, each of his films has enjoyed increasing financial success until Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown, which became 1989’s highest-grossing foreign film in North America and the most successful Spanish film ever in Spain.

Almodóvar’s oeuvre makes a good argument for the auteur theory. One can trace to his first films themes and strategies that he would explore in different forms, with varying degrees of success but with increasing technical expertise, throughout the rest of his career. Almodóvar’s films posit the absolute autonomy of the individual. Increasing technical expertise, throughout the rest of his career, explore in different forms, with varying degrees of success but with the most successful Spanish film ever in Spain. became 1989’s highest-grossing foreign film in North America and National Society of Film Critics Award, all for Best Director, for Nashville, 1975; Golden Board of Review), and National Society of Film Critics Award, for Nashville, 1975; Golden

Almodóvar’s films posit the absolute autonomy of the individual. Increasing technical expertise, throughout the rest of his career, explore in different forms, with varying degrees of success but with the most successful Spanish film ever in Spain. became 1989’s highest-grossing foreign film in North America and National Society of Film Critics Award, all for Best Director, for Nashville, 1975; Golden

In Almodóvar’s films, the various paths to pleasure lead to a destination and fulfillment (Matador), a dead end and disappointment (Dark Hideout, Women on the Verge), or an endlessly winding path and continuous displacement (The Law of Desire), but never resignation. To explore these varied roads Almodóvar has over the years accumulated a rep company of actors (including Antonio Banderas, who graduated to Hollywood stardom). When in an Almodóvar film, no matter how absurd the situation their characters might find themselves in, all the actors are directed to a style that relies on understatement and has often been called ‘‘naturalist’’ or ‘‘realist.’’ For example, when in The Law of Desire Tina tells her brother that ‘‘she’’ had previously been a ‘‘he’’ and had run off to Morocco to have a love affair with their father, Carmen Maura acts it in a style considerably subtler than that used by, for example, June Allyson to tell us she really shouldn’t have broken that date with Peter Lawford. This style of acting is partly what enables Almodóvar’s often outrageous characters to be so emotionally compelling.

Almodóvar borrows indiscriminately from film history. A case in point is What Have I Done to Deserve This? which contains direct reference to, or echoes of, neo-realist, the caper film, Carrie, Buñuel, Wilder, Warhol, and Waters. Moreover, by his second period, beginning with Dark Hideout, it became clear that Almodóvar’s preferred mode of cinema was the melodramatic. It is a mode that cuts across genre, equally capable of conveying the tragic and the comic, eminently emotional, adept at arousing intense audience identification, and capable of communicating complex psychological processes no matter what the character’s gender or sexual orientation.

Almodóvar’s signature, and a unique contribution to the movies, is the synthesis of the melodramatic mode with a clash of quotations. This combination allows Almodóvar both a quasi-classical Hollywood narrative structure (which facilitates audience identification) and a very self-conscious narration (which normally produces an alienation effect). This results in dialectical moments in which the absurd can be imbued with emotional resonance (the mother selling her son to the dentist in What Have I Done); the emotional can be checked with cheek without disrupting identification (superimposing a character’s crying eyes with the wheels of a car in The Law); and camp can be imbued with depth without losing its wit (the transference of emotions that occurs when we see Pepa dubbing Joan Crawford’s dialogue from Johnny Guitar in Women on the Verge). At his best (What Have I Done to Deserve This?, The Law of Desire, Women on the Verge of a Nervous Breakdown), Almodóvar drills a heart into the postmodern and fills it with an operatic range of feeling.

Although Almodóvar’s movies have garnered increasingly hearty praise in the 1990s, one senses the critical establishment is consciously trying to legitimize him in their eyes. Why is it that when a comedy expert grows more “serious,” he is, perforce, taken more seriously? Fortunately, Almodóvar’s mature works remain vibrant, unpretentious melodramas (unlike Woody Allen, whose art films seem like Xerox copies of the masters he slavishly imitates). Although Almodóvar has been chastised for trying to have his soap opera and send it up, too, he accomplished just that impossibility with earlier works like Law of Desire. As arresting sentimentally as All About My Mother is, and as disturbingly mournful as Live Flesh is, they lack the kick of less-acclaimed works like High Heels, an unabashed glimpse into the soul of Lana Turner. Whereas Almodóvar once passionately embraced the Hollywoodness of Douglas Sirk’s women pictures, his most recent movies merely buss those stylized conventions on the cheek. Why is there such a frenzy to commend the new-improved maverick, simply because he now uses humor only as a diversionary tactic, instead of an integral part of his canon? Despite reservations about the shift in his approach, one admires Almodóvar’s unbridled insight into role-playing, his debunking of machismo, his celebration of tarkness, and his unsurpassed skill with actresses. If something joyful seems missing from latter-day Almodóvar, something has also been gained in his collaboration with actress Marisa Paredes, a gravelly beautiful dynamo, whom the director uses to suggest the melancholy behind emotional extravagance. If films like The Flower of My Secret are high-wire acts between pathos and humor, then Paredes helps keep his balance. Even if one reminisces about Almodóvar’s team-work with eufervescent comediennes like Carmen Maura and Victoria Abril, one is relieved that he hasn’t become the Spanish John Waters, a filmmaker whose rebelliousness now seems quaint. Exploring his gay sensibility, Almodóvar appeals to straight audiences, who share his appetite for the resurrection and re-invigoration of old movie clichés. In overlooked works like Kika, characters literally die for love, and this slick director understands that classic escapism has undying appeal for a reason. The genius of Almodóvar lies in succumbing to the absurdity of Hollywood romanticism, while recognizing it as an impossible ideal. After enduring bloodless Oscar-winners and critically correct masterpieces, the audience rushes to Almodóvar’s movies because they act like a tonic.

—José Arroyo, updated by Robert J. Pardi

ALTMAN, Robert

Nationality: American.  Born: Kansas City, Missouri, 20 February 1925. Education: Attended University of Missouri, Columbia (three years). Military Service: Bomber pilot, U.S. Air Force, 1943–47. Family: Married La Vonne Elmer, 1946, one daughter; married Lotus Corelli, 1954, divorced 1957, two sons; married Kathryn Reed, two sons. Career: Directed industrial films for Calvin Company, Kansas City, 1947; wrote, produced, and directed first feature, The Delinquents, 1955; TV director, 1957–63; co-founder of TV production company, 1963; founder, Lion’s Gate production company (named after his own 8-track sound system), 1970. Awards: Palme d’Or, Cannes Festival, and Academy Award nominations for Best Film and Best Director for *M*A*S*H*, 1970; New York Film Critics’ Circle Award, D.W. Griffith Award (National Board of Review), and National Society of Film Critics Award, all for Best Director, for Nashville, 1975; Golden
Robert Altman

Bear, Berlin Festival, for Buffalo Bill and the Indians, 1976; Academy Award nomination for Best Director, New York Film Critics Circle Award for Best Film and Best Director, for The Player, 1992; Academy Award nomination for Best Director, for Short Cuts. Agent: Johnny Planco, William Morris Agency, 1325 Avenue of the Americas, New York, NY 10019. Address: Sandcastle 5 Productions, 502 Park Avenue, Suite 15G, New York, NY 10022–1108.

Films as Director:

1954 The Builders (medium length publicity film)
1955 The Delinquents (+ pr, sc)
1957 The James Dean Story (co-d, + co-pr, co-ed)
1964 The Party (short); Nightmare in Chicago (Once upon a Savage Night) (for TV)
1965 Pot au Feu (short); The Katherine Reed Story (short)
1967 Countdown (moon-landing sequence uncred by William Conrad)
1969 That Cold Day in the Park
1970 M*A*S*H; Brewster McCloud (+ pr)
1971 McCabe and Mrs. Miller (+ co-sc)
1972 Images (+ pr, sc)
1973 The Long Goodbye
1974 Thieves like Us (+ co-sc); California Split (+ co-pr)
1975 Nashville (+ co-pr, co-songwriter: “The Day I Looked Jesus in the Eye”)
1976 Buffalo Bill and the Indians, or Sitting Bull’s History Lesson (+ pr, co-sc)
1977 Three Women (+pr, sc)
1978 A Wedding (+ pr, co-sc)
1979 Quintet (+ pr, co-sc); A Perfect Couple (+ pr, co-sc)
1979 Health (+ pr, sc)
1980 Popeye
1981 The Easter Egg Hunt
1982 Come Back to the Five and Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean; Two by South (“Rattlesnake in a Cooler” and “Precious Blood”) (for TV) (+pr)
1983 Streamers (+ pr); O.C. and Stiggs (+ pr) (released 1987)
1985 The Laundromat (for TV)
1986 "Les Boreades" in Aria: Beyond Therapy (+ co-sc); The Room (for TV); The Dumb Waiter (for TV)
1988 Tanner '88; The Caine Mutiny Court-Martial (+ pr)
1991 Interview with Jonathan Rosenbaum and Charles Michener, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1978.
1990 Vincent and Theo
1992 The Player
1993 Short Cuts (+ sc)
1994 The Real McTeague (for TV, opera)
1995 Ready to Wear (Pret a Porter) (+ sc)
1996 Jazz—34 (+ pr); Kansas City (+ sc, pr)
1997 Gun (series for TV) (+ pr)
1998 The Gingerbread Man (+ sc, ro as Al Hayes)
1999 Cookie's Fortune (+ pr); Another City, Not My Own
2000 Dr. T and the Women (+ pr)

Other Films:

1948 Bodyguard (co-story)
1951 Corn's-a-Poppin' (co-sc)
1976 Welcome to L.A. (Rudolph) (pr)
1977 The Late Show (Benton) (pr)
1978 Remember My Name (Rudolph) (pr)
1979 Rich Kids (Young) (pr)
1983 Luck, Trust & Ketchup: Robert Altman in Carver County (Dorr, Kaplan) (doc)
1997 Afterglow (Rudolph) (pr); Frank Capra's American Dream (Boswer—for TV) (as himself)
1998 Liv
1999 Trixie; Hitchcock: Shadow of a Genius (Haimes—for TV) (as himself)

Publications

By ALTMAN: book—

By ALTMAN: articles—

Interview with S. Rosenthal, in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1972.
Interview with Michel Ciment and Bertrand Tavernier, in Positif (Paris), February 1973.
Robert Altman Seminar, in Dialogue on Film (Beverly Hills), February 1975.

Interview with Jean-André Fieschi, in Cinémagraphe (Paris), June 1977.
Interview with Jonathan Rosenbaum and Charles Michener, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1978.
Interview and article by J.-P. Le Pavec and others, in Cinéma (Paris), November 1978.
Interview with Michel Ciment and M. Henry, in Positif (Paris), March 1979.
Interview with Leo Braudy and Robert Phillip Kolker, in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Fall 1981 and Winter 1982.
"A Foolish Optimist": Interview with Robert Altman,” by H. Kloman, Lloyd Michaels, and Virginia Wright Wexman, in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1983.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), June 1984.
Interview with Steven Aronson, in Architectural Digest, March 1990.
Interview with Graham Fuller, in Interview, May 1992.
Interview with Thomas Bourguignon and others, in Positif (Paris), January 1994.
Interview with Philippe Rouyer and Michael Henry, in Positif (Paris), May 1996.

On ALTMAN: film—

On ALTMAN: books—

On ALTMAN: articles—

Engle, Gary, “‘McCabe and Mrs. Miller: Robert Altman’s Anti-Western,’” in Journal of Popular Film (Bowling Green, Ohio), Fall 1972.

Stewart, Garrett, “The Long Goodbye from Chinatown,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1974/75.

Oliver, Bill, “The Long Goodbye and Chinatown: Debunking the Private Eye Tradition,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1975.

“Altman Issue” of Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1975.

Byrne, Connie, and William O. Lopez, “Nashville (An Interview Documentary),” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1975/76.

Yacowar, Maurice, “‘Actors as Conventions in the Films of Robert Altman,’” in Cinema Journal (Evanston), Fall 1980.

Edgerton, G., “‘Capra and Altman: Mythmaker and Mythologist,’” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.

Farber, Stephen, “‘Five Horsemen after the Apocalypse,’” in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1985.

Wolcott, James, “‘Jack Tanner, for Real,’” in Vanity Fair, July 1988.

Film Comment (New York), September/October 1989.

Schiff, Stephen, “_Auteur!_ Auteur!” in Vanity Fair, April 1992.
Henry, B., Gavin Smith, and F. Anthony Macklin, “_Back/Roads to Short Cuts: Faultlines of a Daydream Nation_,” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1993.
Murphy, Kathleen, “A Lion’s Gate: The Cinema according to Robert Altman,” in Film Comment (New York), 1994.
Wollen, Peter, “_Strike a Pose_,” in Sight and Sound (London), March 1995.
Wyatt, Justin, “Economic Constraints/Economic Opportunities: Robert Altman as Auteur,” in Velvet Light Trap (Austin), Fall 1996.
Combs, R., “Kansas City,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1997.

* * *

The American 1970s may have been dominated by a “New Wave” of younger, auteurist-inspired filmmakers including George Lucas, Peter Bogdanovich, Steven Spielberg, Martin Scorsese, and Francis Ford Coppolla, all contemporaries as well as sometime colleagues. It is, however, an outsider to this group, the older Robert Altman—perhaps that decade’s most consistent chronicler of human behavior—who could be characterized as the artistic rebel most committed to an unsparing personal vision. If the generation of whiz kids tends to admire the American cinema as well as its structures of production, Altman tends to regard the American cinema critically and to view the production establishment more as an adversary to be cunningly exploited on the way to an almost European ambiguity.

Although Altman has worked consistently within American genres, his work can instructively be seen as anti-genre: _McCabe and Mrs. Miller_ is a kind of anti-western, exposing the myth of the heroic westerner (as described by Robert Warshow and executed by John Wayne and John Ford) and replacing it with an almost Marxist view of the Westerner as financier, spreading capitalism and corruption with opportunism and good cheer. _The Long Goodbye_ sets itself in opposition to certain aspects of the hard-boiled detective genre, as Elliott Gould’s Philip Marlowe reflects a moral stance decidedly more ambiguous than that of Raymond Chandler’s conventional lonely moralist. Similarly, _Countdown_ can be seen in relationship to the science-fiction film; _Thieves like Us_ (based on _They Live by Night_) in relationship to the bandit-gangster film; _That Cold Day in the Park_ in relationship to the psychological horror film inaugurated by Alfred Hitchcock’s _Psycho_; and _California Split_ in relationship to that generic phenomenon so common to the 1970s, the “buddy film.” Even _Nashville_, Altman’s complex bicentennial musical released in 1975, can be seen in relationship to a generic tradition with roots in _Grand Hotel_ and branches in _Earthquake_, for it is a kind of disaster film about the American dream.

Aside from his generic preoccupations, Altman seems especially interested in people. His films characteristically contain perceptive observations, telling exchanges, and moments of crystal clear revelation of human folly. Altman’s comments are made most persuasively in relationship to a grand social organization: that of the upper classes and _nouveaux riches_ in _A Wedding_; health faddists and, metaphorically, the American political process, in _Health_; and so forth. Certainly, Altman’s films offer a continuous critique of American society: people are constantly using and exploiting others, though often with the tacit permission of those being exploited. One thinks of the country-western singers’ exploitation by the politician’s P.R. man in _Nashville_, for instance, or the spinster in _That Cold Day in the Park_. Violence is often the climax of an Altman film—almost as if the tensions among the characters must ultimately explode. Notable examples include the fiery deaths and subsequent “surprise ending” in _A Wedding_, or the climactic assassination in _Nashville_. Another recurring interest for Altman in his preoccupation with the psycho-pathology of women: one thinks of the subtly encroaching madness of Sandy Dennis’s sexually repressed spinster in _That Cold Day in the Park_, an underrated, early Altman film; the disturbing instability of Ronee Blakley in _Nashville_; the relationships among the unbalanced subjects of _Three Women_, based on one of Altman’s own dreams; and the real/surreal visions of Susannah York in the virtual horror film, _Images_. Because almost all of Altman’s characters tend to be hypocritical, psychotic, weak, or morally flawed in some way, with very few coming to a happy end, Altman has often been attacked for a kind of trendy cynicism. The director’s cynicism, however, seems a result of his genuine attempt to avoid the conventional myth-making of the American cinema. Altman imbues as many of his characters as possible with that sloppy imperfection associated with human beings as they are, with life as it is lived.

Performers enjoy working with Altman in part because he provides them with the freedom to develop their characters and often alter the script through improvisation and collaboration. Like Bergman, Altman has worked often with a stock company of performers who appear in one role after another, among them Elliott Gould, Sally Kellerman, Rene Auberjonois, Keith Carradine, Shelley Duvall, Michael Murphy, Bert Remsen, and Henry Gibson.

Altman’s distinctive style transforms whatever subject he approaches. He often takes advantage of widescreen compositions in which the frame is filled with a number of subjects and details that compete for the spectator’s attention. Working with cinematographer Vilmos Zsigmond, he has achieved films that are visually distinguished and tend toward the atmospheric. Especially notable are the use of the zoom lens in the smoky cinematography of _McCabe and Mrs. Miller_; the reds, whites, and blues of _Nashville_; the constantly mobile camera, specially mounted, of _The Long Goodbye_, which so effortlessly reflects the hazy moral center of the world the film presents; and the pastel prettiness of _A Wedding_, particularly the first appearance of that icon of the American cinema, Lillian Gish, whose subsequent filmic death propels the narrative.

Altman’s use of multi-track sound is also incredibly complex: sounds are layered upon one another, often emanating from different speakers in such a way that the audience member must also decide what to listen for. Indeed, watching and listening to an Altman film inevitably requires an active participant: events unroll with a Bazinian ambiguity. Altman’s Korean War comedy M*A*S*H was the director’s first public success with this kind of soundtrack. One of his more extreme uses of this technique can be found in McCabe and Mrs. Miller, generally thought to be among the director’s finest achievements.

Nashville, Altman’s most universally acclaimed work, provides a panoramic view of the American experience and society as it follows the interrelated experiences of twenty-four characters in the country-western music capital. In its almost three-hour length, Nashville accumulates a power of the whole even greater than the vivid individual parts which themselves resonate in the memory: the incredibly controlled debut performance of Lily Tomlin and the sensitive performances of at least a dozen others; the lesson on sexual politics Altman delivers when he photographs several women listening to a song by Keith Carradine; the vulnerability of Ronone Blakley, who suffers a painful breakdown in front of her surprisingly fickle fans; the expressions on the faces of the men who watch Gwen Welles’s painfully humiliating striptease; and the final cathartic song of Barbara Harris, as Altman suddenly reveals the conventional “Star is Born” myth in his apparent anti-musical, like a magician stunning us with an unexpected trick.

Overall, Altman’s career itself has been rather weird. His output since M*A*S*H has been prodigious indeed, especially in light of the fact that a great number of his films have been financial and/or critical failures. In fact, several of his films, among them A Perfect Couple and Quintet (with Paul Newman) barely got a national release; and Health (which starred Glenda Jackson, Carol Burnett, James Garner, and Lauren Bacall) languished on the shelf for years before achieving even a limited release in New York City. The most amazing thing about Altman’s Popeye, which was relatively successful with critics and the public (though not the blockbuster that Hollywood had counted on), was that Altman managed to secure the assignment at all. The film that emerged was one of the most cynical and ultimately disturbing of children’s films, in line with Altman’s consistent vision of human beings and social organization.

Altman’s career in the 1980s veered sharply away from mainstream film, dominated instead by a number of film adaptations of theatre pieces, including Come Back to the Five & Dime, Jimmy Dean, Jimmy Dean; Streamers; The Laundromat; Secret Honor; Beyond Therapy; and Fool for Love. Although many of these works are fascinating and contain incredibly modulated performances and surprisingly evocative cinematography (particularly Jimmy Dean), these films have not been particularly influential or financially successful. But they allowed Altman to continue to make notable films in a Spielberg-dominated era that was otherwise largely hostile to his provocative filmmaking.

Vincent and Theo, one of the few Altman films in this period that did not start out as a play, received much positive notice. Altman’s decision to preface his film with documentary footage of a present-day auction in which millions of dollars are offered for a single Van Gogh painting was particularly stunning in a Brechtian way. He then begins his narrative story of Van Gogh’s lifetime financial failure, trying to remain true to his painter’s vision. Certainly, it is the parallels between Van Gogh and Altman which incite the director’s interest. Tanner ’88, a mock documentary about the 1988 American presidential campaign which many critics consider among Altman’s master works, was even more amazing. It was a cult hit which marked Altman’s return to the kind of satire with which he had already excelled. Unfortunately, its distribution on cable TV prevented this work from reaching a wide audience.

The most stunning development in Altman’s career is the total critical and financial comeback he made with 1992’s The Player, a film that appeared long after most Hollywood executives had written him off. The most insightful and scathing satire about Hollywood and filmmaking today, The Player hiliariously skewed one target after another (the pitch, the Hollywood restaurant, the Hollywood party, the dispensable writer), in the process winning the New York Film Critics Circle awards for Best Film and Best Director. Contributing to the film’s popular success were the dozens of stars who took cameos as themselves in order to support Altman, whom they have always admired.

The success of The Player allowed Robert Altman to go forward with his most ambitious project since Nashville. Another panoramic narrative featuring dozens of characters, a rich soundtrack, striking cinematography, and sensitive performances, this film is set in contemporary Los Angeles and based on short stories by Raymond Carver. The result, Short Cuts, is one of those rare contemporary American films which truly examines American values (or what passes for them) and dissects life as it is being lived today. The film is memorable from its opening images of helicopters sweeping over Los Angeles to spray for the Medfly infestation to its closing images of urban violence and earthquake; from its depiction of Angelenos struggling to connect with each other through phone sex and illicit liaisons to its presentation of bitterness, silence, and missed rapprochement as the standard American condition. Central to Short Cuts is the ubiquitousness of violence in American life, particularly against women, and the thesis that men’s passive insensitivity often masks a profound hatred of women and a propensity for aggression. No act of violence in Short Cuts results in punishment, just in more apathy. A trader in ironies and social criticism, Altman emphasizes all the ways we deceive each other; and hardly any of the relationships presented—between parents and children, between husbands and wives—are marked by open, honest, useful exchanges; indeed, the jazz theme “I Don’t Know You,” which is sung by one character as her daughter is about to commit suicide, works as the film’s most prescient theme. Notable, too, is how another character describes her own paintings as being “about seeing, and the responsibility that comes with that.” From that message, Altman cuts to a group of men who’ve found the body of a raped woman, but choose to ignore it, lest it interrupt their fishing weekend. As a reaction against an eighties culture that championed special effects and mindless entertainment (Star Wars, Indiana Jones, Conan, etc.), Altman’s admonition to see the world and take responsibility emerges as the courageous stand of a visionary artist still viable and surprising. Like Nashville, Short Cuts is a key Altman film which will undoubtedly come to be regarded as a masterpiece of the American cinema. In fact, both films can be seen as providing the inspirational blueprint for many other filmmakers—particularly Paul Thomas Anderson (whose controversial 1999 Magnolia uses several cast members borrowed from the Altman films) and Todd Solondz (whose disturbing 1998 Happiness uses a similar interlocking narrative within a mode of ironic social criticism).
In 1994 Altman took on the fashion industry in Ready to Wear (Prêt-à-Porter). Critics and the public were less kind in their regard for this panoramic satire, but the film was nevertheless witty and controlled, more subtle and light-hearted than had been anticipated. The film’s finale—whereby a group of models parade nude—marked the witty and appropriate conclusion of Altman’s satire on the political/ideological implications of fashion and its capacity to demean our values. Unfortunately, three recent Altman films seems less impressive, if focused on the indigenous local color of their respective regional portraits. Kansas City, in 1996, presents a murky canvas of gangsterism, ‘‘dope’’ addiction, and black jazz in the early thirties Kansas City. The Gingerbread Man, in 1998, reportedly written by Altman pseudonymously, is a thriller about a lawyer involved with a troubled young woman. In contrast to the sharp visual and aural clarity of Hitchcock’s thrillers, The Gingerbread Man is suffused with such stunningly atmospheric cinematography and overlapping sound (indeed, it virtually never stops raining in the film), that we feel like we are eavesdropping on real people, rather than watching a narrative work its way to a fairly predictable (if effective) conclusion. And finally, the 1999 Cookie’s Fortune, set in Holly Springs, Mississippi, is a rather charming evocation of the genuine quirkiness of small-town life, using some of the typical Altman structures from Nashville, but within a much smaller framework.

As a postscript on Altman, one should add that he, more than any other director, should never be counted out as an important force in American film culture. If Altman’s work is sometimes uneven, the fact that he continues to work on projects which are political, ideological, and personal—refusing to compromise his own artistic vision—is a sign that he remains, even in his late seventies, the United States’ single most ambitious director. His future agenda is ambitious, including a film of Another City, Not My Own, the strange Dominick Dunne novel based on Dunne’s experiences as a journalist covering the sensational murder trial in Los Angeles of O. J. Simpson. Although Altman might seem to be the perfect director, in a culminating masterpiece, to deal with the human circus of venality and opportunism which was the Simpson trial, Altman’s peripatetic popularity with Hollywood backers suggests that this project is by no means a sure thing, no matter how eagerly anticipated the results.

—Charles Derry

ALVAREZ, Santiago

Films as Director:

1960 Un año de libertad (co-d)
1961 Escambray; Muerte al invasor (co-d)
1962 Forjadores de la paz; Cumplimos; Crisis en el Caribe
1963 Ciclon; El Barbaro del Ritmo; Fidel en la URSS
1964 Vía libre a la zafra del ’64; Primeros Juegos Deportivos Militares
1965 Solidaridad Cuba y Vietnam; Cuba dos de enero; Pedales sobra Cuba; Now; Segunda Declaracion de la Habana; La escalada del chantaje
1966 Abril de Giron; Cerro Pelado; Año Siete; Ocho años de Revolucion
1967 La guerra olvidados (Laos, the Forgotten War); Hasta la victoria siempre (Till Victory Always); Golpeando en la selva; Hanoi, martes 13
1968 Amarrando el Cordón; L.B.J.
1969 Despede a la 18.00; 79 Primaveras (79 Springtimes of Ho Chi Minh)
1970 Once por cero; Piedra sobre piedra; El sueño del Pongo; Yanapanacuna
1971 Quemando tradiciones; Como, por qué y para qué asesina a un general?; La estampida; El pájaro del faro
1972 De America soy hijo . . . y a ella me debo
1973 Y el cielo fue tomado por asalto; El tigre salto y mato . . . pero morira . . . morira (The Tiger Leaped and Killed, But He Will Die, He Will Die)
1974 60 Minutos con el primer mundial de boxeo amateur; Rescate; Los cuatro puentes
1975 Abril de Vietnam en el año del gato; El primer delegado
1976 El Tiempo es el viento; El sol no se puede tapar con un dedo; Luanda ya no es de San Pablo; Morir por la patria es vivir; Maputo; Meridian Novo; Los Dragones de Ha-Long
1977 Mi Hermano Fidel; El Octubre de todos
1978 Sobre el problema fronterizo entre Kampuchea y Vietnam; . . . y la noche se hizo arcoiris
1979 El Gran salto al vacio; Tengo fe en ti; La cumbre que nos une; El desafío
1980 Celia, imagen del pueblo; Marcha del pueblo combatiente; El mayo de las tres banderas; Un Amazonas de pueblo embravecido; Lo que el viento se llevó; La guerra necesaria
1981 La importancia universal del hueco; Tiempo libre a la roca; Comienzo a retumbar el Momtombo; 26 es también 19; Mazazo macizo; Contrapunto
1982 Nova sinfonía; A galope sobre la historia; Operación abril del Caribe
1983 Los refugiados de la Cueva del Muerto (+ sc); Biografia de un carnaval; Las campanas también pueden doblar mañana
1984 Gracias Santiago; Dos rostros y una sola imagen; El soñador del Kremlin; Por primera vez; elecciones libres
1985 Taller de la vida; La soledad de los dioses; Reencuentro
1986 Las antípodas de la victoria; Aires de renovación en el meridiano 37; Memorias de un reencuentro
1987 Brascuba
1997 Concierto por la vida; Concierto mayor

Publications

By ALVAREZ: book—

By ALVAREZ: articles—

“Santiago Alvarez habla de su cine,” in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), July/August 1970.

Interview in Cineaste (New York), vol. 6, no. 4, 1975.

Interview with M. Pereira, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 104, 1983.

Interview with C. Galiano and R. Chavez, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 107, 1984.

“Hablard de estas fotos: Conversación con Santiago Alvarez,” in Revolución y Cultura (Havana), November 1986.

On ALVAREZ: books—

On ALVAREZ: articles—

Sutherland, Elizabeth, “Cinema of Revolution—90 Miles from Home,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1961/62.

* * * *

Predominantly associated with the educational or the exotic in the United States, the documentary film occupies a very different place in the cinema of revolutionary Cuba. Between 90 and 95 percent of the films produced under the revolution have been documentaries, and the man most responsible for the international stature of Cuban documentary cinema is Santiago Alvarez.

As the director of the weekly “‘Latin American Newsreel” produced by the Cuban Film Institute (ICAIC), Alvarez directed an enormous number of newsreels as well as many other short and feature-length documentaries. Never having formally studied cinema, he became a filmmaker by “handling millions of feet of film.” Alvarez felt himself to be a journalist, but believed that cinematic journalism should have a permanence beyond simple reportage. To achieve such transcendency, Alvarez’s newsreels are typically monothematic and integrated, with the result that they appear more like individual documentary films than the sort of generalized news reporting normally associated with newsreels.

The dominant characteristic of Alvarez’s style is the extraordinarily rhythmic blend of visual and audio forms. Alvarez utilized everything at hand to convey his message: live and historical documentary footage, still photos, bits from TV programs and fiction films, animation, and an incredible range of audio accompaniment. Believing that “50 percent of the value of a film is in the soundtrack,” Alvarez mixed rock, classical, and tropical music, sound effects, participant narration—even silence—into the furious pace of his visual images. For Alvarez, cinema had its own language, different from that of television or of radio, and the essence of this language is montage.

Alvarez’s documentaries focus on both national and international themes. For example, Ciclon is an early newsreel on the effects of hurricane Flora in Cuba. Although it lacks the elaborate visual montage for which Alvarez later became famous, the film shows great skill in the use of sound. There is no verbal narration, and the track is limited to the source sound of trucks and helicopters, and the organ music which eerily punctuates the scenes of caring for the wounded and burying the dead.

Now, a short dealing with racism in the United States and edited to the rhythm of Lena Horne’s song, shows the master at his best in working with still photographs. Particularly effective is a sequence in which Alvarez cuts between the chained hands of arrested blacks and the linked hands of protestors to suggest a dynamic of collective struggle in which people are seen not only as products of their circumstances, but as historical actors capable of changing their circumstances. Here, Alvarez fuses ideology and art by making graphic the third of Marx’s “Theses on Feuerbach.” Alvarez’s tribute to Che Guevara, Hasta la victoria siempre, deals with much the same concept. He begins with a series of beautifully shot stills of poverty in the Altiplano. Then, following footage of Che speaking in the Sierra Maestra of Cuba, he dissolves a still of Che into a still of a Gulf Oil Company camp in Bolivia. Through this technique he links the earlier struggle in Cuba with the later guerrilla war in the Andes.

One of the finest examples of Alvarez’s work is 79 Springtimes, a beautifully controlled montage on Ho Chi Minh’s life and death. He opens the short by ironically mixing elapsed-time photography of flowers opening with slow-motion footage of bombs falling from United States planes. He goes on to cut between scenes of United States atrocities in Vietnam and protest marches in the U.S., visually depicting the position that the real enemy is not the people of the U.S., but the ruling class and its mercenaries. In the final sequence, Alvarez uses what seems to be every available visual effect—torn and burned strips of film, film frames, bits of paper—to create an incredible animated montage. The soundtrack underscores the visual dynamic with music and poems by Ho Chi Minh and Jose Martí.

Even since his death in 1998, Alvarez continues to be thought of as one of the foremost documentary filmmakers in Latin America, although some consider his earlier short films to be superior to the later and longer works. This may result from the fact that in the earlier films the line between heroes (Che, Ho Chi Minh) and villains (U.S. imperialism and racism) was more clearly drawn, while his later works reflected the international compromises with the Soviet Union and reformist Latin American governments that have been required of the Cuban revolution. Nonetheless, Alvarez persisted in his indefatigable quest for an “audacious and constantly renewed optic.”

—John Mraz

ANDERSON, Lindsay

Films as Director:

1948 Meet the Pioneers (+ sc, co-ed, narration)
1949 Idrers That Work (+ sc, narration)
1952 Three Installations (+ sc, narration); Trunk Conveyor (+ sc, narration); Wakefield Express (+ sc)
1953 Thursday’s Children (co-d, + co-sc); O Dreamland (+ sc)
1955 Green and Pleasant Land (+ sc); Henry (+ sc, role); The Children Upstairs (+ sc); A Hundred Thousand Children (+ sc); £20 a Ton (+ sc); Energy First (+ sc); Foot and Mouth (+ sc, narration)
1957 Every Day except Christmas (+ sc)
1963 This Sporting Life
1967 The White Bus; Raz, dwa, trzy (The Singing Lesson) (+ sc)
1969 If. . . : (+ pr)
1972 O Lucky Man! (+ co-pr)
1974 In Celebration
1982 Britannia Hospital
1985 Wish You Were There (Foreign Skies)
1986 The Whales of August

1988 Glory! Glory!
1993 Is That All There Is? (+ sc, role)

Other Films:

1949 Out of Season (Brendon) (narrator)
1952 The Pleasure Garden (Broughton) (pr, role)
1956 Together (Mazzetti) (supervising ed)
1958 March to Aldermaston (supervising ed)
1960 Let My People Go (Krish) (sponsor)
1962 The Story of Private Pooley (Alsen) (English-language version of Der Schwur des Soldaten Pooley) (narrator)
1965 The Threatening Sky (Ivens) (English-language version of Le Ciel, la terre) (narrator)
1966 Mucednici lásky (Martyrs of Love) (Nemec) (role)
1967 About ‘The White Bus’ (Fletcher) (role as himself)
1968 Abel Gance—The Charm of Dynamite (Brownlow) (for TV) (narrator); Inadmissible Evidence (Page) (role)
1969 The Parachute (Page) (for TV) (role)
1970 Hetty King—Performer (Robinson) (narrator)
1971 A Mirror from India (Sarabhai) (narrator)
1981 Chariots of Fire (Hudson) (role as schoolmaster)
1991 Prisoner of Honor (for TV) (role as war minister)
1992 Blame It on the Bellboy (role as Mr. Marshall)
1994 Lucky Man (role as himself)

Publications

By ANDERSON: books—

By ANDERSON: articles—

“The Film Front,” in Sequence (London), Summer 1949.
“Notes at Cannes,” in Sequence (London), New Year issue 1950.
“Goldwyn at Claridges,” in Sequence (London), New Year issue 1951.
Lindsay Anderson

“As the Critics Like It: Some Personal Choices,” in Sight and Sound (London), October/December 1952.

“Stand Up! Stand Up!,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1956.

“Notes from Sherwood,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1956.

“Ten Feet Tall,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.

“The Critical Issue: A Discussion between Paul Rotha, Basil Wright, Lindsay Anderson, Penelope Houston,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1957.

“Two Inches off the Ground,” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1957.

“An Interview with Lindsay Anderson,” with Peter Cowie, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1964.

“The Film Maker and the Audience,” in Film Makers on Film Making, edited by Harry Geduld, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.

Interview in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), October 1987.

Interview with S. Stewart and L. Friedman, in Film Criticism, vol. 16, no. 1, 1991/92.
On ANDERSON: books—

On ANDERSON: articles—

Milne, Tom, “This Sporting Life,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.
Houston, Penelope, “Parker, Attenborough, Anderson,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1986.

* * *

In a 1958 essay titled “Get out and Push,” Lindsay Anderson expressed his approach to working in the cinema. The way Anderson, the individual, approached working in the cinema paralleled the world view he put forth in feature films: the individual must examine the basis of the system within which he finds himself, “the motives that sustain it and the interests that it serves.” It is the responsibility of the individual to actively seek a new self-definition beyond the confines of the established system; the individual cannot look for change to come from or through any outside authority—political, social, or spiritual. This theme is consistently present in Anderson’s feature films.

In This Sporting Life, Anderson approaches the repression of a traditionally structured society through the personal, subjective story of Frank Machin and Margaret Hammond. The setting of This Sporting Life, an industrial northern city, is an environment divided into economic classes, a division which serves to emphasize the central problem of the film—the division within Frank Machin. Machin finds himself limited to the realm of the physical, and constantly attempts to connect with others on an emotional level. Despite his attempts, he is only seen in terms of his physical qualities; he is valued only when he is participating in the physical act of playing rugby.

Frank Machin is aware of his limitations but does not know how to change; he lacks direction. He tries to make others responsible for his happiness: Margaret Hammond, the rugby team, and even the elites of society who populate the world of Mr. and Mrs. Weaver, owners of the rugby team. Machin constantly attempts to break into the established system, seemingly unaware that it is this same system which controls and restrains him.

Mick Travis, the protagonist of Anderson’s second feature film, If..., struggles instead to break out of the established system. Mick takes on the responsibility of action, and although his revolution is not complete, he does not remain trapped like Frank. The environment in If..., the English public school system, is a metaphor for the “separation of intellect from imagination,” according to Elizabeth Sussex. The environment of College House does not allow for the creative development of the individual. It encourages separation and fragmentation of the self.

Film technique in If... also serves to reveal the narrative theme of the division of the self. The chapter headings physically divide the film into rigidly ordered sections, reflecting the separation of intellect and imagination encouraged by the nature of the tradition of College House. These chapter headings, along with the alternation between black and white and color film, function as distancing devices, making the viewer more aware of the medium.

A narrative technique Anderson used to illustrate the process that leads to Mick’s eventual break from the system is the establishment of verbal language as an essential part of the structure of College House. When Mick expresses his disdain for College House through words, they are simply absorbed by the system. There is no change in Mick’s situation until he initiates action by bayoneting the college chaplain. After this point, Mick no longer recites revolutionary rhetoric; in fact, he rarely speaks. He is no longer existing within the structure of College House. Totally free of the system, Mick launches into the destruction of the established order. Mick is no longer acted upon but is the creator of action; in this respect, he triumphs where Frank Machin fails.

In O Lucky Man!, the thematic sequel to If..., the medium of film itself becomes one of the narrative themes, and self-reflexive film techniques serve to reveal not only the narrative theme of self-definition, but also the process of filmmaking. The titles used in O Lucky Man! announce the different sections of the film but do not impose order; on the contrary, their abrupt appearance and brevity tend to interrupt the order of the narrative. It is as if the medium of film itself breaks through to remind the viewer of its existence. Indeed the medium, specifically the energy the medium generates, is one of the themes of O Lucky Man! The process of creation in the medium far exceeds anything Mick accomplishes in the narrative until the two meet in the final sequence.
Mick Travis, the character, confronts Lindsay Anderson, the director, at an audition for the film O Lucky Man! Mick obediently projects the different emotions Anderson demands of him until he is asked to smile. It is at this point that Mick finally takes action and rejects a direct order: “What is there to smile about?” he asks. Mick is looking outside himself for motivation, as he has done throughout the film, before he will take action. Anderson, exasperated, strikes Mick with a script. After receiving the blow, Mick is able to smile. He soon finds that he is one of the actors in the film; he too is capable of creating action.

Britannia Hospital, the final work in the series begun by If. . . presents a much darker vision than Anderson’s previous films. As in If. . ., the physical environment of the film—the hospital—is a metaphor for a static, repressive system. Unlike If. . ., this film contains little hope for change or progress, not for the individual and certainly not within the system itself. Mick Travis appears in this film as an investigative reporter who has achieved success by selling “something the people want,” a reference to his former position in O Lucky Man! and a description of his motives as a news reporter. He is attempting to expose the questionable experiments of Britannia Hospital staff member Dr. Millar, the same unethical researcher from O Lucky Man! Although Mick puts up a fight, the system finally overwhelms him in this film.

Glory! Glory! a Home Box Office production, is somewhat of a synthesis of Anderson’s previous work in both theme and technique. The institution that stands as metaphor in this case is one peculiar to the United States, a television evangelism empire—the Church of the Companions of Christ. Like the school in If. . ., this institution has a verbal language essential to its structure, the use of which sanctions just about any action. Throughout the film people have “revelations” or “visions” in which God makes key decisions for them, removing all personal responsibility. Any action is justifiable—deception, fraud, blackmail—as long as it is done in “a holy cause” or “for the church.”

The film techniques Anderson uses in Glory! Glory! are related to his earlier works. The medium is present throughout the narrative in the form of chapter headings and blackouts between chapters. Music is important to the narrative, as it is in O Lucky Man! but in the later film it is integrated into the narrative structure rather than used as a distancing device.

The theme of personal responsibility for self-definition is clearly seen in the character of Ruth. She struggles throughout the film with the idea of who she wants to be and with the identities others want to impose on her. She reaches a key point in her personal progression when she admits that she has always needed some kind of crutch—sex, drugs, God. Not long after realizing that she has been looking outside herself for an identity, Ruth reveals that she finally understands God. In essence, she has created her own god, her own mythology. Ruth remains within the system, but for the first time actually believes in what she is “selling” because she has defined for herself the “authority” and the basis for the system.

Anderson’s other features, In Celebration and The Whales of August, contain more subjective narratives but still explore the theme of the individual’s responsibility for self-definition. In his last film, Is That All There Is?, an autobiographical documentary made for the BBC, Anderson presents himself as such an individual: an independent artist who actively sought a self-definition beyond the confines of the established system.

—Marie Saeli

---

ANGELOPOULOS, Theodoros

Nationality: Greek. Born: Athens, 27 April 1935; surname also spelled Anghelopoulos. Education: Studied in Athens, 1953–59, Sorbonne, Paris, 1961–64, and at IDHEC, Paris, 1962–63. Military Service: 1959–60. Career: Film critic for left-wing journal Dimokratiki Allaghi until its suppression in 1967 coup; worked as lawyer until 1969; began association with cinematographer Giorgios Arvanitis on Reconstruction, 1970; taught at Stavrakou Film School in 1970s. Awards: Georges Sadoul Award, 1971; FIPRESCI Award, 1973, for Days of ’36; FIPRESCI Grand Prix, Golden Age Award, B.F.I. Best Film, Interfilm Award, for The Travelling Players; Golden Hugo Award, for The Hunters; Golden Lion Award, Venice, 1980; Cannes Film Festival Palme d’Or, for Eternity and a Day, 1998; Chevalier des Arts et des Lettres.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

- 1968 Ekpombi (The Broadcast; L’Emission)
- 1970 Anaparastassi (Reconstruction; Reconstitution) (+ ro)
- 1972 Mères tou 36 (Days of ’36; Jours de 36)
- 1975 O Thiagos (The Travelling Players; Le Voyage des comédiens)
- 1977 I Kynighi (The Hunters) (+ co-pr)
- 1980 O Megalexandros (Alexander the Great) (+ pr)
- 1982 Athens (doc)
- 1984 Taxidi sta Kithira (Voyage to Cythera)
- 1986 O Melissokomos (The Beekeeper)

---

Theodoros Angelopoulos
1988 Topio stia Omichli (Landscape in the Mist)

1991 The Suspended Step of the Stork (+pr)

1995 Ulysses’ Gaze (+pr); episode in Lumière et Compagnie (Lumière and Company)

1998 Mia Aiwniothta kai Mia Mera (Eternity and a Day) (+pr, +sc)

Other Films:

1968 Kieron (role)

Publications

By ANGELOPOULOS: books—

Interview with A. Faber, in Filmvilag, vol. 36, no. 1, 1993.

On ANGELOPOULOS: books—

On ANGELOPOULOS: articles—

Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1975.

Giacci, V., in Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1976.

Stevens, Julie, “Ulysses’ Gaze,” in Empire (London), March 1996.

* * *

Theodoros Angelopoulos’s considerable achievements in cinema during the 1970s and 1980s have made him not only the most important Greek filmmaker to date, but one of the truly creative and original artists of his time. In 1970 he convinced producer George Papalios to finance his first film, Anaparastassi. The story follows the pattern of a crime tale à la James Cain. A Greek peasant is killed by his wife and her lover on his return from Germany, where he had gone to find work. A judge tries to reconstruct the circumstances of the murder, but finds himself unable to communicate with the accused, who belong to a totally different culture. To shoot this Pirandellian story of misunderstanding, Angelopoulos adopted an austere style featuring long camera movements that show a bleak and desolate Greek landscape far removed from the tourist leaflets. Reminiscent of Visconti’s Ossessione, this is a film noir that opens the way to more daring aesthetic ventures.

Angelopoulos’s trilogy of Days of 36, The Travelling Players, and The Hunters can be seen as an exploration of contemporary Greek history. If his style shows some influences—particularly Jancsó’s one reel-one take methodology and Antonioni’s slow, meditative mood—Angelopoulos has nevertheless created an authentic epic cinema akin to Brecht’s theatre in which aesthetic emotion is counterbalanced by a reflexive approach that questions the surfaces of reality. The audience is not allowed to identify with a central character, nor to follow a dramatic development, nor given a reassuring morality. The director boldly goes from the present to the past within the same shot, and in The Hunters broadens his investigation by including the fantasies of his characters. The sweep of a movie like Travelling Players, which includes songs and dances, is breathtaking. Its tale of an actors group circulating through Greece from 1939 to 1952 performing a pastoral play is transformed into a four-hour earth odyssey.

Angelopoulos’s masterpiece was preceded by the haunting Days of ’36. This political thriller about a murder in a prison proved a prelude to events of national importance. It is the director’s most radical use of off-screen space and off-screen sound, of the dialectic between the seen and the unseen. With its closed doors, whispering voices in corridors, and silhouettes running to and fro, it evokes the mystery that surrounds the exercise of power.

Angelopoulos’s fifth film, Alexander the Great, breaks new ground: it deals with myth and develops the exploration of the popular unconscious already present in Travelling Players and The Hunters. At the turn of the twentieth century, a bandit is seen as the reincarnation of the Macedonian king. He kidnaps some English residents in Greece and leads them to the mountains. The kidnapper tries to blackmail the British government but ends up killing his hostages. Angelopoulos opposes several groups: the foreigners, the outlaws, some Italian anarchists who have taken refuge in Greece, and village people who try to establish a utopian community. The director’s indictment of hero-worship and his portrayal of diverse forms of political failure reveal a growing pessimism in his works. But his style is as masterful as ever, reaching a kind of austere grandeur reminiscent of Byzantine mosaics. Few have blended political investigation with a search for new forms of expression with such satisfying results.

Ulysses’ Gaze is exclusively preoccupied with the problems of historical reconstruction and personal remembrance. The film, co-scripted by the legendary European screenwriter Tonino Guerra, carries out a nostalgic reconstruction of peaceful and colorful ethnic cohabitation at the Balkan crossroads between Orient and Occident. The narrative of the film breaks away from the linear not only time-wise, but also spatially, providing an ultimately subjective account of a personal experience of history and regionality.

In Ulysses’ Gaze, Angelopoulos created the perfect cinematic language that allowed him to talk of an individual experience of history as superseding time and space. The remarkable use of elaborately manipulated long shots enables the narrative to include complex and magnificent subtleties. The mostly hand-held camera of cameraman Yorgos Arvanitis moves very slowly and is often positioned in such a way that it reveals actions taking place in different semantic layers of the screen space. The events lose their objectivity and are constructed through the gaze of the onlooking protagonist. Older historical interpretations intersect with the perceived significance of newer ones.

In 1995, Angelopoulos was one of forty international directors asked to participate in Lumière and Company, a celebration of one hundred years of filmmaking with the camera invented by the Lumière brothers. For this novelty film, each director was asked to create a film in three takes, a maximum of fifty two seconds in length. Though the film was largely forgettable, the inclusion of Angelopoulos among the forty representative filmmakers clearly shows his status in international film.

His 1998 film, Eternity and a Day, marked a departure in tone from much of his earlier work. Less harsh and more accessible than his earlier films, Eternity and a Day is the story of an old and ill Greek writer who finds meaning in the last days of his life by helping a homeless Albanian child. A poetic film with dense and haunting imagery, it juxtaposes youth and age, national identity and language, patriotism and ethnic hatred to create an intensely human look at the meaning of life and its unlikely sources.

—Michel Ciment, updated by Tina Gianoulis

ANGER, Kenneth

Films (Conception, Direction, Photography, and Editing):

1941 Who Has Been Rocking My Dream Boat
1941/42 Tinsel Tree
1942 Prisoner of Mars
1943 The Nest
1944 Escape Episode

Kenneth Anger
ANGER DIRECTORS, 4th EDITION

1945 Drastic Demise
1946 Escape Episode (sound version)
1947 Fireworks* (+ role as The Dreamer)
1948 Puce Women (unfinished)
1949 Puce Moment*; The Love That Whirls (unfinished)
1950 La Lune des Lapins* (Rabbit’s Moon) (conception, d, and ed only, + prod. design)
1951/52 Maldoror (unfinished)
1953 Eaux d’artifice* (+ costume design); Le Jeune Homme et la mort
1954 Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome* (+ role as Hecate)
1955 Thelema Abbey (conception, d, and ed only)
1962/63 Scorpio Rising
1965 Kustom Kar Kommandos*
1969 Invocation of My Demon Brother*
1971 Rabbit’s Moon
1974 Lucifer Rising*
1980 Lucifer Rising* (second version) (+ role as Magus)
1989 Mouse Heaven

Note: * indicates films contained and distributed in Anger’s definitive portfolio “The Magick Lantern Cycle.”

Other Films:

1985 He Stands in a Desert Counting the Seconds of His Life (role as himself)
1992 Hollywood Babylon (for TV) (advisor)
1993 Jonas in the Desert (role as himself)
1998 Busby Berkeley: Going through the Roof (for TV) (role as himself); Donald Cammell: The Ultimate Performance (role as himself)

Publications

By ANGER: books—

By ANGER: articles—

Interview in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1966.
Interview with Bruce Martin and Joe Medjuck, in Take One (Montreal), August 1967.
Interview with Lenny Lipton, in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), November 1967.
Correspondence between Kenneth Anger and Paul Johnston, in Film Culture (New York), nos. 70–71, 1983.
Interview with J. English, in On Film (Los Angeles), Summer 1983.

Interview in City Limits (London), 7 February 1986.
Interview with Kate Haug, in Wide Angle (Baltimore), October 1996.

On ANGER: books—

On ANGER: articles—

“Filmography of Kenneth Anger,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 31, 1963/64.
Kelman, Kenneth, “Appendix to Thanatos in Chrome,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1964.
Rowe, C., “Illuminating Lucifer,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1974.
One of the key figures of the postwar American avant-garde, Kenneth Anger represents a fiercely original talent, relatively free of the independent circles and movements which his own work managed to anticipate in almost every case. Creator of an oeuvre and a persona defined by their dialectical relationship to dominant representational, ideological, industrial, sexual, and aesthetic practices, Anger embodies the “radical otherness” of the avant-garde filmmaker, casting himself not only outside the mainstream, but as its negative image. While other experimentalists were exploring “ways of seeing” through cinematic abstraction, Anger remained committed to a search for meanings, even as his films pursued a variety of aesthetic paths. Anger’s meanings emerge from his subversive reworkings of sources already charged with significance: the iconography of American popular culture (movie stars, comic strips, car clubs); the conventional rhetoric of narrative forms (from the commedia dell’arte to the lyrics of rock songs); the imagery of classic cinema (Coeptoe, Eisenstein, DeMille); and the symbolism of various mythologies (Egyptian, Greek, astrological, alchemical), centered by the cosmology of master “magickian” Aleister Crowley.

Anger gained international prominence and notoriety at the age of seventeen with his film Fireworks, in which he appeared as the protagonist of a homoerotic fantasy in the oneric tradition of Cocteau and Maya Deren, shot through with the romantic sadism of the American film noir. Three years later, he made Rabbit’s Moon, a delicately humorous, Méliès-like fantasy involving a Pierrot character and a magic lantern, shot in Cocteau’s own studio in Paris. Another three years found Anger in Italy, where he choreographed an elaborately baroque game of hide-and-seek through Tivoli’s water gardens in Eaux d’artifice. Focusing at intervals on the visual patterns of water flowing from the fountains, this film experiments with the textures of an abstract filmic image a full two years before Brakhage’s Wonder Ring. Yet, characteristically, the multiple superimpositions of Anger’s colorful mass/masquerade Inauguration of the Pleasure Dome have less to do with abstraction than with an effort to achieve a magical condensation of mythological imagery. Scorpio Rising, however, remains Anger’s most influential and original work. A tour-de-force collage of pop imagery, it is a paean to the American motorcyclist, a revelation of the violent, homoerotic undercurrent of American culture, and a celebration of the forces of chaos in the universe.

Anger spent most of the mid- to late-1960s on two abortive projects. His Kustom Kar Kommandos was cut short by the death of the young man playing its protagonist, although one sensual sequence, involving the dusting of a custom hot rod with a powder puff, has survived. Far more ambitious, however, was a master opus titled Lucifer Rising, a project cut tragically short when, at a 1967 San Francisco screening of the work-in-progress, the single print of the film was stolen by one of the film’s actors, Manson cultist Bobby Beausoleil, and was supposedly buried somewhere in Death Valley, never to be recovered. This event was followed by Anger’s self-imposed retirement, interrupted in 1969 by the appearance of an eleven-minute structural black mass constructed largely of Lucifer’s outtakes, backed by a maddeningly monotonous soundtrack by Mick Jagger, and titled Invocation of My Demon Brother. By 1974, however, Anger had completed another version of Lucifer Rising, a dense meditative work shot mostly in Egypt, imbued with Crowleyan mysticism and most memorable for the thoroughly uncanny image of a pinkish flying saucer hovering above the pyramids. The far more complete version finally released by Anger in 1980 marks a quantum leap in terms of Lucifer Rising’s complexity, and remains the chef-d’oeuvre of Anger’s career.

—Ed Lowry

ANTONIONI, Michelangelo

Nationality: Italian. Born: Ferrara, Italy, 29 September 1912. Family: Married 1) Letizia Balboni, 1942; 2) Enrica Antonioni, 1986. Education: Studied at University of Bologna, 1931–35, and at Centro Sperimentale di Cinematografica, Rome, 1940–41. Career: Journalist and bank teller, 1933–39; moved to Rome, 1939; film critic for Cinema (Rome) and others, 1940–49; assistant director on I due Foscari (Fulchignoni), 1942; wrote screenplays for Rossellini, Fellini, and others, 1942–52; directed first film, Gente del Po, 1943 (released 1947). Awards: Special Jury Prize, Cannes Festival, for L’avventura, 1960, and L’eclisse, 1962; FIPRESCI Award from Venice Festival, for Il deserto Rosso, 1964; Best Director Award, National Society of Film Critics, for Blow-Up, 1966; Palme d’Or, Cannes Festival, for Blow-Up, 1967; Academy Award for Lifetime Achievement in Film, 1995. Address: Via Vicenzo Tiberio 18, Rome, Italy.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>Cronaca di un amore (Story of a Love Affair) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1952</td>
<td>I Vinti (I nostri figli; The Vanquished) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>La signora senza camelie (Camille without Camelias) (+ co-sc); “Tentato suicidio” episode of L’Amore in città (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>Le amiche (The Girlfriends) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>Il grido (The Outcry) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>L’avventura (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>La notte (The Night) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>L’eclisse (The Eclipse) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Deserto rosso (Red Desert) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>‘Prefazione’ episode of Tre Volti (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Blow-Up (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>Zabriskie Point (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>Chung Kuo (La cina) (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Professione: Reporter (The Passenger) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>Il mistero di Oberwald (The Oberwald Mystery) (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>Identificazione di una donna (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Kumbha Mela; Roma ’90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1992</td>
<td>Noto-Mandorli—Vulcano—Stromboli—Carnevale</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>Beyond the Clouds (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2000</td>
<td>Destinazione Verna (+ co-sc, pr)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Short Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1947  Gente del Po
1948  N.U. (Nettezza urbana); Roma—Montevideo; Oltre l’oblio
1949  L’amorosa menzogna; Bomarzo; Superstizione; Ragazze in bianco
1950  Sette canne e un vestito; La villa dei mostri; La funivia del Faloria; Uomini in più

Other Films:

1984  Chambre 666 (role as himself)
1995  Making a Film for Me Is Living (role as himself)
1998  Liv (pr)

Publications

By ANTONIONI: books—

L’eclisse, with Tonino Guerra and E. Bartolini, Capelli, 1962.

Il mistero di Oberwald, Turin, 1980.

By ANTONIONI: articles—

“There Must Be a Reason for Every Film,” in Films and Filming (London), April 1959.

Interview with André Labarthé, in New York Film Bulletin, no. 8, 1961.

“Making a Film Is My Way of Life,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.

“Conversazione con Michelangelo Antonioni,” in Filmcritica (Rome), March 1975.

“Antonioni after China: Art versus Science,” interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1975.

Interview with Gideon Bachman, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1983.

Interview with F. Tomasulo, in On Film (Los Angeles), Fall 1984.

“Quel big-bang con cui esplode lo spazio,” in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), January/February 1987.

On ANTONIONI: books—

Carpi, Fabio, Michelangelo Antonioni, Parma, 1958.
Sarris, Andrew, Interviews with Film Directors, New York, 1967.

Barthes, Roland, and others, Michelangelo Antonioni, Munich, 1984.

Michelangelo Antonioni, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Margarethe von Trotta, Zurich, 1991.

Cuccu, Lorenzo, Antonioni: il discorso dello sguardo e altri saggi, Pisa, 1997.
Michelangelo Antonioni’s cinema is one of non-identification and displacement. In almost all of his films shots can be found whose striking emphasis on visual structure works in opposition to the spectator’s desire to identify, as in classical Hollywood cinema, with either a protagonist’s existential situation or with anything like a seamless narrative continuity—the “impression of reality” so often evoked in conjunction with the effect of fiction films on the spectator. Since his first feature, Cronaca di un amore, Antonioni’s introduction of utterly autonomous, graphically stunning shots into the film’s narrative flow has gradually expanded to the point where, in Professione: Reporter, but even more emphatically in Il mistero di Oberwald and Identificazione di una donna, the unsettling effect of these discrete moments in the narrative continuity of the earlier work has taken over entirely. If these graphically autonomous shots of Antonioni’s films of the fifties and sixties functioned as striking “figures” which unsettled the “ground” of narrative continuity, his latest films undo altogether this opposition between form and content, technique and substance, in order to spread the strangeness of the previously isolated figure across the entirety of the film which will thus emphatically establish itself as a “text.”

That which might at first seem to mark a simple inversion of this opposition—where narrative substance would take a back seat to visual technique—instead works to question, in a broad manner, the opposition—where narrative substance would take a back seat to visual technique and substance, in order to spread the strangeness of the previously isolated figure across the entirety of the film which will thus emphatically establish itself as a “text.”

On ANTONIONI articles—

Bollero, Marcello, “Il documentario: Michelangelo Antonioni,” in Sequenze (Italy), December 1949.

Cavallaro, Giambattista, “Michelangelo Antonioni, simbolo di una generazione,” in Bianco e Nero (Rome), September 1957.

Special Issue of Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1962.

Simon, J., and others, “Antonioni: What’s the Point,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1970.

Hernacki, T., “Michelangelo Antonioni and the Imagery of Disintegration,” in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Fall 1970.

Special Issue of Camera/Style (Paris), November 1982.

“Antonioni Section” of Postif (Paris), January 1983.

* * *
where the protagonist has something to do with producing images, narratives, or other works of art (the filmmaker of La signora senza camelie, the architect of L'avventura, the novelist of La notte, the photographer of Blow-Up, the television reporter of Professione: Reporter, the poet of Il mistero di Oberwald, and the film director of Identificazione di una donna), their professions remain important only on the level of the film's drama, never in terms of its technique. It is as though the image of the artist were trapped in a world where self-reflection is impossible. Indeed, one common strand linking the themes of all of Antonioni's films—the impossibility for men to communicate with women—might be seen to illustrate, on the level of drama, the kind of communicational impasse to be found on the level of "technique" in his cinema. Though his films are far from "experimental" in the sense of the work of Hollis Frampton, Michael Snow, or Andy Warhol, Antonioni's fictional narratives always feel flattened or, to borrow a term from Roland Barthes, they seem curiously mat, as if the spectator's ability to gain immediate access to the fiction were being impeded by something.

Antonioni's films, then, are not simply "about" the cinema, but rather, in attempting to make films which always side-step the commonplace or the conventional (modes responsible for spectatorial identification and the "impression of reality"), they call into question what is taken to be a "language" of cinema by constructing a kind of textual idiotect which defies comparison with any other film, even Antonioni's other films. This may at least in part account for the formidable strangeness and difficulty of Antonioni's work, not just for general audiences but for mainstream critics as well. One constantly has the impression that the complexity of his films requires years in the cellar of critical speculation before it is ready to be understood; a film that is initially described as sour and flat ends up ten years later, as in the case of L'avventura, being proclaimed one of the ten best films of all time ("International Critics Poll," Sight and Sound). To judge from the reception in the United States of his most recent work, it appears that we are still at least ten years behind Antonioni.

As Antonioni has himself stressed repeatedly, the dramatic or the narrative aspect of his films—telling a story in the manner of literary narrative—comes to be of less and less importance; frequently, this is manifested by an absurd and complete absence of dramatic plausibility (Zabriskie Point, Professione: Reporter, Il mistero di Oberwald). The nonverbal logic of what remain narrative films depends, Antonioni says, upon neither a conceptual nor emotional organization: "Some people believe I make films with my head; a few others think they come from the heart; for my part, I feel as though I make them with my stomach."

—Kimball Lockhart

APTED, Michael

Nationality: British. Born: Aylesbury, England, 10 February 1941; son of Ronald William and Frances Amelia (Thomas) Apted. Education: Downing College, Cambridge University, B.A., 1961. Family: Married Joan, 9 July 1966; children: Paul, James. Career: Researcher, director, and producer for Granada television, London, 1960s; director, Strawberry Fields, National Theatre, London, 1978; executive producer, Crossroads (C. C. Riders) TV series, ABC, 1992. Awards: TV Critics Award, for best play, for Another Sunday and Sweet F.A., 1972; TV Critics Award, for best play, SFTA award for best director, both for Kisses at Fifty, 1974; International Emmy, for The Collection, 1976; British Academy Award, for 28 Up, 1984. Address: Osiris Films, 300 South Lorimar, Building 137, Burbank, CA 91505, U.S.A. Agent: Mike Marcus, Creative Artists Agency, 9830 Wilshire Boulevard, Beverly Hills, CA 90212, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

- 1968 Number 10 (for TV); Your Name's Not God, It's Edgar (for TV); Big Breadwinner Hog (for TV)
- 1969 In a Cottage Hospital (for TV)
- 1970 Don't Touch Him, He Might Resent It (for TV); Slattery's Mounted Foot (for TV); The Day They Buried Cleaver (for TV)
- 1971 Big Soft Nellie (for TV); The Mosedale Horseshoe (for TV); One Thousand Pounds for Rosebud (for TV)
- 1972 Another Sunday and Sweet F.A. (for TV); Joy (for TV); Said the Preacher (for TV); The Style of the Countess (for TV); The Reporters (for TV); Buggins' Ermine (for TV)
- 1973 Triple Echo (Soldier in Skirts); High Kampf (for TV); Jack Point (for TV)
- 1974 Stardust; Kisses at Fifty (for TV); Poor Girl (for TV); A Great Day for Bonzo (Childhood) (for TV)
- 1975 Wednesday Love (for TV)
- 1976 The Squeeze; 21 (for TV); The Collection (for TV)
- 1977 Stronger than the Sun (for TV)
- 1978 Agatha (for TV)
- 1980 Coal Miner's Daughter (for TV)
- 1981 Continental Divide (for TV)
- 1983 Kipperbang (P'Tang Yang, Kipperbang); Gorky Park (for TV)
- 1984 28 Up (for TV) (+ pr); First Run Features; First Born; The River Rat (+ exec pr)
- 1985 Bring on the Night (for TV)
- 1986 Critical Condition (for TV)
- 1988 Gorillas in the Mist (for TV)
- 1989 The Long Way Home (for TV)
- 1991 Class Action; 35 Up (for TV) (+ pr, sc)
- 1992 Thunderheart; Incident at Oglala (for TV)
- 1994 Blink; Nell; Moving the Mountain (for TV)
- 1996 Extreme Measures (for TV)
- 1997 Inspirations (+ pr)
- 1998 Always Outnumbered (for TV); 42; Forty Two Up (+ pr)
- 1999 Me & Isaac Newton; The World Is Not Enough; Nathan Dixon (for TV)
- 2000 Enigma (for TV)

Other Films:

- 1985 Spies like Us (role as Ace Tomato agent)
- 1990 Criminal Justice (co-exec pr) (for TV)
- 1992 Bram Stoker's Dracula (co-exec pr); Intruders: They Are among Us (mini, for TV) (exec pr); Murder without Motive: The Edmund Perry Story (Best Intentions: The Education and Killing of Edmund Perry) (co-exec pr) (mini, for TV); Age 7 in America (7 up in America) (for TV) (pr)
Michael Apted

1993  Strapped (for TV) (exec pr)
1994 A Personal History if British Cinema by Stephen Frears (for TV) (role as himself)
1998 14 Up in America (for TV) (exec pr)
1999 The James Bond Story (role as himself)

Publications

By APTED: articles—

With Alan Parker, “One on One. Michael Apted and Alan Parker,” in American Film (Marion, Ohio), vol. 15, no. 12, September 1990.
Interview with F. Arnold, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 9, no. 9, September 1992.

On APTED: articles—

Interview, September, 1991.

*   *   *

Classic Hollywood, with its contract personnel and assembly-line approach to film production, no doubt encouraged directors to be craftsmen rather than artists. Certainly, studio workers with no pretensions to what would later be called auteurship could be counted on to do a competent, occasionally inspired job with scripts and performers of many different types. This cadre of professionals on which all five majors depended regularly turned out films that would make back their negative costs and perhaps turn a small profit at the box office. Since American film production became largely independent with the demise of the studio system in the 1960s, not many directors have been satisfied with this traditional hack role, despite the benefits it could bring. For flexibility and steady diligence are qualities that are useful in sustaining a career in an era of more limited feature production.

Michael Apted is an instructive case in point of how well such a strategy can work. Apted came to Hollywood in 1979 after a prolific, mildly celebrated stint as a director of features and documentaries for British Granada Television. Like some actors eager for steady employment (Michael Caine and Gene Hackman come to mind), Apted, since leaving Britain, has signed on to a variety of projects in order to practice his craft regularly. In part, his career is defined by his generally satisfactory, occasionally excellent handling of mainstream fiction film projects. Apted, however, is not just a very competent hack. He has remained faithful to an artistic vision as well, which was nurtured by his television work. In fact, his ordinary commercial projects have made it possible for him to continue working as a documentarist.

Apted’s debut effort for Hollywood was an unusual project, Agatha, a mystery about that most enigmatic of mystery writers, Agatha Christie. Saddled with a full-of-holes plot by writers Kathleen Tynan and Arthur Hopcraft, Apted proved unable to make much sense of this women’s picture story (the famed novelist disappears, only to experience an exciting, brief flight with an American newspaperman). However, he did a commendable job with coaching layered performances from the two leads, the unexpected combination of Dustin Hoffman and Vanessa Redgrave. Predictably, Apted was at his most competent with the detailed recreation of 1920s Britain, especially the lush interiors of luxury hotels.

Interestingly, several other of Apted’s Hollywood films are studies in enigmatic, powerful women. Gorillas in the Mist traces the conversion of biologist Dian Fossey into an African conservationist who goes back to nature to study the primates with whom she becomes obsessed. Once again, Apted does a fine job merging Hollywood fabriky (i.e., men in gorilla suits, studio sets) with the real thing (much of the film was made, in grueling fashion, on scene in Rwanda). Apted is sensitive to the twists and turns of this ultimately tragic story, including Fossey’s suicidal opposition to the natives in general and poachers in particular, who are trying to kill “her” gorillas. Like these two others films, Coal Miner’s Daughter is part woman’s picture, part biographical picture, for the main character is here again a ‘real’ person, country singer Loretta Lynn.

More than is the case in either Agatha or Gorillas, however, Loretta Lynn’s story is melodramatized in the customary TV docudrama style. Her rise to stardom is fueled by the assistance of a mentor, the unsellish singer Patsy Cline, and the relentless, self-serving promotion of a no-good husband, appropriately named Doolittle. Yet Lynn’s success, adroitly evoked by Sissy Spaceck’s endearing performance and excellent singing, goes beyond the power of others to instruct and direct. Even Doolittle’s alcoholism and her own depression cannot derail her career, though the film seems cautionary in its depiction of the problems success creates for her personal and family life. Nell likewise focuses on an unusual woman, a girl who has grown up in savage isolation in the woodland home where her mother’s death has stranded her. Discovered by a physician and a psychologist, Nell is first a “case,” only later to be seen by the scientifically oriented professionals as a human being with her own needs and rights, including the opportunity to keep herself distant from civilization. This Rousseauean point is made with perhaps more sophistication in Truffaut’s quite similar The Wild Child, but Apted’s treatment is, if predictably heartwarming, effective nonetheless. Much the same could be said about Firstborn, which probes the effects on her children of a recently divorced woman’s rebound relationship with a charming sociopath. Both these films, in the manner of docudrama, are short on coherent plot, even as they focus on suitably affecting moments of emotional crisis.

Given the enduring popularity of the form in the 1980s and 1990s, it is hardly surprising that Apted has tried his hand at thrillers as well as the contemporary woman’s picture’s. Gorky Park, Extreme Measures, and Blink collectively demonstrate that he has little talent in either managing a narrative of generically predictable twists and turns or sustaining suspense and interest from beginning to end. In all three of these films, Apted seems uncertain whether to treat the story seriously (which would have been a smart choice with the intricate web of intrigue Martin Cruz Smith weaves in the novel version of Gorky Park) or, in the Hitchcockian manner, use it as a disposable McGuffin and concentrate on the sophisticated management of spectator emotions.

In contrast, Apted’s several treatments of male and female manners, slick updatings of the classic screwball comedy, have been more generally successful. Continental Divide features a hard-bitten journalist who is both “greened” and charmed by his encounter with a reclusive ornithologist high in the Rockies. As his pride is humbled, her prejudice gives way to admiration and affection. Married at the end, they decide, however, to live apart and pursue their separate careers. Here Apted makes the most of Lawrence Kasdan’s somewhat prosaic and unimaginative script. Class Action, with its courtroom opposition of old left-wing father and modern corporate daughter, recalls several Spencer Tracy-Katharine Hepburn pairings of the 1940s and offers an entertaining dramatization of contemporary mores. Critical Condition is a Richard Pryor vehicle that, despite some interesting comment on the dubious distinction between sane and crazy behavior, proves generally unfunny.

More interesting from the point of view of cinema history perhaps is Apted’s continuing work as a documentarist. In 1963, he was part of a huge sociological project undertaken by Granada Television, the interviewing of a cross-section of British seven-year olds with a view toward demonstrating the effects of social class on the directions their lives would assume. Updatings were undertaken by Granada at the fourteen and twenty-one year point, while Apted has assumed direction of the commercially released segments done at ages twenty-eight and thirty-five for the group. In those two films, 28 Up and 35 Up, Apted acts as the interviewer, showing no little talent for asking the questions that, with wit and perspicacity, often go directly to the heart of the matter.

The traditional left-wing politics of the project (which was conceived to demonstrate that in the middle of the “swinging London” era that class still mattered in the “new” Britain) are very much Apted’s own, as his two other principal documentary films show. Conceived and financed by Robert Redford, Incident at Oglala examines the controversial case of Leonard Peltier, a Sioux activist convicted of murdering two FBI agents at the Oglala Reservation. The film is a tendentious, quite convincing marshaling of evidence that Peltier was framed for the crime by the FBI and thus improperly imprisoned. Thunderheart, a fiction film project conceived and produced by Robert De Niro, yet another marquee supporter of the movement for Native American justice, was likewise directed by Apted, with special permission from the tribe, on the same reservation. The plot is thin, a predictable thriller with a man of divided loyalty (an FBI agent of Indian blood) at its center; here the main interest lies in Apted’s expert evocation of a way of life fallen on disastrously hard times. Much the same praise may be accorded Apted’s second most impressive documentary project Moving the Mountain, a meticulously detailed account of the student democracy movement in China that culminated in the Tian An Men square massacre in 1989. Bring on the Night shows that Apted can deal effectively with lighter material as well, in this case rock star Sting’s attempt to create a band with jazz musicians after the demise of The Police.

—R. Barton Palmer

ARAKI, Gregg

Films as Director:

1987 Three Bewildered People in the Night
1989 Long Weekend (o’ Despair)
1992 The Living End (+ ed, sc, cine)
1993 Totally Fed Up (+ ed, sc, pr, cine)

Publications

By ARAKI: articles—

“The (Not So) Totally Fked up Gregg Araki,” in Suspect Culture (Toronto), Fall 1994.

On ARAKI: articles—

Ehrenstein, David, “‘Gay Film’s Bad Boy,’” in Advocate, 8 September 1992.

Moran, James M., “Gregg Araki: Guerrilla Film-maker for a Queer Generation,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1996.

* * *

Of the heterogeneous group of young gay filmmakers currently lumped together under the term “New Queer Cinema,” Gregg Araki is arguably the most challenging and audacious. The very titles of the three films that have received a limited theatrical release and secured him a reputation (The Living End, Totally Fed Up, The Doom Generation) suggest the impulses that drive his work: anger, desperation, a sense of imminent apocalypse, a passionate and reckless romanticism. A possible motto for his work might be the famous line “Freedom’s just another word for nothing left to lose.” The films have been labeled “nihilistic.” To anyone truly alive to the realities of contemporary life (not only gay life), they might equally be found inspirational. Nihilism means a belief in nothing; it should never be confused with pessimism. Araki’s passionate commitment to his characters (“totally fed up” as their lives may be) is anything but nihilistic.

Araki’s aesthetic allegiances are clear already in The Living End: its subtitle, “An Irresponsible Movie,” refers (if somewhat esoterically) to Hawks’s Bringing up Baby, but the most obvious influence is Godard—the early, anarchic Godard of Breathless, who also lost no opportunity (as both critic and filmmaker) to express his commitment to the more subversive of the Hollywood genres. The film also introduces the themes ("radical" in every sense of the word) that propel Araki's work: gay life in the age of AIDS, human life at the end of western civilization. The question, what can one still find to live for in a world in which there really is "nothing left to lose"?, generates the extraordinary fury, intensity, and desperate humor of this film and its successors.

1995 The Doom Generation (+ed, sc, pr)
1997 Nowhere (+ed, sc, pr)
1999 Splendor (+ed, sc, pr)

Just as The Living End can be seen as a loose remake of (or gay variant on) Breathless, so Totally Fed Up (the asterisks are Araki's, not imposed by censorship) relates structurally to Masculin, Féminin. But Araki's characters are no longer "the children of Marx and Coca-Cola": they inhabit the desolate landscape of America in the 1990s, where Marx is not available, consumerism has overwhelmed the culture, concepts no longer apply, and the only fragile hope lies in the precariously and elusive possibility of an ever-more-vulnerable human contact.

The Doom Generation (subtitled "A Heterosexual Movie," it could only have been made by a gay director) is Araki's most fully achieved statement to date. Because he does not make overt political statements, one should not assume that his films have no political meaning. Apocalypse is expressed in The Doom Generation not only in the running gag of every storekeeper charging $6.66, or in the "Welcome to Hell" of the opening. It is there in the fleeting landscapes through which the characters pass: the clouds of smoke, the graveyard of wrecked cars—the destructiveness and detritus of Capitalism. Araki himself has drawn a comparison (favorable, and the asterisks are...)

But Araki's characters are no longer "the children of Marx and Coca-Cola": they inhabit the desolate landscape of America in the 1990s, where Marx is not available, consumerism has overwhelmed the culture, concepts no longer apply, and the only fragile hope lies in the precariously and elusive possibility of an ever-more-vulnerable human contact.

Araki himself has insisted that the film is not nihilistic. Nihilism is what Capitalism has brought us to, and a stand against it is becoming increasingly problematic, but Araki (the true rebel, unlike, say, Lynch and Tarantino, whose allegiances merely reuses conventions that have lost their force. But most artists have gone through relatively arid stretches; the early works have lost none of their resonance with time, and their achievement gives one faith in Araki's capacity for renewal.

—Robin Wood

ARCAND, Denys

Films as Director:

1962 Seul ou avec d'autres
1964 Champlain (+ sc); Samuel de Champlain: Québec 1603 (+ sc)
1965 La Route de l'Ouest (+ sc)
1966 Volleyball (+ ed)
1972 Québec: Duplessis et après... (Québec: Duplessis and After... ) (+ ed, ph); La Maudite galette (Dirty Money) (ro as Detective)
1973 Réjeanne Padovani (+ sc, ed)
1974 Gina (+ ed)
1976  On est au coton (Cotton Mill, Treadmill)
1982  Le Confort et l’indifférence (Comfort and Indifference, Québec et après)
1984  Le Crime d’Ovide Plouffe (The Crime of Ovide Plouffe, Murder in the Family) (+ sc)
1985  Murder in the Family (mini—for TV)
1986  Le Décès de l’empire américain (The Decline of the American Empire) (+ sc)
1989  Jésus de Montréal (Jesus of Montreal) (+ sc)
1991  Montréal vu par... (Montreal Sextet) (+ ro)
1993  Love & Human Remains (Amour et restes humains)
1996  Joyeux Calvaires (Poverty and Other Delights)
2000  Stardom (15 Moments) (+sc)

Other Films:
1967  Entre la mer et l’eau douce
1987  Un zoo la nuit (Night Zoo) (ro as Man at peep-show)
1992  La Vie fantôme (Phantom Life) (dialogue advisor); Léolo (ro as Director)
1993  Les Amoureuses (scenographical advisor)
1999  Dogma (special thanks)

Publications

By ARCAND: articles—

On ARCAND: books—

On ARCAND: articles—

Johnston, Trevor, “‘Love and Death,’” in Take One (Toronto), vol. 5, no. 12, Summer 1996.

The career of the Québécois filmmaker Denys Arcand presents a bewildering roller-coaster in which periods of national and even world-wide acclaim have given way to stretches of near-total obscurity. Hailed in the early 1990s as “Godfather of the New Canadian Cinema” and feted at Cannes as one of the leading contemporary filmmakers, since 1993 Arcand has been able to complete only two films, one of them a small-scale project for TV. This fallow period echoes another around 1980 when, despite having made a string of hard-hitting documentaries and three exceptional feature films, he was considered washed up and found himself reduced to directing episodes of mini-series for CBC television.

Arcand would be the first to admit that these setbacks stem, to a large degree, from his own reluctance to compromise. Provocative and politically aware, he sees film as a means of challenging society and its comfortable assumptions, and can rarely bring himself to follow box-office fashion. “You have to believe in the material,” he told an interviewer in 1997. “You wouldn’t believe how many scripts with Martians are floating around out there. I could never look at Star Wars; I’m sure it’s well made, but I could never relate to the material.” And even when he finds material he can relate to, Arcand is inclined to go his own way without regard to the consequences. A documentary he made for the National Film Board of Canada in 1970 so outraged the NFB that they suppressed it, only giving it a grudging release six years later.

Documentary took up the first decade of Arcand’s directing career. Having graduated (with a degree in history), he joined the National Film Board to make a series of shorts on Canadian culture and history. “They were small films,” he deprecatingly remarked, “and no one wanted to make them.” Arcand used these half-dozen shorts to hone his technique and develop his ideas. At the same time he contrived to slip elements of his pessimistic humour and scepticism even into such anodyne subjects as Volleyball and Parcs... atlantiques (Atlantic Parks)—often making tellingly subversive points through astute use of editing.

Open confrontation erupted over Arcand’s first feature-length film, On est au coton (We’re Fed Up), an exposé of the wretched working conditions in Quebec’s textile industry. It succeeded in antagonising both the extreme left (who thought the propaganda should have been more outspoken) and the employers. The NFB accused Arcand of lacking objectivity and the film, which became a cause célèbre, was suppressed until 1976. “The Film Board,” observed Arcand, “makes thousands of films to say that all goes well in Canada. . . . So I think it is just normal that there should now and then be a film which says that everything is rotten and that we live in a country that is corrupt from top to bottom.” He made two more full-length documentaries for the NFB, both dealing with Québécois politics. “Arcand’s great theme is betrayal,” commented John Harkness, “and his documentaries deal with that theme most explicitly.”

Meanwhile Arcand had turned to feature films to pursue his disenchanted vision of Quebec society—and, by implication, of Western society in general. La maudite galette (The Damned Dough) was rather too obviously indebted to Godard, but with its two successors Arcand hit his stride. Réjeanne Padovani and Gina both make shrewd use of a thriller framework to explore political themes, and Gina adds in an element of sexual politics that anticipates his later work—as does its often teasing tone. Though consistently operating from a left-wing standpoint, Arcand mistrusts any form of dogmatism and enjoys upsetting audience expectations. “A good film is always pulling the rug out from under people’s beliefs and prejudices,” he once remarked.

The films attracted international notice—the French critic Jean Rochereau compared Arcand to Juvenal and Voltaire—but were too unsettling to gain popular success. For several years Arcand found his career hampered by official suspicion and changes in the system of Canadian government funding. He bounced back, quite unexpectedly, with his first international hit, Le déclin de l’empire américain (The Decline of the American Empire), a sardonic comedy about sex. Not a sex comedy; the eroticism is all in the talk. While preparing a lakeside dinner, four male academics discuss sex; at the gym their female counterparts do likewise. Finally they all meet for dinner where the conversation, and the revelations, continue. With nods towards Rohmer and late Buñuel, the overall effect is at once funny and bleak: a witty, perceptive study of an alienated society in terminal decline. The film won the Critics’ Prize at Cannes, and was nominated for an Oscar.

Arcand gained his second Oscar nomination for Jésus de Montréal, a fable of passionate irony about an actor cast as Christ in the city’s annual Passion Play who finds the role is taking over his life. Envisaging the film as “not a very commercial proposition” and likely to offend the religious as well as the secular establishment, Arcand was amazed when it became his greatest box-office hit, gaining an award from the World Council of Churches. “Woe unto you when all men praise you,” he mused wryly.

Now rated “one of the most important of contemporary directors,” Arcand went on to make his first English-language film, Love and Human Remains, a comedy about sexuality and murder, was adapted from a play by Canadian playwright Brad Fraser. Intended as the director’s mainstream breakthrough, it flopped disastrously. Since then he has completed two films, Joyeux calvaire (Poverty and Other Delights), made for TV, is an amiable, undemanding chronicle of homeless people in downtown Montréal. Stardom, a pseudo-documentary on the rise and fall of a young supermodel, returns to Arcand’s earlier satiricial mode, but despite some shrewd jabs at the media it lacks real punch or personal insight. More ambitious projects, such as a long-cherished film about euthanasia, have so far failed to find backing. But given Arcand’s resilience and remarkable come-back record, it would be unwise to write him off just yet.

—Philip Kemp

ARMSTRONG, Gillian

Nationality: Australian. Born: Melbourne, 18 December 1950. Education: Swinburne College, studied filmmaking at Melbourne and Australian Film and Television School, Sydney. Family: Married, one daughter. Career: Worked as production assistant, editor, art director, and assistant designer, and directed several short films, 1970s; directed her first feature, My Brilliant Career, 1979; directed her first American film, Mrs. Soffel, 1984; returned to Australia to direct High Tide, 1987; has since made films both in Australia and the United States; also director of documentaries and commercials. Awards: Best Short Fiction Film Sydney International Film Festival, for The Singer and the Dancer, 1976; British Critics’ Award and Best Film and Best Director, Australian Film Institute Awards, for My Brilliant Career, 1979; Women in Film Award, 1995. Agent: Judy Scott-Fox, William Morris Agency, 151 El Camino Drive, Beverly Hills, CA 90212.

Films as Director:

1970  Old Man and Dog (short)
1971  Roof Needs Mowing (short)
1973  Gretel, Satdee Night; One Hundred a Day (shorts)
1975  Smokes and Lollies (doc)
1976  The Singer and the Dancer (+ pr, sc)
1979  My Brilliant Career
1980  Fourteen’s Good, Eighteen’s Better (+ pr); Touch Wood (doc)
1982  Starstruck
1983  Having a Go (doc)
1984  Mrs. Soffel
1986  Hard to Handle: Bob Dylan with Tom Petty and the Heartbreakers
1987  High Tide
1988  Bingo, Bridesmaids, and Braces (+ pr)
1991  Fires Within
1992  The Last Days of Chez Nous
1994  Little Women
1996  Not Fourteen Again (+ sc)
1997  Oscar and Lucinda

Publications

By ARMSTRONG: articles—

“Little Women,” an interview with Margaret Smith and Emma Coller, in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), March 1994.

On ARMSTRONG: books—

On ARMSTRONG: articles—

Haskell, Molly, “Wildflowers,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1993.

* * *

While women directors in film industries around the world are still seen as anomalous (if mainstream) or marginalized as avant garde, the Antipodes have been home to an impressive cadre of female filmmakers who negotiate and transcend such notions. Before the promising debuts of Ann Turner (Celia) and Jane Campion (Sweetie), Gillian Armstrong blazed a trail with My Brilliant Career, launching a brilliant career of her own as an international director. Like Turner and Campion, Armstrong makes films that resist easy categorization as either “women’s films” or Australian ones. Her films mix and intermingle genres in ways that undermine and illuminate afresh, if not openly subvert, filmic conventions—as much as the films of her male compatriots, like Peter Weir, Bruce Beresford, or Paul Cox. Formally, however, the pleasures of her films are traditional ones, such as sensitive and delicate cinematography, fluid editing, an evocative feel for setting and costume, and most importantly, a commitment to solid character development and acting. All in all, her work reminds one of the best of classical Hollywood cinema, and the question of whether her aim is parody or homage is often left pleasingly ambiguous.

Although Armstrong has often spoken in interviews about her discomfort at being confined to the category of woman filmmaker of women’s films, and has articulated her desire to reach an audience of both genders and all nationalities, her work continually addresses sexual politics and family tensions. Escape from and struggle with traditional sex roles and the pitfalls and triumphs therein are themes frequently addressed in her films—from One Hundred a Day, her final-year project at the Australian Film and Television School, through My Brilliant Career, her first feature, to High Tide and Oscar and Lucinda. Even one of her earliest films at Swinburne College, the short Roof Needs Mowing, obliquely tackled this theme, using a typical student filmmaker’s pastiche of advertising and surrealism. Like most maturing filmmakers with an eye on wider distribution, Armstrong dropped the “sur” from surrealism in her later work, so that by One Hundred a Day—an adaptation of an Alan Marshall story about a shoe-factory employee getting a back-street abortion in the 1930s—she developed a more naturalistic handling of material, while her use of soundtrack and fast editing remained highly stylized and effective.

Made on a tiny budget and heavily subsidized by the Australian Film Commission, the award-winning The Singer and the Dancer was a precocious study of the toll men take on women’s lives that marked the onset of Armstrong’s mature style. On the strength of this and My Brilliant Career, produced Margaret Fink offered Armstrong the direction of My Brilliant Career. Daunted at first by the scale of the project and a lack of confidence in her own abilities, she accepted because she “thought it could be bungled by a lot of men.”

While The Singer and the Dancer had been chastised by feminist critics for its downbeat ending, in which the heroine returns to her philandering lover after a half-hearted escape attempt, My Brilliant Career was widely celebrated for its feminist fairy-tale story as well as its employment of women crew members. Adapted from Miles Franklin’s semi-autobiographical novel, My Brilliant Career, with its turn-of-the-20th-century setting in the Australian outback, works like Jane Eyre in reverse (she does not marry him), while retaining the romantic allure of such a story and all the glossy production values of a period setting that Australian cinema had been known for up until then. Distinguished by an astonishing central performance by the then-unknown Judy Davis (fresh from playing Juliet to Mel Gibson’s Romeo on the drama-school stage), the film managed to present a positive model of feminine independence without belying the time in which it was set. Like Armstrong’s later Mrs. Soffel, My Brilliant Career potently evokes smothered sensuality and conveys sexual tension by small, telling details, as in the boating scene.

Sadly, few of Armstrong’s later films have been awarded commensurate critical praise or been as widely successful, possibly because of her refusal to conform to expectations and churn out more upbeat costume dramas. Her next feature, Starstruck, although it too features a spunky, ambitious heroine, was a rock musical set in the present and displaying a veritable rattle bag of influences—including Judy Garland-Mickey Rooney “let’s-put-on-a-show” films, Richard Lester editing techniques, new wave pop videos, and even Sternberg’s Blond Venus, when the heroine sheds her kangaroo suit to sing her “torch song” à la Marlene Dietrich. Despite a witty script and fine bit characters, the music is somewhat monotonous, and the film was only mildly successful.

Armstrong’s first film to be financed and filmed in America was Mrs. Soffel. Based on a true story and set at the turn of the century, it delineated the tragic story of the eponymous warden’s wife who falls in love with a convict, helps him escape, and finally runs off with him. The bleak, monochrome cinematography is powerfully atmospheric but was not to all reviewers’ tastes, especially in America. For Armstrong, the restricted palette was quite deliberate, so that the penultimate images of blood on snow would be all the more striking and effective. A sadly underrated film, it features some unexpectedly fine performances from Diane Keaton in the title role, Mel Gibson as her paramour (a fair impersonation of young Henry Fonda), and the young Matthew Modine as his kid brother. At its best, it recalls, if not McCabe and Mrs. Miller, then at least Bonnie and Clyde. High Tide returns to Australia for its setting in a coastal caravan park, and comes up trumps as an unabashedly sentimental weepie, and none the worse for it. It features three generations of women: Lilli (Judy Davis again), backup singer to an Elvis impersonator and drifter; Ally (Claudia Karvan), the pubescent daughter she left behind; and mother-in-law Betty (Jan Adel), who vies with Lilli for Ally’s affections. In terms of camera work, it is one of Armstrong’s most restless films, utilizing nervous zip pans, fast tracking, and booms, and then resting for quiet, intense close-ups on surfboards, legs being shaved, and shower nozzles, all highly motivated by the characters’ perspectives. Like Mrs. Soffel, High Tide uses colors symbolically to contrast the gentle tones of the seaside’s natural landscape with the garish buildings of the town called Eden.

Armstrong wears her feminist credentials lightly, never on her sleeve. Nevertheless, her early fiction films can be seen as charting over the years the trajectory of the women’s movement: My Brilliant Career celebrated women’s independence, as Sybylla rejects the roles of wife and mother; Mrs. Soffel reopens negotiations with men (with tragic results); and, finally, High Tide returns to the rejected motherhood role, with all its attendant joys and anxieties.

Fires Within, Armstrong’s first 1990s release, is a well-meaning but insipid tale of a Cuban political prisoner and his encounter with his family in Miami. A fiasco, Armstrong lost control of the project during post-production. The filmmaker bounced back strongly, however, with two impressive films centering on the relationships between female siblings. The Last Days of Chez Nous, which Armstrong directed back in Australia, is a thoughtful, well-acted drama focusing on the emotional plight of a pair of sisters. One (Lisa Harrow) is a bossy, fortysomething writer, and the other (Kerry Fox) has just emerged from an unhappy love affair. The scenario centers on events that take place after the latter becomes romantically involved with the former’s husband (Bruno Ganz). The film’s major strength is the depth and richness of its female characters. Its theme, consistent with Armstrong’s best previous work, is the utter necessity of women’s self-sufficiency.

Little Women, based on Louisa May Alcott’s venerable 1868 novel of four devoted sisters coming of age in Concord, Massachusetts, during the Civil War, was Armstrong’s first successful American-made film. It may be linked to My Brilliant Career as a story of feminine independence set in a previous era. Alcott’s book had been filmed a number of times before: a silent version, made in 1918; most enjoyably by George Cukor, with Katharine Hepburn, in 1933; far less successfully, with a young Elizabeth Taylor (among others), in 1949; and in a made-for-TV movie in 1978. Armstrong’s version is every bit as fine as the Cukor-Hepburn classic. Her cast is just about perfect, with Wynona Ryder deservedly earning an Academy Award nomination as the headstrong Jo March. Ryder is ably supported by Trini Alvarado, Claire Danes, Samantha Mathis, and Kirsten Dunst, and Susan Sarandon offers her usual solid performance as Marmee, the March girls’ mother. If the film has one fault, it is the contemporary-sounding feminist rhetoric that Marmee spouts: the dialogue is completely out of sync with the spirit and reality of the times. But this is just a quibble. This new Little Women is a fine film, at once literate and extremely enjoyable.

In her next film, Oscar and Lucinda, Armstrong contrasts a strong feminist heroine and a hero who is “sensitive” to the point of being effeminate. The film is a Victorian-era romantic adventure, and the title characters are shy, guilt-ridden Oscar Hopkins (Ralph Fiennes) and intensely strong-willed Lucinda Leplastrier (Cate Blanchett). The two are soul mates who share an obsession with gambling, and their natures do not allow them to assume the accepted, traditional male and female societal roles.

The first section of the film charts the parallel stories of Oscar and Lucinda, and how they evolve as individuals. Lucinda is oblivious to what others think of her as she expresses herself—and she even boldly dresses in pants. Oscar, meanwhile, suffers a traumatic childhood and remains estranged from his father. Approximately 40 minutes into the story the characters meet, and quickly discover that they are kindred spirits. Lucinda’s sense of independence does impact positively on Oscar, but not enough to allow him to free himself from his mental shackles. A childhood shock has made Oscar fearful of water, and his religious upbringing forces him to equate pleasure with sin. So it is not without irony that he is fated to drown while trapped inside a church that has been made of glass; the structure is set on a raft that had been floating down a river.

Armstrong fills Oscar and Lucinda with a strong sense of the opposing forces that prevent the characters from adding to the foundation of their relationship. Guilt, fear, and the constraints of religion are what imprison Oscar; they are contrasted to the spirit, individuality, and freedom that personify Lucinda. By depicting Oscar as incorrigibly ineffectual, Armstrong’s purpose is neither to lampoon masculinity nor to cram the film with one-dimensional feminist ire. Instead, she lucidly points out how a male-female relationship is hollow (if not altogether doomed) if both participants fail to connect on equal terms. The twist of the story is that, here, the male is submissive while the female is aggressive.

—Leslie Felperin, updated by Rob Edelman

ARZNER, Dorothy

Nationality: American. Born: San Francisco, 3 January 1900. Education: Studied medicine at University of Southern California. Military Service: Ambulance driver in World War I, 1917–18. Career: Typist for William C. De Mille, at Famous Players-Lasky (Paramount), 1919; editor for “Realart,” a subsidiary of Paramount, 1922; wrote and edited Old Ironsides (Cruez), 1925; directed Paramount’s first sound film, Wild Party, 1929; retired from directing, 1943. Awards: Honored at First International Festival of Women’s Films, New York, 1972, and by Director’s Guild of America, 1975. Died: 1 October 1979.

Films as Director:

1927 Fashions for Women; Get Your Man; 10 Modern Commandments
1928 Manhattan Cocktail
1929 The Wild Party
1930 Sarah and Son; “The Gallows Song—Nichavo” sequence in Paramount on Parade; Anybody’s Woman; Behind the Makeup (co-d); Charming Sinners (co-d, uncredited)
1931 Honor among Lovers; Working Girls
1932 Merrily We Go to Hell
1933 Christopher Strong
1934 Nana (Lady of the Boulevard)
1936 Craig’s Wife
1937 The Bride Wore Red; The Last of Mrs. Cheyney (co-d, uncredited)
1940 Dance, Girl, Dance
1943 First Comes Courage

Other Films:

1922 Blood and Sand (ed)
1923 The Covered Wagon (ed)
1924 Inez from Hollywood (ed, sc); The Bread of the Border (sc); The No-Gun Man (sc)
1925 Red Kimono (sc); When Husbands Flirt (sc)
1926 Old Ironsides (ed, sc)

Publications

By ARZNER: article—

Interview with Gerald Peary, in Cinema (Beverly Hills), no. 34, 1974.

On ARZNER: books—

On ARZNER: articles—

Cruiikshank, H., “Sketch,” in Motion Picture Classic (Brooklyn), September 1929.
St. John, Adela Rogers, “Get Me Dorothy Arzner,” in Silent Screen (New York), December 1933.
“‘They Stand out from the Crowd,’” in Literary Digest (New York), 3 November 1934.
Castle, W., “Tribute to Dorothy Arzner,” in Action (Los Angeles), March/April 1975.
Johnston, Claire, in Jump Cut (Berkeley), 30 December 1976.

Houston, Beverle, “‘Missing in Action: Notes on Dorothy Arzner,’” in Wide Angle (Athens, Georgia), vol. 6, no. 3, 1984.
Forster, A., “‘Dance, Girl, Dance,’” in Skrien (Amsterdam), September-October 1984.
Mayne, J., “‘Dorothy Arzner, les femmes et la politique des auteurs,’” in Cinémaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), March 1993.

* * *

Dorothy Arzner’s career as a commercial Hollywood director covered little more than a decade, but she had prepared for it by extensive editing and script writing work. Ill health forced her to abandon a career that might eventually have led to the recognition she deserved from her contemporaries. One of only a handful of women operating within the structure of Hollywood’s post-silent boom, Arzner has been the subject of feminist critical attention, with film retrospectives of her work both in the United States and United Kingdom in the 1970s, when her work was “rediscovered.”

Most feminists would recognize that the mere re-insertion of women into a dominant version of film history is a dubious activity, even while asserting that women’s contributions to cinema have been excluded from most historical accounts. Recognition of the work of a “popular” director like Arzner and an evaluation of her contribution to Hollywood cinema must be set against an awareness of her place in the dominant patriarchal ideology of classic Hollywood cinema. Arzner’s work is particularly interesting in that it was produced within the Hollywood system with all its inherent constraints (time, budget, traditional content requirements of particular genres, etc.).

While Arzner directed “women’s pictures”—classic Hollywood fare—she differed from other directors of the genre in that, in place of a narrative seen simply from a female point of view, she actually succeeded in challenging the orthodoxy of Hollywood from within, offering perspectives that questioned the dominant order.

The films often depict women seeking independence through career—a burlesque queen and an aspiring ballerina (Dance, Girl, Dance), a world champion aviatrix (Christopher Strong). Alternatively, the escape route can be through exit from accepted female positions in the hierarchy—a rich daughter “escaping” into marriage with a poverty-stricken drunk (Merrily We Go to Hell). Even excess can be a way of asserting independence, as with the obsessive housekeeper rejecting family relationships in favor of a passion for domesticity and the home (Craig’s Wife).

The films frequently play with notions of female stereotyping (most notably in Dance, Girl, Dance, with its two central female types of Nice Girl and Vamp). Arzner’s “nice girls” are likely to have desires which conflict with male desires, while narrative requirements will demand that they still please the male. While these tensions are not always resolved, Arzner’s strategies in underlining these opposing desires are almost gleeful at times.

In addition, Arzner’s films offer contradictions which disturb the spectator’s accepted relationship with what is on screen—most notably in Dance, Girl, Dance, when dancer Judy O’Brien turns on her Burlesque (male) audience and berates them for their voyeurism. This scene has been the focus for much debate about the role of the spectator in relation to the woman as spectacle (notably in the work of Laura Mulvey).

Although the conventions of plot and development are present in Arzner’s films, Claire Johnston sees these elements as subverted by a “women’s discourse”: the films may offer us the kinds of narrative closure we expect from the classic Hollywood text—the “happy” or the “tragic” ending—but Arzner’s insistence on this female discourse gives the films an exciting and unsettling quality. In Arzner’s work, she argues, it is the male universe which invites scrutiny and which is “rendered strange.”

Dorothy Arzner’s position inside the studio system has made her a unique subject for debate. As the women’s movement set about reassessing the role of women in history, so feminist film theorists began not only to re-examine the role of women as a creative force in cinema, but also to consider the implications behind the notion of a ‘women’s discourse’. This scene has been the focus for much debate about the role of the spectator in relation to the woman as spectacle. The work of Dorothy Arzner has proved a rich area for investigation into both these questions.

—Lilie Ferrari

ASCH, Timothy

Nationality: American. Born: Southampton, New York, 16 July 1932. Education: Attended California School of Fine Arts; apprenticed with still photographers Minor White, Edward Weston, and Ansel Adams, 1950–51; Columbia University, B.S. in Anthropology and Film, 1959; attended Boston University; Harvard, M.A. in Anthropology, 1964. Military Service: U.S. Army; traveling reporter in Japan, 1953–54. Family: Married Patsy Asch; four children. Career: Freelance photojournalist, 1954–59; film editor and cinematographer, Film Study Center, Harvard University, 1959–62; director of ethnographic studies, Educational Services, Inc. 1965–66; co-founder, Documentary Educational Resources, 1967; film expeditions in collaboration with anthropologist Napoleon Chagnon to document the Yanomamo Indians of the Venezuelan rainforest, 1969–76; research associate in human genetics, University of Michigan, 1968–70; lecturer in visual and environmental studies, Harvard University, 1970–71; film editor, American Anthropologist, 1970–76; adjunct professor of film, Brandeis University, 1973–74; research fellow in ethnographic film, Harvard University, 1973–79; research cinematographer, National Anthropological Film Center, Smithsonian Institution, 1975; lecturer, University Film Center, Hampshire College, 1975; film expeditions to document spiritual and ritual life in Indonesia, 1978–1992. Awards: Blue Ribbon (First Prize), American Film Festival (New York), CINE Golden Eagle, Grand Prize of Golden Bucranium (Pauda, Italy), First Prize, Flaherty Award, First Prize, Festival Del Popoli (Florence, Italy), Exceptional Merit Award, International Festival of Short Films (Philadelphia), and Grand Prize, International Folklore Festival, all for The Feast, 1969; CINE Golden Eagle, Red Ribbon (Second Prize) American Film Festival, Diploma of Merit, International Scientific Film Festival (Rio de Janeiro), all for Yanomamo: A Multidisciplinary Study, 1971; Red Ribbon (Second Prize), American Film Festival, Diploma of Honor International Scientific Film Association (Philadelphia), Special Merit Award, Athens International Film Festival, all for The Ax Fight, 1975; Red Ribbon (Second Prize), American Film Festival, CINE Golden Eagle, Bronze Medal, Film Council of Columbus; all for A Man Called “Bee,” 1975; Grand Prix Bilan du Film Ethnographique (Paris), for A Celebration of Origins, 1993. Agent: Documentary Educational Resources, 101 Morse Street, Watertown, Massachusetts 02472, USA. Died: In California after a long battle with cancer, 3 October 1994.

Films as Director and Cinematographer:

1963 Dodoth Morning
1969 The Feast
1971 Yanomamo: A Multidisciplinary Study
1974 Ocamo Is My Town; Arrow Game; Weeding the Garden; A Father Washes His Children; Firewood; A Man and His Wife Make a Hammock; Children’s Magical Death; Magical Death; Climbing the Peach Palm; New Tribes Mission; Yanomamo (for Japanese TV)
1975 The Ax Fight; A Man Called “Bee”; Moonblood; Tapi Distribution; Yag of War; Bride Service; The Yanomamo Myth of Naro as Told by Kaobawa; The Yanomamo Myth of Naro as Told by Dedeheiva
1976 Jaguar: A Yanomamo Twin-Cycle Myth
1978 The Sons of Haji Omar
1979 A Balinese Trance Seance
1980 Jero on Jero: A Balinese Trance Seance Observed
1983 Jero Tapakan: Stories from the Life of a Balinese Healer; The Medium Is the Masseuse: A Balinese Massage; The Water of Words
1988 Spear and Sword
1990 Releasing the Spirits
1992 A Celebration of Origins

Publications

By ASCH: book—

By ASCH: articles—

“Making a Film Record of the Yanomamo Indians of Southern Venezuela,” in Perspectives on Film, 1979.

On ASCH: book—

On ASCH: articles—

Still photography was Timothy Asch’s first love. He began photographing with David Sapir when he was a teenager at the Putney School, in Vermont, between 1947 and 1951. He went on to study photography at the California School of Fine Arts, where he apprenticed with Ansel Adams, Minor White, and Edward Weston. In 1952 he did seven months of photographic field work on Cape Breton Island, Canada. These powerful black and white photographs remained unpublished until after his death. He continued his career as a photographer for Stars and Stripes while in the U.S. Army stationed in Japan.

In 1959 he completed undergraduate studies in anthropology while working as an assistant to Margaret Mead. It was this connection to Mead that influenced Asch to take up film in the service of anthropology. His career took a turn in this direction, in spite of the fact that he continued to exhibit his still photographs from the 1950s to the 1980s. From 1959 to 1962 he utilized his talents as a film editor and worked at the Peabody Museum at Harvard University, where he met John Marshall and Robert Gardner. In 1961 he worked for the author Elizabeth Marshall Thomas in Karamoja, Uganda, among the Dodoth. His photographs from that time were published in Warrior Herdsman (1965) and he completed his first film from this material, Dodoth Morning (1963).

Asch saw film as a powerful tool to educate; he was one of the earliest proponents of educational reform and encouraged the use of film in the classroom. From 1966–68 he worked with Jonathan Kozol to develop a media-based curriculum for the public school system in Massachusetts. Throughout the 1960s and 1970s he was in demand by many universities, including Harvard, Brandeis and New York University, as a lecturer on filmmaking and anthropology.

From 1968 to 1975 Asch traveled deep into the rainforest of South America with anthropologist Napoleon Chagnon to live with, work with, and film the Yanomamo Indians. Shooting 16mm film in the jungles of Venezuela with native peoples who had a taste for intertribal warfare was not an easy task. From this experience Asch directed and produced his first important film, The Feast. Another film from this series, The Ax Fight, stands as a crucial work in the genre. In its understanding of the power of the vignette in film and in its concern for the truth and the accuracy of its representation of a society, it echoes the concerns and methods of Robert Flaherty in Nanook of the North. The Ax Fight, while simultaneously embodying the legacy of Flaherty, also prefigures the more self-conscious and experimental modes of ethnographic filmmaking to come. Asch’s collaboration with Chagnon resulted in thirty-nine films on the Yanomamo which were distributed worldwide through television and international film festivals, and received numerous awards.

Timothy Asch did his finest work as a collaborator. After producing the Yanomamo series he worked from 1979 to 1994 with Patsy Asch, Linda Connor, James Fox, and Douglas Lewis on a group of eight films about the people and culture of Indonesia. His intense engagement with the spirit medium and healer Jero Tapakan resulted in a fascinating experiment in cross-cultural filmmaking. His last film, A Celebration of Origins, was perhaps his most complex and difficult work. It received greater recognition internationally than in the United States.

During the 1980s Asch was a pivotal figure on the international ethnographic filmmaking scene, building the foundation for the establishment of visual anthropology and ethnographic film programs in China, Europe, and Africa. In 1991 he was the keynote speaker at the International Visual Anthropology and Sociology Conference, Eyes Across the Water, held at the University of Amsterdam. In 1982 he became the director of the Center for Visual Anthropology at the University of Southern California, a post he held until his untimely death in 1994.

—Cynthia Close

ASHBY, Hal

Nationality: American. Born: Ogden, Utah, 1932. Education: Attended Utah State University. Career: Mimeographer in Universal script department, Los Angeles, 1950–51; worked at Republic studios, becoming assistant editor, 1950s; became full editor, 1963; directed first feature, The Landlord, 1970. Awards: Oscar for Best Editing, In the Heat of the Night, 1967. Died: In Los Angeles, 27 December 1988.

Films as Director:

- 1970 The Landlord
- 1971 Harold and Maude
- 1973 The Last Detail
- 1975 Shampoo
- 1976 Bound for Glory
- 1978 Coming Home
- 1979 Being There (+ ed)
- 1981 Second Hand Hearts (+ ed)
- 1982 Lookin’ to Get Out (+ co-ed); Let’s Spend the Night Together
- 1983 Time Is on Our Side (+ ed)
- 1984 The Slugger’s Wife
- 1985 Eight Million Ways to Die

Other Films:

- 1958 The Big Country (Wyler) (asst ed); The Diary of Anne Frank (Stevens) (asst ed)
- 1961 The Young Doctors (Karlson) (asst ed)
- 1962 The Children’s Hour (The Loudest Whisper) (Wyler) (asst ed)
Hal Ashby

1964  The Best Man (Schaffner) (asst ed)
1965  The Greatest Story Ever Told (Stevens) (asst ed); The Loved One (co-ed); The Cincinnati Kid (Jewison) (ed); The Russians Are Coming, the Russians Are Coming (Jewison) (ed)
1967  In the Heat of the Night (Jewison) (ed)
1968  The Thomas Crown Affair (Jewison) (assoc pr, supervising ed)
1969  Gaily, Gaily (Jewison) (assoc pr)

Publications

By ASHBY: articles—

“Breaking out of the Cutting Room,” in Action (Los Angeles), September/October 1970.
Interview with L. Salvato and D. Schaefer, in Millimeter (New York), October 1976.

On ASHBY: book—

On ASHBY: articles—

Pflaum, H. G., Obituary, in EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), vol. 6, February 1989.

* * *

Hal Ashby had a reputation for showing a light touch as a director; he stated that he preferred to let the actors develop their characters. During the filming of Coming Home, for example, he threw out a script when actor Jon Voight envisioned one of the major characters differently than the screenwriter. The people in his films generally face choices in situations that reflect major social concerns. In The Landlord characters have to make decisions involving the issue of race; in Shampoo they must decide which side they are on in a complex political and sexual skirmish set in the turbulent summer of 1968; and in Coming Home, the effects of the Vietnam War force characters involved directly with the war as well as those at home to deal with unexpected changes in their lives. The solutions to decisions faced by Ashby’s characters are never facile. In Harold and Maude, Harold gains some degree of maturity but loses the love of his life, Maude; the military police of The Last Detail give a prisoner a way to face life, but also deliver him to prison; while George in Shampoo realizes how empty his life is and appears to want to change it, but at the same time he has lost what chances he had for happiness.

Ashby’s experience as an editor is evident; he employed a wide variety of editing effects in his films. His use of both dissolves and rapid cutting to show the passage of time in The Last Detail serves as an example of his background. His predilection for varying editing techniques could explain in part an aspect of his filmmaking that Ashby himself admitted: he did not rely on a distinctive style, but rather attempted to adapt his style to the type and subject of each film.

Though he has been called a ‘‘maverick director,’’ Ashby’s career garnered him a good deal of respect from the critics, and his films did well at the box office. Shampoo, Coming Home, and Being There represent his major financial successes, while the reputation of Harold and Maude was made in a slightly different manner. After an initial panning and a short general release, the film caught on in the Midwest, running in several theaters for over a year. The film has since become a cult favorite and has received positive critical response.

—Ray Narducy
ASTRUC, Alexandre

Films as Director:

1948 Aller et retour (Aller-retour) (+ sc)
1949 Ulysse ou Les Mauvaises rencontres (+ sc)
1953 Le Rideau cramoisi (The Crimson Curtain) (+ sc)
1955 Les Mauvaises rencontres (+ co-sc)
1958 Une Vie (End of Desire) (+ co-sc)
1960 La Proie pour l’ombre (+ co-sc)
1962 L’Éducation sentimentale (+ sc)
1963 Le Puits et le pendule (The Pit and the Pendulum) (for TV) (+ sc)
1965 Evariste Galois (+ sc)
1966 La Longue Marche (+ co-sc)
1968 Flamme sur l’Adriatique (+ co-sc)
1976 Sartre par lui-même (co-sc)
1980 Arsène Lupin joue et perd (mini for TV)
1981 La Chute de la maison Usher (mini for TV)

Other Films:

1948 Jean de la Lune (Achard) (co-sc)
1949 La P...respectiveuse (Paglieri) (co-sc); La Valse de Paris (Achard) (role)
1950 L’Affaire Manet (Aurel) (commentary)
1954 Le Vicomte de Bragelonne (Cerchio) (co-sc)
1964 Bassae (Pollet) (sc)
1974 La Jeune Fille assassinée (role as Publisher)
1993 François Truffaut: Stolen Portraits (role as himself)

Publications

By ASTRUC: books—

Les Vacances, 1945.
Quand la chouette s’envole, 1978.
Le Permissionnaire, 1982.
Le Roman de Descartes, 1989.

De la caméra au stylo, 1992.

By ASTRUC: articles—

Interview in Film Français (Paris), 6 March 1987.

On ASTRUC: articles—

* * *

Alexandre Astruc was the embodiment of the revolutionary hopes of a renewed cinema after the war. True, Clément, Bresson, and Melville were already making films in a new way, but making them in the age-old industry. Astruc represented a new, arrogant sensibility. He had grown up on the ideas of Sartre and was one of the youthful literati surrounding the philosopher in the St. Germain-des-Prés cafes. There he talked of a new French culture being born, one that demanded new representations in fiction and film.

His personal aspirations were great and grew even greater when his novel Les Vacances was published by the prestigious N.R.F., almost winning an important prize. While writing essays on art and culture for Combat and L’Ecran français he became convinced that the cinema must replace the novel.

But first the cinema must become more like the novel. In his crucial essay “Le Caméra stylo,” written the same year as Sartre’s “Situation of the Writer in 1948,” he called for an end to institutional cinema and for a new style that would be both personal and malleable. He wanted cinema to be able to treat diverse ideas and a range of expressions. He, like Sartre, wanted to become ethical.

This was the first loud clarion cry of the New Wave and it provoked attention in its own day. Astruc found himself linked with Bazin, Cocteau, Marker, and Tacchella against the Stalinists at L’Ecran français, led by Louis Daquin. Banding together to form “Objectif 48,” these men created a new atmosphere for cinema, attracting the young Truffaut and Godard to their screenings.

Everyone looked to Astruc to begin turning out short films, but his 16mm efforts ran aground. Soon he began writing scripts for acceptable standard directors like Marc Allégret. Finally in 1952 he was able to make Le Rideau cramoisi in his own way. It was a remarkable way: this nineteenth-century mystery tale was reduced to a set of unforgettable images and a soundtrack that contained no dialogue whatsoever. Pushing the voice-over discoveries of Bresson and Melville to the limit, Astruc’s narrational device places the film somewhere between dream and memory. This coincides perfectly with the haunting night photography and Anouk Aimée’s inscrutably romantic performance.

There followed more adaptations, not because Astruc had joined the industry’s penchant for such quality material, but because he always believed in the overriding import of style, seeing plots as pretexts only. The color photography in Une Vie, for example, explores the painterly concerns of the impressionists. But since the plot comes from a Maupassant tale written in the same era, the result is unpretentious.

In his older age Astruc has renounced this obsession with style. The themes that possess him now, crises in marriage and love, can actually be seen in all his earlier work as well. Now he can explore these issues in television, the medium that seems perfectly suited to his early ideas. Only now his ideas have changed and so has his following. Alexandre Astruc must always be mentioned in any chronicle of modern French cinema, but his career can only be thought of as disappointing.

—Dudley Andrew

ATTENBOROUGH, Richard

Career: Film acting debut in In Which We Serve, 1942; co-starred with wife Sheila Sim in original stage production of The Mousetrap, 1952; chairman, 1956–88, and president, from 1988, Actor’s Charitable Trust; debut as film producer, 1961; chairman of Combined Theatrical Charities Appeals Council, 1964–88; member of Cinematograph Films Council (UK), 1967–73; directorial film debut, Oh! What a Lovely War, 1969; director of Chelsea Football Club (London), 1969–82; chairman of RADA from 1971; chairman of Capital Radio (UK), 1972–92; chairman of Duke of York’s Theatre (London, UK), 1979–92; chairman of Goldcrest Films and Television Ltd., 1982–87; president of The Gandhi Foundation, from 1983; member of Committee of Inquiry into the Arts and Disabled People (UK government post), 1983–85; fellow, from 1983, and vice president, 1971–94, BAFTA; president of Brighton Film Festival (UK), from 1984; president of British Film Year, 1984–86; member of British Screen Advisory Council, from 1987; Goodwill Ambassador for UNICEF from 1987; member of European Script Fund, from 1988; head of Channel Four Television (UK), 1987–92; fellow of BFI, from 1992; fellow of FKC, from 1993. Awards: Zulueta Prize for Best Actor, San Sebastián International Film Festival (Spain), for The League of Gentlemen (shared with Jack Hawkins, Bryan Forbes, Roger Livesey, Nigel Patrick), 1960; British Academy of Film and Television Arts (BAFTA) Award for Best British Actor, for Guns at Batasi, 1965; San Sebastián International Film Festival Prize for Best Actor, for Séance on a Wet Afternoon, 1964; Golden Globe for Best Supporting Actor, for The Sand Pebbles, 1967; received CBE, 1967; Golden Globe for Best Supporting Actor, for Doctor Dolittle, 1968; knighted, 1976; Oscars for Best Director and Best Picture, BAFTA Film Awards for Best Direction and Best Film, and Directors’ Guild of America Award for Outstanding Directorial Achievement in Motion Pictures (with David Tomblin, assistant director), all for Gandhi, 1983; Evening Standard Film Award for 40 Years’ Service to British Cinema, 1983; Berlin International Film Festival Peace Film Award Honourable Mention, for Cry Freedom, 1988; BAFTA Alexander Korda Award for Best British Film, for Shadowlands, 1994. Address: Old Friars, Richmond Green, Surrey, TW9 1NQ, UK.

Films as Director:

1969 Oh! What a Lovely War (+ co-pr)
1972 Young Winston
1977 A Bridge Too Far (with Sidney Hayers)
1978 Magic
1982 Gandhi (+ pr)
1985 A Chorus Line
1987 Cry Freedom (+ pr)
1992 Chaplin (+ co-pr)
1993 Shadowlands (+ pr)
1997 In Love and War (+ pr)
1999 Grey Owl (+ pr)

Films as Actor:

1942 In Which We Serve (Coward) (as Young Sailor who leaves post)
1943 Schweik’s New Adventures (Lamac) (as Railway worker)
1944 The Hundred Pound Window (Hurst) (as Tommy Draper)
1946 School for Secrets (Secret Flight) (Ustinov) (as Jack Arnold); Journey Together (Boulting) (as David Wilton); A Matter of Life and Death (Stairway to Heaven) (Powell and Pressburger) (as Young Dead Flyer)
1947 Dancing with Crime (Carstairs) (as Ted Peters); Brighton Rock (Young Scarface) (Boultng) (as Pinkie Brown); The Man Within (Smugglers) (Knowles) (as Francis Andrews)
1948 London Belongs to Me (Dulcimer Street) (Gilliatt) (as Percy Boon); The Guinea Pig (The Outsider) (Boultng) (as Jack Read)
1949 Boys in Brown (Tully) (as Jackie Knowles); The Lost People (Knowles) (as Jan)
1950 Morning Departure (Operation Disaster) (Baker) (as Stoker Snipe)
1951 The Magic Box (Boultng) (as Jack Carter); Hell Is Sold Out (Anderson) (as Pierre Bonnet); Eight O’Clock Walk (Comfort) (as Tom Manning)
1952 The Gift Horse (Glory at Sea) (Bennett) (as Dripper Daniels); Father’s Doing Fine (Cass) (as Dougall)
1955 The Ship That Died of Shame (Dearden) (as George Hoskins)
1956 The Baby and the Battleship (Lewis) (as Knocker White); Private’s Progress (Boulting) (as Pvt. Percival Henry Cox)
1957 The Scamp (Strange Affection) (Rilla) (as Stephen Leigh); Brothers in Law (Boulting) (as Henry Marshall)
1958 Sea of Sand (Desert Patrol) (Green) (as Brody); The Man Upstairs (Chaffey) (as Peter Watson, the Man); Dunkirk (Norman) (as John Holden)
1959 League of Gentlemen (Dearden) (as Edward Lexy); Jet Storm (Killing Urge) (Endfield) (as Ernest Tilley); I’m All Right Jack (Boulting) (as Sidney de Vere Cox); Danger Within (Breakout) (Chaffey) (as Captain Bunter Phillips); SOS Pacific (Green) (as Whitey)
1960 The Angry Silence (Green) (as Tom Cutsis) (+ pr)
1961 All Night Long (Dearden) (as Rod Hamilton)
1962 Dock Brief (Trial and Error) (Hill) (as Foreman of the Jury/Fowle/Judge/Member of the Public); Only Two Can Play (Gilliat) (as Probert)
1963 The Great Escape (Sturges) (as Bartlett)
1964 The Third Secret (Crichton) (as Alfred Price-Gorham); Séance on a Wet Afternoon (Forbes) (as Bill Savage) (+ pr); Guns at Batasi (Guillermin) (as Sergeant Major Lauderdale)
1965 The Flight of the Phoenix (Aldrich) (as Lew Moran)
1966 The Sand Pebbles (Wise) (as Frenchy Burgoyne)
1967 Doctor Dolittle (Fleischer) (as Albert Blossom)
1968 The Bliss of Mrs. Blossom (McGrath) (as Robert Blossom); Only When I Larf (Dearden) (as Silas); The Magic Christian (McGrath) (as Oxford Coach)
1969 The Last Grenade (Fleming) (as General Charles Whiteley)
1970 David Copperfield (Mann—for TV) (as Mr. Tungay); A Severed Head (Clement) (as Palmer Anderson)
1971 Loot (Narrizano) (as Truscott); Ten Rillington Place (Fleischer) (as John Reginald Christie)
1972 Conduct Unbecoming (Anderson) (as Lionel Roach)
1974 And Then There Were None (Clair) (as Arthur Cannon)
1975 Brannigan (Hickox) (as Commander Swann); Rosebud (Preminger) (as Edward Sloat)
1977 Shatranj Ke Khiladi (The Chess Players) (Ray) (as General Outram)
1979 The Human Factor (Preminger) (as Colonel John Daintry)
1993  Jurassic Park (Spielberg) (as John Hammond)
1994  Miracle on 34th Street (Mayfield) (as Kriss Kringle)
1996  E=mc2 (Wavelength) (Fry) (as The Visitor); Hamlet (William Shakespeare’s Hamlet) (Branagh) (as English Ambassador)
1997  The Lost World: Jurassic Park (Spielberg) (as John Hammond)
1998  Elizabeth (Elizabeth: The Virgin Queen) (Kapur) (as Sir William Cecil, Lord Burghley)

Publications

By ATTENBOROUGH: books—

On ATTENBOROUGH: books—

On ATTENBOROUGH: articles—

* * * *

Richard Attenborough’s successful film career as an actor had been established for twenty-seven years when he directed his first feature. Oh! What a Lovely War was an adaptation of Joan Littlewood’s London stage show about the First World War and the waste of life caused by incompetent and careless strategists. With a script by spy thriller writer Len Deighton, the film shows hints of Attenborough’s future strengths as a director. In particular, the closing shot, in which the camera tracks backwards over a war cemetery, anticipates similar large-scale landscapes and crowd scenes in films such as Gandhi and Cry Freedom. Even the more intimate, and rather disappointing, Shadowlands contains some hallmark Attenborough footage as a small car winds its way through the English countryside.

After completing his training at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Arts in London, Attenborough began his film career in 1942, playing the role of a frightened young sailor in Noel Coward’s acclaimed war film, In Which We Serve. It was a part he would reprise in many British war films during the 1940s and 1950s: as a young actor during World War II, Attenborough made a name for himself representing the ordinary serviceman, struggling to do his duty in the face of overwhelming world events. It was only by taking on character roles such as Pinkie Brown in the 1947 adaptation of Graham Greene’s novel, Brighton Rock, that Attenborough managed to avoid becoming type-cast. Yet the impact of those early roles in war films was to be felt in his work as a director: the underlying theme of his best-known film, Gandhi, is of an ordinary man caught up in major historical events yet rising to the challenge with honour, dignity, and self-sacrifice.

Attenborough has claimed that it was always his ambition to make a film of the life of Mahatma Gandhi, and in 1982 Gandhi became his most successful effort as director to date. The film, which won a total of eight Oscars, runs to over three hours and gives a linear biographical account of the founder of modern India. The pace tends to be rather slow, but the Oscar-winning performance of Ben Kingsley in the title role is fascinating to watch, and the film successfully captures a sense both of the vastness of India and the difficulty of the struggle. The overall strength of the film as an uplifting story of courage and sacrifice makes it possible to overlook its simplistic historical vision. Chaplin was an attempt to repeat the epic life of a little man, but proved similarly questionable as an accurate biopic, and lacks emotional depth. Later films, such as Shadowlands, In Love and War, and Grey Owl are not of the same order as Gandhi, which managed to be both epic and touching.

Attenborough has gained a reputation as a director of long films with epic themes, and his style tends to be technically, rather than emotionally, impressive. His third film as director, the war action film A Bridge Too Far, is a case in point: its star cast and ambitious scale tend to detract from the human tragedy of its subject matter, the allied defeat at Arnhem in 1944. A later film, Cry Freedom, has similar limitations. The story of journalist Donald Woods and his investigation of the death of Steve Biko in police custody in South Africa is a gripping thriller, but the film has been criticized for romanticizing the relationship between Woods and Biko. In the end its political impact is reduced by a rather detached mood, and moralizing tone.

When Attenborough has attempted smaller-scale dramas, as in Shadowlands, the effect of such detachment is an awkwardness that goes beyond the psychological difficulties of the main characters. Telling the story of the love affair between writer and Oxford Don C.S. Lewis and the American poet Joy Davidson, who later turns out to be terminally ill, the film was named to Time magazine’s top ten list in 1993. But the success of Shadowlands perhaps reflects the strength of the performances of Anthony Hopkins and Debra Winger in an otherwise sentimental film.

Distinguished actors and young stars alike continue to be attracted to Attenborough’s film projects, and he continues to appear in films as diverse as Steven Spielberg’s Jurassic Park series and Kenneth Branagh’s Hamlet. Although he has become better known as a director since the 1970s, it was his success as a character actor and as an important British star in the 1950s and 1960s that enabled him to co-produce and direct his first feature. Having come late to directing,
Richard Attenborough, who received a life peerage and was made Lord Attenborough in 1993, has become one of the most important influences in British cinema. The fact that he has continued successfully to direct, produce and act in films since the late 1960s marks him out as a true all-rounder.

—Chris Routledge

AUGUST, Bille

Nationality: Danish. Born: Copenhagen, 9 November 1948. Education: Studied advertising photography; earned diploma as a director of photography from Danish Film School, 1971. Family: Married Pernilla Ostergren, star of Den Goda Viljan, 1991. Career: Selected by filmmaker Jorn Donner as cinematographer on Homeward in the Night, 1976; directed his first feature, Honningmane, 1978; also directed dramas for Danish television, as well as episode of The Young Indiana Jones Chronicles for American television. Awards: Outstanding Film of the Year, London Festival, for Zappa, 1983; Special Jury Prize, Young Peoples’ Cinema Festival at Lyon, and Best Danish Film Award, for Tro, hab og kærlighed, 1984; Culture Award, Danish Trades Union Congress, 1984; Oscar, Best Foreign Film, and Palme d’or, Cannes Festival, for Pelle erobreren, 1987; Palme d’or, Cannes Festival, for Den goda viljan, 1992. Agent: Tom Chasin, The Chasin-Becsey Agency, 190 N. Canon Drive., Suite 201, Beverly Hills, CA 90210–5319, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1978 Honningmane (Honeymoon in My Life) (+ sc); Kim G.
1983 Zappa (+ co-sc)
1984 Tro, hab og kærlighed (Twist and Shout) (+ co-sc); Busters verden (The World of Buster) (for television)
1987 Pelle erobreren (Pelle the Conqueror) (+ co-sc)
1992 Den goda viljan (The Best Intentions)
1994 House of the Spirits (+ sc)
1996 Jerusalem (+ sc)
1997 Smilla’s Sense of Snow
1998 Les Misérables

Films as Cinematographer:

1977 Hemåt i Natten (Homeward in the Night) (Lindstrom); Miesta ei voi raiskata (Men Can’t Be Raped) (Donner)
1980 Karleken (Love) (Kallifatides)
1982 The Grass Is Singing (Raeburn)

Publications

By AUGUST: articles—

Interview in Cinema (Paris), April/May 1986.
Interview in Positif (Paris), November 1988.

On AUGUST: articles—

Flamm, Matthew, article in New York Post, 30 December 1988.

* * *

Since the retirement of Ingmar Bergman from film directing in the mid-1980s, Bille August has become Scandinavia’s premiere international filmmaker.

August’s debut feature, In My Life, the story of a seemingly bright and optimistic middle-class Copenhagen couple and how their hopes steadily disintegrate, heralded the appearance of an important young talent. His follow-up features, Zappa and Twist and Shout, are keenly observed tales of teen angst in the 1960s. For international audiences, they served as reminders that adolescent dilemmas and concerns cut across cultures and language barriers. August’s next project was The World of Buster, an amusing made-for-TV kiddie film which ultimately is a minor credit on his filmography.

In Zappa and Twist and Shout, August examines the distinction between characters from separate social classes. This also is the case in the feature he made after The World of Buster. This work, the career-defining Pelle the Conqueror, is a wonderful, universal film about desire and disappointment, dignity and dreams. Along with Gabriel Axel’s Babette’s Feast, it was the first Scandinavian film since the heyday of Bergman to earn a high international profile.

Set at the turn of the twentieth century, it is the story of Lasse (Max von Sydow), a humble old widower who has emigrated with his son Pelle from poverty-stricken Sweden to the relative prosperity of Denmark. Lasse and Pelle are in search of a better life. Instead, they find themselves practically indentured servants on the aptly named Stone Farm, a harsh and dreary estate owned by a penny-pinching philanderer and his frustrated, faded beauty of a wife.
Pelle the Conqueror is a subtle film, the kind in which the characters’ quick glances reveal volumes about what they are thinking and feeling but never, ever could articulate. Its multi-faceted narrative presents a landscape of villains and victims, a world in which any hint of true love is stifled, and an environment in which the well-heeled but repressed upper classes use and abuse their power by brutalizing the lower classes.

As the seasons turn and the plot unfolds, Pelle begins to transcend the mysteries and fears of childhood. It becomes clear to the boy that if he is ever to get beyond the stifling existence of Stone Farm, he will have to part with his loving, well-meaning, but weak father and set forth into the world. Indeed, the force that holds the film together is the relationship between Pelle and Lasse. There is a poignant, life-sustaining bond between the boy, whose experiences here clearly will shape the course of his future, and his father.

August never overplays the story’s melodramatics. His direction is sure-handed as he weaves the tale, allowing the viewer to come to know Lasse, Pelle, and the other characters. As much as anything else, Pelle the Conqueror is a film about physical presences, such as the great ship that brings Lasse and Pelle to their new land, the rural landscape of Stone Farm, and the everyday details of farm labor. The images, stunningly captured by cinematographer Jorgen Persson, are as beautiful as they are loaded with drama and emotion.

Unlike dozens of filmmakers from across the world who have impressed with films not nearly as striking as Pelle the Conqueror, August has refused to go Hollywood. Instead, he has staunchly criticized films whose prime aesthetic motivations are car crashes and special effects, and has chosen to remain in his homeland and direct films which are motivated more by character and plot development.

Upon the success of Pelle the Conqueror, August was the logical choice to be selected by Bergman to direct the latter’s autobiographical script, The Best Intentions, a follow-up to Fanny and Alexander. The Best Intentions is the story of the courtship and marriage of Bergman’s parents; the end result is a film of which the master could be proud. The third film in the trilogy, Sunday’s Children, was directed by Bergman’s son, Daniel.

After Pelle the Conqueror, August had attempted to film The House of the Spirits, based on Isabel Allende’s best-selling novel, but could not obtain adequate funding. He eventually got the film made on an estimated $27-million budget. The film was his first major foray into international filmmaking, but it also proved to be his first major failure. The House of the Spirits charts forty-five momentous years in the lives of the South American Trueba family. August directed a notable cast that included Meryl Streep, Jeremy Irons, Glenn Close, Winona Ryder, Vanessa Redgrave, Armin Mueller-Stahl, and Antonio Banderas. Unfortunately, the result was wholly unsuccessful, with many of the actors miscast and seeming out of place in the setting.

—Rob Edelman

AUTANT-LARA, Claude

Films as Director:

1923 Faits divers
1926 Construire un feu; Vitel
1930 Buster se marie (d of French version of American film Parlor, Bedroom, and Bath [Sedgwick])
1932 L’Athlète incomplet (d of French version of American film); Le Gendarme est sans pitié; Un Client sérieux; Monsieur le Duc; La Peur des coups; Invite Monsieur à dîner
1933 Ciboulette (+ co-sc, co-costume des)
1936 My Partner Mr. Davis (The Mysterious Mr. Davis) (+ co-sc, pr)
1937 L’Affaire du courrier de Lyon (The Courier of Lyon) (co-d)
1938 Le Ruisseau (co-d)
1939 Fric-Frac (co-d)
1942 Le Mariage de Chiffon; Lettres d’amour
1943 Douce (Love Story)
1944 Sylvie et le fantôme (Sylvie and the Phantom)
1947 Le Diable au corps (Devil in the Flesh)
1949 Occupe-toi d’Amélie (Oh Amelia!)
1951 L’Auberge rouge (The Red Inn) (+ co-sc)
1952 “L’Orgueil” (“Pride”) episode of Les 7 Péchés capitaux (The Seven Deadly Sins) (+ co-sc)
1953 Le Bon Dieu sans confession (+ co-sc); Le Blé en herbe (The Game of Love) (+ co-sc)
1954 Le Rouge et le noir
1956 Marguerite de la nuit; La Traversée de Paris (Four Bags Full)
1958 En Cas de malheur (Love Is My Profession); Le Jouer
1959 La Jument verte (The Green Mare) (+ pr)
1960 Les Régates de San Francisco; Le Bois des amants
1961 Tu ne tueras point (Non uccidere; Thou Shalt Not Kill) (+ co-pr); Le Comte de Monte Cristo (The Story of the Count of Monte Cristo)
1962 Vive Henri IV . . . Vive l’amour!
1963 Le Meurtrier (Enough Rope)
1964 Le Magot de Josefa (+ co-sc); “La Fourmi” episode of Humour noir
1965 Le Journal d’une femme en blanc (A Woman in White)
1966 Le Nouveau Journal d’une femme en blanc (Une Femme en blanc se révolte)
1967 “Aujourd’hui” (“Paris Today”) episode of Le Plus Vieux Métier du monde (The Oldest Profession); Le Franciscain de Bourges
1969 Les Patates (+ co-sc)
1971 Le Rouge et le blanc
1973 Lucien Leuwen (for TV)
1977 Gloria (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1919 Le Carnaval des vérités (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des); L’Ex-voto (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des)
1920 L’Homme du large (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des)
1921 Villa Destin (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des); Eldorado (L’Herbier) (co-art d, costume des)
1922 Don Juan et Faust (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des)
1923 L’Inhumaine (L’Herbier) (co-art d, costume des); Le Marchand de plaisir (Catelain) (co-art d, costume des)
1926 Nana (Renoir) (co-art d, co-costume des, ro as Fauchery)
1946 Le Diable au coeur (L’Herbier) (art d, costume des)
1968 Flash 29 (ro as himself)
1978 Buster Keaton: A Hard Act to Follow (for TV) (ro as himself)

Publications

By AUTANT-LARA: books—

By AUTANT-LARA: articles—

“La Traversée de Paris est un film insolité,’’ interview with Martine Monod, in Les Lettres Françaises (Paris), 4 October 1956.

“Attention, notre métier n’est pas un métier d’hurluberlus,’’ in La Technicien du Film (Paris), May 1958.
Claude Autant-Lara is best known for his post-World War II films in the French “tradition of quality.” His earliest work in the industry was more closely related to the avant-garde movements of the 1920s than to the mainstream commercial cinema with which he was later identified. He began as a set designer in the 1920s, serving as art director for several of Marcel L’Herbier’s films, including L’Inhumaine, and for Jean Renoir’s Nana; he also assisted René Clair on a number of his early shorts. After directing several films, he worked on an early wide-screen experiment, Construire un feu, using the Hypergonar system designed by Henri Chretien. On the basis of his work in this format, he was brought to Hollywood and ended up directing French-language versions of American films for several years. He returned to France and directed his first feature of note, Ciboulette, in 1933.

During the war Autant-Lara exercised greater control in his choice of projects and started working with scenarists Jean Aurenche and Pierre Bost, who would continue to be among his most consistent collaborators. He also started assembling a basic crew that worked with him through the 1960s: composer René Cloerec, designer Max Douy, editor Madeleine Gug, and cameraman Jacques Natteau. Autant-Lara rapidly established his reputation as a studio director in the tradition of quality. For many, the names Aurenche, Bost, and Autant-Lara are synonymous with this movement. Their films are characterized by an emphasis on scripting and dialogue, a high proportion of literary adaptations, a solemn “academic” visual style, and general theatricality (due largely to the emphasis on dialogue and its careful delivery to create a cinematic world determined by psychological realism). They frequently attack or ridicule social groups and institutions.

Autant-Lara’s first major postwar film, Le Diable au corps, was adapted from a novel by Raymond Radiguet. Set during World War I, it tells the story of an adolescent’s affair with a young married woman whose husband is away at war. While the film was considered scandalous by many for its valorization of adultery and tacit condemnation of war, it was also seen to express the cynical mood of postwar youth. Autant-Lara’s films seem to revel in irreverent depictions of established authority and institutions. L’Auberge rouge is a black comedy involving murderous innkeepers, a group of insipid travellers (representing a cross-section of classes), and a monk trapped by the vows of confession.

Throughout the 1950s Autant-Lara was extremely active. His successes of the period include Le Rouge et le noir, adapted from Stendhal; La Traversée de Paris, a comedy about black-market trading in occupied France; and En cas de malheur, a melodrama involving a middle-aged lawyer, his young client, and her student lover. At the same time Autant-Lara was an active spokesman for the French film industry. As head of several film trade unions and other groups promoting French film, he criticized (often harshly) the Centre National du cinéma française (CNC) for its inadequate support of the industry; the American film industry for its stultifying presence in the French market; and government censorship policies for limiting freedom of expression.

Autant-Lara’s prominence was effectively eclipsed with the emergence of the French New Wave, although he continued directing films. In the 1950s he, along with Aurenche and Bost, had been subject to frequent critical attacks, most notably by François Truffaut. In the wake of the success of the new generation of directors, Autant-Lara’s work is often seen as no more than the “stale” French cinema of the 1950s which was successfully displaced by the more vital films of the New Wave. Yet in spite of, indeed owing to, their “armchair” criticism of authority, bleak representation of human nature, and slow-paced academic style, they possess a peculiarly appealing, insolent sensibility.

—M. B. White
BACON, Lloyd

Films as Director:

1926 Broken Hearts of Hollywood; Private Izzy Murphy
1927 Finger Prints; White Flannels; The Heart of Maryland; A Sailor’s Sweetheart; Brass Knuckles
1928 Pay as You Enter; The Lion and the Mouse; Women They Talk About; The Singing Fool
1929 Stark Mad; No Defense; Honky Tonk; Say It with Songs; So Long Letty
1930 The Other Tomorrow; She Couldn’t Say No; A Notorious Affair; Moby Dick; The Office Wife
1931 Sit Tight; Kept Husbands; Fifty Million Frenchmen; Gold Dust Gertie; Honor of the Family
1932 Manhattan Parade; Fireman Save My Child; Alias the Doctor; The Famous Ferguson Case; Miss Pinkerton; Crooner; You Said a Mouthful
1933 42nd Street; Picture Snatcher; Mary Stevens M.D.; Footlight Parade; Son of a Sailor
1934 Wonder Bar; A Very Honorable Guy; He Was Her Man; Here Comes the Navy; Six-Day Bike Rider
1935 Devil Dogs of the Air; In Caliente; Broadway Gondolier; The Irish in Us; Frisco Kid
1936 Sons o’ Guns; Cain and Mabel; Gold Diggers of 1937
1937 Marked Woman; Ever since Eve; San Quentin; Submarine D-1
1938 A Slight Case of Murder; Cowboy from Brooklyn; Rocket Busters; Boy Meets Girl
1939 Wings of the Navy; The Oklahoma Kid; Indianapolis Speedway; Espionage Agent
1940 A Child Is Born; Invisible Stripes; Three Cheers for the Irish; Brother Orchid; Knute Rockne—All American 1941 Honeymoon for Three; Footsteps in the Dark; Affectionately Yours; Navy Blues
1942 Larceny, Inc.; Wings for the Eagle; Silver Queen
1943 Action in the North Atlantic
1944 Sunday Dinner for a Soldier
1945 Captain Eddie
1946 Home Sweet Homicide; Wake Up and Dream
1947 I Wonder Who’s Kissing Her Now
1948 You Were Meant for Me; Give My Regards to Broadway; Don’t Trust Your Husband (An Innocent Affair)
1949 Mother Is a Freshman; It Happens Every Spring; Miss Grant Takes Richmond
1950 Kill the Umpire; The Good Humor Man; The Fuller Brush Girl
1951 Call Me Mister; The Frogmen; Golden Girl
1953 The I Don’t Care Girl; The Great Sioux Uprising; Walking My Baby Back Home
1954 The French Line; She Couldn’t Say No

Other Films:

1915 The Champion (Chaplin) (role); In the Park (Chaplin) (role); The Jitney Elopement (Chaplin) (role); The Bank (Chaplin) (role); The Tramp (Chaplin) (role)
1916 The Floorwalker (Chaplin) (role); The Vagabond (Chaplin) (role); Behind the Screen (Chaplin) (role); The Rink (Chaplin) (role); The Fireman (Chaplin) (role)
1919/20 Roles for Mutual and Triangle studios

Publications

On BACON: books—

Fuments, Rocco, editor, 42nd Street, Madison, Wisconsin, 1980.

On BACON: articles—

Parsons, Louella, “Cosmopolitan’s Citation for the Best Direction of the Month,” in Cosmopolitan (New York), May 1949.

* * *
Lloyd Bacon is probably best known for his director’s credit on such classic Warner Bros. films as 42nd Street, Footlight Parade, Knute Rockne—All American, and Action in the North Atlantic. Still, other film personalities are better remembered for these films: choreographer Busby Berkeley for the musicals, and actors Pat O’Brien, Ronald Reagan, and Humphrey Bogart for the 1940s films. Today Bacon is lost in the literature about Warner Bros.

In his day, however, Lloyd Bacon was recognized as a consummate Hollywood professional. One cannot help standing in some awe of Bacon’s directorial output in the era from the coming of sound to the Second World War. During those fourteen years he directed an average of five films per annum for Warner Bros. (seven were released in 1932 alone.) Bacon’s 42nd Street and Wonder Bar were among the industry’s top-grossing films of the decade. For a time Bacon was considered to be the top musicals specialist at Warner Bros. The corporation paid him accordingly, some $200,000 per year, making him one of his highest paid contract directors of the 1930s.

Bacon’s status declined during the 1940s. His craftsmanship remained solid, for he knew the classical Hollywood system of production as well as anyone on the Warner lot. But Bacon never seemed to find his special niche. Instead, he skipped from one genre to another. He seemed to evolve into the Warner Bros. handyman director. His greatest success during this period came with war films. For example, Wings of the Navy had a million dollar budget and helped kick off the studio’s string of successful World War II films. Bacon’s best-remembered film of the 1940s is probably Action in the North Atlantic, a tribute to the U.S. Merchant Marine. This movie was Bacon’s last film at Warner Bros.

In 1944 Bacon moved to Twentieth Century-Fox to work for his former boss, Darryl F. Zanuck. There he re-established himself in musicals as well as films of comedy and family romance, but still seemed unable to locate a long-term specialty. He finished at Fox with an early 1950s series of Lucille Ball comedies, and ended his directorial career in somewhat ignominious fashion, helping Howard Hughes create a 3-D Jane Russell spectacle, The French Line.

Bacon’s most significant contribution to film history probably came during his early days at Warner Bros. as that studio pioneered new sound technology in the late 1920s. Bacon presided over several significant transitional films, none more important than The Singing Fool. Although The Jazz Singer usually gets credit as the first (and most important) transitional talkie, The Singing Fool should receive far more credit because for more than a decade, this film stood as the... highest grossing feature in Hollywood annals. As its director, Bacon was honored by the trade publication Film Daily as one of the top ten directors of the 1928–29 season. As a consequence of his involvement on this and other films, Bacon established his reputation as a director who helped thrust Hollywood into an era of movies with sound.

—Douglas Gomery

BADHAM, John

Films as Director:

1971 The Impatient Heart (for TV)
1974 Isn’t It Shocking? (for TV); The Law (for TV); The Gun (for TV); Reflections of Murder (for TV); The Godchild (for TV)
1976 The Bingo Long Travelling All-Stars and Motor Kings; The Keegans (for TV)
1977 Saturday Night Fever
1979 Dracula
1981 Whose Life Is It Anyway?
1983 Blue Thunder; War Games
1985 American Flyers
1986 Short Circuit
1987 Stakeout (+ pr)
1990 Bird on a Wire
1991 The Hard Way
1993 Point of No Return (The Assassin); Another Stakeout (The Lookout, Stakeout 2) (+ pr)
1994 Drop Zone (+ pr)
1995 Nick of Time (+ pr)
1997 Incognito

Films as Producer:

1989 Disorganised Crime
1992 From Time to Time (Timekeeper, Le Visionarium)
1993 Dragon: The Bruce Lee Story
1994 Relentless: Mind of a Killer (for TV)
1996 Rebound: The Legend of Earl ‘The Goat’ Manigault (Rebound) (for TV)

Publications

On BADHAM: articles—

Brown, Jeffrey A. “‘Gender and the Action Heroine: Hardbodies and the Point of No Return,’” in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), Spring 1996.

On BADHAM: films—

* * *

Best known as the director of Saturday Night Fever, and a raft of flawed but popular thrillers, English-born director John Badham began his career working in television on series such as Night Gallery (1969), Nichols (1971) and Police Story (1973). He also made several TV movies of variable quality in the early 1970s before going on to establish the characteristic glossy style of his 1980s film output. Badham is notable for the number of different types of films he has made, from dance drama in Saturday Night Fever through romantic horror in Dracula, techno-para-noia in War Games, and sub-Hitchcockian thrillers such as Bird on a Wire. Badham is a workman-like director, skilled in the mechanics of movie making and with a reputation for making reliable, if sometimes predictable, entertainment.

The disco dance movie Saturday Night Fever accelerated the career of actor John Travolta, and also marked the beginning of Badham’s own most successful spell as a director. The dramatic pace of the film, helped along by some sharp editing and Travolta’s presence, have made Saturday Night Fever a cult movie: Travolta’s dance scene in Quentin Tarantino’s celebrated Pulp Fiction (1994) pays homage to the earlier film. Yet despite its cult status Saturday Night Fever is at times a rather sluggish film, rescued only by Travolta’s performance and some extraordinary dance sequences. It has been released in several versions over the years, some of which are quite heavily censored.

After the success of Saturday Night Fever, Dracula became Badham’s stylistic contribution to the vampire film canon. An expensive production, heavy with visual effects and flamboyant theatricality, Dracula gives an indication of Badham’s status in Hollywood at the end of the 1970s, and is one of his most watchable films. His period of greatest success, however, came during the 1980s, when films like Blue Thunder and War Games appealed to Cold War worries about placing too much faith in technology. Blue Thunder is a lavish action movie featuring a plot about the commissioning of a high-tech police helicopter.

More interesting is War Games, which was Oscar nominated for screenplay and cinematography. An early treatment of the dangerous possibilities for online terrorism, War Games tells the story of a teenager hacker who manages to connect his home computer into the Pentagon’s system, pretending to be the Soviet military about to embark on nuclear war. At a time of great tension between the West and the Soviet Union, the film was a reminder that deadly conflicts often begin with a misunderstanding. Playing on the mystique and suspicion that still surrounded computers at the time, War Games is overburdened by the need to make the machines look as complicated and sinister as possible. It could be argued that the elements of adventure and suspense in the film contradict the message that hacking poses a serious threat. Nevertheless, both Blue Thunder and War Games were immensely successful at the box office.

Short Circuit again demonstrated Badham’s ability to switch between genres, this time with the enjoyable comic story of a malfunctioning robot on the loose. It was quickly followed by the light-hearted but over-long police thriller, Stakeout. After these successes, Badham’s career took a downturn in the late 1980s from which it has never really recovered. Bird on a Wire is an amusing but ultimately unbelievable star vehicle for Mel Gibson and Goldie Hawn, while another comedy thriller, The Hard Way, tells the story of an actor who teams up with a real-life New York cop in order to research a film role.

Badham’s later films can mostly be described as journeyman work, epitomized by Point of No Return (The Assassin), a remake of Luc Besson’s La Femme Nikita. Besson’s film is a gritty, violent movie about a convicted killer given the chance to avoid the death penalty if she agrees to work as an assassin for the state. While the Badham film sticks fairly closely to the plot of the original, it takes a sanitized, altogether softer approach. There seems little reason for Point of No Return ever to have been made, other than the American audience’s dislike of subtitling and Hollywood’s worries about the extreme levels of violence in the French original.

Having begun his career in television, Badham has returned at the end of the 1990s to making TV movies. While in filmmaking terms many of his films are uneven and unsatisfactory, in the 1980s he made some of the most popular movies of the decade. He has also been involved in the development of computer generated special effects. Ironically, having established a reputation as a director of predictable star vehicles, he will probably be best remembered as the director of Saturday Night Fever, a film which helped make a star of John Travolta.

—Chris Routledge

Awards: Rockefeller Foundation fellowship, 1966; Creative Arts Award for Filmmaking, Brandeis University, 1971; honorary M.F.A., San Francisco Art Institute, 1971; National Endowment for the Arts fellowship, 1971, 1981; CAPS, NY, 1981; Maya Deren Award, Vermont Institute, 1981, American Film Institute, 1991; San Francisco International Film Festival Golden Gate Award; Ann Arbor Grand Prize; Moholy Nagy Award; Guggenheim fellowship; American Film Institute fellowship. Address: 669 W. Kodiak Ave., Camano Island, WA 98292, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1960/61 On Sundays
1961 David Lynn’s Sculpture (unfinished); Mr Hayashi; The Gymnastics
1962 Friend Fleeing (unfinished); Everyman; News No. 3; Have You Thought of Talking to the Director?: Here I Am
1962/63 A Hurrah for Soldiers
1963 To Parsifal
1964 Mass for the Dakota Sioux; The Brookfield Recreation Center
1964/65 Quixote (revised 1967)
1965 Yellow Horse
1966 Tung; Castro Street; All My Life; Still Life; Termination; Port of Chicago Vigil; Show Leader
1967 Valentin de las Sierras
1970 Quick Billy
1971-present Roslyn Romance (multi-part film)
1978 Roslyn Romance (*Is It Really True?): Intro. I and II
1981-present The Cardinal's Visit (final section of Roslyn Romance)
1987-present Dr. Bish Remedies II
1990 The P-38 Pilot; The Bus Driver's Tale; Dr. Bish Remedies I
1995 Commute; Kindergarten

Publications

By BAILLIE: articles—

Frequent poems and letters, in Canyon Cinema News (San Francisco)
“Letters: San Francisco Film Scene,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1963.
Interview with Richard Whitehall, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1969.
Interview in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1971.
“Bruce Baillie,” in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1971.
Interview with Scott MacDonald, in Wide Angle (Baltimore), July-October 1992.

On BAILLIE: books—

On BAILLIE: articles—

Callenbach, Ernest, “Bruce Baillie,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1964.
“Baillie Issue” of Harbinger (Houston), July 1967.
“Baillie Section” of Film Culture (New York), no. 67–69, 1979.
Cinematograph (San Francisco), vol. 5, 1993.

***

The career of Bruce Baillie has two central aspects, which are also features of the whole American avant-garde film movement. First, his films are generally intensely poetic, lyrical evocations of persons and places in which the subject matter is transformed by the subjective methods used to photograph it. Second, many of his films display a strong social awareness, describing attitudes critical towards, and alienated from, mainstream American society. In many cases, Baillie fuses these concerns within single films.

Stylistically, Baillie’s films are characterized by images of haunting, evanescent beauty. An object will appear with spectacular clarity, only to dissolve away an instant later. Light itself often becomes a subject, shining across the frame or reflected from objects, suggesting a level of poetry in the subject matter that lies beyond easy interpretation. Baillie combines images with other images, and images with sound, in dense, collage-like structures. Thus, many of his films cut frequently between scenes, or superimpose objects on each other. One is constantly aware of a restlessness, an instability, which seems to result from his images’ appearance and flow. It is significant, too, that many of Baillie’s films contain, or are structured as, journeys.

The effect of Baillie’s films is to make the viewer feel that any moment of the viewing, any single image he is looking at is at a mere illusion that will soon vanish. The sensuousness of the light and colors only heighten one’s awareness of their unreality. It is as if there is a void, a nothingness, that lies behind all things. It is not irrelevant in this regard that Baillie has evidenced strong interest, over the years, in Eastern religious thought.

Some degree of social comment is present in most of Baillie’s films, but in widely varying degrees. Mr. Hayashi places the poetic and the social in a very precise balance. The imagery consists of evocative, sun-drenched images forming a short, haiku-like portrait of a man. On the soundtrack, we hear the man speak of his life, and his difficulty in finding work. Mass and Quixote indict American society as overly aggressive, toward its citizens, toward Native Americans, and toward nature; as impersonal and dehumanizing; as lacking physical or moral roots. For Quixote, Baillie uses an extremely dense, collage-like form, in which images and fragments of images are intercut with and superimposed on others, with a similarly complex soundtrack. At times, the film’s multiple themes seem to blur into each other, as if the filmmaker is acknowledging that he is as “lost” as the society he is depicting.

Castro Street, Tung, and Valentin de las Sierras are, by contrast, apparently simpler portraits of people and places. By keeping his camera very close to things, Baillie renders their details ever more stunning, while his collage editing and soundtrack again create an instability leading to “nothingness.” Castro Street, which depicts an industrialized area, is extraordinary for its combination of diverse photographic representations—black and white, color, positive and negative—in editing and superimposition. Quick Billy contains thematic and stylistic elements of most of Baillie’s previous films; its motifs include autobiography, “portrait”-like representation of people and events, and an underlying theme, made explicit in the film’s final section, of Western man’s aggressiveness toward his surroundings.

—Fred Camper

BARDEM, Juan Antonio

Nationality: Spanish. Born: Juan Antonio Bardem-Munoz in Madrid, 2 July 1922. Education: Instituto de Investigaciones Cinematograficas, 1947–48. Career: Worked for Spanish Ministry of Agriculture, assigned to Cinema section, 1946; wrote for film periodicals, and on scripts with Luis Berlanga, from 1947; began film magazine Objectivo, 1953 (banned by government, 1955); arrested for political reasons, 1956 and later; produced through Uninci company, 1958–61; head of Spanish directors’ guild, 1970’s; directed Bulgarian/USSR/East German production of The Warning, 1981.

Films as Director:

1949 Paseo sobre una guerra antigua (co-d, co-sc) (silent short incorporated by Luis Escobar into feature La honradez de la cerradura)
1950 Barajas, aeropuerto internacional (short) (+ sc)
1951 Esa pareja feliz (That Happy Pair) (co-d, co-sc)
1954 Cómicos (Comedians) (+ sc); Felices Pascuas (+ co-sc)
1955 Muerte de un ciclista (Death of a Cyclist; Age of Infidelity) (+ sc)
1956 Calle Mayor (Grand Rue; The Lovemaker) (+ sc)
1957 La muerte de Pío Baroja (unreleased) (+ sc); La venganza (The Vengeance) (+ sc)
1959 Sonatas (+ pr, sc)
1960 A las cinco de la tarde (+ pr, co-sc)
1962 Los inocentes (+ co-sc)
1963 Nunca pasa nada (+ co-sc)
1965 Los pianos mécanicos (Les Pianos méchaniques; The Uninhibited) (+ sc)
1969 El último día de la guerra (The Last Day of the War) (+ co-sc)
1971 Variedades (+ sc)
1973 Four versions of The Mysterious Island: 1. La isla misteriosa (for Spanish and Latin American distribution), 2. L’isola misteriosa e il Capitano Nemo (for Italian distribution, incorporates material directed by Henri Colpi), 3. L’île mystérieuse and The Mysterious Island (French, English and international version, co-d with Colpi), 4. six-hour TV version for international distribution; La corrupción de Chris Miller (The Corruption of Chris Miller) (+ role); Behind the Shutter
1976 El poder del deseo; Foul Play
1977 The Dog; El puente
1979 7 Días de enero (Seven Days in January) (+ sc)
1982 The Warning
1987 Lorca, la muerte de un Poeta (+ sc)
1993 El Joven Picasso (Young Picasso: 1881–1906) (TV)
1998 Resultado final (+sc)

Other Films:

1952 Bienvenido, Mr. Marshall! (Welcome, Mr. Marshall!) (Berlanga) (co-sc)
1953 Novio a la vista (Berlanga) (co-sc)
1954 El torero (Wheeler) (Spanish version of Châteaux en Espagne) (co-dialogue)
1955 Playa prohibida (El esconçido) (Soler) (sc)
1956 El amor de Don Juan (Don Juan) (Berry) (co-sc); Carta a Sara (Mananos and Bercovici) (sc)
1958 L’uomo dai calzoni corti (Tal vez mañana) (Pellegrini) (pr)
1961 Viridiana (Buñuel) (pr)
1978 El Diputado (Eloy de la Iglesia) (role)
1986 Adiós pequeña (Uribe) (role)
1995 Noctámbulos (Cempón) (ro as Old Bum)

Publications

By BARDEM: articles—

“Spanish Highway,” in Films and Filming (London), June 1957.
Film Makers on Filmmaking, edited by Harry Geduld, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.
Interview with P. Farinas, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 103, 1983.
Interview with Wolfgang Martin Hamdorf, in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), 1994.

On BARDEM: books—

Oms, Marcel, J.A. Bardem, Lyons (Premier Plan no. 21).
Scwartz, Ronald, Spanish Film Directors: 21 Profiles, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.
Higginbotham, Virginia, Spanish Film under Franco, Austin, Texas, 1988.

On BARDEM: articles—

Biofilmography, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Winter 1984.

*  *  *

A pioneer figure in Spanish film, Juan Antonio Bardem is also one of Spain’s most consistently political filmmakers. In his early movies Esa pareja feliz and Bienvenido Mr. Marshall, co-directed with Luis Garcia Berlanga, he broke with prevailing Francoist film traditions that emphasized militarism, folklore, literary adaptations and costume dramas. Bardem and Berlanga chose instead to present scenes of aspects of Spanish society. With Bienvenido Mr. Marshall the two directors were recognized as leading filmmakers and, along with others of their generation, they set out to revitalize the Spanish film industry and to rescue Spanish films from mediocrity. At a meeting held in Salamanca in 1955, they drafted a statement of principles in which Bardem wrote: “After 60 years, Spanish cinema is politically futile, socially false, intellectually worthless, aesthetically valueless and industrially paralytic.” Bardem went on to note that Spanish cinema “had turned its back on reality . . . (and was) totally removed from Spanish realistic traditions [as found] in paintings and novels.”

Bardem and other filmmakers who attended the meeting at Salamanca also deployed the lack of general film culture in Spain, noting that it was not possible to see 95% of movies made abroad. Bardem felt that it was important for Spaniards to keep abreast of worldwide trends in filmmaking and especially to become familiar with Italian neo-realism. This was the single most important influence in the development of his own cinematic style. Both in his movies and in his writings he remained faithful to the tenets of neo-realism. In order to foster a film culture in Spain, Bardem founded Objetivo, a cinema journal that was eventually banned by the government. During its brief existence, Objetivo nevertheless became a rallying point for Spanish cineastes, raised the level of film criticism in Spain and informed readers about prohibited films. Several years later, in yet another effort to ensure the autonomy and integrity of Spanish film, Bardem joined with Berlanga, Carlos Saura, and other directors and founded a production company, UNINICI, which operated until 1962, when it was closed down for co-producing Luis Buñuel’s Viridiana. Because of these endeavors as well as his political outspokenness, Bardem was arrested seven times during the Franco years. He nevertheless persisted in his efforts to make political films in Spain. In spite of his lack of favor at home, he won many prizes at film festivals around the world and directed co-productions in Italy, France, Argentina, and Bulgaria.

Bardem is most closely associated with films that chronicle the negative effects of Francoism on the psyche of Spaniards of different classes, regions and social milieus. In several films he dramatizes the alienation fostered by Francoism by focusing on a single individual who often bears Bardem’s own given name—Juan. This Spanish everyman feels frustrated and stifled in a closed society. He attempts to find outlets through hobbies, intrigues, and even through radio contests, but all means prove unsatisfactory. In the course of his efforts, Juan is led to reevaluate himself and the world around him in order to find new options. The films depict the choices that each Juan makes, becoming increasingly critical of individuals who act selfishly, cowardly, or who refuse to take a stand. These general themes continue in the movies Bardem has made since the death of Franco.

—Katherine Singer Kovács

BARNET, Boris

Films as Director:

1926 Miss Mend (serial) (co-d, co-sc, role)
1927 Devushka s korobkoi (The Girl with the Hat Box); Moskva v oktyabre (Moscow in October) (+ role)

1928 Dom na Trubnoi (House on Trubnaya)
1929 Zhivye dela (Living Things) (short) (+ co-sc)
1930 Proizvodstvo musikal’nykh instrumentov (The Manufacture of Musical Instruments) (short)
1931 Ledolom (The Thaw)
1933 Okrana (Outskirts; Patriots) (+ co-sc)
1935 U samogo s涅go morya (By the Deep Blue Sea)
1939 Noch’ v sentyabre (One September Night) (+ role)
1940 Staryi nayezdnik (The Old Jockey) (released 1959)
1941 “Muzhestvnoe’” (“Courage”) episode of Boyevoy kinosbornik no. 3 (Fighting Film Album no. 3)
1942 “Bestsennaya golova” (“A Priceless Head”) episode of Boyevoy kinosbornik no. 10 (Fighting Film Album no. 10)
1943 Novgorodtsy (Men of Novgorod) (not released)
1945 Odnazhdya noch’yu (Once One Night) (+ role)
1947 Podvig razvedchika (The Exploits of an Intelligence Agent) (+ role)
1948 Stranitsy zhizni (Pages from a Life) (co-d)
1950 Schedroie leto (A Bounteous Summer)
1952 Kontsert misterov ukrainskogo iskusstva (Masters of Ukrainian Art in Concert) (+ sc)
1955 Lyana (+ co-sc)
1957 Poet (The Poet); Borets i kloun (The Wrestler and the Clown) (co-d)
1959 Annushka
1961 Alyonka
1963 Polustanok (The Whistle-Stop) (+ co-sc)

Films as Actor Only:

1924 Neobychaianye priklicheniya Mistera Vesta v stranye Bolshevikov (The Adventures of Mr. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks) (Kuleshov)
1925 Shakhmatnaya goryachka (Chess fever) (Pudovkin) (short); Na vernom sledu (On the Right Track) (A. Dmitriyev)
1926 Protess o trekh millionakh (The Three Millions Trial) (Protazanov)
1928 Potomok Chingis-khana (The Heir to Genghis Khan; Storm over Asia) (Pudovkin)
1929 Zhivoi trap (The Living Corpse) (Otsep)
1936 Lyubov’ i nenavist’ (Love and Hate) (A. Endelstein)
1946 Sinegoriya (The Blue Mountains) (Garin and Lokshina)

Publications

On BARNET: books—

Kushnirov, M., Zhizni i fil’my Boris Barneta [The Life and Films of Boris Barnet], Moscow, 1977.

On BARNET: articles—

“Boris Barnet,” in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1965.
Kuzmina, “A Tribute to Boris Barnet,” in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1968.
Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, June 1993.
Filmkultura (Budapest), vol. 31, no. 11, November 1995.

* * *

Boris Barnet’s career as a director has been much underrated in the West, yet it spanned almost forty years of Soviet filmmaking. After a brief period as a PT instructor in the Red Army and then as a professional boxer, he joined Kuleshov’s workshop as an actor and handyman. In 1924 Barnet played the part of Cowboy Jedyd, a grotesque caricature of an American, in Kuleshov’s eccentric comedy The Extraordinary Adventures of Mr. West in the Land of the Bolsheviks. He frequently appeared later in his own films, often in cameo roles.

Like Kuleshov, Barnet went to work for the Mezhrabpom-Rus studio, where experimentation was combined with the production of films that were commercially successful. Barnet collaborated with Fyodor Otsep on the serial thriller Miss Mend and then made his first two feature films, The Girl with the Hatbox and The House on Trubnaya. Both films involved actors from the Kuleshov workshop and both were light-hearted comedies, satirising the excesses of the New Economic Policy and the social and economic tensions associated with it. The first centred on a lost lottery ticket and the second on the arrival of a country girl in Moscow, but Barnet managed very gently to broaden their frame of reference. His deft touch on these two films marked him out by the end of the 1920’s as a director of originality and distinction.

The advent of sound seems to have caused Barnet fewer problems than it did other directors: he made two sound shorts about musical instruments in 1930, neither of which has been preserved. His first sound feature film, Okraina, was produced in 1933. This was a remarkably powerful, and in some ways almost Chekhovian, portrayal of life in a provincial Russian town during the First World War and the start of the Revolution. The lives of the characters are almost imperceptibly intertwined with the historical events unfolding far away. The relationship between individuals and events was, however, portrayed in too subtle a fashion for many of Barnet’s contemporaries and, like so many other Soviet filmmakers of the time, he was attacked for ideological obscurantism. Hence it was that Barnet later remarked that he was not merely a “film director” but a “Soviet film director.”

The reception for Barnet’s next film, By the Deep Blue Sea, was even more hostile. On one level the film was a light-hearted love intrigue set on a collective farm on the banks of the Caspian Sea. On another level, however, it can be read as an allegorical tale of the eternal struggle between dream and reality, with the collective farm itself as a latter-day utopia, emphasised by the somewhat ironic title—a dangerous comparison in 1936 in the Soviet Union. Given the atmosphere of the time, it is perhaps not altogether surprising that Barnet’s next film, One September Night, was devoted to a more conventional account of the birth of the Stakhanovite movement. In this film the secret police were portrayed as heroes, defending the Soviet Union against sabotage. But The Old Jockey, made the year after, fell afoul of the authorities and was not released until 1959.

The Second World War dominated Barnet’s output for the next few years and his efforts were rewarded with the Stalin Prize in 1948. He returned to his true métier, comedy, in 1950, with his first colour film, A Bounteous Summer, made in the Ukraine. Another film, Lyana, was made in Moldavia five years later. Barnet’s last completed film, The Whistle-Stop, was also a comedy, but other films that he made during the last decade of his life are more properly characterised as dramas. But to say that is to underestimate Barnet, because his films cannot be easily pigeon-holed.

Barnet’s career in Soviet cinema spanned four decades. He belonged to the generation of lesser known filmmakers who in fact constituted the backbone of that cinema, while taking a back seat in the theoretical polemics that attracted international curiosity and focused attention on the avant garde. His films displayed a mastery of visual technique and a disciplined economy of style. He was a mainstream director but a subversive artist, whose work, tinged with warmth, humour, and humanity, constantly attracted Soviet audiences. He took his own life in 1965.

—Richard Taylor

BARTEL, Paul

Nationality: American. Born: Brooklyn, New York, 6 August 1938.

Films as Director:

1969 The Secret Cinema (+pr, sc)
1972 Private Parts
1975 Death Race 2000
1976 Cannonball (+pr)
1982 Eating Raoul (+pr)
1984 Not for Publication (+pr)
1985 Last in the Dust
Paul Bartel

1986 The Longshot
1989 Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (+sc)
1993 Shelf Life

Films as Actor:

1970 Hi, Mom! (Blue Manhattan; Confessions of a Peeping Tom; Son of Greetings) (DePalma) (as Uncle Tom Wood)
1976 Hollywood Boulevard (Arkush and Dante) (as Eich Von Leppe); Cannonball (+d); Eat My Dust (Griffith)
1977 Grand Theft Auto (Howard) (as Groom); Mr. Billion (Kaplan)
1978 Piranha (Dante) (as Dumont)
1979 Rock ‘n’ Roll High School (Arkush) (as Mr. McGee)
1981 Heartbeeps (Arkush) (as Party Guest)
1982 Trick or Treats (Graver) (as Wino); Eating Raoul (+d) (as Paul Bland); White Dog (Fuller) (as Cameraman)
1983 Flip Out (Get Crazy) (Arkush) (as Docter Carver); Heart like a Wheel (Kaplan) (as Chef Paul)
1984 Frankenweenie (Burton) (as Mr. Walsh); Not for Publication (Bartel) (as TV Director)
1985 National Lampoon’s European Vacation (Heckerling) (as Mr. Froeger); Into the Night (Landis) (as Doorman); Sesame Street Presents “Follow That Bird” (Kwapis) (as Grouch Cook)
1986 Chopping Mall (Killbots) (Wynorski) (as Paul Bland); Killer Party (Fruet) (as Professor Zito)
1987 Amazon Women on the Moon (Cheeseburger Film Sandwich) (Dante and Gottlieb) (as Doctor); Munchies (Hirsch) (as Doctor Crowder)
1988 Caddyshack II (Arkush) (as Jamieson); Mortuary Academy (Schroeder) (as Paul Truscott); Out of the Dark (Schroeder) (as Hotel Clerk); Shakedown (Glickenhaus) (as Night Court Judge)
1989 Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (Bartel) (as Docter Mo Van De Kamp)
1990 Dan Turner, Hollywood Detective (Conner and Lewis—for TV) (as Larry Badger); Gremlins 2: The New Batch (Dante) (as Theatre Manager); Far out Man (Chong) (as Weebee Cool)
1991 The Pope Must Die (The Pope Must Diet) (Richardson) (as Monsignor Fitchie)
1992 Desire and Hell at Sunset Motel (Castle) (as The Manager);
Liquid Dreams (Manos) (as Angel); The Living End (Araki)
(Twister Master); Our Hollywood Education (Beltrami)
1993 Acting on Impulse (Eyes of a Stranger; Roses Are Dead;
Secret Lies; Secret Lives) (Irvin) (as Bruno); Posse (Van
Peebles) (as Mayor Bigwood); Shelf Life (Bartel) (as Various Apparitions); Grief (Glatzer) (as Attorney)
1994 Twin Sitters (The Babysitters) (Paragon) (as Languini-Covered Man)
1995 The Usual Suspects (Singer) (as Smuggler); The Jerky Boys (Mellkonian) (as Host); Bucket of Blood (Dark Secrets; The Death Artist; Roger Corman Presents Bucket of Blood) (McDonald—for TV) (as Older Man);
Love and Happiness (Alan) (as Sully the Short-Order Cook); Naomi & Wynnona: Love Can Build a Bridge (Love Can Build a Bridge) (Roth—for TV) (as Ralph Emery); Not like Us (Payne) (as Mortician);
Red Ribbon Blues (Winkler) (as Fred the Pharmacist);
The Wacky Adventures of Dr. Boris and Nurse Shirley (Leder) (as Doctor Boris)
1996 Basquiat (Schnabel) (as Henry Geldzahler); Escape from L.A.
(John Carpenter’s Escape from L.A.) (Carpenter) (as Congressman);
Joe’s Apartment (Payson) (as NEA Scout);
Prey of the Jaguar (DeCoteau) (as Toymaker); Skeletons
(DeCoteau) (as Mayor Dunbar)
1997 Lewis & Clark & George (McCall) (as Cop); Inheritance
(Louis May Alcott’s The Inheritance) (Roth—for TV)
1998 Billy’s Hollywood Screen Kiss (O’Haver) (as Rex Webster)
1999 Hard Time: The Premonition (Cass—for TV) (as Proprietor);
Zoo (King) (as Dr. Rat St. Cloud)
2000 Dinner and a Movie (as Lou Semelhack); Dreamers (Kors)
(as Larry); Hamlet (Almereyda)

Publications

By BARTEL: articles—
‘‘Dialogue on Film: Paul Bartel, Interview,’’ in American Film,
April, 1985.
‘‘The Secret Cinema—A Screenplay by Paul Bartel,’’ in Scenario:

On BARTEL: articles—

Jacobs, Diane, ‘‘Bartel’s Parables,’’ in The Washington Post, 4 January 1983.
Goldstein, Patrick, ‘‘Paul Bartel Sticks It to the Idle Rich,’’ in The Los

Paul Bartel has acted in over sixty films, but he is best known for two, for which he was also writer and director: Eating Raoul (1982) and Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills (1989). These two black comedies amused, titillated, and shocked audiences by finding humor in such diverse subjects as cannibalism, kinky sex, serial murder, class resentment, and homosexuality.

The young Paul Bartel would have seemed an unlikely candidate for such scandalous and subversive filmmaking. Raised in a conventional middle-class New Jersey family, Bartel knew from an early age that he wanted to make movies. After high school, he enrolled in UCLA’s prestigious film school. Upon graduating, he was awarded a Fulbright grant to study at the Center for Experimental Film in Rome.

Bartel’s first directing work was on two low-budget shorts:
Naughty Nurse and The Secret Cinema. These films came to the attention of MGM studio head James Aubrey, who bankrolled Bartel’s next project, a bizarre sex comedy originally called Blood Relations.
However, the studio marketed the film unwisely, changed the name to Private Parts (a more risque title that many ‘‘family newspapers’’ would not even print, which hindered advertising) and abandoned it soon thereafter.

But Bartel’s work nonetheless brought him to the attention of Roger Corman, who specialized in producing low-budget action and horror films. Corman gave Bartel a job as Second Unit Director for the 1974 film Big Bad Mama, and was sufficiently impressed with the younger man’s work so as to offer him the director’s chair on Death Race 2000. However, professional disagreements between the two men marked both the filming and the post-production process.
The final cut was a financial success, but at the cost of Corman and Bartel’s working relationship.

Paul Bartel’s first success on his own terms came with Eating Raoul (1982), which he directed, co-wrote (with Richard Blackburn), and starred in. The female lead was Mary Woronov, who has done most of her screen work in independent films, notably several directed by Andy Warhol. In Eating Raoul, Bartel and Woronov portray Paul and Mary Bland, a financially strapped married couple.
They have never consummated their marriage, because both view sex as ‘‘dirty,’’ and they are contemptuous of their neighbors, all of whom seem to be lust-crazed California ‘‘swingers.’’ The Blands hit on the notion of murdering as many of these ‘‘perverts’’ as they can, and taking their money. Later, they take on a partner named Raoul, whose restaurant offers the perfect means of disposing of all of those bodies, thus giving a whole new meaning to the phrase ‘‘mystery meat.’’

Bartel’s next major directing assignment was on Lust in the Dust
(1985), starring former 1950s heartthrob Tab Hunter and transvestite actor Divine, the latter known for outrageous portrayals in several John Waters films. The film was a send-up of the ‘‘Spaghetti Westerns’’ that had been popular during the 1960s, but it was not a financial success.

In 1989, Paul Bartel went to work on the film that has proved his greatest commercial success to date. Scenes from the Class Struggle in Beverly Hills was surely helped at the box office by the star power of Jacqueline Bisset, who played wealthy sitcom actress Claire Lipkin. Her neighbor and best friend, Lisabeth Hepburn-Saurian, was played by Mary Woronov. The two women become the subject of a wager between their respective housemen: the first one who beds his employer wins—and the stakes of the wager involve more than money. Bartel wrote, directed, and played a supporting role in this black comedy.

Before his death in 2000, Paul Bartel worked mostly as an actor.
He appeared in more than sixty films, including made-for-TV movies.
With occasional exceptions like his role in Eating Raoul, Bartel mostly played character parts in supporting roles. Clearly his first love was directing, and he viewed much of his acting work as a way to raise funds for his next stint behind the camera.

—Justin Gustainis
BAUER, Evgeni

Films as Director:

1913 Sumerki Zhenskoi Dushi (The Twilight of a Woman’s Soul) (+ art dir)
1914 Ditya Bol’shogo Goroda (Child of the Big City; Devushka s Ulitsy; The Girl from the Street) (+ art dir); Ec Geroiskoi Podvig (Her Heroic Feat); Lyulya Bek; Slava Nam—Smert’ Vagrama (Glory to Us, Death to the Enemy); Tol’ko Raz v Godu (Only Once a Year; Doroga v ad; The Road to Hell); Khodolodnye Dushi (Cold Showers; Frigid Souls)
1915 Grezi (Daydreams; Obmanuyte Mchuty; Deceived Dreams); Deti Veka (Children of the Age); Zhemchuzhnoe Ozherel’e (+ art dir); Pervaya Lyubov’ (First Love); Schast’e Vechnoi Nochi (The Happiness of Eternal Night); Tysyacha Vtoraya Khitrost (The Thousand and Second Ruse); Yuri Nagorny (Ob’el stitel; The Seducer)
1916 Zhizn’ za Zhizn’ (A Life for a Life; Za Kazhduyu slezu po Kable Krovi; A Tear for Every Drop of Blood; Sestry-Sopernitsy; The Rival Sisters) (+ sc); Nelly Raintseva; PriklyuchenieLiny v Sochi (Lina’s Adventure in Sochi)
1917 Unireyashchie Lebed’ (The Dying Swan); Za Schast’em (For Luck); Korol’ Paricha (The King of Paris) (+ co-sc); Lina Pod Eksperitsoi ili Buinyi Pokoznik (Lina Under Examination; The Turbulent Corpse); Nabet (The Alarm) (+ sc); Revolyutsioner (The Revolutionary)

Note: These are the only films that remain from the 82 with which he has been credited.

Publications

On BAUER: book—

On BAUER: articles—

When, in 1989, the Russians released a hoard of movies of the Czarist era, few of which had been seen in the West, we discovered a new “great” director. Evgeni Bauer was found to tower over all his contemporaries, including Victor Sjöström; for while Bauer’s films could be as emotionally complex as those of Sjöström, he was a marvel at something which did not motivate the Swedish master—the mechanics of cinema. Bauer understood the language of the cinema better than any of his contemporaries, and in that silent era, he exploited silence as no one else did until Keaton. The Hollywood of Keaton’s time, ten years later, was still only groping toward some of Bauer’s techniques—the traveling or roving camera, the sudden or unexpected close-up, the zoom-in (if used in a primitive way), angleshots from above, the masked screen, the use of movement and editing (e.g., in a frenzied dance) to build to a climax, the split screen, vivid composition. Visually then, his films are exciting, and furthermore he uses locations tellingly to enhance his dramatic material, as we may expect from a former art director. These elements, when added to natural playing and generally above-average stories—which invariably include a biting, if implicit, commentary on bourgeois society—make up a body of work unparalleled in early cinema. And who else at this time could take his narrative from A to D, without plodding through B and C?

Bauer entered the cinema as set designer for Drankov, but when in that capacity he moved over to Khanzhonov, he was given an entirely free hand, directing as well for him—and Bauer’s first film as such, Twilight of a Woman’s Soul (1913), still survives. Like most Russian filmmakers of this period, Bauer gave audiences the doom and gloom they craved, often with a last-reel suicide—but he did it with a sophistication matched only by Yakov Protazanov. For instance, in Child of the Big City a working-girl is wooed by a rich man attracted to women outside his own class; after marriage he bores her and she becomes a courtesan, because she does not wish to give up a life of luxury. He, ruined, seeks her out, only to find her no less contemptuous than she was when their marriage ended.

In Silent Witnesses the title characters are the servants of Moscow’s sybaritic high society, but they have an independent life of their own, caring and principled. When one young maid has a mind to the advantages of being a rich man’s lady and, after a half-hearted refusal, acquiesces, she finds her position too insecure to protest against his continuing infidelities. In all of Bauer’s films drunken parties and sexual license are the prerogatives of the rich, who are also vindictive, cruel, and without moral values—but they are also dangerously attractive. In Children of the Age a loving young wife allows an aged roué to seduce her and remains with him even after he has reduced her husband to penury by having him sacked. Her options are open, and furthermore she remains sympathetic, though the peasant audiences of Czarist Russia might well have thought that this brutally unequal society ought to be destroyed forthwith. It would be an overstatement to describe Bauer as subversive, but the society he depicts is wholly unadmirable, mortally sick.

There is abnormal psychology—perhaps specifically of the Russian variety—at the heart of both Daydreams and After Death. In the first a man becomes a recluse after his wife’s death, only to become obsessed by an actress who resembles her; and she, while perhaps still loving him, fatally mocks his passion for his dead wife. In the second a man, inconsolable after the death of his mother, drives to suicide the actress who has aspired to be the new woman in his life, then kills himself after reading her diaries to discover her motives. Happiness of Eternal Night marks a firm return to Bauer’s central theme, the rottenness of society, but the plot is a silly thing about a wealthy blind girl who marries a rake, persuaded by his brother who, because of his love for her, had trained to be an eye-surgeon in order to cure her.

Because Bauer was his leading director, Khanzonkov offered him a choice of subjects when he decided to make a super-production to rival Yermoliev’s Queen of Spades. Bauer chose a now-forgotten French novel, which emerged as A Life for a Life, a complex melange of high-society gambols, infidelity, and debts. Since all the characters are well-off and one of them, a wealthy dowager, does an exemplary job in running a factory, the film (unlike any of Bauer’s others still extant) lacks any immediate revolutionary portents. Yuri Nagorni was designed to tell its story without inter-titles, thus pushing us willy-nilly into an incomprehensible plot about an adulterous wife who makes a play for a libidinous opera-singer, the eponymous Yuri: she leaves him at the end of the first half to die in a fire, but the second part, in flashback, contains all that we need to know.

Bauer was fascinated by the underside of life, the past and dreams, and both feature in a return to the subject of death, in The Dying Swan, in which an artist fantasizes about a ballerina as she expires. To Happiness holds to this theme as a widow encourages her longtime admirer to court her adolescent daughter, whose fatal illness is halted when she conceives a passion for him. This was Bauer’s last completed film, and the dialectic is less “true” than the first of his movies, but he atones for the deficiencies of the plot by setting it lovingly in the shimmering Crimean sun, with distant vistas of the sea. It also shows, rarely for its time, two mature people genuinely in love with each other.

Bauer died in the Crimea, after sustaining an accident while scouting locations for his next film, The King of Paris (1917), completed after the February revolution by Olga Rakhanova, who had acted in several of his pictures. The inter-titles have not survived, so the plot is not easy to follow, but it is only clear, in this tale of intrigue and blackmail, that the two leading characters are homosexual. The sequence in which the older man takes home a young stranger, having impulsively paid his gambling debts, is quite extraordinary, as the two of them look guiltily about them.

Bauer’s films, with their predatory, managing women and their weak, hedonistic men, suggest a homosexual sensitivity, but he is too modern in outlook to be categorized. With Sjöström, he is the only director of the teens of the twentieth century whose work can still be watched with satisfaction and enjoyment. Sjöström’s studies of rural life in the last century are valuable, but Bauer’s portraits of Czarist Russia in its last days are even more so, because he was actually there. We have to wait for Lamprecht’s Berlin and Ozu’s Tokyo before we have any other filmed record of a contemporary society; and Ozu is far less pungent, perhaps because, unlike Bauer and Lamprecht, he did not see that as his aim. Bauer made over eighty films, of which only-one third have survived. Sjöström made forty-five films in Sweden, of which only thirteen were known to be extant—but two turned up in the 1980s. May we dare hope that there are still some Bauers to come to light?

—David Shipman

BAVA, Mario

Films as Director:

1946 L’Orecchio (doc) (+ ph)
1947 Santa notte (doc) (+ ph); Legenda Sinfonica (+ ph); Antiteatro Flavio (short) (+ ph)
1949 Variazioni sinfoniche (doc) (+ ph)
1956 I Vampiri (The Devil’s Commandment; Last of the Vampire; The Vampires) (uncredited; completed film + ph)
1959 Calitiki—the mostro immortale (Calitiki, the Immortal Monster) (uncredited; completed film + ph); La Battaglia di Maratona (Giant of Marathon) (uncredited; completed film + ph)
1960 La Maschera del demonio (Mask of the Demon; Black Sunday (+ sc, ph); Esther and the King (+ ph)
1961 L’Ultimo dei Vikinghi (The Last of the Vikings) (uncredited); Le Meraviglie di Aladino (The Wonders of Aladdin); Gli Invasori (Erik the Conqueror) (+ sc, ph); Ercole al centro della terra (Hercules in the Haunted World; Hercules at the Center of the Earth) (+ sc, ph)
1963 I Tre volti della paura (Black Sabbath; Black Christmas) (+ sc); La Ragazza che sapeva troppo (The Evil Eye; The Girl Who Knew Too Much) (+ sc, ph); La Frusta e il corpo (The Whip and the Body; What!)
1964 La Strada per Fort Alamo (The Road to Fort Alamo; Arizona Billy; Sei donne per l’assassino (Blood and Black Lace) (+ sc)
1965 Terrore nello spazio (Planet of the Vampires) (+ sc); I Colletti del vendicatore (Bladestorm; Knives of the Avenger) (+ sc)
1966 Spie vengono dal semicrudo (Dr. Goldfoot and the Girl Bombs); Savage Gringo; Operazione paura (Kill, Baby. . . Kill!) (+ sc)
1968 Diabolik (Danger: Diabolik) (+ sc, ph)
1969 Rosso segno della follia (Hatchet for the Honeymoon) (+ sc, ph)
1970 Roy Colt e Winchester Jack (Roy Colt and Winchester Jack); Cinque bambole per la luna d’agosto (Island of Terror) (+ ed)
1971
Reazione a catena (A Bay of Blood; Last House on the Left, Part II; New House on the Left; Twitch of the Death Nerve) (+ sc, ph)

1972
Quante volte... quella notte (Four Times That Night); Gli Orrori del castello di Norimberga (Baron Blood)

1974
Cani arrabbiati (Rabid Dogs) (unreleased, + ph); La Casa dell’esorcismo (The House of Exorcism; Lisa and the Devil) (+ sc)

1977
Schock (Shock)

1978
La Venere di Ile (Venus of Ille) (for TV)

Films as Cinematographer:

1939
Il Tacchino prepotente (Rossellini) (short)

1943
Uomini e cieli (De Robertis); Sant’Elena piccola isola (Simoni); L’Avventura di Annabella (Menardi)

1946
L’Elisir d’amore (This Wine of Love) (Costa)

1948
Pagliacci (Love of a Clown—Pagliacci) (Costa)

1949
Natale al campo 119 (Christmas at Camp 119) (Francisci); Follie per l’opera (Mad about the Opera) (Costa)

1950
Antonio di Padova (Anthony of Padua) (Francisci); Quel bandito sono io (The Taming of Dorothy) (Soldati)

1951
Er arrivato il cavaliere! (Monicelli and Steno); Vita da cani (A Dog’s Life) (Monicelli and Steno); Miss Italia (Miss Italy) (Coletti)

1952
Guardie e ladri (Cops and Robbers) (Monicelli and Steno); Amor non ho... pero... pero (Bianchi)

1953
Perdonami (Costa); Papa diventa mamma (Fabrizi)

1954
Villa Borghese (Franciolini); Il Viale della speranza (Risi); Gli Eroi della Domenica (Camerini); Cose da puzz... (Pabst); Balocchi e profumi (Bernardi and Montillo); Il Baciodell’Aurora (Parolini)

1955
Terza liceo (Emmer); Hanno rubato un tram (Bonnard and Fabrizi); Le Avventure di Giacomo Casanova (Sins of Casanova) (Steno)

1956
La Donna più bella del mondo (Beautiful but Dangerous) (Leonard); Buonanotte... avvocato! (Bianchi)

1957
Mio figlio Nerone (Nero’s Big Weekend) (Steno); Citta di notte (City at Night) (Trieste)

1958
Le fatiche di Ercole (Hercules; Labors of Hercules) (Francisci)

1959
La Morte viene dallo spazio (The Day the Sky Exploded) (Heusch)

1959
Ercole e la regina di Lidia (Hercules Unchained) (Francisci) (+ asst d; uncredited); Agi Murad il diavolo bianco (The White Warrior) (Freda) (+ asst d; uncredited)

Other Films:

1960
Seddoc, l’erede di Satana (Atom Age Vampire) (Majano) (pr)

1980
Inferno (Argento) (d underwater sequence; uncredited)

Publications

On BAVA: books—

On BAVA: articles—

Silver, Alain, and James Ursini, ““Mario Bava: The Illusion of Reality,’’” in Horror Film Reader, New York, 2000.

The day after Germany declared war on France and Russia in response to the assassination of Austria’s archduke, Francis Ferdinand—July 31, 1914—Mario Bava was born in San Remo, Italy. His father, Eugenio Bava, was a sculptor turned accomplished cinematographer in the early days of the Italian silent film industry (in 1912, he photographed the epic Quo Vadis; a year later, he assisted Segundo de Chomon on Cabria, a film whose special effects are legendary). For several years Mario worked as his father’s helper, submitting films for export and animating title sequences for Italian features, until the 1930s, when he began to assist some of Italy’s finest cinematographers. Mario was trained as a painter, and his artistic background encouraged him in his strong belief in the importance of visual composition in filmmaking. This led to a fast-growing reputation as a special effects wizard, one with a knack for developing new ways of using optical trickery. In 1939, Mario advanced to the level of director of photography, and besides a series of shorts which he directed in the 1940s, he remained a cinematographer until 1960. Included among the directors for whom Bava photographed films in the early part of his career are Jacques Tourneur, Raoul Walsh, G.W. Pabst, Roberto Rossellini, Paolo Heusch, and Robert Z. Leonard. Furthermore, as Tim Lucas notes, “his stylized lensing was critical in developing the screen personas of such international stars as Gina Lollobrigida and Steve Reeves.”

While working with Riccardo Freda on I vampiri (The Vampires) in 1956—the first Italian horror film of the sound era—the director left the project early on after an argument with his producers. Bava stepped in and finished directing half of the twelve-day schedule in a mere two days. This would not be the last time he performed such a crucial task: in 1957, Bava directed some of Pietro Francisci’s La fatiche di Ercole (Hercules), and in 1959, he was credited with “saving” Jacques Tourneur’s Giant of Marathon. Legend has it that Freda then tricked Bava by hiring his friend to photograph Calikti il mostro immortale (Calikti, the Immortal Monster, 1959) and once again stepped down as director after just two days. Lionello Santo, the film’s producer, was so impressed with Bava’s efforts that he invited him to select any film he wanted for his official directorial debut, when he was already forty-six years of age.

Bava couldn’t have made a better choice, basing La maschera del demonia (Black Sunday, 1960) on the Nikolai Gogol story, Vij. Black Sunday, starring Barbara Steele in dual roles as a vampire sorceress and her virginal descendant, is widely acknowledged as the last great black and white Gothic horror film. However, “Bava’s tactic,” according to Alain Silver and James Ursini, “was a reliance on fresh rendering or novel manipulation of traditional images.” The film was an international success overnight, and the British actress Steele became an instant sensation.

Although Black Sunday was shot in black and white, Bava’s subsequent reputation was in large built on his extraordinary and highly symbolic use of color. In the words of Jeff Dove, “the projects which followed [La maschera del demonia] began to develop stunning photography, making great use of lighting, set design, and camera positioning to compliment mise-en-scene bathed in deep primaries.” Ercole al centro della terra (Hercules at the Center of the Earth, 1961) shows off Bava’s adeptness with Technicolor, and in films such as Sei donne per l’assassino (Blood and Black Lace, 1963) and Terrore nello spazio (Planet of the Vampires, 1965), his sets and compositions approach the look of artworks. The one exception to Bava’s astounding use of color is his 1962 Hitchcock spoof La ragazza che sappeva troppo (The Girl Who Knew Too Much/Evil Eye), a black and white murder mystery that is widely acknowledged as the first of the giallos—peculiarly Italian horror-thrillers named for the yellow pages of the cheap novels upon which they were based.

Silver and Ursini argue quite persuasively that “the unusual and disquieting visuals of Bava’s films seem rooted in a conception of life as an uncomfortable union of illusion and reality. The dramatic conflict for his characters lies in confronting the dilemma of distinguishing between the two perceptions.” Many of his films—including Black Sunday, Gli Invasori (Erik the Conqueror, 1961), and Operazione Paura (Kill, Baby, Kill, 1966)—make use the doppelgänger theme in order to engender confusion and uncanniness. This last film, about villagers who are compelled to commit suicide by the ghost of a young girl, was an admitted influence on works by Fellini, Martin Scorcese, and David Lynch. Other of Bava’s films rely on idiosyncratic camera techniques, such as snap zooms, over-rotated pans, and unconventional point-of-view shots, as a way of conveying the emotional states of characters.

The extreme violence and downbeat endings of much of Bava’s output in the 1960s eventually resulted in the dissolution of his contract with American International Pictures, which had been successfully distributing his films in English-speaking countries. After not working for two years, Bava returned with a vengeance in 1968—Diabolik (Danger: Diabolik), produced by Dino DeLaurentis, was a comic book adaptation that proved enormously popular in Europe. Three years later, Bava would break new ground once again with L’ecologia del delitto (A Bay of Blood, 1971), a gory slasher film that preceded Halloween and Friday the 13th in America by nearly a decade.

The last three films directed by Bava all met with misfortune of one sort or another. Lise e il diavolo (Lisa and the Devil, 1973) is justly proclaimed by Lucas “an extraordinary combination of horror film, art film and personal testament.” Unfortunately, this creepy tale of necrophilia, evil, and murder starring Elke Sommer and Telly Savalas proved unsalable at Cannes in 1973. Cani arrabbiati (Rabid Dogs), a pet project of Bava’s that he had wanted to make for years, was neither completed nor released in the director’s lifetime. After producer Roberto Loyola declared bankruptcy, Rabid Dogs was impounded for twenty years, only to be acquired and finished by co-star Lea Lander. In 1996, Lander premiered the film in Brussels under the title Semaforo rosso (Red Traffic Light), to great critical acclaim. Bava’s final feature, Schock (Shock, 1977), was scripted by his son Lamberto. But Lamberto had to take over at various times during production, as his father feigned illness in order to provide him with directorial experience. On April 25, 1980, just days after receiving a clean bill of health, Mario Bava died of a heart attack. Never given nearly as much credit for his many accomplishments as he deserved during his lifetime, this director of masterpieces in many different genres, who worked with low budgets under extremely stressful conditions, is only now beginning to elicit the praise and attention he so richly merits.

—Steven Schneider

BECKER, Jacques

Nationality: French. Born: Paris, 15 September 1906. Education: Lycée Condorcet, and Schola Cantorum, Paris. Family: Married actress Françoise Fabian, a son, Jean, and daughter. Career: Became assistant to Jean Renoir, 1932; made first short film, Le Commissaire, . . ., 1935; German prisoner of war, 1941–42; directed first feature, Le Dernier Atout, 1942; son and assistant Jean Becker completed Le Trou following his death. Died: 1960.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1935</td>
<td>Le Commissaire est bon enfant, le gendarme est sans pitie (co-d, co-sc with Pierre Prevert); Tête de turc (Une Tête qui rapporte) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1938</td>
<td>short documentary on Communist Party Congress at Arles</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1939</td>
<td>L’Or du Cristobal (co-d, uncredited)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1942</td>
<td>Le Dernier Atout (+ co-pr, co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1943</td>
<td>Goupi Mains rouges (It Happened at the Inn) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1945</td>
<td>Falbalas (Paris Frills) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1947</td>
<td>Antoine et Antoinette (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Jacques Becker (right) with Jean Gabin
1949  Rendez-vous de Juillet (+ co-sc)
1951  Édouard et Caroline (+ co-sc)
1952  Casque d’Or (+ co-sc)
1953  Rue de l’Estrade
1954  Touchez pas au Grisbi (Grisbi) (+ co-sc); Ali Baba et les quarante voleurs (Ali Baba) (+ co-sc)
1956  Les Aventures d’Arsène Lupin (The Adventures of Arsène Lupin) (+ co-sc)
1957  Montparnasse 19 (Modigliani of Montparnasse) (+ co-sc)
1960  Le Trou (The Night Watch; The Hole) (+ co-d, co-sc)

Other Films:

1929  Le Bled (Renoir) (role); Le Rendez-vous de Cannes (Petrossian—documentary) (appearance)
1932  Boudu sauvé des eaux (Renoir) (asst, role); La Nuit du carrefour (Renoir) (asst)
1933  Chotard & Compagnie (Renoir) (asst)
1934  Madame Bovary (uncredited, asst)
1935  Le Crime de Monsieur Lange (Renoir) (asst); Toni (Renoir) (asst)
1936  Les Bas-Fonds (Renoir) (asst, role); Une Partie de campagne (Renoir) (asst, role); La Vie est à nous (Renoir) (asst, role)
1938  La Grande Illusion (Renoir) (asst, role); La Marseillaise (Renoir) (asst); La Bête humaine (Renoir) (asst)
1939  Le Règle du jeu (Renoir) (asst); L’Héritier des Montdésir (Valentin) (asst)

Publications

On BECKER: books—

On BECKER: articles—

De la Roche, Catherine, “The Stylist,” in Films and Filming (London), March 1955.
“Becker,” in * Sight and Sound* (London), Spring 1960.

On BECKER: film—

* * *

Next to Jean Grémillon, Jacques Becker is surely the most neglected of France’s great directors. Known in France for Goupi Mains rouges and Antoine et Antoinette, his only film to reach an international critical audience was Casque d’Or. But from 1942 to 1959 Becker fashioned thirteen films, none of which could be called a failure and each of which merits respect and attention.

Tied to Jean Renoir through a youthful friendship (their families were both close to the Cézannes), Becker began assisting Renoir in 1932. For eight years he helped put together some of the greatest films ever made, allowing the generous genius of Renoir to roam, unconcerned over the details he had already prearranged. Becker gave Renoir the kind of grounding and order which kept his films from flying into thin air. His fastidiousness and precision made him the perfect assistant. Many of his friends, however, doubted that such a sensibility could ever command the energy needed to finish a film.

Nevertheless, film direction was Becker’s ambition from the beginning of his career. It was he who developed the idea for Le Crime de M. Lang, and when the producer insisted that Renoir take over, it cost them their friendship for a time. Soon Becker was directing a cheap anarchist subject, Le Commissaire est bon enfant, with the Octobre groupe company of actors. He wasn’t to be held back.

Like so many others, Becker was given his chance with the Occupation. A producer handed Becker the reins of a detective comedy, Le Dernier Atout, which he brought in under budget and to a good box office response. This opened his career, permitting him to film the unforgettable Goupi. Georges Sadoul claims that after the war an American firm bought up the film and had it destroyed so that it wouldn’t compete with American products as Open City had done. Whether this is true or not, the film remains impressive in the clarity of its partially cynical, partly mysterious tone. In addition, the work shows Becker to be a brilliant director of actors.

The sureness of touch in each of Becker’s films derives from a precision some link to craftsmanship; but Becker was striving for far more than competence, veneer, or “quality.” He was first and always interested in rhythm. A musician, he was obsessed with jazz and ragtime. No other standard director spent so much time collaborating with his editor, Marguerite Renoir.

Goupi is only the first of a host of Becker films whose subjects are difficult to define. Becker seems to have gone out of his way to set himself problems. Many of his films are about groups of characters, most notably his final work, Le Trou. Others feature widely diverse settings: Antoine et Antoinette captures the working class quarters of Paris; Rendez-vous de Juillet must be the first film anywhere to explicitly bring out the youth culture of postwar Europe; Fallalas evokes the world of high fashion as only someone raised in such a world could know it; and, of course, Casque d’Or makes the turn-of-the-century Parisian underworld come to life with a kind of grim romanticism.

Becker stated that his fastidious attention to milieu was the only way he could approach his characters. Bazin goes further, claiming that only through the exactitude of social particularity could the universality of his characters and their situations come to life. For Bazin, Edouard et Caroline is, if not his greatest film, at least his most revealing one. This brilliant farce in the style of Marivaux is virtually plotless. Becker was able, via the minuteness of his découpage and the sympathy he had for his actors, to build a serious moral comedy from literally nothing. Edouard et Caroline, along with Le Trou, shows him working at his best, working without plots and without the luxury of breadth. Both films take place in prison cells, Le Trou in an actual prison, Edouard et Caroline in the dingy apartment they share and the more menacing jail of her uncle’s mansion.

Becker has been called “the mechanic” of cinema, for he took a delight in its workings and he went about his own job with such order and method. This separates him further from such “quality” directors as Autant-Lara, Cayatte, and Delannoy, whose themes may seem grander. Becker was interested in what the cinema could do just as he was interested in what men and women do. Never searching for the extraordinary, he would go to endless lengths to bring out not some abstract rhythm in the lives of people (as René Clair did) but the true style and rhythm of their sensibilities.

In 1956 Max Ophuls bequeathed to Becker his project on the life of Modigliani. While the resultant film, Montparnasse 19, is one of his least successful, its style is illustrative. Within weeks after Becker assumed control of the project, both the scriptwriter (Henri Jeanson) and the set designer (Annenkov) left in outrage, for Becker refused to let them show off with words and drapery. His was always a reduced idea of cinema, even when, as in Falbalas, his subject was fashion. Nor did he ever choose name actors, except perhaps Gérard Philipe as Modigliani. He had a sureness of taste, backed up by scrupulous reflection. Becker viewed filmmaking as an endless series of choices, each of which could founder the project.

Truffaut once claimed that Becker had his own pace of living; he would linger over meals, but race his car. He would spend hours of film over minor incidents in the lives of his characters, while whipping through the core of the intrigue that brought those characters together. Perhaps this is why Le Trou is a fitting finale to his career. For here the intrigue is given in advance and in a sense is without interest: five men struggling to escape from jail. For two and a half hours we observe the minutiae of their efforts and the silent camaraderie that develops among them. This is, for Becker, the state of life on earth: despite the ingenuity we bring to our struggle for freedom, we are doomed to failure; but in the effort we come upon another value, greater even than liberty, an awareness that our struggle is shared and of the friendship and respect that shared effort confers. If Casque d’Or is destined to remain his most popular and most acclaimed film (it was his personal favorite), it will not betray these sentiments, for the character of Manda gives up not only liberty, but also life with Marie-Casque d’Or, in order to be true to his friend. The stunning scene at the guillotine which ends that film evokes a set of emotions as contradictory as life itself. Jacques Becker was uniquely able to express such contradictions.

—Dudley Andrew

BEINEIX, Jean-Jacques

Nationality: French. Born: Paris, France, 8 October, 1946. Education: Studied medicine. Career: Gave up medical studies in 1970 to work as assistant director; after Diva, worked as director of TV commercials; defended European filmmakers at the GATT negotiations, 1993. Awards: César Award for Best New Director of a Feature Film for Diva (1982); Seattle International Film Festival Golden Space Needle Award for Best Director for 37°2 le Matin (1986) and IP5: L’île aux pachydermes (1992). Address: c/o French Film Office, 745 Fifth Avenue, New York, USA.

Films as Director:

- 1981  Diva (+ sc)
- 1983  La Lune dans le caniveau (The Moon in the Gutter) (+ sc)
- 1986  37°2 le matin (37.2 Degrees in the Morning; Betty Blue) (+ sc, pr)
- 1989  Roselyne et les lions (+sc)
- 1992  IP5: L’île aux pachydermes (IP5: The Island of Pachyderms) (+ sc, pr)
- 1994  Otaku (+ pr)
- 2000  Mortel Tranfert (+ sc)

Films as Assistant Director:

- 1971  Le Bateau sur l’herbe (The Boat on the Grass)
- 1972  The Day the Clown Cried (unreleased); Une journée bien remplie (Full Day’s Work); La Course du lièvre à travers les champs (And Hope to Die)
1973  Par le sang des autres (By the Blood of Others); Défense de savoir (Forbidden to Know)
1975  Le male du siècle (Male of the Century); Course à l’échalote (Wild Goose Chase)
1976  L’Aile ou la cuisse
1977  L’Animal (The Animal; Stuntwoman)
1979  French Postcards

Other Films:

1997  Cannes... les 400 coups (role as himself)

Publications:

By BEINEIX: articles—

Interview with Michael Church, “Hip-hop along the Road to Paradise,” in The Observer Review (London), 14 November 1993.

On BEINEIX: books—

On BEINEIX: articles—

Russell, David, “‘Two or Three Things We Know about Beineix,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1989/90.

* * *

After a long apprenticeship as assistant to directors as diverse as Jerry Lewis, on the unreleased The Day the Clown Cried, and Claude Berri on Le maule du siècle, Jean-Jacques Beineix emerged as a director in his own right with the intelligent thriller, Diva. Beineix’s talents also extend to screenwriting and producing, and in the 1980s, along with directors Luc Besson and Leos Carax, he helped establish a category of French films sometimes known as “Cinema du Look.” Defined by its slogan “the image is the message,” the Cinema du Look consists of films in which appearances are more important than reality, and in which style is more important than plot or content.

Sometimes considered to be the inaugural film of this new style, Beineix’s first solo project is one of the most influential French films of the 1980s. Diva self-consciously addresses what have become known as postmodern themes: it is full of images of reflective glass buildings, and its plot centres on the relative value of recorded music and information. The diva of the film’s title is an American opera star who refuses to be recorded but finds that this only increases the value of bootleg recordings of her performances. It is when one of these bootleg tapes is confused with a tape that incriminates a politician that the plot takes off. As Jill Forbes points out, however, the central figure of the drama is not the diva herself, but the mail courier who makes the bootleg recording. The film’s point, argues Forbes, is that the circulation of information is more important than production.

The glossy style of the “Cinema du Look” transferred easily to TV advertising, and Beineix became involved in making commercials after the success of Diva. Like TV commercials, which he has claimed “capture youth,” his films tend to employ intense colours and lighting effects, as well as stylized or strange locations. It is thought, for example, that most of the 7.5 million Franc budget for Diva went on sound and vision rather than high-profile actors.

His next film, La Lune dans le caniveau, is, if anything, still more a triumph of style over substance than Diva. It tells the story of a stevedore who searches the docks for his sister’s rapist, and raises more questions than it answers. La Lune dans le caniveau is far less convincing than the director’s debut, and confirmed, for French critics at least, that Beineix had been polluted as a filmmaker by his contact with the advertising industry.

More successful is 37°2 le matin, which tells the story of a doomed love affair between a disturbed young woman, Betty (Beatrice Dalle), and an aspiring writer. Their turbulent relationship makes for a bleak film, but it is attractively directed and photographed and has achieved cult status and some notoriety for the explicit sex scene with which it begins. Perhaps as a result of Beineix’s involvement in advertising, 37°2 le matin is structured in short set pieces that are separate episodes in themselves. As if to emphasise this connection, one such scene from 37°2 le matin, where Betty angrily throws her lover’s possessions over the balcony of their house, has been remade and used in Europe to advertise a small Japanese car.

Despite his influence on the direction of French cinema since the 1980s, Beineix’s later films have failed to live up to the early promise of Diva and 37°2 le matin. Unlike his contemporary, Luc Besson, Beineix could be said to have stuck closely to the spirit of “Cinema du Look,” but he seems also to have gone on ignoring its limitations. His most recent feature film, IP5: L’île aux pachyderms, is a pensive, good-looking road movie, but in the end it will be remembered for the way its male lead, Yves Montand, died from a heart-attack on the last day of filming, just as his character does in the film. The controversy centered on the way Beineix had made the ageing star spend the whole day immersed in a freezing lake, but the French public was also scandalized that so iconic an actor should end his days working on a Beineix project.

Beineix works hard to protect his privacy, and few details of his life outside filmmaking are available. In a sense this parallels the aims of “Cinema du Look”: Beineix allows his images to speak for themselves. Some insight into his working methods may be gleaned from Denis Parent’s Jean-Jacques Beineix: Version Originale, available only in French, which is the journalist’s diary of the making of Rosalyne et les Lions.

—Chris Routledge

BELLOCCHIO, Marco

Films as Director:

1965  I pugni in tasca (Fists in the Pocket) (+ sc)
1967  La Cina è vicina (China Is Near) (+ co-sc)
1969  “Discutiamo discutiamo” episode of Amore e rabbia (Vangelo 70) (+ co-sc, role)
1971  Nel nome del padre (In The Name of the Father) (+ sc)
1972  Shatti il mostro in prima pagina (Strike the Monster on Page One) (co-d uncredited, co-sc)
1974  Nessuno o tutti—Matti da slegare (co-d, co-sc)
1976  Marcia trionfale (+ co-sc)
1977  Il gabbiano (+ co-sc)
1979  Salò o le 120 giornate di Sodoma (Salò, 120 Days of Sodom)
1981  Vacanze in Valtrebbia (as student at Centro Sperimentale)
1982  Gli occhi, la bocca (The Eyes, the Mouth)
1983  Enrico IV (Henry IV)
1986  Devil in the Flesh
1987  La visione del sabba (The Visions of Sabbath)
1988  La sorciere
1990  La condanna (+ sc)
1991  Nel nome del padre (In The Name of the Father) (+ sc)
1994  Sogno della Farfalla (+ sc)
1995  Sogni infranti (+ sc)
1996  La Balia (The Nanny) (+ sc)
1998  Broken Dreams (co-d, co-sc)
1999  Sogni infranti (+ sc)

Other films:

1958  La colpa e la pena, Abbasso lo zio (as student at Centro Sperimentale); Ginepro fatto uomo (diploma film at Centro Sperimentale)
1966  Francesco d’Assisi
1975  Salò o le 120 giornate di Sodoma (Pier Paolo Pasolini) (ro as The President)

Publications

By BELLOCCHIO: books—

By BELLOCCHIO: articles—

Interview with Dan Yakir, in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1983.

Interview in 24 Images (Montreal), Winter 1988–89. Interview in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1989.

On BELLOCCHIO: books—

On BELLOCCHIO: articles—

Croyden, Margaret, ‘‘A Fresh Cinematic Voice from Italy,’’ in New York Times, 11 December 1983.

Stefanutto-Rosa, S., ‘‘Il diaovolta nel subconsone dello psicoanalista selvaggio,’’ in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), March-April 1986.

Segnocinema (Vicenza), July–August 1994.

* * *

One of the healthiest aspects of the ever-more impressive cinematic output of the 1960s was the greater respect accorded to different, even opposing, approaches to political filmmaking. Thus, a Godard or a Straub could comfortably accept being called a political filmmaker while their work analyzed the process of creating meaning in cinema. One of Italy’s most gifted directors to have emerged since the war, Marco Bellocchio chose to delve into his own roots and scrutinize those primary agents of socialization—the classroom, the church, and, most crucially for him, the family. Besides serving to reproduce selected values and ideas about the world, these structures are depicted by Bellocchio to be perfect, if microcosmic, reflections of society at large.

Bellocchio’s films are black comedies centered around the threat of impending chaos. Typically, Bellocchio’s protagonists are outsiders who, after learning the rules by which social structures remain intact, set about circumventing or ignoring them. Through their actions they expose the fragility of the social order by exposing the fragility of all presumed truths. The judge in Leap into the Void, for example, devises a bizarre plot to have his sister killed in order to avoid suffering the embarrassment of sending her to a mental institution.

The nuclear family, as an incarnation of the social order, represents a system of clearly understood, if unexpressed, power relationships within a fixed hierarchy. These power relationships are expressed in familial terms: Bellocchio’s women, for example, are usually defined as mothers or sisters. Even the radical political beliefs that some of his characters profess must be judged with regard to their application in the family sphere: shocked to discover that his sister is no longer a virgin, Vittorio in China Is Near admits, ‘‘You can be a Marxist-Leninist but still insist that your sister doesn’t screw around.’’
Along with his countryman Bernardo Bertolucci, Bellocchio is a primary example of the first European generation of film-school-educated directors. Often, these directors—perhaps under the influence of la politique des auteurs—tended to exhibit an extreme self-consciousness in their films. While watching a Bellocchio film, one is struck at how little or nothing is left open to interpretation—everything seems achingly precise and intentional. Yet what saves his films from seeming airless or hopelessly “arty” is that they’re often outrageously funny. The havoc his characters wreak on all those around them is ironically counterpointed to the controlled precision of the direction. There is a kind of mordant delight in discovering just how far Bellocchio’s characters will go in carrying out their eerie intrigues. The sense of shrewd critical intelligence orchestrating comic pandemonium into lucid political analyses is one of the most pleasurable aspects of his cinema.

—Richard Peña

FOMBERG, Maria Luisa

Nationality: Argentinian. Born: Buenos Aires, 1925. Family: Divorced, four children. Career: Established Argentina’s Teatro del Globo theater company, 1950s; wrote her first screenplay, Cronica de una Senora (Chronicle of a Woman), 1971; moved to New York and attended the Strasberg Institute, late 1970s; returned to Argentina and directed her first feature, Momentos, 1981. Died: 7 May 1995.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>Momentos (Moments)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>Señora de Nadie (Nobody’s Woman)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Camila</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Miss Mary</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>Yo, la peor de todas (I, the Worst of Them All)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993</td>
<td>De eso no se habla (I Don’t Want to Talk about It) (co-sc)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Films as Scriptwriter Only:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>Cronica de una Señora (Chronicle of a Woman)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>El Mundo de la Mujer (short)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Triangulo de Cuatro (Ayala)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>Juguetes (short)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997</td>
<td>El Impostor (The Imposter) (Maci)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By BEMBERG: articles—

- Interview in Cine Cubano (Havana), 1991.
- Interview with B. Olson, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 36, 1994.

On BEMBERG: book—

On BEMBERG: articles—

- Obituary in Film-dienst (Cologne), 23 May 1995.
- Obituary in Angles (Milwaukee), vol. 3, no. 1, 1996.

---

* * *
Maria Luisa Bemberg entered the filmmaking world only after leading an “asphyxiating and uneventful” life (her own words). Born into one of the wealthiest families in Buenos Aires, she entered the film industry at age forty-six after her children had grown and she had obtained a divorce. Despite her belated entry into the profession, Bemberg became one of the most subversive and popular Argentinian directors of the twentieth century. In addition, she has been acclaimed in Europe and the States.

Bemberg’s first (semi-autobiographical) screenplay, Cronica de una Señora, gained acclaim as a contemporary domestic drama, focusing on a regressive political system as it affected the female protagonist. Wishing to exert more control over her screenplays, but with no formal training, she spent three months as an actress at the Lee Strasberg Institute in New York and returned to Argentina to direct. In 1982 she caused a stir with Senora de Nadie, which featured a friendship between a gay man and a separated woman, challenging in one swoop the sacred notions of marriage, family, and the Church. Released on the day that Argentina invaded the Malvinas (Falklands), the film’s impact was overshadowed somewhat by political events, but the crumbling state of the military regime (which had exerted so much censorship and control over the country’s film industry that by the late 1970s only twelve films were being produced per year) ultimately helped the film succeed. Hugely popular with female audiences, it made a powerful and overtly feminist intervention into a culture crippled by its own repression and machismo.

After the overthrow of the military regime, and the humiliation of defeat in the Falklands War, Bemberg still saw much to come to terms with and much to struggle against in her national identity. She felt that her role as a filmmaker, and as a woman in a fiercely patriarchal society, was to explore political oppression as a backdrop and context for intense personal conflict. Her films dwell anxiously on Argentina’s troubled past, and suggest that only by coming to terms with it can the nation—and the individual—put it to rest.

In 1984 Bemberg directed Camila, the first Argentinian film ever to break into the American market. Recipient of an Oscar nomination for best foreign language film, it is all the more remarkable in that many other directors who wanted to film this true story of illicit love between a priest and a young woman in 1847 had previously been prevented from doing so by the government. By casting the Priest as a beautiful object of desire and Camila (historically portrayed as the innocent victim) as the temptress, Bemberg created a passionate melodrama in which she consciously moved away from her earlier, innocent victim) as the temptress, Bemberg created a passionate melodrama in which she consciously moved away from her earlier, though Miss Mary is a reactionary agent of oppression, the film works to explore why she is so—in an attempt to study the forces that could create both she and the sick family for which she works.

Bemberg’s strong sense of the melancholy is an integral part of her work, causing an uneasy tension in all her films: while all her works indict the reactionary political system, they are also impregnated with a tragic sensibility that presents events as somehow out of the protagonists’ control. The bleak endings (in which transgressors are punished and traditional structures remain apparently intact) of Bemberg’s films might seem pessimistic. But the very expression of transgression in the films—along with the tentative exploration of the disruptions that inevitably threaten an apparently monolithic system—by an individual who could so easily be a victim of that system (female, bourgeois, divorced), is not merely laudable, but remarkable.

Camila and Miss Mary remain exceptional films, the former a passionate and profound examination of a doomed romance and the latter a sumptuous, evocative account of a repressed woman. If both films are not overtly autobiographical, they do deal in very personal ways with Bemberg’s own identity as a woman existing in a male-dominated society. A third, most impressive, feature from Bemberg is I, The Worst of Them All, set in Mexico during the seventeenth century. Her heroine is a nun possessed of a deep thirst for knowledge who becomes a writer. She also is destined to becomes the antagonist of her country’s misogynist archbishop. Bemberg followed that up with what would be her final directorial effort, I Don’t Want to Talk About It, a fitfully interesting drama about two women—one a dwarf and the other her physically appealing but obnoxiously controlling mother—who become involved with an aging but still-suave bachelor (impeccably played by Marcello Mastroianni).

The unfortunate aspect of Bemberg’s career is that it began so late in her life, thus robbing her of time to write and direct other films. Still, before her death in 1995 she was able to transcend the repressive political forces at work in her country and the constraints placed upon her because of her sex. Moreover, her films show her ability to discerningly philosophize about these aspects of existence in her country.

—Samantha Cook, updated by Rob Edelman

BENEGAL, Shyam

Films as Director:

1967 A Child of the Streets (doc short)
1968 Close to Nature (doc short); Indian Youth—An Exploration (doc short); Sinhasta or The Path to Immortality (doc short)
1969 Poovanam (The Flower Path) (doc short)
1970 Horoscope for a Child (doc short)
1971 Pulsating Giant (doc short); Steel: A Whole New Way of Life (doc short); Raga and the Emotions (doc short)
1972 Tala and Rhythm (doc short); The Shruti and Graces of Indian Music (doc short); The Raag Yaman Kalyan (doc short); Notes on a Green Revolution (doc short); Power to the People (doc short); Foundations of Progress (doc short)
1974 Ankur (The Seedling) (+ sc)
1974/5 Learning Modules for Rural Children (doc)
1975  Nishant (Night’s End); Charandas Chor (Charandas the Thief)
1975  A Quiet Revolution (doc)
1976  Manthan (The Churning); Tomorrow Begins Today; Industrial Research (short); Epilepsy (short)
1977  Bhumika (The Role) (+ co-sc); Kondura/Anugrahan (Telugu version) (The Boon) (+ co-sc); New Horizons in Steel (doc)
1978  Junoon (The Obsession)
1980  Hari Hondal Bargadar (Share Cropper) (+ sc)
1981  Kalyug (The Machine Age)
1982  Arohan (Ascending Scale)
1983  Mandi (The Market Place)
1985  Jawaharlal Nehru (doc); Satyajit Ray (doc); Trikaal (Past, Present, and Future) (+sc)
1986  Susman (The Essence) (+ p)
1993  Suraj Ka Satvan Ghoda
1994  Mammo
1995  Apprenticeship of a Mahatma
2000  Zubeidaa

Publications

By BENEGAL: book—

By BENEGAL: articles—

Interview with F. El Guedj, in Cinémagraphe (Paris), September-October 1983.

Interview in Screen International (London), 13 December 1986.

On BENEGAL: books—

On BENEGAL: articles—

‘Shyam Benegal,’’ article and interview in Cinéma (Paris), September/October 1975.

Denis, F., ‘‘Of Truth and Invention,’’ in Cinema in India, no. 9, 1992.

Sen, M., ‘‘The Wonder Years,’’ in In India, vol. 4, no. 3, 1993.

Cossio, C., ‘‘Il settimo cavallo del sole nel cinema indiano,’’ in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), July-October 1995.

* * * *

The career of Shyam Benegal, which began with his first feature in 1974, has some similarity in terms of both approach and tenacity to that of Satyajit Ray twenty years earlier. Among shared aspects one may note a background in the film society movement, a strong western influence, commercial work in an advertising agency, and direction of children’s film (in Benegal’s case the feature length Charandas the Thief, made in 1975 for the Children’s Film Society). But Benegal was forty by the time he made his first feature and had already directed a large number of sponsored documentaries and commercials. Moreover, virtually all of his films have been in Hindi, the language of the commercial “all-India” movie, not in a regional dialect.

Benegal’s personal style is already apparent and fully formed in the loose trilogy of studies of rural oppression made between 1974 and 1976: The Seedling, Night’s End, and The Churning, the last financed collectively—at two rupees apiece—by the farmers of Gujarat state. In each case the interaction of the rural populace and often well-meaning outsiders ends disastrously, but the note of revolt is very muted. Though Benegal’s social commitment is unquestionable, he does not offer any clear way out for his characters. In The Seedling, the seduction and abandoning of a servant girl is followed by the savage beating of her deaf-mute husband, but the only answer is the stone thrown at the landlord’s house by a small boy in the film’s final sequence. This is the “seedling,” but Benegal offers no indication as to how it can be nurtured. In Night’s End, a schoolmaster’s efforts lead to violence when his wife is kidnapped by a landlord’s family who are accustomed to exploiting and brutalizing peasants at will. But the final peasant revolt stirred up by the middle class hero gets totally and blindly out of hand, and one knows that it will be put down—no doubt savagely—by the authorities and that passivity will resume. The Churning is more optimistic, but even here the advocates of change are eventually defeated, though their efforts may some day bear fruit. Typical of Benegal’s approach is the way in which women—so often a personification of new values in third world films—are depicted as passive suffering figures. Benegal’s style is always solidly realistic, with stress on a carefully worked out narrative line and well-drawn characters. The pace is generally slow and measured but enlivened by excellent observation and fine choice of significant detail.

In the late 1970s, Benegal retained this somewhat austere style with a total professionalism but without ever slipping into the extravagance or melodrama of the conventional Hindi film. The Role, one of his richest films, tells of a more dynamic woman, a film star who tries desperately to live her own life but is cruelly exploited by men throughout her life. The film, essentially a problem picture of a kind familiar in the West, has a muted, open ending and is enlivened by vigorously recreated extracts from the films in which the actress is purported to star. Subsequently, Benegal continued the widening of his chosen area of subject matter. The Boon, a film shot in two language versions and known as Kondura in Hindi and Anugrahan in Telegu, is a study of the tragic effect of a young man’s belief that he has been granted supernatural powers. The Obsession is a tale of interracial love set at the time of the Indian Mutiny, and The Machine Age is a story of bitter rivalry between industrialists—an archetypal conflict based on an ancient Hindi epic. But Ascending Scale, which depicts a peasant family destroyed as it is pitted against the reactionary forces of rural India, shows Benegal’s fidelity to the themes with which he had begun his career. Working aside from the dominant Hindi traditions, the director offers a striking example of integrity and commitment to an unrelenting vision.

—Roy Armes

BENTON, Robert

Nationality: American. Born: Robert Douglas Benton in Waxahachie, Texas, 29 September 1932. Education: University of Texas, and at Columbia University, New York City. Military Service: Served in U.S. Army, 1954–56. Family: Married Sally Rendigs, 1964, one son. Career: Art Director of Esquire magazine, New York, 1957–61 (consulting editor, 1962—); began screenwriting partnership with David Newman, on Bonnie and Clyde, 1967; directed first feature, Bad Company, 1972. Awards: National Society of Film Critics Award, New York Film Critics Award, Writers Guild of America Award and Oscar nomination, Best Screenplay, for Bonnie and Clyde, 1967; Oscar nomination, Best Screenplay, for The Late Show, 1977; Oscars and Los Angeles Film Critics Association Awards for Best Screenplay and Best Director, Golden Globe Award for Best Screenplay, Writers Guild of America Award and Best Director, National Society of Film Critics and Directors Guild of America, for Kramer vs Kramer, 1979; Oscar for Best Screenplay, for Places in the Heart, 1984; Oscar nomination for Best Screenplay, for Nobody’s Fool, 1994. Address: c/o Sam Cohn, International Creative Management, 40 W. 57th Street, New York, NY 10019, U.S.A.

Films as Director and Co-Scriptwriter:

1972 Bad Company
1977 The Late Show (sc)
1979 Kramer vs. Kramer
1982 Still of the Night (+sc)
1984 Places in the Heart (The Texas Project)
1987 Nadine (+sc)
1991 Billy Bathgate
1994 Nobody’s Fool (+sc)
1998 Twilight (+sc)

Films as Scriptwriter Only (with David Newman except as indicated):

1967 Bonnie and Clyde (Penn)
1970 There Was a Crooked Man (J. Mankiewicz)
1972 What’s up Doc? (Bogdanovich) (co-sc with Newman and Buck Henry)
1978 Superman (Donner) (co-sc with David Newman, Mario Puzo, and Leslie Newman)

Other Films:

1988 The House on Carroll Street (Yates) (co-exec pr)
1994 A Great Day in Harlem (Bach) (ro as himself)

Publications

By BENTON: books—

Don’t Ever Wish for a Seven-Foot Bear, with Sally Rendigs, New York, 1972.

By BENTON: articles—

Interviews in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1973, January/February 1977, and July/August 1978.
Interview in American Film (Washington, D.C.), July/August 1979.
Interview in Image et Son (Paris), April 1980.
Interview with Sheila Johnston, in Stills (London), March 1985.
Interview with P. Calum and A. Skytte in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), May 1985.
Interview with P. Freeman, in American Screenwriter, vol. 4, no. 4, 1987.
Interview with L. Vincenzi in Millimeter (Cleveland), August 1987.
Interview with Andrew Sarris, in Film Comment (New York), January-February 1995.

On BENTON: articles—

There were many ways to make it as a bigtime Hollywood director in the 1970s. Robert Benton’s experience provides a common mode: a successful screenwriter turned director. Benton teamed with another aspiring author, David Newman, to pen the script of Arthur Penn’s wildly successful, highly influential Bonnie and Clyde (1967), a film that showed Hollywood how to meld comedy, melodrama, and social commentary. The story of how Benton and Newman came to write Bonnie and Clyde is the stuff of Hollywood legend. In 1964 they were working for Esquire magazine, developing the magazine’s annual college issue. As they were crafting the magazine’s infamous Dubious Achievement Awards, they became caught up with the art cinema of Ingmar Bergman, Federico Fellini, and Akira Kurosawa. They decided to attempt an American version of Jean-Luc Godard’s Breathless through the story of two desperados of the 1930s, Bonnie Parker and Clyde Barrow.

Benton and Newman wrote a seventy-page treatment in which they tried to make their film feel like an Hitchcock thriller, but with the comic violent tone of François Truffaut’s Shoot the Piano Player. First they sent the “Bonnie and Clyde” script to Truffaut, who passed on it, as did Jean-Luc Godard. Warren Beatty rescued the project, agreed to produce it, and Arthur Penn became the director. Here were the first members of the film generation of the 1960s making what in some ways came to represent the most influential film of the decade, for it captured the restlessness of an age as well as the era’s ethical ambiguity. Bonnie and Clyde at once demonstrated that Hollywood films could successfully incorporate the stylistic flourishes of the French New Wave into Classic Hollywood genre material.

The Bonnie and Clyde script won numerous awards, and the duo went on to co-script There Was a Crooked Man (1970), *What’s up...
Doc? (1972), and Superman (1978). The last two proved Benton and Newman were able to make movies that made money. What’s up Doc? finished in the top ten earners for 1971; Superman generated more than 100 million dollars worldwide. But Benton aspired to be his own director, and he worked single-mindedly at that goal during the 1970s.

Success came with Kramer vs. Kramer (1979), Benton’s third directorial effort. Based on his screenplay, Kramer vs. Kramer won the Oscar for Best Picture, Best Actor (Dustin Hoffman), Best Screenplay, Best Director, and Best Supporting Actress (Meryl Streep), a sweep rarely accomplished in Hollywood history. More importantly for Benton’s future, Kramer vs. Kramer finished atop the domestic box-office rankings for the year. Robert Benton had reached his goal; he was as hot a property as there was in Hollywood as the 1980s opened.

But thereafter Benton’s filmmaking successes were limited. He did reach another peak in 1984 with Places in the Heart. The film, which featured Benton’s award-winning screenplay, was one man’s affectionate look at life in his hometown of Waxahachie, Texas, during the hard days of the Great Depression. On the other hand, Benton’s Nadine (1987) was also set in Texas, but this comedy failed to capture either the fancy of the critics or the public.

As Benton moved into the 1990s, many saw him as the principal case of the power of the screenwriter as auteur. Perhaps this is so, but continuing success at the top—a Hollywood prerequisite if one wants to control one’s movies—seemed to have sucked the life from Benton’s story-telling ability. Some speculated that Benton, who had crafted fine stories of outsiders from Bonnie Parker to the aging detective of The Late Show, had difficulty functioning as a member of the Hollywood establishment.

Benton’s most recent films have been set in the environs of upstate New York. Billy Bathgate, based on the E.L. Doctorow novel about a young man’s involvement with mobster Dutch Schultz, has much going for it, beginning with a talented cast (headed by Dustin Hoffman and Nicole Kidman) and superlative production design. But the shoot was troubled, resulting in acrimony between Benton and Hoffman and a curiously emotionless and eminently forgettable film, despite the presence of the always watchable Hoffman (cast as Schultz—a character altogether different from his Ted Kramer character).

Nobody’s Fool, based on a novel by Richard Russo, is far more successful. The characters are less flamboyant than those found in Billy Bathgate; as an evocation of time and place, and a portrait of small-town American life, the film is closer in spirit to Places in the Heart. Paul Newman is nothing short of superb as Donald “Sully” Sullivan, an aging, out-of-work construction worker. Long-estranged from his family, the film follows events when he is forced to deal with his son and grandson. Also central to the story are Sullivan’s relationships with various townsfolk, including his landlady (Jessica Tandy), who once was his eighth-grade teacher, his sometime employer (Bruce Willis), and the latter’s neglected wife (Melanie Griffith). Nobody’s Fool works best as a film of moods and feelings; ultimately, it is a knowing, entertaining blend of poignancy and humor. As in his earlier films, Benton draws fine performances from his cast. While one would expect exceptional acting from Newman and Tandy, the filmmaker elicits solid work from Griffith and Willis, who rarely have been better on screen.

—Douglas Gomery, updated by Rob Edelman

---

BERESFORD, Bruce

Nationality: Australian. Born: 1940. Education: Sydney University. Family: Married 1) Rhoisin Patricia Harrison; 2) Virginia Patricia Mary Dugan, 1985; has three children. Career: Worked in advertising and for ABC TV, late 1950s; moved to London, 1961, and taught at girl’s school, Willesden; film editor, East Nigerian Film Unit, 1964–66; head of British Film Institute Production Board, 1966–70; produced eighty-six films, notably short documentaries; moved to Australia, 1971; directed first feature, The Adventures of Barry MacKenzie, 1972; moved to United States, 1981. Awards: Best Director, Australian Film Awards, for Don’s Party, 1976, and Breaker Morant, 1980; Best Director, American Film Institute Awards, for Don’s Party, 1977; Best Director, Canadian Film Awards, for Black Robe, 1991. Agent: William Morris Agency, Beverly Hills, CA.

Films as Director:

- 1972 The Adventures of Barry MacKenzie (+ sc)
- 1974 Barry MacKenzie Holds His Own (+ co-sc, pr)
- 1975 Don’s Party
- 1977 The Getting of Wisdom
- 1978 Money Movers (+ sc)
- 1980 Breaker Morant (+ sc)
- 1981 The Club
- 1982 Puberty Blues
- 1983 Tender Mercies

---

Bruce Beresford
1985  King David; Fringe Dwellers (+ sc)
1986  Crimes of the Heart
1987  Aria (directed one episode)
1989  Driving Miss Daisy
1990  Her Alibi
1991  Mister Johnson (+ co-sc)
1992  Black Robe
1993  Rich in Love
1994  A Good Man in Africa; A Silent Fall
1996  Last Dance
1997  Paradise Road (co-sc)
1999  Double Jeopardy; Sydney: A Story of a City

Other Films:

1967  You’re Human like the Rest of Them (pr)
1994  Curse of the Starving Class (exec pr, sc)
1998  Rich in Love
1990  Her Alibi
1996  The Adventures of Barry McKenzie
1993  A Good Man in Africa
1991  Mister Johnson (directed one episode)
1999  Double Jeopardy

Publications

By BERESFORD: articles—

Interview in Screen International (London), 21 May 1983.

Interview with Film a Doba (Prague), Autumn 1994.

Interview with S.B. Katz, in Written By (Los Angeles), June 1997.

On BERESFORD: books—

Quartermain, Peter, “Two Australian Films: Images and Contexts for The Term of His Natural Life (1927) and Don’s Party,” in Commonwealth Essays and Studies (Dijon, France), Spring 1984.

Bruce Beresford’s career has been described as both interesting and uneven. Since his debut as a maker of feature films in 1972 with the broad comedy The Adventures of Barry McKenzie, Beresford has made a wide variety of movies. But there is unity in this variety. If his Australian films, such as The Getting of Wisdom and Breaker Morant, seem more hard-edged and political than Tender Mercies, Crimes of the Heart, or Driving Miss Daisy, his latest American films nevertheless carry a social comment, if conveyed ever so quietly.

Beresford showed an interest in making films from an early age but moved to England when he saw little chance of being able to direct in Australia. After holding a number of jobs abroad, including a stint working for the British Film Institute, he returned home when government subsidies offered the possibilities for an expanded local production schedule. His first film, The Adventures of Barry McKenzie, was deliberately commercial and pitched at a popular level since he felt that Australian films needed to prove their marketability at that time. The success of this film and his next “ocker” epic, Barry McKenzie Holds His Own, gave him the leverage within the industry to be able to explore a different kind of work.

The more serious social comment of Don’s Party, a film set against the failure of the Labor Party in the national elections of 1969, offered a clear-eyed look at Australian society of the 1960s and pursued in a more serious way the contradictions in the Australian character. Don’s Party is a small movie based on David Williamson’s play, and it was filmed largely within the confines of a suburban house. Its intense probing of character and the film’s at-times claustrophobic atmosphere surfaced in the director’s later, better-known films.

Beresford next turned to a project he had wanted to do for some time, The Getting of Wisdom, based on the autobiographical novel by H. H. Richardson. The story traces the adventures of a young woman who arrives from the outback to receive a proper education at a city girl’s school. The film is a period piece but provides a devastating look at the overly genteel pretensions of class-bound, nineteenth-century Australian society. Not yet secure in its own identity, the film noted that the society still copied the Victorian social arrangements of the motherland. A stunningly beautiful film, The Getting of Wisdom established Beresford as a maker of serious and thoughtful films in the European art film tradition.

After shooting a caper film, The Money Movers, Beresford made Breaker Morant, which returned to Australia’s past and explored the country’s colonial relationship with Great Britain against the background of the Boer War. The film confirmed Beresford’s international reputation and opened the way for him to make films outside the rather limited resources of the Australian cinema. Breaker Morant contains a savage look at British attitudes towards its former colony and examines the exploitation and condescension such attitudes produce. Although the film’s leading character was played by an Englishman, the movie was also a showcase for Australian acting talent.

With The Club and Puberty Blues, Beresford returned to contemporary Australia. The Club, adapted from another of Bruce Williamson’s plays, is a satire on the inner workings of an Australian football club, including its financial woes, moral tensions, and labor disputes. Puberty Blues deals with a pair of would-be ‘surfer-girls’ growing up along the southern beachside suburbs of Sydney. The film deftly explores the macho world of Australian surfers while offering up an unflattering picture of how young women in this world are exploited and abused.

In part because of his growing international reputation, Beresford moved to the United States to direct his next film, Tender Mercies, from a Horton Foote script about a down and out country singer who finds love and solace with a small town Texan widow and her son. At first glance the story seems an unusual subject for Beresford to film, but Tender Mercies contains much of the same social commentary and the visual beauty of his earlier films. The acting is notable, as is the evocation of locale, which is not unlike the arid spaces of the Australian outback. It is a quiet, small film, the kind of movie Beresford was used to making, and it set the pattern for the other successful American films that followed. Only when venturing into the mega-epic with King David did the Beresford touch falter.

Returning to Australia, Beresford made The Fringe Dwellers, a movie about a family of aborigines and their attempts to integrate themselves into white Australian society. Their failure to do so causes a split between the generations and a dissolution of the family itself. Long a touchy subject in Australia, Beresford handled the integration issue with sensitivity, tracing the sad divisions between the races. King David came next. Although fraught with high expectations, the film was a critical and box-office disaster. He recouped whatever damage the fiasco might have done to his career by turning to Crimes of the Heart, an adaptation of Beth Henley’s play about three eccentric sisters who have come together as a result of a family crisis. Once again, the director captured the ambience of small-town Southern society with gentleness and affection. The three sisters, all played by major Hollywood stars who worked remarkably well together under Beresford’s direction, come off as a loving but eccentric by-product of regional gentility and repression. Underlying the film is a steady and unblinking look at the place of women in this traditional society.

It is noteworthy that Beresford’s next film rated a large spread in the financial section of the New York Times. Driving Miss Daisy cleaned up at the box-office as well as at the Oscars, and made Beresford’s name a known quantity among general film audiences around the world. A quiet film about the relationship between a black man and his elderly Jewish female employer in the South, the work features tour de force acting performances from both of the principal stars, Morgan Freeman and Jessica Tandy. For the most part the film does not deal with racial or social problems, but prejudice hovers around the edges of the world of the film and subtly affects its tone. It is another of Beresford’s small films, a work of intense concentration that focuses on a microcosm of the modern world and which, in its unfolding, explores broad human as well as social issues.

Beresford’s films of the 1990s have met with mixed critical and financial success. Mister Johnson, based on a Joyce Cary novel, follows the adventures of an English engineer in West Africa during the 1920s. The engineer, who has been hired to build a road through the native bush, is accompanied by Mr. Johnson, his wily local assistant. Like many of his other films, it is a tragic story about the clash between societies in a colonial setting. Black Robe is a larger-scale historical film set in the Canadian wilderness. In 1734 a French Jesuit priest accompanies a tribe of Algonquins to his mission among the Hurons. The priest’s spirituality is challenged by the hardships he faces in the wilderness and with the North American Indians. It is a grim film with bleak, scenic locations that create a thoughtful and stark background for its message of cultural friction.

The same creative team that filmed Driving Miss Daisy reunited to film Josephine Humphreys’ novel about a Southern family whose conventional lives are disrupted when the mother unexpectedly, and without explanation, leaves her husband and children. Rich in Love deals with the various members of the family but focuses on the coming-of-age of the youngest daughter, who has taken over the mother’s duties. Both the acting and the screen adaptation were critically praised. In A Good Man in Africa, starring Sean Connery, the director returned to Africa, where the locals and the British were still at odds. The film was rather badly reviewed and several of the critics found the portrayal of both sides stereotypical and dated. Silent Fall is a suspense film about a psychiatrist who solves a double murder witnessed by the victims’ nine-year-old son. It was released right on the heels of A Good Man in Africa and might have helped to save Beresford’s current reputation, but it was so infrequently and so negatively reviewed that it only multiplied his troubles.

Although in many ways Bruce Beresford has become a Hollywood director, one who likes large filming budgets and the options that such budgets afford, his films remain really quite consistent.
Preferring ensemble acting to star vehicles, smaller films to epics (even though Breaker Morant was favorably compared to a David Lean epic by the critics, the film is still basically an intimate courtroom drama) and always infusing his films with an insistent social critique, especially on the question of racism, Beresford has fashioned a remarkably consistent career for all of its seeming diversity.

—Charles L. P. Silet

BERGMAN, Ingmar

Nationality: Swedish. Born: Ernst Ingmar Bergman in Uppsala, Sweden, 14 July 1918. Education: Palmgrens School, Stockholm, and Stockholm University, 1938–40. Family: Married 1) Else Fisher, 1943 (divorced 1945), one daughter; 2) Ellen Lundström, 1945 (divorced 1950), two sons, two daughters; 3) Gun Grut, 1951, one son; 4) Käbi Laretei, 1959 (separated 1965), one son; 5) Ingrid von Rosen, 1971 (died 1995). Also one daughter by actress Liv Ullmann.

Films as Director:

1946 Kris (Crisis) (+ sc); Det regnar på vår kärlek (It Rains on Our Love; The Man with an Umbrella) (+ co-sc)
1947 Skepp till Indiland (A Ship Bound for India; The Land of Desire) (+ sc)
1948 Musik i mörker (Music in Darkness; Night Is My Future); Hamnstad (Port of Call) (+ co-sc)
1949 Fängelse (Prison; The Devil’s Wanton) (+ sc); Törst (Thirst; Three Strange Loves)
1950 Till glädje (To Joy) (+ sc); Sänt händer inte här (High Tension; This Doesn’t Happen Here)
1951 Sommarlek (Summer Interlude; Illicit Intercourse) (+ co-sc)
1952 Kvinnors väntan (Secrets of Women; Waiting Women) (+ sc)
1953 Sommaruren med Monika (Monika; Summer with Monika) (+ co-sc); Gyckelnas afton (The Naked Night; Sawdust and Tinsel) (+ sc)
1954 En lektion i kärlek (A Lesson in Love) (+ sc)
1955 Kvinnodröms (Dreams; Journey into Autumn) (+ sc); Sommarnattens leende (Smiles of a Summer Night) (+ sc)
1956 Det sjunde inseget (The Seventh Seal) (+ sc); Smultronstället (Wild Strawberries) (+ sc)
1957 Nära livet (Brink of Life; So Close to Life) (+ co-sc); Ansikte (The Magician; The Face) (+ sc)
1958 Jungfrukällen (The Virgin Spring); Djävulens öga (The Devil’s Eye) (+ sc)
1959 Såsom i en spiegel (Through a Glass Darkly) (+ sc)
1960 Nattvardsgästerna (Winter Light) (+ sc); Tystnaden (The Silence) (+ sc)
1964 For att inte tala om alla dessa kvinnor (All These Women; Now about These Women) (+ co-sc under pseudonym ‘‘Bunret Eriksson’’)
1966 Persona (+ sc)
1967 Daniel” episode of Stimulantia (+ sc, ph)
1968 Vargtimmen (Hour of the Wolf) (+ sc); Skammen (Shame; The Shame) (+ sc)
1969 Riten (The Ritual; The Rite) (+ sc); En passion (The Passion of Anna; A Passion) (+ sc); Fårö-dokumentet (The Fårö Document) (+ sc)
1971 Beröringen (The Touch) (+ sc)
1973 Viskningar och rop (Cries and Whispers) (+ sc); Sceiner ur ett åttenskap (Scenes from a Marriage) (+ sc, + narration, voice of the photographer) in six episodes: ‘‘Oskuld och panika (Innocence and Panic)’’; ‘‘Kunsten att sopa under matan (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Paula’’; ‘‘Täreldalen (The Vale of Tears)’’; ‘‘Analfabeterna (The Illiterates)’’; ‘‘Mitt i natten (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Paula’’; ‘‘Oskuld och panika (Innocence and Panic)’’; ‘‘Kunsten att sopa under matan (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Paula’’; ‘‘Täreldalen (The Vale of Tears)’’; ‘‘Analfabeterna (The Illiterates)’’; ‘‘Mitt i natten (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Husstumta (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Oskuld och panika (Innocence and Panic)’’; ‘‘Kunsten att sopa under matan (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Paula’’; ‘‘Täreldalen (The Vale of Tears)’’; ‘‘Analfabeterna (The Illiterates)’’; ‘‘Mitt i natten (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’; ‘‘Husstumta (The Art of Papering over Cracks)’’
1977 Das Schlangei (The Serpent’s Egg; Ormens ägg) (+ sc)
1978 Herbstsonate (Autumn Sonata; Höstsonaten) (+ sc)
1979 Fårö-dokument 1979 (Fårö 1979) (+ sc, narration)
1980 Aus dem Leben der Marionetten (From the Life of the Marionettes) (+ sc)
1982 Fanny och Alexander (Fanny and Alexander) (+ sc)
1983 Efter Repetitioner (After the Rehearsal) (+ sc)
1985 Karin’s Face (short)
1991  Den Goda viljan (The Best Intentions) (mini for TV)
1992  Markisimman de Sade (for TV) (+sc)
1995  Sista skriket (The Last Gasp) (for TV) (+sc)
1997  Larmar och gör sig till (In the Presence of a Clown) (for TV) (+sc, ro as Mental Patient); Bergmans röst (The Voice of Bergman (Bergdahl) (doc)

Other Films:

1944  Hets (Torment; Frenzy) (Sjöberg) (sc)
1947  Kvinna utan ansikte (Woman without a Face) (Molander) (sc)
1948  Eva (Molander) (co-sc)
1950  Medan staden sover (While the City Sleeps) (Kjellgren)
      (synopsis)
1951  Fränskild (Divorced) (Molander) (sc)
1956  Sista paret at (Last Couple Out) (Sjöberg) (sc) 1961  Lustgården (The Pleasure Garden) (Kjellin) (co-sc under pseudonym “Buntel Eriksson”)
1974  Kallelsen (The Vocation) (Nykvist) (pr)
1975  Trollflöjten (The Magic Flute) (for TV) (+ sc)
1976  Ansikte mot ansikte (Face to Face) (+ co-pr, sc) (for TV, originally broadcast in serial form); Paradistorg (Summer
      Paradise) (Lindblom) (pr)
1977  A Look at Liv (Kaplan) (role as interviewee)
1986  Dokument: Fanny och Alexander (Carlsson) (subject)
1992  Den Goda Viljan (The Best Intentions) (sc); Sondagsbarn
      (Sunday’s Children) (sc)
1996  Enskilda samtal (Private Confessions) (series for TV) (sc)
2000  Trolösa (Faithless) (sc)

Publications

By BERGMAN: books—

*A Film Trilogy (Through a Glass Darkly, Winter Light, and The BERGMAN

Scenes from a Marriage, New York, 1974.

Face to Face, New York, 1976.

From the Life of the Marionettes, New York, 1980.

The Marriage Scenarios: Scenes from a Marriage; Face to Face; Autumn Sonata, New York, 1983.

By BERGMAN: articles—

“Self-Analysis of a Film-Maker,” in Films and Filming (London), September 1956.

“Schizophrenic Interview with a Nervous Film Director,” by ‘Ernest Riffe’ (pseudonym), in Film in Sweden (Stockholm), no. 3, 1968, and in Take One (Montreal), January/February 1969.

Interview with Peter Cowie, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1983.

“Goodbye to All That: Ingmar Bergman’s Farewell to Film,” an interview with F. van der Linden and B.J. Bertina, in Cinema Canada (Montreal), February 1984.

Interview with Jan Aghed and Jannike Åhlund, in Positif (Paris), May 1998.

On BERGMAN: books—

Kawin, Bruce, Mindscreen: Bergman, Godard, and the First-Person Film, Princeton, 1978.

Tornqvist, Egil, Between Stage and Screen: Ingmar Bergman Directs (Film Culture in Transition), Amsterdam University Press, 1996.

On BERGMAN: articles—

Archer, Eugene, “The Rack of Life,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1959.

Nykvist, Sven, “Photographing the Films of Ingmar Bergman,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), October 1962.

Kinder, Marsha, “From the Life of the Marionettes to The Devil’s Wanton,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1981.

Boyd, D., “Persona and the Cinema of Representation,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Winter 1983–84.

“Ingmar Bergman Section” of Positif (Paris), March 1985.

Nystedt, H., article in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 32, no. 1, 1990.

Riding, Alan, “Face to Face with a Life of Creation: At 76, the Eminent Director Ingmar Bergman Seems Even to Have His Demons under Control,” in New York Times, 30 April 1995.

Murphy, Kathleen, “A Clean, Well-lighted Place: Ingmar Bergman’s Dollhouse,” in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1995.

On BERGMAN: films—

* * *

Ingmar Bergman’s unique international status as a filmmaker would seem assured on many grounds. His reputation can be traced to such diverse factors as his prolific output of largely notable work (40 features from 1946–82); the profoundly personal nature of his best films since the 1950s; the innovative nature of his technique combined with its essential simplicity, even when employing surrealistic and dream-like treatments (as, for example, in Wild Strawberries and Persona); his creative sensitivity in relation to his players; and his extraordinary capacity to evoke distinguished acting from his regular interpreters, notably Gunnar Björnstrand, Max von Sydow, Bibi Andersson, Ingrid Thulin, and Liv Ullmann.

After an initial period of derivative, melodramatic filmmaking largely concerned with bitter man-woman relationships (“I just grabbed helplessly at any form that might save me, because I hadn’t any of my own,” he confesses in Bergman on Bergman), Bergman reached an initial maturity of style in Summer Interlude and Summer with Monika, romantic studies of adolescent love and subsequent disillusionment. In The Naked Night he used a derelict travelling circus—its proprietor paired with a faithless young mistress and its clown with a faithless middle-aged wife—as a symbol of human suffering through misplaced love and to portray the ultimate loneliness of the human condition, a theme common to much of his work. Not that Bergman’s films are all gloom and disillusionment. He has a recurrent, if veiled, sense of humour. His comedies, such as A Lesson in Love and Smiles of a Summer Night, are ironically effective (“You’re a gynecologist who knows nothing about women,” says a man’s mistress in A Lesson in Love), and even in Wild Strawberries the aged professor’s relations with his housekeeper offer comic relief. Bergman’s later comedies, the Shavian The Devil’s Eye and Now About All These Women, are both sharp and fantastic.

“To me, religious problems are continuously alive . . . not . . . on the emotional level, but on an intellectual one,” wrote Bergman at the time of Wild Strawberries. The Seventh Seal, The Virgin Spring, Through a Glass Darkly, Winter Light, and The Silence lead progressively to the rejection of religious belief, leaving only the conviction that human life is haunted by “a virulent, active evil.” The crusading knight of The Seventh Seal who cannot face death once his faith is lost survives only to witness the cruelty of religious persecution. In Bergman’s view, faith belongs to the simple-minded and innocent. The Virgin Spring exposes the violence of vengeance in a period of primitive Christianity.

Bergman no longer likes these films, considering them “bogus”; nevertheless, they are excellently made in his highly professional style. Disillusionment with Lutheran denial of love is deep in Winter Light. “In Winter Light I swept my house clean.” Bergman has said.

Other Bergman films reflect his views on religion as well: the mad girl in Through a Glass Darkly perceives God as a spider, while the ailing sister in The Silence faces death with a loneliness that passes all understanding as a result of the frigid silence of God in the face of her sufferings. In The Face, however, Bergman takes sardonic delight in letting the rationalistic miracle-man suspect in the end that his bogus miracles are in fact genuine.

With Wild Strawberries, Bergman turned increasingly to psychological dilemmas and ethical issues in human and social relations once religion has proved a failure. Above all else, the films suggest, love, understanding, and common humanity seem lacking. The aged medical professor in Wild Strawberries comes through a succession of dreams to realize the truth about his cold and loveless nature. In Persona, the most psychologically puzzling, controversial, yet significant of all Bergman’s films—with its Brechtian alienation technique and surreal treatment of dual personality—the self-imposed silence of the actress stems from her failure to love her husband and son, though she responds with horror to the self-destructive violence of the world around her. This latter theme is carried still further in The Shame, in which an egocentric musician attempts non-involvement in his country’s war only to collapse into irrational acts of violence himself through sheer panic. The Shame and Hour of the Wolf are concerned with artists who are too self-centered to care about the larger issues of the society in which they live.

“It wasn’t until A Passion that I really got to grips with the man-woman relationship,” says Bergman. A Passion deals with “the dark, destructive forces” in human nature which sexual urges can inspire. Bergman’s later films reflect, he claims, his “ceaseless fascination with the whole race of women,” adding that “the film . . . should communicate psychic states.” The love and understanding needed by women is too often denied them, suggests Bergman. Witness the case of the various women about to give birth in Brink of Life and the fearful, haunted, loveless family relationships in Cries and Whispers. The latter, with The Shame and The Serpent’s Egg, is surely among the most terrifying of Bergman’s films, though photographed in exquisite color by Sven Nykvist, his principal cinematographer.

Man-woman relationships are successively and uncompromisingly examined in a series of Bergman films. The Touch shows a married woman driven out of her emotional depth in an extramarital affair; Face to Face, one of Bergman’s most moving films, concerns the nervous breakdown of a cold-natured woman analyst and the hallucinations she suffers; and a film made as a series for television (but reissued more effectively in a shortened, re-edited form for the cinema, Scenes from a Marriage) concerns the troubled, long-term love of a professional couple who are divorced but unable to endure separation. Supreme performances were given by Bibi Andersson in Persona and The Touch, and by Liv Ullmann in Cries and Whispers, Scenes from a Marriage and Face to Face. Bergman’s later films, made in Sweden or during his period of self-imposed exile, are more miscellaneous. The Magic Flute is one of the best, most delightful of opera-films. The Serpent’s Egg is a savage study in the sadistic origins of Nazism, while Autumn Sonata explores the case of a mother who cannot love. Bergman declared his filmmaking at an end with his brilliant, German-made misanthropic study of a fatal marriage, From the Life of the Marionettes, and the semi-autobiographical television series Fanny and Alexander. Swedish-produced, the latter work was released in a re-edited version for the cinema. Set in 1907, Fanny and Alexander is the gentle, poetic story of two years in the lives of characters who are meant to be Bergman’s maternal grandparents.

After Fanny and Alexander, Bergman directed After the Rehearsal, a small-scale drama which reflected his growing preoccupation with working in the theater. It features three characters: an aging, womanizing stage director mounting a version of Strindberg’s The Dream Play; the attractive, determined young actress who is his leading lady; and his former lover, once a great star but now an alcoholic has-been, who accepts a humiliating bit role in the production.

After the Rehearsal was not Bergman’s cinematic swan song. He went on to author two scripts which are autobiographical outgrowths of Fanny and Alexander. The Best Intentions, directed by Bille August, is a compassionate chronicle of ten years in the tempestuous courtship and early marriage of Bergman’s parents. His father starts out as an impoverished theology student who is unyielding in his views. His mother is spirited but pampered, the product of an upper-class upbringing. The film also is of note for the casting of Max von Sydow as the filmmaker’s maternal grandfather. The actor’s presence is most fitting, given the roots of the scenario and his working relationship with Bergman, which dates back to the 1950s.

The Best Intentions was followed by Sunday’s Children, directed by Bergman’s son Daniel. The film is a deeply personal story of a ten-year-old boy named Pu, who is supposed to represent the young Ingmar Bergman. Pu is growing up in the Swedish countryside during the 1920s. The scenario focuses on his relationship to his minister father and other family members; also depicted is the adult Pu’s unsettling connection to his elderly dad.

—Roger Manvell, updated by Rob Edelman

BERKELEY, Busby

Nationality: American. Born: Busby Berkeley William Enos in Los Angeles, 29 November 1895. Education: Mohegan Military Academy, Peekskill, New York, 1907–14. Military Service: Organized marching drills and touring stage shows for U.S. and French armies, and served as aerial observer in U.S. Air Corps, 1917–19. Family: Married six times. Career: Actor, stage manager, and choreographer, 1919–27; director of A Night in Venice on Broadway, 1928; director of dance numbers in Whoopee for Samuel Goldwyn, 1930; worked for Warner Bros., 1933–39; hired as dance advisor and director by MGM, 1939; returned to Warner Bros., 1943; released from Warner Bros. contract, returned to Broadway, 1944; directed last film, Take Me out to the Ball Game, 1949. Died: 14 March 1976.

Films as Director:

- 1933 She Had to Say Yes (co-d, ch)
- 1935 Gold Diggers of 1935 (+ ch); Bright Lights (+ ch); I Live for Love (+ ch)
- 1936 Stage Struck (+ ch)
- 1937 The Go-Getter (+ ch); Hollywood Hotel (+ ch)
- 1938 Men Are Such Fools (+ ch); Garden of the Moon (+ ch); Comet Over Broadway (+ ch)
- 1939 They Made Me a Criminal (+ ch); Babes in Arms (+ ch); Fast and Furious (+ ch)
- 1940 Strike up the Band (+ ch); Forty Little Mothers (+ ch)
- 1941 Blonde Inspiration (+ ch); Babes on Broadway (+ ch)
- 1942 For Me and My Gal (+ ch)
- 1943 The Gang’s All Here (+ ch)

1946 Cinderella Jones (+ ch)
1949 Take Me out to the Ball Game (+ ch)

Other Films:

- 1930 Whoopee (ch)
- 1931 Palmy Days (ch); Flying High (ch)
- 1932 Night World (ch); Bird of Paradise (ch); The Kid from Spain (ch)
- 1933 42nd Street (ch); Gold Diggers of 1933 (ch); Footlight Parade (ch); Roman Scandals (ch)
- 1934 Wonder Bar (ch); Fashions of 1934 (ch); Dames (ch)
- 1935 Go into Your Dance (ch); In Caliente (ch); Stars over Broadway (ch)
- 1937 Gold Diggers of 1937 (ch); The Singing Marine (ch); Varsity Show (ch)
- 1938 Gold Diggers in Paris (ch)
- 1939 Broadway Serenade (ch)
- 1941 Ziegfield Girl (ch); Lady Be Good (ch); Born to Sing (ch)
- 1943 Girl Crazy (ch)
- 1950 Two Weeks with Love (ch)
- 1951 Call Me Mister (ch); Two Tickets to Broadway (ch)
- 1952 Million Dollar Mermaid (ch)
- 1953 Small Town Girl (ch); Easy to Love (ch)
- 1954 Rose Marie (ch)
- 1962 Jumbo (ch)
- 1970 The Phynx (role in cameo appearance)
Publications

By BERKELEY: book—

By BERKELEY: articles—

Interview with P. Brion and R. Gilson, in Contracampo (Madrid), September 1981.

On BERKELEY: books—

On BERKELEY: articles—

Sarris, Andrew, “‘Likable but Elusive,’” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
Jenkins, Philip, “‘The Great Busby,’” in Film (London), Spring 1966.
“‘What Directors are Saying,’” in Action (Los Angeles), May/June 1970.

No American film director explored the possibilities of the mobile camera more fully or ingeniously than Busby Berkeley. He was the Méliès of the musical, the corollary of Vertov in the exploration of the possibilities of cinematic movement. His influence has since been felt in a wide array of filmmaking sectors, from movie musicals to television commercials.

Certain aspects of Berkeley’s personal history are obvious in their importance to a discussion of his cinematic work, most specifically his World War I service and his work in the theatre. Born to a theatrical family, Berkeley learned early of the demands of the theatrical profession: when his father died, his mother refused to take the night off, instilling in Busby the work ethic of “‘the show must go on.’’” Throughout most of his career, Gertrude Berkeley and her ethic reigned, no wife successfully displacing her as spiritual guide and confidante until after her death in 1948. Even then, Berkeley drove himself at the expense of his many marriages.

Berkeley’s World War I service was significant for the images he created in his musical sequences. He designed parade drills for both the French and U.S. armies, and his later service as an aerial observer with the Air Corps formed the basis of an aesthetic which incorporated images of order and symmetry often seen from the peculiar vantage of an overhead position. In addition, that training developed his approach to economical direction. Berkeley often used storyboarding to effect his editing-in-the-camera approach, and provided instruction to chorus girls on a blackboard, which he used to illustrate the formations they were to achieve.

Returning from war, Berkeley found work as a stage actor. His first role was directed by John Cromwell, with Gertrude serving as his dramatic coach. He soon graduated to direction and choreography, and in 1929 he became the first man on Broadway to direct a musical for which he also staged the dance numbers, setting a precedent for such talents as Jerome Robbins, Gower Champion, Bob Fosse, and Tommy Tune. When Samuel Goldwyn invited him to Hollywood in 1930 as a dance director, however, that Broadway division of labor remained in effect. Berkeley had to wait until Gold Diggers of 1935 before being allowed to do both jobs on the same film.

From 1933 through 1939 Berkeley worked for Warner Bros., where he created a series of dance numbers which individually and collectively represent much of the best Hollywood product of the period. An examination of his work in this period in relation to the Production Code and the developing conventions of the musical genre illustrates his unique contribution to cinema.

Boy/girl romance and the success story were standard narrative ingredients of 1930s musicals, and Berkeley’s work contributed significantly to the formulation of these conventions. Where he was unique was in his visualization of the onstage as opposed to the backstage segments of these dramas. Relying on his war service, he began to fashion onstage spectacles which had been impossible to perform on the Broadway stage. In his films he was able to explode any notion of the limitations of a proscenium and the relationship of the theatre spectator to it: the fixed perspective of that audience was abandoned for one which lacked defined spatial or temporal coordinates. His camera was regularly mounted on a crane (or on the monorail he invented) and swooped over and around or toward and away from performers in a style of choreography for camera which was more elaborate than that mapped out for the dancers. Amusingly, he generally reversed this procedure in his direction of non-musical scenes; he typically made the backstage dramas appear confined within a stage space and bound to the traditions of theatrical staging and dialogue.

As Berkeley created the illusion of theatre in his musical numbers, so too he created the illusion of dance. Having never studied dance, he rarely relied on trained dancers. Instead, he preferred to create movement through cinematic rather than choreographic means. Occasionally, when he included sophisticated dance routines, such as in the Lullaby of Broadway number from Gold Diggers of 1935, he highlighted the dancers’ virtuosity in a series of shots which preserved the integrity of their movement without infringing on the stylistic nuances of his camerawork.

The virtuosity of Berkeley’s camera movement remains important not only for a discussion of aesthetics, but also for understanding the meaning he brought to the depiction of sexual fantasy and spectacle in a period of Hollywood history when the Production Code Administration was keeping close watch over screen morality. Throughout the 1930s, Berkeley’s camera caressed as if involved in foreplay, penetrated space as if seeking sexual gratification, and soared in an approximation of sexual ecstasy. Whether tracking through the legs of a line of chorus girls in 42nd Street, swooping over an undulating vagina-shaped construction of pianos in Gold Diggers of 1935, or caressing gigantic bananas manipulated by scantily clad chorines in The Gang’s All Here, his sexual innuendos were titillating in both their obviousness and seeming naïveté. Berkeley’s ability to inject such visual excitement meant that he was often called upon to rescue a troubled picture by adding one or more extravagantly staged musical numbers.

After leaving Warner Bros. in 1939, Berkeley returned to MGM where, although generally less innovative, his work set precedents for the genre: he directed the first Judy Garland/Mickey Rooney musical, the first Garland/Gene Kelly film, and with his last effort as a director, introduced the team of Gene Kelly and Stanley Donen. Undoubtedly the master director of American musicals in the first decade of sound film and a huge influence on many of the musical talents of succeeding decades, Berkeley worked only occasionally through the 1950s, staging musical numbers for various studios. The last of these was the 1962 MGM film Jumbo. With the nostalgia craze of the late 1960s, Berkeley’s aesthetic was resurrected. In 1971 he triumphantly returned to the Broadway stage, where he directed a revival of the 1920s hit No, No, Nanette, starring his leading lady of the 1930s, Ruby Keeler, herself in retirement for thirty years. That moment was surely the fulfillment of all the success stories he had directed over his long career.

—Doug Tomlinson

BERRI, Claude

Nationality: French. Born: Claude Berel Langmann in Paris, 1 July 1934. Family: Married Anne-Marie Rassam, 1967 (divorced); two sons: Julien and Thomas; brother of writer/editor/production designer Arlette Langmann. Career: Dropped out of school and worked with his parents as a furrier, 1949; began his career as an actor, appearing in roles on stage and screen, early 1950s; formed Renn Productions, his own production company, 1963; formed AMLF-Paris, a distribution company, early 1970s; became founding president of the French Union of Producers-Directors. Awards: Best Live Action Short Subject Academy Award, for Le Poulet, 1965; Berlin International Film Festival C.I.D.A.L.C. Ghandi Award, Berlin International Film Festival Interfilm Award, for Le Vieil homme et l’enfant, 1967, Best Adapted Screenplay British Academy Award, Best Film British Academy Award, for Jean de Florette, 1986. Address: Renn Productions, 10 rue Lincoln, 75008 Paris, France.

Films as Director:

1963 Le Poulet (The Chicken) (short) (+ pr, sc, ro); Les Baisers (Kisses) (episode)
1964 La Chance et l’amour (Luck and Love) (episode)
1967 Le Vieil homme et l’enfant (The Two of Us, Claude, The Old Man and the Boy) (+ co-sc)
1969 Mazel Tov ou le mariage (Marry Me! Marry Me!) (+ pr, sc, ro)
1970 Le Pistonne (The Man with Connections); Le Cinema du papa (Papa’s Movies) (+ ro)
1973 Le Sex Shop (+ sc, ro)
1975 Le Male du siecle (Male of the Century) (+ ro)
1976 La Premiere fois (The First Time) (+ sc)
1977 Un moment d’egarement (In a Wild Moment, One Wild Moment, A Summer Affair)
1979 A nous deux (An Adventure for Two)
1980 Ja vous aime (I Love You All) (+ sc)
1981 Le Maitre d’ecole (The School Master)
1983 Tchao, pantin! (+ sc)
1986 Jean de Florette (+ co-sc); Manon des sources (Manon of the Spring) (+ sc)
1990 Uranus (+ co-sc)
1993 Germinale (+ pr, co-sc)
1997 Lucie Aubrac (+ sc)
1999 La Debandade (+ co-sc, ro)

Other Films:

1953 Le Bon Dieu sans confession (Autant-Lara) (ro)
1954 Le Ble en herbe (Autant-Lara) (ro)
1955 Jeune homme a l’inauguration (French Cancan, Only the French Can) (Renoir) (ro)
1959  J’irai cracher sur vos tombes (I Spit on Your Grave) (Gast) (ro)
1960  Les Bonnes femmes (The Girls) (Chabrol) (ro); La Verite (The Truth) (Clouzot) (ro)
1961  La Bride sur le cou (Only for Love, Please Not Now!) (Aurel, Trop, Vadim) (ro); Janine (Pialat—for TV) (sc)
1962  Les Sept pechés capitaux (The Seven Capital Sins, The Seven Deadly Sins) (de Broca, Chabrol, Demy, Dhomme, Godard, Molinari, Vadim) (ro)
1964  Behold a Pale Horse (Zinnemann) (ro)
1966  La Ligne de demarcation (Line of Demarcation) (Chabrol) (ro)
1970  L’Enfance nue (Me, Naked Childhood) (Pialat) (co-pr)
1979  Tess (Polanski) (co-pr)
1980  Inspecteur la Bavure (Zidi) (pr)
1982  Deux heures moins le quart avant Jesus-Christ (Yanne) (co-pr) 1983  L’Africain (The African) (de Broca) (pr); Barzai (Zidi) (pr); L’Homme blessé (Chereau) (ro)
1985  Les Enrages (Glenn) (co-pr)
1987  Hotel de France (Chereau) (pr); Sous le soleil de Satan (Under the Sun of Satan) (Pialat) (ro)
1988  L’Ours (The Bear) (Annaud) (pr); Trois places pour le 26 (Demy) (pr); A gauche en sortant de l’ascenseur (The Door on the Left as You Leave the Elevator) (Molinari) (exec pr)
1989  La Petite veoleuse (The Little Thief) (Miller) (co-pr); Valmont (Forman) (exec pr)
1990  Stan the Flasher (Gainsbourg) (ro)
1991  L’Amant (The Lover) (Annaud) (co-pr)
1994  La Reine Margot (Queen Margot) (Chereau) (pr); La Separation (The Separation) (Vincent) (pr); La Machine (The Machine) (Dupeyron) (ro)
1995  Gazon Maudit (French Twist) (Balasko) (exec pr); Les Trois freres (Bourdon, Campan) (co-pr, ro)
1996  Der Unhold (The Ogre) (Schlondorff) (co-exec pr); Billard a l’etage (Marbeuf—for TV) (exec pr)
1997  Didier (Chabat) (pr); Arlette (Zidi) (pr); Le Pari (Bourdon, Campan) (pr)
1998  Mookie (Palud) (assoc pr); Un grand cri d’amour (Balasko) (ro)
1999  Asterix et Obelix contre Cesar (Asterix and Obelix Take on Caesar) (Zidi) (pr); Mauvaise passe (The Escort, The Wrong Blonde) (Blanc) (pr)

Publications

By BERRI: books—

Marry Me! Marry Me!, New York, 1969

By BERRI: articles—

“Je vous aime,” interview, in Film en Televisie (Brussels), March 1981.

On BERRI: articles—

Solman, G., “Claude Berri,” in Millimeter (Cleveland, Ohio), January 1990.

* * *
Claude Berri started out in the early 1950s as an actor, and for several years appeared in roles on stage and screen. When he realized that stardom would elude him, he turned to writing and directing; however, he remained in front of the camera in many of his earliest films as director-screenwriter. The most representative include Le Vieil homme et l’enfant (The Two of Us), Le Cinema du papa (Papa’s Movies), Mazel Tov ou le mariage (Marry Me! Marry Me!), Le Sex Shop, and Le Male du siecle (Male of the Century). Le Vieil homme et l’enfant, Berri’s debut feature, is set during World War II and chronicles the evolving relationship between a grumpy old anti-Semite and a young Jewish boy. It is a warm-hearted, humanistic allegory, seasoned with an ethnic flavor that reflects Berri’s Polish-Romanian Jewish background and, even more specifically, his own experiences when his parents went into hiding during the Occupation and placed him with a non-Jewish family.

In his subsequent films, the relationships and themes Berri explored were more adult in nature: love and marriage (Mazel Tov ou le mariage); the male preoccupation with sex and pornography (Le Sex Shop; marital jealousy (Le Male du siecle); and connections between parents and offspring (Le Cinema du papa). In each, Berri casts himself as the male lead; that they are at least partially autobiographical is evidenced by the fact that all of Berri’s characters are named “Claude.” Berri’s parents both were employed in the Paris fur district, and in Mazel Tov ou le mariage his character even is a furrier’s son. The manner in which the “Claude” character permeates Berri’s early work parallels Truffaut’s use of Antoine Doinel as a cinematic alter ego. Nonetheless, Berri’s early-career films are fashioned as mainstream entertainments, and so even the best of them do not rate with the works of Truffaut, Godard, Chabrol, or other icons of the French New Wave. Indeed, Berri has admitted that at this stage of his career his primary aim was to amuse, rather than create art.

After a career slump in the late 1970s, Berri came back strong in the following decade with three very different films: Je vous aime (I Love You All), an exploration of romantic connections from a woman’s viewpoint; Le Maître d’école (The School Master), the story of a dedicated schoolteacher; and Tchao, pantin!, a tale of revenge centering on a lonely anti-hero and his response to the murder of a young friend. Then he reached a career summit with Jean de Florette and a sequel, Manon des sources (Manon of the Spring), adapted from Marcel Pagnol’s two-volume novel, The Water of the Hills, which deservedly became major art house hits in the United States. Both are rich and rewarding examples of old-fashioned, back-to-basics storytelling, with colorful, larger-than-life characterizations and fluid, cohesive narratives. Jean de Florette and Manon des sources are linked to Le Vieil homme et l’enfant as films that tell simple, human stories. In this regard, they are links both to Berri’s cinematic roots and the films he scripted and directed in the 1990s.

Jean de Florette is the story of Jean Cadoret, a hunchback who inherits some farmland in Pagnol’s beloved Provence. Jean arrives with his wife and young daughter in tow, and elicits a passion for toiling the earth. His dream is to live peacefully, and eat the vegetables he harvests. Unfortunately, a wily, powerful old landowner named Cesar Soubeyran covets Jean’s property for its hidden resource: a stream. The naive, affable Jean is unaware that this source of water exists on his land; meanwhile, Cesar and his crotchety nephew Ugolin plot to drive him out of the district by concocting a series of deceptions.

The films ends with Jean dead and his little daughter Manon accidentally discovering the deceit. This serves as a segue into Manon des sources, with Manon having grown into a beautiful shepherdess who is like a force of nature. Yet she also is awaiting the right moment to avenge her father.

Jean de Florette and Manon des sources lyrically capture the eb and flow of life while reflecting on living and dying, the passage of time, and survival. Both mirror the nature of pettiness and greed, and how they may cause unnecessary, irrevocable pain; they spotlight the simple reality that one person’s fortune may be another’s catastrophe. If Jean de Florette details the anguish of an innocent man who savors life and meets an early end because of his neighbors’ avarice, Manon des sources chronicles how those villains are not allowed peace. Despite the ambitious themes explored by Berri in his subsequent films, Jean de Florette and Manon des sources remain the bellwethers of his career.

Uranus, Berri’s first release of the 1990s, is a contemplative chronicle of the interaction between the citizens, among them collaborators, resistance members, and those in between, in a small French town at the end of World War II. Here, Berri returns to the approximate time period of Le Vieil homme et l’enfant. He does the same while focusing on romantic heroism in Lucie Aubrac, the based-on-fact account of husband-and-wife members of the French Resistance. While all three films succeed as vivid depictions of life in France during the war, Uranus and Lucie Aubrac offer Berri’s take on the manner in which individual Frenchmen and women responded to the chaos of the time. Finally, Germinal, based on the Emile Zola novel, is epic in scope, a sobering, carefully detailed expose of the exploitation of French coal miners in the late 19th century. The film is linked to Jean de Florette and Manon des sources as a humanistic exploration of the manner in which individuals are manipulated by greater forces of evil.

In the early 1960s, Berri established his own production company; a decade later, he was involved in the formation of a distribution company. Over the years he has produced, co-produced, and distributed scores of films. He has been equally involved in the backing of commercial and non-commercial properties, and such classics as Eric Rohmer’s Ma Nuit chez Maud (My Night at Maud’s) and Jacques Rivette’s Celine et Julie vont en bateau (Celine and Julie Go Boating). Most often, he has worked over and over with the same filmmakers, including Maurice Pialat, Claude Zidi, Patrice Chereau, and Josiane Balasko.

—Rob Edelman

BERTOLUCCI, Bernardo

Nationality: Italian. Born: Parma, Italy, 16 March 1940. Education: Attended University of Rome, 1960–62. Family: Married 1) Clare Peptoe, 1978; 2) Adriana Asti. Career: Assistant director on Accattone (Pasolini), 1961; directed first feature, La commare secca, 1962; joined Italian Communist Party (PCI), late 1960s. Awards: Special Award, Cannes Festival, for Prima della revolution, 1964; Best Director Award, National Society of Film Critics, for Il conformista, 1971; Oscars for Best Director and Best Screenplay, and Directors Guild of America Award for Outstanding Feature Film Achievement, for The Last Emperor, 1987. Address: via della Lungara 3, Rome 00165, Italy.
Films as Director:

1962  La commare secca (The Grim Reaper) (+ sc)
1964  Prima della rivoluzione (Before the Revolution) (+ co-sc)
1965/66  La vie del Petrolio (+ sc); Il canale (+ sc)
1966/67  Ballata de un milliardo (+ co-sc)
1967  "Il fico infruttuoso" episode of Amore e rabbia (Vangelo ’70; Love and Anger) (+ sc)
1968  Partner (+ co-sc)
1969  La strategia del ragno (The Spider’s Stratagem) (+ co-sc)
1970  Il conformista (The Conformist) (+ sc)
1971  La saluta e malato o I poveri muorioro prima (La Sante est malade ou Les Paupères meurent les premiers) (+ sc); L’inchiesa (+ co-sc)
1972  Last Tango in Paris (Le Dernier Tango à Paris; Ultimo tango a Parigi) (+ co-sc)
1976  1900 (Novecento) (presented in two parts in Italy: Novecento atto I and Novecento atto II) (+ co-sc)
1979  La luna (+ co-sc)
1981  La tragedia di un uomo ridicolo (La Tragedie d’un homme ridicule; The Tragedy of a Ridiculous Man) (+ sc)
1987  The Last Emperor (+co-sc)
1990  The Sheltering Sky (+co-sc)
1994  Little Buddha
1996  Stealing Beauty (+co-sc)
1998  Besieged (+co-sc)
1999  Paradiso e inferno

Other Films:

1961  Accatone (Pasolini) (asst-d)
1967  C’era una volta il West (Once upon a Time in the West) (Leone) (co-sc)
1975  Bertolucci secondo il cinema (The Cinema according to Bertolucci) (Amelio, Giuseppe Bertolucci) (as himself)
1981  Wie de Waarheid Zegt Moet Dood (Whoever Says the Truth Shall Die) (Bregstein) (as himself)
1992  Golem, l’esprit de l’exil (Golem, the Spirit of the Exile) (Gitai) (as Master of the Courtyard)
1993  Jean Renoir (Thompson) (doc) (as himself); De Domeinen Ditvoorst (The Ditvoorst Domains) (Hoffman)
1994  La Vera vita di Antonio (The True Life of Antonio H.) (Monteleone) (as himself)

Publications

By BERTOLUCCI: books—

By BERTOLUCCI: articles—

“A Conversation with Bernardo Bertolucci,” with John Bragin, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1966.

Interview with Amos Vogel, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.

“Films Are Animal Events,” interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Autumn 1975.

Interview with D. Buckley and others, in Cineaste (New York), Winter 1976/77.

“History Lessons,” interview with D. Young, in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1977.

Interview with G. Graziani, in Filmcritica (Florence), February/March 1983.

“‘After the Revolution? A Conversation with Bernardo Bertolucci,’” by D. Lavin, in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1984.

Interview about Pasolini, in Cinema e Cinema (Rome), May/August 1985.

Article in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1987.

Interview with Bram Crols and Marcel Meeus, in Film en Televisie (Brussels), July 1996.

On BERTOLUCCI: articles—

Lopez, D., “The Father Figure in The Conformist and in Last Tango in Paris,” in Film Heritage (New York), Summer 1976.

Horton, A., “History as Myth and Myth as History in Bertolucci’s 1900,” in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), February 1980.

Article in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1989.

Burgoyne, Robert, “The Somatization of History in Bertolucci’s 1900,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1986.

Loshitzky, Yosefa, “‘Memory of My Own Memory’: Processes of Private and Collective Remembering in Bertolucci’s The Spider’s Stratagem and The Conformist,” in History and Memory, vol. 3, no. 2, 1991.

At the age of twenty-one, Bernardo Bertolucci established himself as a major artist in two distinct art forms, winning a prestigious award in poetry and receiving high critical acclaim for his initial film, La commare secca. This combination of talents is evident in all of his films, which have a lyric but exceptionally concrete style. His father, Attilio Bertolucci, was famous in his own right as a critic, professor, and poet, and in 1961 introduced Bernardo to Pier Paolo Pasolini, an esteemed literary figure. This friendship led both writers, ironically, away from poetry and into the cinema. Serving as the assistant director on Pasolini's inaugural film, Accattone, Bertolucci was very quickly entrusted with the full direction of Pasolini's next project, La commare secca, based on a story by the writer.

La commare secca is an auspicious debut; as both screenwriter and director, Bertolucci found at once the high visual style and narrative complexity which distinguish his later films. The sex murder of a prostitute is its central narrative event; as the probable witnesses and suspects are brought in for questioning, a series of lives are unraveled, with each sad story winding toward the city park where the murder occurred. Formally, the film is an ambitious amalgam of a film noir and poet, and in 1961 introduced Bernardo to Pier Paolo Pasolini, an esteemed literary figure. This friendship led both writers, ironically, away from poetry and into the cinema. Serving as the assistant director on Pasolini’s inaugural film, Accattone, Bertolucci was very quickly entrusted with the full direction of Pasolini’s next project, La commare secca, based on a story by the writer.

In Before the Revolution, Bertolucci first presents the theme which will become foremost in his work: the conflict between freedom and conformity. Fabrizio, the leading character, is obliged to decide between radical political commitment and an alluring marriage into the bourgeoisie. In this reworking of Stendhal’s The Charterhouse of Parma, Bertolucci expressly delineates the connection between politics and sexuality. The film also establishes the Freudian theme of the totemic father, which will recur throughout Bertolucci’s work, here emphasized in the figure of Fabrizio’s communist mentor, whom Fabrizio must renounce as a precondition to his entry into moneysociety.

Bertolucci diverged from the style of his first two critically successful films with The Partner, a complex, experimental work based on Dostoevski’s The Double. Heavily influenced by the films of Godard and the events of May 1968, it eschews narrative exposition, developing instead a critique of literary consumerism, academic pacifism, and the student left, through a series of polemical debates between a bookish student and his radical double. For the most part The Partner is an anomalous film, which conveys very little of the heightened lyricism of his major works.

With The Spider’s Stratagem, originally made for television in 1969, and The Conformist, Bertolucci combines an experimental narrative technique with lavish visual design, achieving in The Conformist an unprecedented commercial and critical triumph. Sexuality is here explicitly posited as the motor of political allegiance, as Marcello, the lead character in The Conformist, becomes a Fascist in order to suppress his growing recognition of his homosexuality. The character performs an outlandishly deviant act—killing his former professor, now a member of the Resistance, in order to declare his own conventionality and membership in the Fascist order. Conformity and rebellion are thus folded together, not only in the psyche of Marcello, but in the culture as a whole, as Bertolucci examines the interpenetrating structures, the twin pathologies, of family and politics. Bertolucci here unveils the full range of stylistic features—the elaborate tracking shots, the opulent color photography (realized by the virtuoso cinematographer Vittorio Storaro), the odd, surrealistic visual incongruities—that give his work such a distinctive surface. It is here, also, that Bertolucci connects most directly with the general evolution of the postwar Italian cinema. Beginning with Visconti, and continuing with Antonioni and Belloccchio, an increasing emphasis is placed on the psychology of transgression, a motif which links politics and the libido. The inner life of the alienated protagonist becomes the lens displaying the spectrum of social forces, as the politics of the state are viewed in the mimetic behavior of disturbed individuals.

Last Tango in Paris depicts the last week in the life of Paul, played by Marlon Brando, as a man who is both geographically and spiritually in exile. His orbit crosses that of “the girl,” played by Maria Schneider. The raw sexual encounters that ensue serve as a kind of purgation for the Brando character, who retaliates against the hypocrisies of cultural institutions such as family, church, and state through the medium of Jeanne’s body. Sex is used as a weapon and symbolic cure, apparatus of social constraints. The outsized human passion Bertolucci depicts, chieflly through the threatening figure of Marlon Brando, seems instead to literalize the filmmaker’s comment that “films are animal events.” In addition to the players, the music by Gatto Barbieri and the cinematography of Vittorio Storaro contribute to the febrile intensity of the work.

The world acclaim brought by Last Tango assured Bertolucci of the financial resources to complete the long-planned Marxian epic, 1900. Setting the film in the rural areas of Parma, a few miles from his childhood home, Bertolucci set out to compose a paean to a way of life that was passing—the “culture of the land” of the peasant farmers, seen as a native and pure form of communism. The film depicts the cruel historical awakening of the farmers of the region, part of an entire class that has been regularly brutalized, first by aristocratic landowners, and then by the Fascist regime. Bertolucci localizes this conflict in the twin destinies of two characters born on the same day in 1900—Olmo, who becomes a peasant leader, and Alfredo, the scion of the feudal estate in which the film takes place.

The controversial work was released in a six-hour form in Europe, and shortened to three hours for American release. Bertolucci had complete control of the cutting of the film, and considers the shorter version a more finished work. The epic sweep remains, as do the contradictions—for the film amalgamates the most divergent elements: a Marxian epic, it is furnished with an international star cast; a portrait of the indigenous peasantry, its principle language is English. Intentionally fashioned for wide commercial appeal, it nonetheless broaches untied subject matter. The film keeps these elements in suspension, never dissolving these differences into an ideological portrait of life “after the revolution.” The film’s ending seems instead to return to the customary balance and tension between historical forces and class interests.

In Luna, Bertolucci turns to a much more intimate subject: the relation between mother and son. The work has a diminutive scale but a passionate focus, a quality crystallized in the opera scenes in which the mother, Caterina, performs. The reconciliation of mother, son, and father occurs during a rehearsal in which the mother reveals, through song, the identity of father and son. This cathartic and bravura scene plays in high relief the characteristic patterns of Bertolucci’s cinema, in which the family drama is played against the backdrop of a ritualized art form, opera in this case, dance in Last Tango, and theater (the Macbeth scene in Before the Revolution).

With Tragedy of a Ridiculous Man, Bertolucci continues his inquiry into the relations between politics and family life, here framing the ambivalent bond between father and son with the correlative conflict between capitalism and political terror.

Bertolucci returned to the wide canvas of the historical film with The Last Emperor in 1987. Frustrated by his inability to acquire financing for a film of the Dashiell Hammett story Red Harvest, and unhappy with the state of filmmaking in Italy, the director turned to the autobiography of Pu Yi, China’s last emperor, and had the privilege not only of filming in China but also of filming in the Forbidden City in Beijing, the first time such access had been allowed.

The story of Pu Yi illustrates a striking change in the political focus of Bertolucci’s filmmaking. The relationship between individual psychology and the political and historical forces that mold it remains, as before, the central subject of the film, linking it to works such as Before the Revolution, The Conformist, and 1900. But the resolution of the film seems to take place outside the political and historical context. The transformation of Pu Yi, in Bertolucci’s words, from “a dragon to a butterfly,” occurs only in the context of individual friendship. In depicting the rise and fall of imperialism, republicanism, and fascism, and ending the film with a portrayal of the harsh excesses of the Cultural Revolution, Bertolucci depicts a sequence of destructive political “solutions” that somehow clear the way for the journey of the main character from “darkness to light.”

Following The Last Emperor, Bertolucci continued his exploration of non-Western cultures with The Sheltering Sky and Little Buddha, opening his work to existential and philosophical themes that would almost seem to defy dramatic expression. In The Sheltering Sky, Bertolucci fashions a disturbing portrait of a consciousness in search of its own annihilation. Drawn from the Paul Bowles novel of the same title, the film, in its first half, focuses on the pathos of a couple who adore each other but cannot be happy, on the difficulty of romantic love. The work centers on the willful isolation and self-loathing of the character Porter, who has traveled to Morocco in 1947 with his wife Kit and a friend, Tunner, in order to escape the bitter sense of his own emptiness and artistic impotence. Like the character Paul in Last Tango in Paris, Porter is a dangerous and mesmerizing character whose self-absorption creates a kind of vortex which draws others down with him. As the two main characters, Port and Kit, push deeper into the Sahara, the physical hardships they encounter seem more and more like rites of purgation, as if only the heat and dirt of the desert could wear down the various masks and poses that they continually display to each other. Port dies a horrifying death from typhus, revealing the depths of his love for Kit only as the curtain descends. Kit, cast adrift deep in Morocco, hitches up with a caravan of Tuareg nomads and allows the remains of her Western identity to dissolve; she becomes the lover of the leader of the caravan, her Western clothes are buried in the desert, and she enters his harem disguised as a boy, dressed in the indigo robes, turban, and sword of a Tuareg tribesman. In a sense, Kit becomes possessed by Porter’s spirit, his taste for uncharted experience, without, however, assuming his arrogance or corrosive unhappiness. Kit’s story, which Bertoucci poetically links with the phases of the moon and nocturnal shades of blue, becomes dream-like, a carnal utopia of full and expressive passion in which she submerges her identity and becomes whole, albeit temporarily.

The Sheltering Sky has much in common with Bertolucci’s earlier films, particularly Last Tango in Paris; as Bertolucci says in an interview, “Isn’t the empty flat of Last Tango a kind of desert and isn’t the desert an empty flat?” By filming in North Africa, however, Bertolucci allows the landscape to provide a kind of silent commentary on the doomed protagonists, whose profound unhappiness is made more piercing by the almost cosmic scale of the environment. The film abounds in visual ideas, finding in the mountain overlooks, wind-blown expanses, and fly-infested outposts a kind of encompassing dimension comparable to the role played by history in other Bertolucci films. Here, cinematographer Vittorio Storaro composes scenes around the division of color temperatures associated with the two main characters, red and blue, in ways that accentuate their irreconcilability. Exceptional acting by John Malkovich and Debra Winger gives The Sheltering Sky a sense of emotional truth that stays with the spectator, like the tattoos on fingers and feet that Kit receives in the deepest Sahara.

Little Buddha, released in 1994, completes what Bertolucci has called his Eastern trilogy. Although it shares the exoticism and the chromatic richness of The Last Emperor and The Sheltering Sky, Little Buddha is a sharp departure from its predecessors. It is, Bertolucci has said, a story without dramatic conflicts, a story in which the dualism and division that animates his other films is resolved into a kind of harmonious unity. Weaving together the ancient tale of Siddartha and his quest for enlightenment with a contemporary story of an eight-year-old American boy who may be the reincarnation of a famous Buddhist master, the film aims for a simplicity of tone and address that could be understood and appreciated by children: indeed, Bertolucci has called Little Buddha a film for children, arguing that when it comes to Buddhism, everyone in the Western world is a child.

Little Buddha features a striking visual style, marked by heightened color abstraction. Vittorio Storaro, Bertolucci’s cinematographer for all his films except one, has said in an interview that Little Buddha represents the culmination of his exploration into light, and that it may be a film that is “impossible to go beyond.” The painterly style of Little Buddha is keyed not only to the contrast between the blue tonality of Seattle and the red and gold of the Siddartha story, but also to the four elements and the movement of the celestial spheres. When Siddartha achieves enlightenment under the banyan tree after staving off temptation and fear, harmony and balance are signified by the simultaneous appearance of the sun and the moon in the sky, and by the balanced color temperature of the sequence. In his career-long work with Bertolucci, Storaro has progressed from an exploration of light and shadow, to an exploration of the contrast of colors within light, to an exploration of the harmony within the spectrum.

The fascinating sequences of Siddartha’s journey to enlightenment have a distinctly magical, storybook quality, a tone that is achieved partly by filming these scenes in 65 millimeter. The precision and detail that sets these sequences apart gives them the quality of an illuminated manuscript, or of a dazzling storybook of hand-colored pages. Also important here is the acting of Keanu Reeves, who embodies the part of a beautiful youth determined to find the true value of life. The slightly unformed, open innocence of Reeves’ Siddartha is perfectly attuned to the enchanted vision of this benevolent film, which discovers in a tale of reincarnation a kind of dispensation from the drama of political and sexual conflict that defined Bertolucci’s filmmaking to this point.

Stealing Beauty, the story of a young girl’s sexual awakening, is a small-scale, intimate film that marks a departure from the spectacular, exotic subject matter of the “oriental trilogy” of The Last Emperor, The Sheltering Sky, and Little Buddha. Returning to Italy to make a film there for the first time in more than ten years, Bertolucci set aside the elaborate cinematography and the opulent design for which he had become famous in favor of a more subdued and unstudied style. A story of a young American girl (played by Liv Tyler) who returns to the villa in Tuscany, still populated by artists and bohemians, where her mother had once lived and reigned as the beautiful muse and poet of the group, Stealing Beauty gradually unfolds as the story of the girl’s search for her unknown father, a quest that coincides with her first experience of sexual love. Bertolucci has said that he felt he needed to approach Italy with new eyes, with the eyes of a foreigner, after all the changes that the country had gone through after the 1980s, and that he had in effect “reincarnated himself as a young 19 year old American girl” in this film.

Here, the director composes a light, Mozart-like variation on themes he has considered in highly dramatic terms before: the search for the father, the passing of one generation and the advent of another, the dangerous power of erotic attraction. Although Stealing Beauty possesses sobering elements, such as the imminent death of the playwright played by Jeremy Irons, the brooding restlessness of the sculptor played by Donal McCann, and the intermittent madness of the character played by the 85-year-old Jean Marais—perhaps best known for his role in Jean Cocteau’s Beauty and the Beast—the overall effect of this subtle, observant film is that of a movie, as Bertolucci says, that “weighs only a few grams.” The title of the film, the director says, comes from the idea that the artist is always “stealing beauty,” using the beauty of the world for his or her subject matter, drawing from it for inspiration. By setting the film in Tuscany, in a landscape that has inspired painters from Giotto onwards, Bertolucci Bertolucci offers a here a quiet meditation on art and life.

In his next film, Beseiged, Bertolucci continues this style of oblique, subtle filmmaking whose greatest power is in its observation of the unpredictability of human behavior. Set again in Italy, this time in Rome, Beseiged is the story of a young African woman (played by Thandie Newton), who has fled to Rome after her husband has been arrested by the military dictatorship in her country. While pursuing her studies toward a medical degree, she works as the live-in housekeeper for a reclusive English pianist (played by David Thewlis). He immediately falls in love with her, which he declares in a series of awkward, tentative, and ultimately assertive gestures that infuriate her. Finally, she tells him that if he really loves her he will try to get her husband out of jail. Surprisingly, he takes her at her word, and begins selling the objects in his apartment to raise money. He also begins incorporating African styles and musical ideas in his compositions. As the apartment becomes more and more bare, she mentions that there is not much left to dust, never suspecting the reasons for his selling most of his material possessions. She also begins to be increasingly fond of him, as he becomes more and more certain, assured, and mysterious. Finally, after giving a last concert in his apartment to his friends and colleagues (who consist only of his young music students), he sells his grand piano and wins her husband’s release.

Beseiged proceeds with very little dialogue — Bertolucci says that he had in mind a line from Cocteau: “There is no love, there are only proofs of love”—a line which he had used in Stealing Beauty and which he saw as a leitmotif for this film: “it’s easy to say ‘I love you,’ it’s more difficult to give proof, proofs of love. Beseiged is about that.” He also says an idea that grew naturally out of the film was that the only way of being truly happy is making happy the people you love. Thus Kinsky, the pianist, finds joy in giving up everything, including his beloved piano—without Shandurai, the African woman, ever knowing his reason for doing so. In several ways, Beseiged presents the reverse side of the coin of Last Tango in Paris, also a film about a man and a woman in a bare apartment. In Last Tango, Bertolucci set out to show, as he said at the time, that “every sexual relationship is condemned.” In Beseiged, the love between Kinsky and Shandurai develops along the opposite arc, from possessive desire to relinquishment, or, as the director says, toward the “total annihilation of selfishness.”

The absence of dialogue in the film, in which emotions and messages are communicated through gesture, music, and movement, recalls the cinema of Rene Clair, who in films like Under the Roofs of Paris would have dialogue fade out and music carry the conversation. Bertolucci has also said that the absence of dialogue in the film came partially from his thinking about where the cinema was going, and how much the cinema should incorporate new technologies. He decided that in Beseiged he would go back to the origins, to the silent cinema before 1927, when feelings were communicated uniquely through images and music. Made originally for Italian television, Beseiged gave Bertolucci a chance to rediscover a kind of spontaneity in filmmaking, a feeling he had lost because of the size and scope of his productions of the last fifteen years. Here, he was able to create twenty or thirty shots in a day’s shooting, to mix handheld, steadicam, and tracking shots together, and not to worry overly much about light and shadow. “It was like going back to the ’60’s, to the old times when there wasn’t so much pressure... to go back to that feeling was extraordinary... incredibly stimulating.”

—Robert Burgoyne

BESSON, Luc

Luc Besson

Films as Director:

1983  L'Avant dernier (short) (+ pr)
1983  Le Dernier Combat (+ pr, sc)
1985  Subway (+ pr, sc)
1987  Kamikaze (co-d with Didier Grousset, + pr)
1988  Le Grand bleu (The Big Blue) (+ sc, lyrics, camera op, submarine crew)
1990  La Femme Nikita (Nikita) (+ sc, song)
1991  Atlantis (+ ph, ed)
1995  The Professional (Leont) (+ sc)
1997  The Fifth Element (+ co-sc)
1999  The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1985  Le Grand Carnaval (Arcady) (2nd unit d)
1986  Taxi Boy (Page) (tech advisor)
1993  Point of No Return (Badham) (based on La Femme Nikita sc)
1997  Nil by Mouth (Oldman) (pr)
1998  Taxi (Pirès) (sc, pr)
2000  Taxi 2 (Krawczyk) (sc, pr); The Dancer (Garson) (pr)

Publications

By Besson: articles—

On BESSON: book—

On BESSON: articles—

Caron, A., “Pour quelques Besson de plus!,” in Sequences (Montreal), September 1990.

Murray, S., “‘European Notes,’” in Cinema Papers (Victoria, Australia), August 1990.

Pezzotta, A., “‘Atlantis,’” in Segnocinema (Vicenza, Italy), May/June 1992.

Slaby, Petr, “‘Neobarokni intermezzo,’” in Film a Doba (Prague), Spring-Summer 1996.

Williamson, K., “‘Imbessonism,’” in Box Office (Chicago), July 1997.

Cosulich, O., “‘Quando il futuro diventa cult,’” in Revista del Cinematografo (Rome), October 1997.

Martani, M., “‘Nouvelles images,’” in Cineforum (Bergamo, Italy), October 1997.

* * *

Most noted for their stunning visuals, Luc Besson’s films often invite scrutiny of the blurred line between the artistic and the commercial. Making his directorial debut with Le Dernier Combat, Besson’s beautifully executed black-and-white cinematography earned him a chance to make his first major feature, Subway, a film described by Michael Wilmington as “Steven Spielberg gone existentialist.” Shot mostly at Beverly Center Cineplex, Subway creates an underground world of the Paris Metro, both eerie in its fluorescent darkness and charming in the interweaving of fast-paced editing and charismatic characters. A seemingly complex narrative of three separate strands is treated with a simplenledness that makes it almost comic-book-like. It is at its best a skillful show of light and shadows, and at worst a flashy skeleton of a film that befits its inhabitants.

The Big Blue, Besson’s third film, was a tremendous box office hit at home but a failure internationally. A breathtakingly filmed story about the lifetime friendship and rivalry between Jacques and Enzo, two free-divers, and their relationship with an American journalist (played by Rosanna Arquette), The Big Blue entangles too many elements at once to make sense. Jacques’ mysterious bond with the ocean, as emphasized time and again by his ties with dolphins—it is no coincidence that Besson’s production company in France is called Les Films du Dolphin—never goes beyond a pretentious justification for the showy underwater photography. The American journalist Joanna’s fascination with Jacques, on the other hand, also never once sparks any romantic fulfillment. It is Jacques’ peculiar friend, Enzo (played by Jean Reno, who later stars in The Professional), who anchors the film with his stocky roundness and almost laughable yet respectable stubbornness.

Produced by the Samuel Goldwyn Company, La Femme Nikita returns to cityscapes and paints a bizarre picture of a female hitperson, working for the French equivalent of the CIA. Ultra-violence adorned with a triangular romance and spy-thriller suspense, Nikita seems to be the most Interesting of Besson’s films; or, at least, its complexity stems neither from the semi-hallucinatory ambiance in Subway nor the pretentious mysticism in The Big Blue, but rather from an uncanny interest and concern that develop in the viewer about Nikita. The character, proclaims Stanley Kauffmann, is “so interesting a wanderer between stages of moral consciousness that violence becomes one of the film’s essentials.” A genuine interest in her psychology provides the emotional depth that was lacking in Besson’s previous works.

In The Professional, Besson continues his psychological study of marginalized, on-the-edge individuals: this time, a hitman. Leon, played by Jean Reno, is the “‘Cleaner,’” New York’s top hitman. He is never emotional; or better yet, as a professional, he never allows himself to be emotional. Through some inopportune circumstances he meets the twelve-year-old Mathilda (played convincingly by Natalie Portman). In her attempt to be trained as a hitperson in order to avenge her parents’ murder, the process of Mathilda’s makeover is in fact a vehicle for exploring the relationship between this odd couple. Walking the thin line between the innocent affection of a man and a child bonding (as in Paper Moon) and a portrayal of a potentially pedophilic liaison, Besson’s incisive direction turns the film from a cliched story into an almost lyrical character study.

The last of Besson’s 1990s features, The Messenger: The Story of Joan of Arc, is a muddled reworking of the Joan of Arc story, with the title character lacking any sort of psychology and becoming little more than an adolescent action heroine. The Messenger was preceded by the visually dazzling but otherwise annoyingly uneven The Fifth Element. If this futuristic epic, most of which is set in the mid-23rd-century, seemed to be little more than a comic book come-to-life, that is understandable; Besson wrote the first draft of its script when he was sixteen years old. His scenario features two primary male characters, one a reluctant hero and the other an over-the-top villain, and a female who is an adolescent male fantasy figure: a near-nude, orange-haired nymphet. Unfortunately, the storyline in which they are involved is incoherent—but the film, produced on a $90-million budget, is worth seeing for its truly inventive production design.

One certainly would welcome the maturing of a director like Luc Besson, whose natural knack for cinematographic beauty has occasionally been enriched with some psychological depth. Going beyond the flashiness, Besson has shown a high potential for artistry, one that goes into the visibility of the imagistic world and actually strives for meanings. But questions still remain: what is it that we seek in cinema (a medium that is first and foremost visual) other than the visuals?

—Guo-Juin Hong, updated by Rob Edelman

BIGELOW, Kathryn

Films as Director:

1978 The Set-Up
1983 The Loveless (Breakdown) (with Monty Montgomery, + sc)
1987 Near Dark (+ sc)
1990 Blue Steel (+ sc)
1991 Point Break (+ sc [uncredited])
1995 Strange Days
2000 The Weight of Water

Other Films:

1983 Born in Flames (Borden) (ed)
1994 American Cinema (for TV) (ro as herself)
1996 Undertow (Red) (sc)

Publications

By BIGELOW: articles—

Interview with Elvis Mitchell, in Interview (New York), March 1990.
“Momentum and Design,” interview with Gavin Smith, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1995.
“Big Bad Bigelow,” interview with Graham Fuller, in Interview (New York), November 1995.
“Hppy New Millennium,” interview with Roald Rynning, in Film Review (London), April 1996.

On BIGELOW: books—

On BIGELOW: articles—

James, Nick, “From Style to Steel,” in City Limits (London), 29 November 1990.
Murphy, Kathleen, “Black Arts,” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1995.

* * *
Almost single-handed, Kathryn Bigelow has lastingly scotched the assumption that the terms “woman director” and “action movie” are somehow incompatible. So far, no other female director has shown herself so adept at handling the intricate ballets of stylised violence that constitute the modern Hollywood action genre. But it may not be a coincidence that Bigelow’s career, which until the mid-1990s was riding high, got stopped in its tracks by one ambitious picture that proved a commercial flop. Most male action directors can get away with a single box-office dud, or even two; but it seems that a woman who trespasses on such classically all-male territory can’t expect the same latitude.

Not that Bigelow has ever been content to produce routine rollercoaster exercises; she translates the conventions of the genre, bending and blending them into fertile new mutations. Her first feature, The Loveless (co-directed with Monty Montgomery), put a dreamy Sirkian spin on the standard biker movie. Near Dark is a vampire western; Blue Steel laces a cop drama with horror film devices; Point Break crosses a surfing movie with a heist thriller. For Strange Days Bigelow mixed an even richer cocktail: sci-fi plus love story plus political satire plus murder mystery. Her films, though vigorously paced and tinged with ironic humour, are shot through with a dark romanticism; and by delving deeper into formal, psychological, and thematic patterns than mainstream Hollywood generally cares to, they lift their material some way towards the condition of arthouse fare.

Though Bigelow avowedly aims at a mass audience, the moral and aesthetic complexity of her films has kept her a slightly marginal figure in the industry. This status may be reflected in her choice of protagonist: for her, as three decades earlier for Arthur Penn, “a society has its mirror in its outcasts.” The black-leather bikers of The Loveless, the nomadic vampire clan of Near Dark, the surfing bankrobbers of Point Break, all defined by their opposition to conventional mores, represent an alternative darkside structure, respectable society’s hidden needs and appetites made manifest. A local citizen, gazing fascinated at the bikers’ remote otherness, fantasises about “be[ing] them for a day or two”; while Bodhi, leader of the surfboard criminals, even claims their heist exploits are meant to inspire the downtrodden masses. “We show them that the human spirit is still alive!” he exults.

Bigelow’s artistic training—prior to becoming a film-maker, she was active as a conceptual artist, a member of the Art and Language group in the ultra-politicised New York art scene—shows in the stylised and highly textured look of her films. Her images are tactile, often sensual to the point of fetishism: in the opening shot of Blue Steel, light caresses the contours of a handgun in extreme close-up, transforming it into an abstract study of curves and shadows. This close-grained visual intensity becomes another means of subverting and reappropriating generic material, turning it to her own ends, while her dark, nihilistic plots serve as prelude to soft-edged, sentimental denouements where love conquers all. Not least of the contradictions that fuel her work is that, while not shying away from graphic incidents of violence against women—the rape scene in Strange Days caused widespread shock—her films often feature women as the strongest, most focused characters, acting as mentors and protectors to the self-doubting males.

In her early films Bigelow played these various tensions off against each other, deftly maintaining a balance between mainstream and ‘serious’ audience appeal. With Strange Days the strategy came unstuck. She herself describes the film as ‘‘the ultimate Rorschach,’’ an artefact lending itself to as many interpretations as it has viewers. Drawing its inspiration from an eclectic multiplicity of sources—Hawks, Hitchcock, and Ridley Scott, cyberpunk fiction, and Michael Powell’s Peeping Tom—the film torments and probes us, forcing us to question not only what we’re seeing but our own motives in wanting to watch it.

In creating such an intricate, demanding collage, inviting simultaneous engagement on any number of levels, Bigelow may have outpaced her public. Many reviewers raved over Strange Days (though there were dissenting voices), but the film stalled badly at the box-office, failing to recoup its substantial budget. Since then her career has suffered: Ohio, a projected film about the 1970 Kent State shootings, came to nothing, and her long-cherished Joan of Arc project to give us a fresh take on the woman who, in all history, most wanted to watch it.

It’s a deplorable loss. Few directors could have been better placed to give us a fresh take on the woman who, in all history, most famously trespassed on male territory. It remains to be seen if Bigelow’s The Weight of Water, a maritime murder thriller and her first feature in five years, restores the status of one of the most original and stimulating of current American film-makers.

—Philip Kemp

BIRRI, Fernando

Nationality: Argentinian. Born: In Santa Fe, 13 March 1925. Education: Universidad Nacional del Litoral, Santa Fe, Argentina, 1942–47; and at Centro Sperimentale de Cinematografia, Rome, 1950–52. Career: Assistant to Vittorio De Sica on Il tetto, 1954; returned to Argentina to found Instituto de Cinematografia, later La Escuela Documental de Santa Fe, 1956; left Argentina for political reasons, 1963; moved to Italy, 1964; attended 1st International Festival of the New Latin American Cinema, Havana, 1979; taught at Universidad Nacional Autonoma de Mexico, 1980, and at Film School of Universidad de Los Andes, Merida, Venezuela, 1980–83. Director of International School of Cinema and TV of San Antonio de Los Banos, 1983—. Awards: Grand Prize, SODRE Festival, Montevideo, for Tire Die, 1960; Golden Lion, Venice Festival, for Los Inundados, 1962; honored at Festivals in Benalmadena, Spain, 1979, and Pesaro, Italy, 1981.

Films as Director:

1951 Selinunte (short); Alfabeto notturno (short)

1952 Immagini Popolari Siciliane Sacre; Immagini Popolari Siciliane Profane

1959 La primera fundacion de Buenos Aires (animation)

1960 Tire die (Toss Me a Dime) (co-sc, co-d, co-ph); Buenos dias, Buenos Aires (short)

1961 Los inundados (Flooded Out)

1962 Che, Buenos Aires (comprising two previous films); La pampa gringa (doc)

1966 Castagnino, diario romano (short)

1979 Org (co-d)

1983 Rafael Alberti, un retrato del poeta por Fernando Birri

1984 Rte.: Nicaragua (carta al mundo) (short film)

1985 Mi hijo, el Chei: Un retrato de familia de Don Ernesto Guevara

1988 Un senor muy viejo con unas alas enormes (+ a, sc)

1998 Enredando sombras

Other Films:

1955 Gli sbanditi (Maselli) (role)

1982 La Rose des vents (P. Guzman) (role)

1994 Plumitas calientes (Gonzalo De Galiana) (ro as El Angel)

Publications

By BIRRI: book—

By BIRRI: articles—

‘‘Cine y subdesarrollo,’’ in Cine Cubano (Havana), May/July 1967.

‘‘Revolución en la revolución del nuevo cine latinoamericano,’’ in Cine Cubano (Havana), August/December 1968.

‘‘Fernando Birri y las raíces del nuevo cine latinoamericano,’’ an interview with Francisco Lombardi, in Hablemos de Cine (Lima), March 1984.

‘‘Ein Letzter Dominostein,’’ an interview with M. Vosz, in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), March 1991.

On BIRRI: books—

On BIRRI: articles—

“Fernando Birri Section” of Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 100, 1981.

* * *

Fernando Birri is a key figure in the history of the New Latin American Cinema because he was more interested in creating filmmakers than in creating films; because he offered a sustained and systematic counter-example to existing industrial modes of filmmaking and to the ideological assumptions that limited both the process and the product; because he developed a concrete theoretical-practical approach and founded the first school of documentary filmmaking in Latin America in order to teach that methodology; and, finally, because his students fanned out across the continent putting his ideas into practice.

Born in the provincial capital of Santa Fe, Birri was a poet and puppeteer before turning to the cinema in search of a broad popular audience. Unable to break into the tightly controlled national film industry, Birri travelled to Italy to study at Rome’s Centro Sperimentale de Cinematografia during the early 1950s, when the neo-realist movement was still at its height. Profoundly influenced by the ideology, aesthetics, and methodology of this first anti-industrial, anti-Hollywood model for a national cinema, Birri returned to Argentina in 1956 hoping to found a national film school. Rejecting the closed commercialism of the Buenos Aires-based film industry, one of the three largest in Latin America at the time, Birri returned to Santa Fe.

Birri recalls: “Fresh from Europe, what I had in mind was a film school modeled on the Centro Sperimentale, a fictional film school which would train actors, directors, cinematographers, set designers, etc. But when I confronted the actual conditions in Argentina and in Santa Fe, I realized that my plan was premature. What was needed was something else: a school which would not only provide apprenticeship in filmmaking, but also in sociology, and even in Argentine history, geography and politics, because the most essential quest is the quest for national identity, in order to recover and rediscover what had been alienated, distorted and destroyed by centuries of cultural penetration. This search for a national identity is what led me to pose the problem in strictly documentary terms, because I believe that the first step for any national cinema is to document its own reality.”

La Escuela Documental de Santa Fe grew out of the Instituto de Cinematografía, which was in turn an outgrowth of a 4-day seminar on filmmaking led by Birri. Birri’s goal was to lay the foundations for a regional film industry that would be “national, realist, and popular”: national by addressing the most pressing problems of national life; realist (documentary) in approach in contrast to the highly artificial style and milieux of the “official” film industry; popular by focusing on and appealing to the less privileged classes. In keeping with his determination to integrate theory and practice, Birri emphasized process over product, viewing each film project as the opportunity for practical apprenticeship on the part of the largest possible number of students. He was the first of the Latin American filmmakers to posit technical imperfection as a positive attribute, preferring sentido imperfecto a una perfeccion sin sentido (an imperfect/sincere meaning to a meaningless perfection).

Birri’s best-known films are the 33-minute documentary Tire die (Toss Me a Dime) and Los inundados (Flooded Out), a picaresque feature in the neorealist style about the adventures of a squatter family displaced by seasonal floods. Both played to huge and enthusiastic audiences at their local premieres but could not achieve broad national exhibition even after winning important prizes in international festivals.

An inhospitable political climate compelled Birri to leave Argentina in 1963. Subsequent months in São Paulo catalyzed an important documentary movement there, but Birri himself returned to Italy and relative obscurity until the late 1970s. His presence at the First International Festival of the New Latin American Cinema in Havana in 1979 signaled renewed activity and recognition. Since then, Birri has taught at Mexico’s national university and at the University of Los Andes in Venezuela. The Benalmadena and Peso Festival (Spain, 1979, and Italy, 1981) organized special programs honoring his work.

—Julianne Burton

BLIER, Bertrand

Nationality: French. Born: Paris, 14 March 1939. Career: Assistant director on films of Lautner, Christian-Jaque, Delannoy, and others, 1960–63; directed first feature, Hitler? Connais pas!, 1963. Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film, for Preparez vos mouchoirs, 1978; Cesar for the screenplay of Buffet froid, 1979; Special Jury Prize, Cannes Film Festival, for Trop belle pour toi (Too Beautiful for You), 1989.

Films as Director:

1963 Hitler? Connais pas! (+ sc)

1966 La Grimace (+ sc)

1967 Si j’etais un espion (Breakdown; If I Were a Spy) (+ co-sc)
1973 Les Valseuses (Going Places) (+ sc)
1975 Calmos (Femmes Fatales) (+ co-sc)
1977 Preparez vos mouchoirs (Get out Your Handkerchiefs) (+ sc)
1979 Buffet froid (+ sc)
1981 Beau-père (+ sc)
1982 La Femme de mon pote (My Best Friend’s Girl) (+ co-sc)
1984 Notre Histoire (Our Story) (+ sc)
1986 Tenue de soirée (Menage) (+sc)
1989 Trop belle pour toi (Too Beautiful for You) (+sc)
1991 Merci la vie (Thanks, Life) (+ sc, pr)
1993 Un deux trois soleil (One Two Three Sun) (+ sc)
1996 Mon homme (My Man) (+ sc)
2000 Les Acteurs (Actors) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1970 Laisse aller, c’est une valse (Lautner) (sc)
1992 Patrick Dewaere (role as himself)

Publications

By BLIER: books—

By BLIER: articles—

‘Manhandler,’ interview with Dan Yakir, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1986.

Interview in Time Out (London), 14 February 1990.

On BLIER: articles—

‘‘Blier Section,’’ in Cinéma (Paris), July-August 1981.

* * *

Bertrand Blier directs erotic buddy movies featuring men who are exasperated by the opposite sex, who perceive of themselves as macho but are incapable of satisfying the women in their lives. In actuality, his heroes are terrified of feminism, of the ‘‘new woman’’ who demands her right to experience and enjoy orgasm. But Blier’s females are in no way villainesses. They are just elusive—and so alienated that they can only find fulfillment from oddballs or young boys.

Going Places (Les Valseuses, which in French is slang for testicles), based on Blier’s best-selling novel, was a box office smash in France. Gérard Depardieu and Patrick Dewaere both achieved stardom as a couple of outsiders, adult juvenile delinquents, whose sexual and sadistic adventures are chronicled as they travel across France. They are both unable to bring to orgasm a young beautician (played by Miou-Miou) they pick up and take on as a sexual partner. They then attempt to please an older woman (Jeanne Moreau), who has just spent ten years in prison. After a night together, she commits suicide by shooting herself in the vagina. Eventually, Miou-Miou is sexually satisfied by a crazy, physically unattractive ex-con.

In Femmes Fatales middle-aged Jean-Pierre Marielle and Jean Rochefort, one a gynaecologist and the other a pimp, decide to abandon wives and mistresses for the countryside, but end up pursued by an army of women intent on enslaving them as studs. Again, men cannot escape women’s sexual demands: here, the latter come after the former with tanks and guns. And in Get out Your Handkerchiefs, driving instructor Depardieu is so anxious to please bored, depressed wife Carol Laure that he finds her a lover. Both the husband and the stranger, a playground instructor (Dewaere), feel that she will be happy if she can only have a child. She in her own way does this, finding a substitute for them in a precocious young boy barely into his teens. Handkerchiefs is a prelude of sorts to Beau-Père, which features only one male lead (as does the later Trop belle pour toi, in which Depardieu is at the centre of a love triangle). Here, a struggling pianist, played by Dewaere, is seduced by the refreshingly self-confident 14-year-old daughter of his recently deceased lover. The teenager’s feelings are deep and pure, while the “adult” is immature, too self-conscious and self-absorbed to accept her.

In Blier’s films, men do not understand women. “Maybe one day I’ll do Camille,” the filmmaker says. “But I won’t do An Unmarried Woman, because I don’t feel I have the right to do it. I don’t know what goes on in a woman’s head. I believe I know what certain men think, but not women.” As a result, the sexual barriers between the sexes seem irrevocable in Blier’s movies. His men are more at ease talking among themselves about women than with actually being with wives or lovers; their relationships with each other are for them more meaningful than their contacts with the opposite sex. There are alternatives to women, such as turning to homosexual relationships (the characters in Going Places sleep with each other when they are lonely or celibate).

Another Blier film, Buffet froid, is also about male bonding: Depardieu, as a psychopathic killer, becomes involved with a mass murderer (Jean Carmet) and a homicidal cop (the director’s father, the distinguished character actor Bernard Blier). However, Buffet froid is mostly a study of alienation in urban society, and the acceptance of random, irrational violence. It is thematically more closely related to Jules Feiffer’s Little Murders than Going Places or Get out Your Handkerchiefs. Quality-wise, Blier’s most recent films have added little luster to his career. However, the film maker seems to have tired of making films about men. Beginning with Trop belle pour toi (Too Beautiful for You), the most accessible of his later-career works, his primary characters have been women. Trop belle pour toi does feature a clever take on extramarital relationships. Blier regular Gerard Depardieu plays a car dealer whose wife is beautiful and intelligent; nonetheless, he cheats on her with his otherwise ordinary, chubby temporary receptionist. Despite this intriguing premise and recognition with a Cannes Film Festival Special Jury Prize, the film lacks the spark and outrageousness of his earlier work.

The director’s other features include Merci la vie (Thanks, Life), a feminist take on Going Places that sparked controversy upon its opening in France. It is a road movie which chronicles the sexual exploits of two young women, one sluttish and the other naive. Un deux trois soleil (One Two Three Sun) focuses on the plight of a young teenager’s feelings are deep and pure, while the “adult” is immature, too self-conscious and self-absorbed to accept her.

In Blier’s films, men do not understand women. “Maybe one day I’ll do Camille,” the filmmaker says. “But I won’t do An Unmarried Woman, because I don’t feel I have the right to do it. I don’t know what goes on in a woman’s head. I believe I know what certain men think, but not women.” As a result, the sexual barriers between the sexes seem irrevocable in Blier’s movies. His men are more at ease talking among themselves about women than with actually being with wives or lovers; their relationships with each other are for them more meaningful than their contacts with the opposite sex. There are alternatives to women, such as turning to homosexual relationships (the characters in Going Places sleep with each other when they are lonely or celibate).

Another Blier film, Buffet froid, is also about male bonding: Depardieu, as a psychopathic killer, becomes involved with a mass murderer (Jean Carmet) and a homicidal cop (the director’s father, the distinguished character actor Bernard Blier). However, Buffet froid is mostly a study of alienation in urban society, and the acceptance of random, irrational violence. It is thematically more closely related to Jules Feiffer’s Little Murders than Going Places or Get out Your Handkerchiefs. Quality-wise, Blier’s most recent films have added little luster to his career. However, the film maker seems to have tired of making films about men. Beginning with Trop belle pour toi (Too Beautiful for You), the most accessible of his latter-career works, his primary characters have been women. Trop belle pour toi does feature a clever take on extramarital relationships. Blier regular Gerard Depardieu plays a car dealer whose wife is beautiful and intelligent; nonetheless, he cheats on her with his otherwise ordinary, chubby temporary receptionist. Despite this intriguing premise and recognition with a Cannes Film Festival Special Jury Prize, the film lacks the spark and outrageousness of his earlier work.

The director’s other features include Merci la vie (Thanks, Life), a feminist take on Going Places that sparked controversy upon its opening in France. It is a road movie which chronicles the sexual exploits of two young women, one sluttish and the other naive. Un deux trois soleil (One Two Three Sun) focuses on the plight of a young girl, growing up in a public housing project in Marseilles, who adores her alcoholic father and is mortified by her mother’s affectations.

Bertrand Blier best explains what he attempts to communicate in his films: “The relations between men and women are constantly evolving and it’s interesting to show people leading the lifestyle of tomorrow.”

—Rob Edelman

BLOM, August

Nationality: Danish. Born: 26 December 1869. Family: Married 1) Agnete von Prangen, 1908; 2) Johanne Fritz-Petersen. Career: Actor at Folkteatret, Copenhagen, from 1893; actor at Nordisk Films Kompagni, 1908; director for Nordisk Films Kompagni, 1910–24; manager of Copenhagen cinema, 1934–47. Died: 10 January 1947.

Films as Director:

1910 Livets Storme (Storms of Life); Robinson Crusoe; Den hvide Slavehandel I (The White Slave); Spinnen fra Tokio (The Red Light); Den skæbesvangre Opfindelse (Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde); Jaagt paa Gentlemønnrøveren; Singareen; Hamlet; Spøgelset i Gravkaelderen (The Ghost of the Variety); Den does Halsbaaen (The Necklace of the Dead)

1911 Den hvide Slavehandel II (In the Hands of Impostors); Den farlige Alder (The Price of Beauty); Ved Faengslets Port (Temptations of a Great City); Vildledt Elskov (The Bank Book); Potifars Hustru (The Victim of a Character); Politimesteren (Convents No. 10 and No. 13); Den blaa Natviol (The Daughter of the Fortune Teller); Damernes Blad (The Ladies’ Journal); Balletdanseninderen (The Ballet Dancer); Jernbanens Datte (The Daughter of the Railway); Den naadige Frøken (Lady Mary’s Love); En Lektion (Aviatikeren og Journalistens Hustru; The Aviator and the Journalist’s Wife); Ekspeditricen (Ungdom og Lesind; In the Prime of Life); Desdemona; En Opfinders Skæbne (The Aeroplane Inventor); Fader og Søn (Onkel og Neve; A Poisonous Love); Dødsdrømmen (A Dream of Death); Min første Monocle (Herr Storms første Monocle; His First Monocle); Fru Potifar (Den skæbesvangre Løgn; A Fatal Lie); Kærlighedens Styrke (The Power of Love); Mormonens Offer (The Victims of the Mormon); Hævnets (Det bødes der for; Vengeance); Det mørke Punk (Mamie Rose; Annie Bell); Eventyr paa Fedrejsen (Den udbrudte Slave; The Two Convicts); Ungdommens Ret (The Right of Youth); Tropisk Kærlighed (Love in the Tropics); Vampyrindseren (The Vampire Dancer); Det gamle Købmændshus (Midsummer; Midsummer-Time); Dødens Brad Gadeoriginalen (A Bride of Death)

1912 Brillantsjøerne (For Her Sister’s Sake); Gavemørens Datter (The Governor’s Daughter); Kærlighed gør blind (Love Is Blind); Dyrekbøt Venskab (Dearly Purchased Friendship); Den sorte Kansler (The Black Chancellor); Hjertets Guld (Et Hjerte af Guld; Faithful unto Death); Olympiens Ret (The Right of Youth); Tropisk Kærlighed (Love in the Tropics); Vampyrindseren (The Vampire Dancer); Det gamle Købmændshus (Midsummer; Midsummer-Time); Dødens Brad Gadeoriginalen (A Bride of Death)
BOETTICHER, Budd

When August Blom came to Nordisk Films Kompagni in 1909 it was the major film production company in Denmark, having been founded in 1906 by Ole Olsen. Nordisk dominated the so-called “belle époque” (from 1910 to 1914) in Danish filmmaking, and August Blom was the leading force in this period. In 1911 Blom became head of production at Nordisk, maintaining his position as a director at the same time. In charge of scripts and actors, Blom launched the career of Valdemar Psilander, who showed a natural talent for understated and realistic film acting. The actor became an immensely popular star in Denmark and Europe until his premature death in 1917. In 1911 Blom directed sixteen of Psilander’s seventeen films.

In 1910 Blom made Ved Faengslets Port (released 1911), which, with Urban Gad’s Afgrunden, introduced the erotic melodrama, a genre refined by Blom in the following years. Ved Faengslets Port is typical of the kind of films which made Nordisk famous all over the world. The story is about a young aristocrat who is in the grip of a moneylender and at the same time loves the moneylender’s daughter. Although Blom tried to introduce contemporary themes in his films, the stories were always the weak part of his and most other Danish films in this period. The compensation for the banal magazine stories was found in the way Blom told these stories. His films are often about contrasts, social and sexual. The films are passionate and reveal the many faces of love with great imagination. As a former actor Blom put great weight on acting, and he had a fine feeling for the direction of actresses. His portraits of women are quite often subtle and daring.

Blom put immense care into the making of his films. The sets were used in a dramatic way, playing an important role in the story as a means of characterizing the people. His narrative technique made use of cross-cutting and, assisted by his favourite cameraman, Johan Ankerstjerne, he was an innovator in lighting. One of his stylistic devices, used to great and surprising effect, was the use of mirrors as a means of expanding the dramatic content of a scene.

Blom must be considered as one of the important pioneers in the early silent film. It was quite natural that Blom was commissioned to direct the greatest and most ambitious film of the period, a film which introduced a literary era in the Danish film. This was Atlantis, based on Gerhart Hauptmann’s novel of 1912. This ambitious attempt to transpose a modern novel with a complicated plot and interesting characters to film benefited from the director’s steady hand. Blom’s direction of the film is astonishingly mature, confident, and imaginative, and in many ways Atlantis is ahead of its time. Johan Ankerstjerne’s camerawork, for instance, points forward to the expressionist-inspired German films. Another fine film by Blom was Verdens Undergang. Blom made seventy-eight of his approximately one hundred films in the years 1910–14, but he was a company man, and he stayed with Nordisk in the years of decline. He left filming in 1924. During the golden age of the Danish cinema, however, Blom was the great stylist, a gifted and civilized director.

—Ib Monty

Films as Director:

(as Oscar Boetticher)

- 1944 One Mysterious Night; The Missing Juror; Youth on Trial
- 1945 A Guy, a Gal and a Pal; Escape on the Fog
- 1946 The Fleet That Came to Stay (and other propaganda films)
- 1948 Assigned to Danger; Behind Locked Doors
- 1949 Black Midnight; Wolf Hunters
- 1950 Killer Shark

(as Budd Boetticher)

- 1951 The Bullfighter and the Lady (+ co-story); The Sword of D’Artagnan; The Cimarron Kid
- 1952 Bronco Buster; Red Ball Express; Horizons West
- 1953 City beneath the Sea; Seminole; The Man from the Alamo; Wings of the Hawk; East of Sumatra
- 1955 The Magnificent Matador (+ story); The Killer Is Loose
- 1956 Seven Men from Now
- 1957 The Tall T; Decision at Sundown
- 1958 Buchanan Rides Alone
- 1959 Ride Lonesome (+ pr); Westbound
- 1960 Comanche Station; The Rise and Fall of Legs Diamond
- 1971 Arruza (+ pr, co-sc; production completed 1968); A Time for Dying (+ sc; production completed 1969)
- 1985 My Kingdom for . . . (+ sc)

Other Films:

- 1970 Two Mules for Sister Sara (Siegel) (sc)
- 1988 Tequila Sunrise (Towne) (to as Judge Nizetitch)
- 1996 Los Años Arruza (Maille) (role)
- 1997 Big Guns Talk: The Story of the Westerns (Morris—for TV) (as interviewee)

Publications

By BOETTICHER: book—

By BOETTICHER: articles—

Interviews with Michel Ciment and others, in Positif (Paris), November 1969.

Interview, in The Director’s Event by Eric Sherman and Martin Rubin, New York, 1970.

On BOETTICHER: books—

Budd Boetticher, Madrid (La Filmoteca Espanola), n.d.

On BOETTICHER: articles—

“The Director and the Public: a Symposium,” in Film Culture (New York), March/April 1955.

“Un Western exemplaire,” in Qu’est-ce que le cinéma by André Bazin, Paris, 1961.

Sarris, Andrew, “Esotérica,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

Schmidt, Eckhart, “B.B. wie Budd Boetticher,” in Film (Germany), October/November 1964.

*    *    *

Budd Boetticher will be remembered as a director of Westerns, although his bullfight films have their fervent admirers, as does his Scarface-variant, The Rise and Fall of Legs Diamond. Since Boetticher’s Westerns are so variable in quality, it is tempting to overcredit Burt Kennedy, the scriptwriter for all of the finest. But Kennedy’s own efforts as director (Return of the Seven, Hannie Caulder, The War Wagon, etc.) are tediously paced dramas or failed comedies. Clearly the Boetticher/Kennedy team clicked to make Westerns significantly superior to what either could create on their own. Indeed, The Tall T, Seven Men from Now, and (on a slightly lower level) Ride Lonesome look now like the finest work in the genre during the 1950s, less pretentious and more tightly controlled than ever those of Anthony Mann or John Ford.

Jim Kitses’s still-essential Horizons West tightly locates Boetticher’s significant Westerns in the “‘Ranown’ cycle (a production company name taken from producer Harry Joe Brown and his partner Randolph Scott). But the non-Kennedy entries in the cycle have, despite Scott’s key presence, only passing interest. One might have attributed the black comedy in the series to Kennedy without the burlesque Buchanan Rides Alone, which wanders into an episodic narrative opposite to the taut, unified action of the others; Decision at Sundown is notable only for its remarkably bitter finale and a morally pointless showdown, as if it were a cynic’s answer to High Noon. The Tall T’s narrative is typical of the best Boetticher/Kennedy: it moves from a humanizing comedy so rare in the genre into a harsh and convincing savagery. Boetticher’s villains are relentlessly cruel, yet morally shaded. In The Tall T, he toys with the redeemable qualities of Richard Boone, while deftly characterizing the other two (Henry Silva asks, “I’ve never shot me a woman, have I Frank?”). Equally memorable are Lee Marvin (in Seven Men from Now) and Lee Van Cleef (Ride Lonesome).

Randolph Scott is the third essential collaborator in the cycle. He is generally presented by Boetticher as a loner not by principle or habit but by an obscure terror in his past (often a wife murdered). Thus, he’s not an asexual cowpoke so much as one who, temporarily at least, is beyond fears and yearnings. There’s a Pinteresque sexual confrontation in Seven Men from Now among Scott, a pioneer couple, and an insinuating Lee Marvin when the four are confined in a wagon. And, indeed, the typical Boetticher landscape—smooth, rounded, and yet impassible boulders—match Scott’s deceptively complex character as much as the majestic Monument Valley towers match Wayne in Ford’s Westerns, or the harsh cliffs match James Stewart in Mann’s.

Clearly the Westerns of the sixties and seventies owe more to Boetticher than Ford. Even such very minor works as Horizons West, The Wings of the Hawk, and The Man from the Alamo have the tensions of Spaghetti Westerns (without the iciness), as well as the Peckinpah fantasy of American expertise combining with Mexican peasant vitality. If Peckinpah and Leone are the masters of the post-‘classic’ Western, then it’s worth noting how The Wings of the Hawk anticipates The Wild Bunch, and how once upon a Time in the West opens like Seven Men from Now and closes like Ride Lonesome. Boetticher’s films are the final great achievement of the traditional Western, before the explosion of the genre.

—Scott Simmon

BOGDANOVICH, Peter

Films as Director:

1967 Targets (+ co-sc, pr, ed, role as Sammy Michaels)
1971 Directed by John Ford (+ sc); The Last Picture Show (+ co-sc)
1972 What’s up, Doc? (+ pr, co-sc)
1973 Paper Moon (+ pr)
1974 Daisy Miller (+ pr)
1975 At Long Last Love (+ pr, sc, co-songwriter: “Poor Young Millionaire”)
1976 Nickelodeon (+ co-sc)
1979 Saint Jack (+ co-sc, role as Eddie Schuman)
1983 They All Laughed (+ sc)
1984 Mask
1987 Illegally Yours
1990 Texassville
1992 Noises Off (+ exec pr)
1993 The Thing Called Love; Fallen Angels (series for TV)
1996 To Sir with Love 2 (for TV)
1997 Rescuers: Stories of Courage: Two Women (for TV); The Price of Heaven (for TV)
1998 Naked City: A Killer Christmas (for TV)
1999 A Saintsly Switch (for TV)

Other Films:

1966 The Wild Angels (Corman) (co-sc, 2nd unit d, all uncredited, + bit role, voice); Voyage to the Planet of the Prehistoric Women (Gill-Women of Venus) (from Russian science-fiction film by Pavel Klushantsev, Planeta Burg [Cosmonauts on Venus; Storm Clouds of Venus], dubbed and re-edited for American Int’l Pictures) (supervising ed, d of add’l scenes under pseudonym Derek Thomas and/or Peter Stewart)
1967 The Trip (Corman) (role)
1969 Lion’s Love (Varda) (guest star role)
1970 The Other Side of the Wind (Welles, unreleased) (role as Higgam)
1973 F for Fake (Welles) (voice-over)
1975 Diaries, Notes & Sketches volume 1, reels 1–6; Lost Lost Lost (Jonas Mekas) (appearance in reel 3); The Gentleman Tramp (Patterson) (‘special thanks’ credit for supervising scenes shot at Charles Chaplin’s home in Switzerland)
1978 Opening Night (Cassavetes) (guest star role)
1996 The Battle over Citizen Kane (Epstein, Lennon—doc); Ben Johnson: Third Cowboy on the Right (Thurman) (as himself)
1996 Mr. Jealousy (Baumbach) (ro as Dr. Poke); Highball (Baumbach); Bella Mafia (Greene—mini for TV)
1998 54 (Christopher) (ro as Elaine’s Patron)
1999 The Shoe Store (Proto) (as himself); Hitchcock: Shadow of a Genius (Haimes—for TV) (as himself); Coming Soon (Burson); Claire Makes It Big (Workman) (ro as Arturo Mulligan)
2000 Rated X (Estevez) (ro as Film Professor); The Independent (Kessler) (ro as himself)

Publications

By BOGDANOVICH: books—

This Is Orson Welles, New York, 1992.
Who the Devil Made It: Conversations with Legendary Film Directors, Ballantine, 1998.
Peter Bogdanovich’s Movie of the Week: 52 Classic Films for One Full Year, Ballantine, 1999.

By BOGDANOVICH: articles—

“Go-Go and Hurry: It’s Later than You Think,” in Esquire (New York), February 1965.

“Godard in Hollywood,” in Take One (Montreal), June 1968.

“Crybil and Peter,” interview with Andy Warhol and others, in Inter/View (New York), June 1974.

Interview with Thomas J. Harris, in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 16, no. 4, 1988.

Interview with P. Kremski, in Film bulletin (Winterthur), vol. 37, no. 1, 1995.

On BOGDANOVICH: books—

Harris, Thomas J., Bogdanovich’s Picture Shows, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1990.

On BOGDANOVICH: articles—

Houston, Penelope, “Hitchcockery,” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1968.

Harrison, B. G., “Peter Bogdanovich Comes Back from the Dead,” in Esquire, August 1990.

White, A., “Directed by Peter Bogdanovich,” in FilmComment, March/April 1993.

* * *

Of all trades ancillary to the cinema, few offer worse preparation for a directing career than criticism. Bogdanovich’s background as Hollywood historian and profiler of its legendary figures inevitably invited comparisons between his movies and those of directors like Ford, Hawks, and Dwan, whom he had deified. That he should have occasionally created films which deserve such comparison argues for his skill and resilience.

He first attracted attention with Targets, a flashy exercise with an ailing Karloff playing straight man to Bogdanovich’s film-buff director and a psychotic sniper menacing the audience at a drive-in cinema. The documentary Directed by John Ford likewise exploited Hollywood history, but with uncertain scholarship and even less certain taste. Yet in his first major fiction feature, based on Larry McMurtry’s rural nocturne The Last Picture Show, Bogdanovich created a precise and moving chronicle of small-town values eroded by selfishness and disloyalty. He also showed a flair for casting in his choice of underrated veterans and fresh newcomers. Ben Johnson, Cloris Leachman, and Ellen Burstyn earned new respect, while Timothy Bottoms, Jeff Bridges, and Cybill Shepherd received boosts to nascent careers—though Shepherd, via her relationship with the director, was to prove a troublesome protégée.

What’s up, Doc? and Paper Moon are among the shapeliest comedies of the 1970s, trading on nostalgia but undercutting it with sly character-playing and dead-pan wit. Ryan and Tatum O’Neal achieve a stylish ensemble performance in the latter as 1930s conman and unwanted orphan auxiliary; in the former, O’Neal makes a creditable attempt at playing Cary Grant to Barbra Streisand’s Hepburn, backed up by a typically rich character cast—notably Austin Pendleton, Kenneth Mars, and the ululating Madeline Kahn.

Daisy Miller, a period vehicle for Shepherd more redolent of Henry King than Henry James, inaugurated Bogdanovich’s decline. An attempt at a 1930s Cole Porter musical, At Long Last Love likewise flopped, as did Nikkelodeon, an unexpectedly leaden tribute to pioneer moviemaking. He returned to form with a low-budget adaptation of Paul Theroux’s Saint Jack, dignified by Ben Gazzara’s performance as the ironic man of honor coping with Occidental venality and Asian corruption. And the Manhattan comedy They All Laughed, though widely disliked, showed a truer synthesis of screwball humour and sentimentality than other equivalent films, and marked a return by Bogdanovich to the spirit of the classical directors he admires.

Bogdanovich worked little in the 1980s, apparently traumatised by the murder of his lover Dorothy Stratten shortly after her acting debut in They All Laughed. At decade’s end, in a twin return to his roots that offered some hope for his future, he married Stratten’s sister and directed Texasville, a Last Picture Show sequel with many of the original cast.

Texasville, like most sequels, fails because what made the original interesting and valuable cannot be repeated. Like Bogdanovich himself, then at the beginning of his career, the characters in The Last Picture Show were embarked, with tragi-comic results, on the painful journey into adulthood; the loss of childhood certainties was mirrored by the film’s detailed mise-en-scène, a small Texas town that loses its heart and soul when a benevolent patriarch dies suddenly. Grown up, they are no longer connected by the irresistible force of adolescence, and Bogdanovich’s film—though based on novelist Larry McMurtry’s often poignant continuation—wanders in search of a plot, boring the spectator with childish antics meant to signify the onset of a collective life crisis. The story goes on, but without much interest or direction.

Much the same might be said of his career in the 1990s, which has continued but not prospered. The Thing Called Love tries to recapture Bogdanovich’s earlier success with coming-of-age stories (not only The Last Picture Show but also Paper Moon). However, this overly predictable and slow-moving saga of young adults trying to make it big in the highly competitive world of country music deservedly continued but not prospered. The Last Picture Show sequel with many of the original cast.

—John Baxter, updated by R. Barton Palmer

BOORMAN, John

Films as Director:

1965 Catch Us If You Can (Having a Wild Weekend)
1967 Point Blank
1968 Hell in the Pacific
1970 Leo the Last (+ sc)
1972 Deliverance (+ pr)
1973 Zardoz (+ sc, pr)
1977 Exorcist II: The Heretic (+ pr)
1981 Excalibur (+ pr, co-sc)
1985 The Emerald Forest (+ pr)
1987 Hope and Glory (+ pr, sc)
1990 Where the Heart Is (+ sc, pr)
1991 I Dreamt I Woke Up (+ role)
1995 Two Nudes Bathing (+ sc, pr); Beyond Rangoon (+ pr); Lumière et compagnie (Lumière and Company) (contributor of short piece)
1998 The General (I Once Had a Life) (pr, sc)

Other Films:

1976 Target of an Assassin (The Long Shot) (role)
1982 Dream One (pr)

Publications

By BOORMAN: books—

By BOORMAN: articles—

``Director John Boorman Talks about His Work,’’ in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1975.
Interview with J.-P. Le Pavec and D. Rabourdin, in Cinéma (Paris), March 1978.
``The Sorcerer: John Boorman Interviewed,’’ by D. Yakir, in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1981.
``The Technology of Style,’’ interview with J. Verniere, in Filmmakers Monthly (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), June 1981.
``The World of King Arthur according to John Boorman,’’ an interview with H. Kennedy, in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1981.
``Christopher Isherwood: Stranger in Paradise,’’ in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1986.
Interview in Positif (Paris), November 1987.
``Bohemian Rhapsody,’’ an interview with Brian Case, in Time Out (London), 1 August 1990.
Interview with Gavin Smith, in Film Comment (New York), vol. 31, no. 4, 1995.
Interview with Alain Masson and Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), December 1998.

On BOORMAN: books—

On BOORMAN: articles—

Farber, Stephen, “The Writer in American Films,’’ in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1968.

Sineux, M., “‘Un Héraut de notre temps,’’ in Positif (Paris), October 1981.
“John Boorman Section’’ of Positif (Paris), November 1987.
Thompson, David, “Follow the Money,’’ in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1995.
Thompson, David, “‘As I Lay Dying,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), June 1998.

* * *

“Film making is the process of turning money into light and then back into money again.” John Boorman’s neat epigram will probably haunt him for the rest of his filmmaking days, not simply because it is so tidy a formulation, but because the tensions it articulates have played such a prominent part in his own career.

Boorman has always been much concerned with the look of his films. In both Deliverance and Point Blank (shot, incidentally, in exquisite ‘scope) he went to unusual lengths to control color tones; Zardoz and Exorcist II: The Heretic are remarkable for their pictorial inventiveness; the images of the Irish countryside in Excalibur and of the Brazilian rain forest in The Emerald Forest are carefully imbued with a luminous, almost magical quality; and the extraordinary street of housing built for Hope and Glory (one of the largest sets constructed in Britain since the heyday of the studio system) speaks volumes for Boorman’s commitment to a cinema of distinctively visual qualities.

Boorman has certainly proven himself able to turn money into light. Turning it back into money, however, has not always proved so easy, and the commercial weakness of Zardoz and the near total box-office disaster of Exorcist II were no help to him in trying to develop his ambitious projects of the 1980s. After all, an Irish-based adaptation of Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (Excalibur), a “green” allegory scheduled for location filming in South America (Emerald Forest), and an autobiographical evocation of his wartime childhood (Hope and Glory) are hardly the most obviously marketable ideas, even from a thoroughly bankable director. Yet sell them he did, and if The Emerald Forest doesn’t come off as well as either Excalibur or Hope and Glory, two out of three is no mean record for an independent-minded filmmaker with a taste for startling visuals and unusual stories.

Boorman’s is a high-risk approach. When it goes wrong, it goes wrong with a vengeance, and both Exorcist II and The Emerald Forest sacrifice narrative conviction in the cause of pictorial splendor and some risible metaphysics. But when his approach goes right, the results are sufficient to justify his reputation as one of the most courageous and imaginative filmmakers still working in the commercial mainstream.
At its best (in Point Blank, Deliverance, Excalibur, Hope and Glory, and The General) Boorman’s cinema is rich and subtle, his fascination with images matched by taut story-telling and a nice sense of the opacity of people’s motives, his characters constantly made aware of the complex and unanticipated consequences of their actions. In many of his films, strong-willed individualists find themselves embroiled in a clash between established order and disorder, a context within which they appear as representative figures caught up in near mythical confrontations. In Hell in the Pacific, for instance, Lee Marvin and Toshiro Mifune play two enemy soldiers stranded on an island. As they continue to conduct the war their roles become emblematic, and they play out the tensions between conditioned aggression and common humanity.

In Point Blank, perhaps Boorman’s most elegantly realized film, the force for disorder is Walker (Lee Marvin), a man obsessed by what he considers to be his just desserts. Double-crossed in a robbery, he wants only his share of the spoils, a goal he pursues step by step up the hierarchy of a criminal syndicate. The film leaves us little choice but to identify with Walker who is, like Sean Connery in Zardoz, an absolute individualist, a man who cannot be restrained by the hierarchical order on which he impinges so forcefully.

Yet Point Blank somehow transcends the conventional morality of assertive individualism. Walker is ruthless and violent, certainly, but it is his symbolic force to which we respond. The movie creates a paradox in which this unlovely figure comes to represent a more human spirit than that embodied in the syndicate’s bureaucratic order. As ever, Boorman provides no easy solutions. After much death and violence it emerges that Walker, too, has been manipulated. Sharing his perspective as we do, we are left with a pervasive sense of impotence in the face of larger impersonal forces.

Deliverance, too, shows us order and certainty revealed as precarious fabrications. It concerns four men on a canoe trip through the wilderness who are forced to recognize that their ideas about morality and their belief in the social niceties are ineffectual constructs in the face of adverse and unintelligible circumstances. After killing a man who had buggered one of their party at gunpoint, they find that the action leads them down a path of lies and death. “There’s no end to it,” one character observes, close to despair.

Excalibur, perhaps inevitably given its source in Arthurian myth, tells of the imposition of order onto chaos and of the terrible price to be paid when that order is not firmly based. Human frailty destroys Camelot when Arthur finds Guinevere and Lancelot asleep together in the forest; in another of Boorman’s inspired cinematic images, Arthur plunges the sword Excalibur into the ground between them. The despairing Guinevere is left curled naked around the sword while the land falls into pestilence and war.

In these three films Boorman ensures that we appreciate how difficult it is to make judgments of good and evil, how tangled the threads of motivation can be, a concern which also informs his later expeditions into apparently more “political” topics in Beyond Rangoon and The General. But he does so not only as a pessimistic observer of human failings; he also has hope. There is a lovely scene in Hope and Glory, his most romantic of films, when young Bill (Boorman himself, for the film is autobiographical) has the “googly” explained to him by his father. When he realises what it involves (bowling a cricket ball so that it turns one way but with a bowling action which suggests that it will turn in the opposite direction) he is both horrified and fascinated. “That’s like telling fibs,” he says, a child’s term for lying which is as accurate to the period as it is precise in its childish evocation of acceptable untruth. In Bill’s (and Boorman’s) world, people are forever telling fibs; like the googly, things are not always what they seem. But, also like the googly, that complexity can be a matter as much for celebration as for concern.

—Andrew Tudor

BORDEN, Lizzie

Films as Director:

1983 Born in Flames (+ pr)
1986 Working Girls (+ pr, sc)
1991 Love Crimes (+pr)

---

Lizzie Borden
1992 Inside Out
1994 “Let’s Talk about Sex” segment of Erotique (+sc)
1996 “Bad Girl” episode of Alex Mack (for TV)

Publications

By BORDEN: articles—

On BORDEN: books—

On BORDEN: articles—

While growing up in Detroit, Linda Elizabeth Borden got used to being called “Lizzie” by her friends, in reference to the alleged ax-murderer of nineteenth-century Massachusetts. When, as a young adult, she decided on a career in film, Borden concluded that adopting the infamous nickname would help her to be noticed. She need not worry—Lizzie Borden’s efforts as a screenwriter, producer, and director have brought her considerable attention, and no small amount of acclaim.

Borden’s first film was Born in Flames, which was, literally, years in the making. For a novice filmmaker like Borden, raising money posed a serious problem, and her best efforts resulted in her film being made on a shoestring budget of only $30,000. Born in Flames was finally finished in 1983, with Borden serving as director, producer, and screenwriter—although the script was revised in collaboration with the actors (nonprofessionals all) who appeared in the film.

Born in Flames takes place in the near future, ten years after a socialist revolution has swept America. But what was promised to be a utopia of gender equality and inclusion has started to revert to the old formula of male supremacy. In response, groups of women come together to resist the new brand of oppression. Although the women learn to work together, the film does not homogenize them by ignoring differences in race, class, or sexual orientation. The rebel women do not achieve unity by sublimating their differences, but by acknowledging them and forging cooperation in the heat of their own passions. Born in Flames became an immediate feminist classic, although not all feminists appreciated the implicit criticisms (such as elitism and insensitivity) that Borden levels at the women’s movement through her film.

Three years later saw the release of Working Girls, Borden’s unsentimental look at prostitution. Shot in pseudo-documentary style, the film follows one group of “working girls” as they put in a long (18 hours) shift at the Midtown Manhattan condo that serves as a bordello. One might expect a feminist’s film about prostitution to be a strident denunciation of the “profession” and the exploitative patriarchy that evokes it, but Borden’s message is more complex. While working on the script, she spent considerable time with members of COYOTE (Call Off Your Old Tired Ethics), an organization of current and former prostitutes who lobby on behalf of the oldest profession and its practitioners. These contacts influenced Borden’s perspective in a major way.

Borden does not glamorize prostitution—her film is not remotely like Pretty Woman—but neither is it a feminist jeremiad. The title that Borden chose is revealing. Working Girls portrays prostitution as a job—often tedious, sometimes depressing, occasionally interesting or funny. The main character, Molly, has a degree from Yale and is a lesbian in her private life. The other “girls” in the film also fail to conform to Hollywood stereotypes.

Lizzie Borden’s next film, Love Crimes, was both her most “mainstream,” and, for many critics, her least successful. Miramax Films gave Borden a bigger budget (about $7 million) than she had ever worked with before, but also took away much of Borden’s control over the final product. The studio even cut out the ending that Borden shot, and substituted its own.

The plot of Love Crimes concerns a female assistant district attorney (played by Sean Young) who goes after a male photographer who pressures unsuspecting young women into posing for sexually explicit photos, then uses the pictures as leverage to extort sexual favors. After her sister falls victim to this ploy, Young’s character goes under cover to trap this rapist, but finds herself responding sexually to the man’s personality.

The film raises interesting questions about pornography, voyeurism, and sexual dominance/submission, but ultimately answers none of them. In the end, the film proved too “kinky” for mainstream audiences, but too conventional for Borden’s usual fans.

Her next project after Love Crimes was “Let’s Talk about Sex,” a segment of the 1994 anthology film Erotique, which finds a female phone-sex operator developing a fascination for her most regular customer; she eventually decides to extend the relationship beyond the telephone. More recently, Borden has directed television episodes for such pay-TV venues as Showtime and the Playboy Channel.

—Justin Gustainis
BORZAGE, Frank

Films as Director:

1916 That Gal of Burke’s (+ role); Mammy’s Rose (co-d, role); Life’s Harmony (co-d, role); The Silken Spider (+ role); The Code of Honor (+ role); Neil Dale’s Men Folks (+ role); The Forgotten Prayer (+ role); The Courtin’ of Calliope Clew (+ role); Nugget Jim’s Pardner (+ role); The Demon of Fear (+ role); Land o’ Lizards (Silent Shelby) (+ role); Immediate Lee (Hair Trigger Casey) (+ role); Enchantment (+ sc, role); The Pride and the Man (+ sc, role); Dollars of Dross (+ sc)

1917 Wee Lady Betty (co-d, role); Flying Colors; Until They Get Me

1918 The Atom (+ role); The Gun Woman (+ role); Shoes That Danced; Innocent’s Progress; An Honest Man; Society for Sale; Who Is to Blame?: The Ghost Flower; The Curse of Iku (+ role)

1919 Toton; Prudence of Broadway; Whom the Gods Destroy; Ashes of Desire

1920 Humoresque

1921 The Duke of Chimney Butte; Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford

1922 Back Pay; Billy Jim; The Good Provider; Hair Trigger Casey (re-ed version); Silent Shelby (reissue of Land o’ Lizards); The Valley of Silent Men; The Pride of Palomar

1923 The Nth Commandment; Children of the Dust; Age of Desire

1924 Secrets

1925 The Lady, Daddy’s Gone A-Hunting; Lazybones; Wages for Wives; The Circle

1926 The First Year; The Dixie Merchant; Early to Wed; Marriage License?

1927 Seventh Heaven

1928 Street Angel

1929 The River; Lucky Star; They Had to See Paris

1930 Son o’ My Heart; Liliom

1931 Doctors’ Wives; Young as You Feel; Bad Girl

1932 After Tomorrow; Young America; A Farewell to Arms

1933 Secrets (remake of 1924 film); Man’s Castle

1934 No Greater Glory; Little Man What Now? (+ pr); Flirtation Walk (+ pr)

1935 Living on Velvet; Stranded; Shipmates Forever

1936 Desire; Hearts Divided

1937 Green Light; History Is Made at Night; Big City

1938 Mannequin; Three Comrades; The Shining Hour

1939 Disputed Passage (+ co-pr)

1940 Strange Cargo; The Mortal Storm (+ co-pr)

1941 Flight Command; Smilin’ Through

1942 The Vanishing Virginian; Seven Sweethearts

1943 Stage Door Canteen; His Butler’s Sister (+ co-pr)

1944 Till We Meet Again (+ pr)

1945 The Spanish Main

1946 I’ve Always Loved You (+ pr); Magnificent Doll

1947 That’s My Man (+ pr)

1948 Moonrise

1958 China Doll (+ pr)

1959 The Big Fisherman

Publications

By BORZAGE: articles—

Article in Motion Picture Directing: The Facts and Theories of the Newest Art, by Peter Milne, New York, 1922.

Interview with V. Tully, in Vanity Fair (New York), February 1927. “What’s Wrong with the Movies?,’’ in Motion Picture (New York), September 1933.

On BORZAGE: books—

On BORZAGE: articles—

Camper, Fred, “Disputed Passage,” in Cinema (London), v. 9, no. 10.

* * *

Frank Borzage had a rare gift of taking characters, even those who were children of violence, and fashioning a treatment of them abundant with lyrical romanticism and tenderness, even a spirituality that reformed them and their story.

Borzage arrived in Hollywood in 1913, and Thomas H. Ince gave him his first small roles as a film actor, gradually promoting him to lead roles and providing him with his first opportunities to direct. He usually played the romantic lead in Westerns and romantic melodramas with such Triangle players as Sessue Hayakawa (The Typhoon and Witch of the Gods, both 1914) and Olive Thomas (Toten, 1919).

The first really important feature he directed was Humoresque, written by Frances Marion from a Fannie Hurst story. It had all the elements which were later to stamp a picture as a Borzage film—hope, love, and faith in oneself and others in a world that was poverty-stricken and could be cruel. It won Photoplay Magazine’s award as Best Picture of the year.

Borzage insisted that “real art is simple, but simplicity requires the greatest art,” adding that “naturalness is the primary requisite of good acting. I like my players to perform as though there were no camera on the set.”

Borzage did exceedingly well at Paramount’s Cosmopolitan and at First National, where he directed two Norma Talmadge favorites, Secrets and The Lady. He then moved over to Fox, where, with the 1927 release of Seventh Heaven, he established himself as one of the best in the business. He directed two others with Janet Gaynor and Charles Farrell, Street Angel and Lucky Star. His The River of 1928, starring Farrell, is a virtual cinematic poem. In 1929 Borzage directed his first all-talking feature, They Had to See Paris, which starred Will Rogers, Fox’s number one box-office star.

The year 1933 was probably Borzage’s finest as a director, for he made three films which still rate as superb examples of the romantic cinema: A Farewell to Arms, from the Hemingway novel, with Gary Cooper and Helen Hayes; Mary Pickford’s final and very best film, a re-make of the silent-era Secrets, which had originally starred Norma Talmadge; and Man’s Castle, with Spencer Tracy and Loretta Young, a very moving romance.

There was a lasting tenderness about Borzage’s treatment of a love story, and during the days of the Depression and the rise of Fascism, his pictures were ennobling melodramas about the power of love to create a heaven on earth. Penelope Gilliatt has remarked that Borzage “had a tenderness rare in melodrama and absolute pitch about period. He understood adversity.” Outside of Griffith, there has never been another director in the business who could so effectively triumph over sentimentiality, using true sentiment with an honest touch.

Borzage made four films with Margaret Sullavan that clearly indicated that she was the quintessential heroine for Borzage films: Little Man, What Now?, a study of love in the midst of deprivation and the growing terror in Germany; Three Comrades, in which Sullavan played an ill-fated tubercular wife; The Shining Hour, which featured her as a self-sacrificing woman; and The Mortal Storm, a moving film of the imminent battle with the Nazi forces.

Borzage also directed three other films during this time of stress that were extraordinary departures for him: Desire, a sleek romance in the Lubitsch tradition, starring Marlene Dietrich and Gary Cooper; Mannequin, co-starring Joan Crawford with Spencer Tracy, one of their best; and a drama that combined romance with effective disaster, History Is Made at Night, with Jean Arthur and Charles Boyer as lovers trapped in a Titanic-like explosion of violence. While in the case of Desire Ernst Lubitsch was producer, the picture features touches that are just as indicative of Borzage as they are of Lubitsch, for both were masters of cinematic subtlety. In the post-war period, it began to be clear that Borzage’s career was on the wane. His best picture during this era was Moonrise.

—DeWitt Bodeen

BOULTING, Roy and John

Nationality: British. Born: Twins, in Bray, Berkshire, 21 November 1913. Education: McGill University, Toronto. Career: John entered film industry as office boy, worked as salesman, publicity writer, and editor, mid-1930s; introduced by John, Roy began as assistant director; they founded Charter Films, 1937; John served in Film Unit of Royal Air Force, Roy in British Army Film Unit, 1940–45; obtained leave at same time to make Thunder Rock, 1942; began series of comedies with Seagulls over Sorrento, 1954; both joined board of British Lion Film Corp. Died: John died in Sunningdale, Berkshire, 17 June 1985.

Films with Roy as Director, John as Producer (though functions overlap):

- 1938 The Landlady; Ripe Earth; Seeing Stars; Consider Your Verdict
- 1939 Trunk Crime
- 1940 Inquest; Pastor Hall
- 1941 Dawn Guard
- 1942 Thunder Rock; They Serve Abroad
- 1943 Desert Victory
- 1944 Tunisian Victory (co-d)
- 1945 Burma Victory; Journey Together (John as d, Roy pr)
- 1947 Fame Is the Spur; Brighton Rock (Young Scarface) (John d and Roy pr)
- 1948 The Guinea Pig (The Outsider) (+ co-sc)
- 1950 Seven Days to Noon (John d and Roy pr)
- 1951 Singlehanded (Sailor of the King); High Treason (+ co-sc); The Magic Box (John d and Roy pr)
- 1954 Seagulls over Sorrento (Crest of the Wave) (Roy and John co-d and co-pr, sc)
- 1955 Josephine and Men
- 1956 Run for the Sun (+ co-sc); Private’s Progress (John d and Roy pr, co-sc)
- 1957 Brothers in Law (+ co-sc); Happy Is the Bride (+ co-sc); Lucky Jim (John d and Roy pr)
- 1959 Carlton-Browne of the F.O. (Man in a Cocked Hat) (co-d, co-sc); I’m All Right Jack (John d and Roy pr, co-sc)
- 1960 A French Mistress (+ co-sc); Suspect (The Risk) (Roy and John co-d and co-pr)
- 1963 Heavens Above! (John d and Roy pr, co-sc)
- 1965 Rotten to the Core (John d and Roy pr)
- 1966 The Family Way (+ co-adaptation)
- 1968 Twisted Nerve (+ co-sc)
- 1970 There’s a Girl in My Soup
- 1974 Soft Beds and Hard Battles (Undercovers Hero) (+ co-sc)
1979 The Number
1979 The Last Word
1985 The Moving Finger (Roy as d) (for TV); Brothers-in-Law (Roy and John co-d)

Publications

By the BOULTINGS: articles—

‘‘Bewitched, Bothered, and Bewildered,’’ in Kine Weekly (London), 9 November 1950.

Interview with Roy in Photoplay Film Monthly (London), March 1974.

‘‘Flour Power,’’ by both in The Month in Yorkshire, March 1981.

Letter signed by both in the Times (London), 10 April 1981.

On the BOULTINGS: books—

On the BOULTINGS: articles—

Lewis and TV Technician (London), March 1964.

‘‘The Boulting Brothers,’’ in Film Dope (London), March 1974.

Tribute to John in Screen International (London), 29 June 1985.

* * *

The Boultings’ auteurial films (interspersed by potboilers, usually comic) outline a ‘‘pilgrim’s progress,’’ or regress, from a moral earnestness and puritan conscience to a sort of hilarious gloom about the State of England. Their first feature, Pastor Hall, was inspired by Martin Niemoller, the Nazi-defying German clergyman, via a play by ex-Expressionist Ernst Toller. With commentary by Eleanor Roosevelt, it created a furor in isolationist America. Thunder Rock, adapted Robert Ardrey’s pro-interventionist dream-play, is still remarkable for its didactic strategies—more persuasive than Brecht’s—and its self-reflexivity à la Pirandello. After these calls to conscience came their war documentaries. Desert Victory, a compilation of newsreel footage and its famous ‘‘gunflash montage’’ of British artillery bombarding by night, won 10,000 bookings in U.S. theaters; its realism redirected U.S. propaganda strategies. Tunisian Victory was delayed by U.S. services’ haggling over duly proportionate representation and by Churchill’s wish to sit beside the moviola deciding the exact re-editing of its last shots.

The Boultings’ next phase reflects the hopes, strains, and glooms of Austerity and the ‘‘Welfare Revolution.’’ Fame Is the Spar, an adaptation of Howard Spring’s best-seller, was inspired by Ramsay MacDonald’s evolution from Socialist firebrand to the Labour Party’s ‘‘Colonel Blimp.’’ The Guinea Pig depicted a working-class scholarship boy’s tribulations in an upper-crust school. The Boultings then switched their moral target from left-idealism becoming sluggish to left-idealism becoming fanatical. In Seven Days to Noor an atomic scientist vows to destroy London unless Britain unilaterally disarms. In High Treason a motley array of ultra-leftists sabotage British power-stations prior to invasion ‘‘from the East.’’ Conversely, the noble hero of Pastor Hall finds his ‘‘antithesis’’—The Boy—in Brighton Rock, from Graham Greene’s gangster novel. The Boy is petty, vile and doomed less through social environment than through natural evil and/or spiritual deprivation. Vis-a-vis atomic scientist and gangster alike, the Boultings’ spokespersons for ordinary humanity are blowzy aging blondes, no better than they ought to be, as if to emblematise lowered expectations of human nature.

The Magic Box, a tribute to British film pioneer Friese-Greene, was the British film industry’s ‘‘official’’ contribution to the Festival of Britain, and, like Single-Handed, a (dullish) tribute to old-fashioned British pluck. The mid-1950s’ deepening anxieties about declining efficiency and social morality provoked the Boultings to satirical comedies; their sarcasms began where Ealing’s left off. Typically, an earnest innocent (often Ian Carmichael) struggles against general moral grubbiness before giving up and joining it. The humour oscillates between tolerant and fraught, puritan and populist, realistic and farcical. Private’s Progress targeted the army, Brothers-in-Law the law, and Carleton-Brown of the F.O the government. Lucky Jim (targeting Oxbridge) is a stodgy version of the Kingsley Amis novel, but I’m All Right Jack (industrial relations) is arguably the crucial movie about post-war Britain, Peter Sellers infusing with warmth and pathos a bloody-minded shop-steward. Heaven’s Above (about the Anglican Church), from an idea by the Socialist-turned-Anglican Malcolm Muggeridge, intriguingly mixes Carry On buffoonery with Evelyn Waugh-type satire.

The Boultings’ bouts of Carry On-type ribaldry aren’t moral cop-out, but a deliberate moral position, an affectionate enjoyment of humanity despite its moral mediocrity and without the guilt of stereotypical puritanism. This mellowness keys their last serious films. In The Family Way, a working-class newlywed’s various troubles make him temporarily impotent; and his trusting father never realises that his best friend was the boy’s real father. The Twisted Nerve, about a mongoloid’s brother given to homicide, offended the mental health lobby, but sought to brood seriously on human nature, irreducible evil, and the everyday. The overt discussion of moral fibre, choice, and consequence in Thunder Rock is the key to the Boultings’ films. Contemplating the characters from outside, they ask... moral questions rather than giving psychological data from the inside; and they stress the erosion of idealism, by puzzlement, weariness, or its paradoxical conflicts with decency. Brighton Rock focuses less on Pinky’s mind, or the criminal milieu, than on the moral tropisms of the more reluctant characters. Such emphasis on “moral intuition” is central to the British character, and the Boultings’ steady popularity evinces a profound, not a glib, affinity with audiences. The switch from very earnest to very satirical forms is another facet of their moralism.

Wherever possible, the Boultings operated as a semi-independent unit, often called Charter Films. On becoming Directors of British Lion in 1963, they were crucial in its renaissance, albeit embroiled in the controversial decisions preceding its dissolution.

—Raymond Durgnat

---

BRAKHAGE, Stan

Nationality: American. Born: Kansas City, Missouri, 14 January 1933. Education: Dartmouth College, 1951; attended Institute of Fine Arts, San Francisco, 1953. Family: Married 1) Jane Collum, 1957 (divorced, 1987), five children; 2) Marilyn Jull, 1989, one child. Career: Performed as boy soprano on live radio and recordings, 1937–46; dropped out of college, ran small theatre in Central City, Colorado, 1952; studies with Edgar Varese, New York, 1954; shot film for Joseph Cornell, 1955; worked for Raymond Rohauer in Los Angeles, 1956; made TV commercials and industrial films, 1956–64; moved to Denver, 1957; began lecturing on film, from 1960; completed major works The Art of Vision and Dog Star Man, 1964; lectured in film history and aesthetics, Colorado University, 1969; taught at School of the Art Institute, Chicago, from 1970; began working in super-8mm, 1976; teacher at Colorado, from 1981. Awards: James Ryan Morris Award, 1979; Telluride Film Festival Medallion, 1981; Maya Deren Award for Independent Film and Video Artists, 1986; MacDowell Medal, 1989. Agent: Film-Makers’ Cooperative, 175 Lexington Ave., New York, NY 10016, U.S.A. Address: c/o Film Studies, Hunter 102, Campus Box 316, University of Colorado, Boulder, CO 80309, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1952 Interim
1953 UnDimensioned Windows Cast a Terrible Reflection: The Boy and the Sea
1954 Desistfilm: The Extraordinary Child; The Way to Shadow Garden
1955 In Between; Reflections on Black; The Wonder Ring (with Joseph Cornell); “Tower House” (photographed for Joseph Cornell under working titles “Bolts of Melody” and “Portrait of Julie,” finally became Cornell’s Centuries of June); Untitled Film of Geoffrey Holder’s Wedding (collaboration with Larry Jordan)
1956 Zone Moment; Flesh of Morning; Nightcats
1957 Daybreak and Whiteye; Loving; Martin Missil Quarterly Reports (commercial work)
1958 Anticipation of the Night; ‘Opening’ for G.E. Television Theatre (commercial work)
1959 Desistfilm; The Dead
1960 Thigh Line Lyre Triangular; Films by Stan Brakhage: An Avant-Garde Home Movie; The Colorado Legend and the Ballad of the Colorado Ute (commercial work)
1962 Blue Moses; Silent Sound Sense Stars Subotnick and Sender; Mr. Tomkins Inside Himself (commercial work)
1963 / in prelude and four parts dated as follows: Prelude, 1962; Part I, 1963; Part II, 1964; Part III, 1964; Part IV, 1964
1965 The Art of Vision (derived from Dog Star Man); Three Films (includes Blue White; Blood’s Tone; Vein); Fire of Waters; Pash; Two: Creeley/McClure (also incorporated in Fifteen Song Traits); Black Vision
1966 Lovemaking; The Horseman, The Woman and The Moth
1970 Scenes from under Childhood (dated as follows: Section No.1, 1967; Section No. 2, 1969; Section No. 3, 1969; Section No. 4, 1970); The Weir-Falcon Saga; The Machine of Eden; The Animals of Eden and After 1971 The Pittsburgh Documents (Eyes; Deus Ex; The Act of Seeing with One’s Own Eyes; Foxfire Childwatch; Angels’ Door; Western History; The Trip to Door; The Peaceable Kingdom
1972 Eye Myth (begun in 1968 as sketch for The Horseman, The Woman and The Moth (16mm version)); Sexual Meditations (titled and dated as follows: Sexual Meditation No. 1: Motel, 1970; Sexual Meditation: Room with View, 1971; Sexual Meditation: Faun’s Room Yale, 1972; Sexual Meditation: Office Suite, 1972; Sexual Meditation: Open Field, 1972; Sexual Meditation: Hotel, 1972); The Process; The Riddle of Lumen; The Shores of Phos: A Fable; The Presence; The Wold Shadow
1973 Gift; Sincerity; The Women
1974 Skein; Aquarian; Hymn to Her; Star Garden; Flight; Domination; he was born, he suffered, he died; Clancy; The Text of Light; The Stars Are Beautiful; Sol
1975 Sincerity II; Short Films: 1975 (divided into Parts I-X)
1976 Gadflies; Sketches; Airs; Window; Trio; Desert; Rembrandt, Etc. and Jane; Short Films; 1976; Tragedy; Highs; The Dream, NYC; The Return, The Flower; Absence
1977 Soldiers and Other Cosmic Objects; The Governor; The Domain of the Moment
1978 Sincerity III; Nightmare Series; Duplicity; Duplicity II; Purity and After; Centre; Bird; That Fal’n; Burial Path; Sluice
1979 Creation
1980 Sincerity IV; Sincerity V; Duplicity III; Salome; Other; Made Manifest; Aftermath; Murder Psalm
1981 Eye Myth (original 35mm version); Roman Numeral Series (dated and titled as follows: I and II, 1979; III, IV, V, VI, VII, 1980; VIII and IX, 1981); Nodes; RR; The Garden of Earthly Delights; Hell Spit Flexion

1982 Arabics (dated and titled as follows: 1, 2 and 3, 1980; 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 0 + 10, 11, 12, 13, 1981; 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 1982); Unconscious London Strata

1984 Egyptian Series; Tortured Dust

1986 Jane; Caswallian Trilogy (The Aerodyne; Dance Shadows by Danielle Helander; Fireloop); The Loop; Nightmusic; Confession

1987 FaustFilm: An Opera; Loud Visual Noises; The Dante Quartet; Kindering

1988 Faust’s Other: An Idyll; Faust 3: Candida Albacore; Matins; I . . . Dreaming; Marilyn’s Window; Rage Net

1989 Faust 4; Visions in Meditation No. 1; Babylon Series

1990 Babylon Series No. 2; City Streaming; The Thatch of Night; Glaze of Cathexis; Visions in Meditation No. 2; Passage Through: A Ritual; Vision of the Fire Tree

1991 Delicacies of Molten Horror Synapse; Christ Mass Sex Dance; Agnus Dei Kindering; A Child’s Garden and the Serious Sea

1992 Crack Gloss Eulogy; Interpolations I-V; For Marilyn; Boulder Blues and Pearls and

1993 Blossom Gift Favor; Autumnal; The Harrowing; Tryst Haunt; Three Homerics; Stellar; Study in Color and Black and White; Ephemeroid Solidity

1994 Elementary Phrases (in collaboration with Phil Solomon); Black Ice; First Hymn to the Night-Navalis; Naughts; Chartex Series; Paranoia Corridor; In Consideration of Pompeii; The Mammals of Victoria; I Take These Truths; We Hold These

1994/95 Trilogy (comprises I Take These Truths; We Hold These; both 1994, and I . . . ; 1995)

1995 Cannot Exist; Cannot Not Exist; Earthen Aerie; Spring Cycle; I . . .

1998 . . . Reel Fine

Note: Beginning 1978, many films first issued in 8mm or Super-8mm reissued in 16mm.

Other Films:

1969 Nuptiae (Broughton) (ph)

1996 Cannibal! The Musical (ro as George Noon’s Father)

1998 Brakhage (as himself)

1999 Keepers of the Frame (as himself)

Publications

By BRAKHAGE: books—

The Brakhage Lectures, Chicago, 1972.

By BRAKHAGE: articles—

“The Silent Sound Sense,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1960.
“Province-and-Providential Letters,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.
“Excerpts from Letters,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1962.
“Sound and Cinema” (exchange of letters with James Tenney and Gregory Markopoulos), in Film Culture (New York), no. 29, 1963.
Interview with P. Adams Sitney, in Film Culture (New York), Fall 1963.
“Letter to Gregory Markopoulos,” in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1963/64.
“Stan Brakhage Letters,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1966.
“‘A Moving Picture Giving and Taking Book,’” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1966.
“On Dance and Film,” in Dance Perspectives, Summer 1967.
“On Filming Light,” with Forrest Williams, in The Structurist (Saskatoon), no. 13/14, 1973–74.
Various writings, in Film Culture (New York), nos. 67–69, 1979.
“Brakhage at the Ninth Telluride,” in Rolling Stock, no. 4, 1983.
“Brakhage Pans Telluride Gold,” in Rolling Stock, no. 6, 1983.
“Brakhage Observes Telluride the Thirteenth,” in Rolling Stock, no. 12, 1986.
“‘Stan Brakhage at the Millennium, November 4, 1977,’” in Millennium Film Journal, Fall/Winter 1986/87.
“Stan Brakhage Reviews the Fifteenth Telluride Film Festival,” in Rolling Stock (Boulder, Colorado), Winter 1989.
“Gertrude Stein: Meditative Literature and Film,” in Millennium Film Journal, Summer 1991.
“Stan Brakhage—The Sixtieth Birthday Interview,” by Surajan Ganguly, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1994.
“Stan Brakhage on Marie Menken,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1994.

On BRakhAGE: books—

Clark, Dan, Brakhage, New York, 1966.
Camper, Fred, Stan Brakhage, Los Angeles, 1976.
Camper, Fred, By Brakhage: Three Decades of Personal Cinema (catalogue), New York, 1981.
Elder, R. Bruce, The Body in Film, Toronto, Ontario, 1989.
Mellencamp, Patricia, Indiscretions: Avant-Garde Film Video and Feminism, Bloomington, Indiana, 1990.
MacDonald, Scott, Film: Motion Studies, London, 1993.

On BRakhAGE: articles—

Tyler, Parker, “Stan Brakhage,” in Film Culture (New York), no. 18, 1958.
Callenbach, Ernest, “Films of Stan Brakhage,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1961.
Brakhage, Jane, “The Birth Film,” in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1963/64.
Hill, Jerome, and Guy Davenport, “Two Essays on Brakhage and His Songs,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1966.
Camper, Fred, “The Art of Vision, a Film by Stan Brakhage,” in Film Culture (New York), Autumn 1967.
Camper, Fred, “My Mtn. Song 27,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1969.
Creeley, Robert, “Mehr Light . . . ,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1969.
Camper, Fred, “Sexual Meditation No.1: Motel, a Film by Stan Brakhage,” and “23rd Psalm Branch (Song XXIII), a Film by Stan Brakhage,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.
Levoff, Daniel, “Brakhage’s The Act of Seeing with One’s Own Eyes,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1973.
James, D., “The Filmmaker as Romantic Poet: Brakhage and Olson,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Spring 1982.
“Brakhage Sections” of Monthly Film Bulletin (London), February and March 1986.

Stan Brakhage was the last and youngest of the great generation of American avant-garde filmmakers who came to cinema during and soon after the Second World War. Between 1952 and 1995 he has made approximately 250 films, some shorter than a minute long and one more than four hours. Naturally, in this immense oeuvre the short films predominate; the majority fall between ten and forty minutes. Until 1964 he completed one or two films a year; the four of 1959 were an exception and signals of a major breakthrough in his art; since then the norm has been closer to five annually. Even Andy Warhol’s astonishing fecundity dwarfs in comparison when we consider that his work was largely finished when he photographed a film—for he never edited and rarely even had to assemble or order reels—and that his most intensive productivity was limited to a five-year period (1963–1968).

The sheer enormity of Brakhage’s filmography encourages some sort of division into periods to facilitate discussion. The first six years—from Interim (1952) to Anticipation of the Night (1958), his first major work—can be considered Brakhage’s apprenticeship to his art. These initial works were predominantly psychodramas: often fantasies of suicide motored by sexual frustration and adolescent despair. He employed a version of the bodily camera movement Marie Menken perfected before he ever knew her work; but it was a commission from Joseph Cornell to film New York’s Third Avenue E1 before it was torn down that inspired his recognition of the rhythmic and structural potential of vehicular motion (The Wonder Ring, 1955).

His marriage to Jane Colllom at the end of 1957 coincided with a surge of invention and increased authority from the four films of 1959 (Wedlock House: An Intercourse, Window Water Baby Moving, Cat’s Cradle, and Sirius Remembered)—in which he explored the possibilities of the cinematic crisis-lyric, which he had largely invented himself—to Dog Star Man (1961–64) and its four-and-one-half-hour exfoliation, The Art of Vision (1965). He abandoned what he had called “drama,” a complex term that included the use of actors and staged fantasies, to concentrate on sights he encountered in his routine daily life. Eros and death (but no longer suicide) continued to be his central themes, along with a new preoccupation with childbirth—he filmed the arrival of the three children Jane bore during that period. Animal life (and death) too became the focus of several films, inspired by Jane, a passionate naturalist. During this time of fervor and enthusiasm he completed and published his most important theoretical volume, Metaphors on Vision (1964).

Brakhage, the most Emersonian of American filmmakers, struggled to make a virtue of his self-trust and of his dire economic poverty in the next phase of his career (1964–1970). When the theft of his 16mm equipment, from a car in New York City, curtailed the flood of highly original short lyrical films in 1964, he turned to inexpensive 8mm filmmaking and a series of thirty Songs (1964–69), until his elaborate editing and printing drove him yet again into serious debt. One solution to these costs was painting on film: The Horseman, the Woman, and the Moth (1968). By the end of the 1960s his severe poverty was slightly eased by minuscule production grants and exhausting lecture tours. To the abiding subjects of birth, sex, death, and animals he added a vigorous exploration of cinematic portraiture and an increasing attention to landscapes. He was living with his wife and now five children in a very small cabin, purchased by his in-laws, high in the Colorado Rockies, when he initiated a large-scale autobiography in 16mm, of which the four-part Scenes from under Childhood and the three-part The Weir-Falcon Saga were completed by 1970. His project, tentatively called The Book of the Film, was to have been, he half-humorously predicted, a twenty-four-hour-long film. Initially he conceived the autobiography as generalized and emblematic: his observations of his young children would provide the visual materials for an allegory of the growth of his mind, as well as stimulate his buried memories.

In the first half of the 1970s oppositional pressures drove his work in two apparently opposite directions: his films became more reflective and subtle on the one hand, and more anxious to make contact with the world. Similarly, in his writings he attempted to reimagine the lives and reevaluate the achievements of the great filmmakers of the past, justifying his liberal elaboration of facts with the analogy of Gertrude Stein’s biographical fantasies. With the help of the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburgh he made three films he thought of as “documentaries,” very personal views of a day in a police patrol car, another in a hospital operating theatre, and the most startling, a day at the morgue (eves, deux ex, The Act of Seeing with One’s Own Eyes, 1971). A series of Sexual Meditations (1970–72) pictured his erotic fantasies when he slept in motels on lecture tours; in making these too he had indirect institutional help: students in the colleges he visited willingly served a nude models. During the same years he made his first personal autobiography: Sincerity (reel one, 1973) uses childhood photographs, the environs of Dartmouth College (which he attended for a semester before quitting to make films), and filmed snippets of the making of his first film. He also created a number of “tone poems” which embodied his emerging theory of “moving visual thinking,” the cinematic mimesis of elusive cognitive acts.

The harsh irony of this period, from 1970 to 1974, culminating in the completion of his long abstract film, The Text of Light—wholly composed of luminous splays of light passing through a crystal ashtray, it was the paradigm of his inward turn at the time—was that institutional support transformed but did not alleviate substantially his marginal economy. He was asked by the Art Institute of Chicago to give courses every spring semester: they paid his travel expenses and a rather high salary for the eight trips—every other week—he made from Colorado. But it added up to less than a poorly paid full-time teaching position. A sputtering trickle of grants and the distribution of his films through the filmmakers cooperatives in New York and San Francisco helped sustain his impressive productivity only with dramatically increasing debts to film laboratories.

The autobiographical series Sincerity I-V (1973–1980) and Duplicity I-III (1978–1980) dominate his work of the late 1970s. Brakhage had insisted on the aesthetic purity and visual intensification of silence since 1956, experimenting with sound tracks merely four times until a change of stance in the late 1980s. In an extreme and problematic extension of his confidence in the truth of vision, by making The Governor (1977), an hour-long silent scrutiny of Colorado Governor Richard Lamm at work and at home, he tried to apply the experience of his Pittsburgh films to “a study of light and power” as an optical examination of politics, personally observed.

Most of his energetic output of films in the 1980s refractions the prolonged crisis culminating in the end of the marriage in which he had been so invested as an artist and polemicist. The key documents representing aspects of that agony would be Tortured Dust (1984), a four-part film of sexual tensions surrounding life at home with his two teenage sons; Confession (1986), depicting a love affair near the end of his marriage (1987); and the Faust series (1987–1989), four autonomous sound films reinterpreting the legend that obsessed Brakhage throughout his career. He had begun the 1980s with two related series of silent “abstract” films—modulations of color and light without identifiable imagery—The Roman Numeral Series (1979–1981), nine films “which explore the possibilities of making equivalents of ‘moving visual thinking,’ that pre-language, pre-‘picture’ realm of the mind which provides the physical grounds for image making (imagination), thus the very substance of the birth of imagery”; and The Arabic Numeral Series (1980–1982), nineteen “abstract” films “formed by the intrinsic grammar of the most inner (perhaps prenatal) structure of thought itself.”

The most recent phase of Brakhage’s filmmaking spans from 1989, the year he married Marilyn Jull and published Film at Wit’s End, until 1995. In this 1989 book, his most lucid and coherent since Metaphors on Vision, Brakhage offered his analysis of the sensibilities of eight of his contemporaries in the avant-garde cinema. The filmmaker’s often repeated tendency to elaborate on an isolated experiment or an idea from an earlier moment of his career, producing much later an extended series of films, makes demarcation of periods frustratingly unclear. Such is the unexpected production of eleven films with sound tracks out of the total of thirty films he made between 1987 and 1992. Although seven of his first twelve films (1952–1957) had sound tracks, only four (Blue Moses [1962], Fire of Waters [1965], Scenes from under Childhood: Section No. 1 [1967], and The Stars Are Beautiful [1974]) of the some 200 films of the intervening years were not silent. Similarly, painting on film has been one of Brakhage’s privileged strategies since 1961, but it did not assume a dominant place in his filmography until the 1980s. Not only does he call upon earlier options from his filmmaking for further exploration, but he measures and questions his development and its modes of consistency by returning to previously fecund themes, locations, and image associations. So the periods tentatively outlined here are traced within a palimpsest of filmic revisions.

—P. Adams Sitney

BRANAGH, Kenneth

Nationality: British. Born: Belfast, Northern Ireland, 10 December 1960; family moved to Reading, England, 1969. Education: Meadway Comprehensive School, Reading; Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, London, graduated 1982. Family: Married actress Emma Thompson, 1989 (divorced, 1996). Career: Actor on the West End stage and on television, beginning 1982; early stage successes included Another Country, 1982, and Francis (as St. Francis of Assisi), 1984, both plays written by Julian Mitchell; joined the Royal Shakespeare Company, 1983, and at twenty-three became the youngest actor ever to play the title role in Shakespeare’s Henry V; also appeared in the RSC’s Hamlet (as Laertes) and Love’s Labour’s Lost (as the King of Navarre), playing the three roles in repertory in Stratford and London, 1984–85; wrote and directed play Tell Me Honestly, 1985; left RSC to produce and direct Romeo and Juliet, 1986 (in which he also starred); with actor David Parfitt, created the Renaissance Theatre Company, 1987; Renaissance productions in which Branagh played a prominent role included: Public Enemy (also written by Branagh); Twelfth Night (directed by Branagh; also televised), 1987; Hamlet (as Hamlet, directed by Derek Jacobi); As You Like It (as Touchstone, directed by Geraldine McEwan); Much Ado about Nothing (as Benedick, directed by Judi Dench), 1988; John Osborne’s Look Back in Anger (as Jimmy

---

Kenneth Branagh
Porter, also televised); King Lear (as Edgar, also directed); A Midsummer Night’s Dream (as Peter Quince, also directed), 1989; Uncle Vanya (co-directed); and Coriolanus (title role), 1992. Returned to the Royal Shakespeare Company to star in Hamlet in London and Stratford, 1992–93; television work includes roles in The Boy in the Bush, the Billy Trilogy, adaptations of Virginia Woolf’s To the Lighthouse, Ibsen’s Ghosts, and O’Neill’s Strange Interlude, Fortunes of War (mini-series), The Lady’s Not for Burning and Shadow of a Gunman, 1982–1995; also narrated television documentary series, Cinema Europe: The Other Hollywood, 1995; acted in first film, High Season, 1987; formed film production company, Renaissance Films PLC, October 1988; directed first film, Henry V, 1989; acted in star-studded Renaissance Theatre Company radio broadcasts (available on CD and cassette) commissioned by the BBC to commemorate Shakespeare’s birthday, 1992–94; other radio work includes Diaries of Samuel Pepys and Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein. Awards: Bancroft Gold Medal, Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, 1982; Most Promising Newcomer Award, Society of West End Theatres, 1982, for Another Country; Best New Director from New York Film Critics Circle, Evening Standard Best Film of the Year, Best Film and Technical Achievement Award from British Film Institute, Best Director Award from British Academy of Film and Television Artists (BAFTA), and Best Director Award from National Board of Review, all 1989–90, all for Henry V; Honorary D. Lit., Queen’s University, Belfast, 1990; “Golden Quill” Award from America’s Shakespeare Guild, 2000.

Films as Director and Actor:

1989   Henry V (+ title role, adapt)
1991   Dead Again (+ ro as Mike Church/Roman Strauss)
1992   Peter’s Friends (+ ro as Andrew Benson, pr); Swan Song (d only)
1993   Much Ado about Nothing (+ ro as Benedick, adapt, co-pr)
1994   Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein (+ ro as Dr. Frankenstein, co-pr)
1995   In the Bleak Midwinter (A Midwinter’s Tale) (d only, + sc)
1996   Hamlet (+ title role, adapt)
1999   The Betty Schimmel Story
2000   Love’s Labour’s Lost (+ro as Berowne, adapt)

Other Films:

1987   High Season (ro); A Month in the Country (ro)
1993   Swing Kids (ro)
1995   Gielgud: Scenes from Nine Decades (doc for British TV) (narrator)
1995   Othello (ro, pr); Anne Frank Remembered (narrator); Cinema Europe: The Other Hollywood (doc series for British TV) (narrator)
1996   Looking for Richard (Pacino) (as himself)
1998   Cold War (series for TV) (as Narrator); The Gingerbread Man (Altman) (ro as Richard “Rick” Magruder); The Proposition (ro as Father Michael McKinnon); Celebrity (Allen) (ro as Lee Simon); The Theory of Flight (ro as Richard); The Dance of Shiva (ro as Colonel Evans)

1999   Wild Wild West (ro as Dr. Arliss Loveless)
2000   How to Kill Your Neighbor’s Dog (ro as Peter McGowan); The Road to El Dorado (voice of Miguel)

Publications

By BRANAGH: books—

Public Enemy (play), 1988.
Beginning (autobiography), Norton, 1989.
Much Ado about Nothing (screen adaptation, introduction, and notes on the making of the film), Norton, 1993.
In the Bleak Midwinter (screenplay with introduction), Nick Hern Books, 1995.

By BRANAGH: articles and interviews—

“Formidable Force,” an interview with Michael Billington, in Interview, October 1989.
Interview with Joan Lunden, broadcast on Good Morning, America, American Broadcasting Company, 23 August 1991 (program number 1355).
Interview with Charles Gibson, broadcast on Good Morning, America, American Broadcasting Company, 21 December 1992 (program number 1701).
“Once More, onto the Screen,” an interview with Peter Barnes, in Los Angeles Times, 2 May 1993.
“Kenneth Branagh and Emma Thompson Discuss Collaboration Much Ado about Nothing,” an interview broadcast on Showbiz Today, CNN, 11 May 1993 (program number 293).
“Branagh Talks about Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein,” an interview with Charlie Rose, broadcast on the Public Broadcasting System, 26 October 1994 (program number 1234).
“It’s a Monster!,” an interview with Graham Fuller, in Interview, November 1994.
“Branagh Discusses His Life and Career,” an interview with Charlie Rose, broadcast on the Public Broadcasting System, 30 December 1994 (program number 1281).
“Branagh’s ‘Bracing’ Encounter with the Bard,” in Variety (Brewster), 16–22 December 1996.
“Hamlets forspill,” an interview with J. Ova, in Film & Kino (Oslo), 1996.
“Idol Chatter,” an interview with A. Weisel, in Premiere (Boulder), December 1996.
On BRANAGH: books—

Shuttleworth, Ian, Ken & Em: A Biography of Kenneth Branagh and Emma Thompson, St. Martin’s, 1995.

On BRANAGH: articles—

Willson, Robert F., Jr., “Henry V: Branagh’s and Olivier’s Choruses,” in Shakespeare on Film Newsletter, April 1990.

Lane, Robert, “‘When Blood Is Their Argument: Class, Character, and Historymaking in Shakespeare’s and Branagh’s Henry V,’” in ELH, Spring 1994.

Lundeen, Kathleen, “Pumping up the Word with Cinematic Supplements,” in Film Criticism (Edinboro, PA), Fall 1999.

* * *

It is impossible to consider Kenneth Branagh’s meteoric rise as a film director and actor without taking into account the career in the British theatre which shaped it—and to which Branagh still periodically returns. Classically trained at the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art in London, where he was awarded the prestigious Bancroft Gold Medal as outstanding student of the year, Branagh completed his course of study in 1982, then moved rapidly into a series of attention-getting roles on the West End and on television. His early association with Shakespeare’s plays began with an invitation to join the Royal Shakespeare Company at the age of twenty-three, and he became the youngest actor ever to perform the title role in an RSC production of Henry V. Important parts in other Shakespeare productions in that 1984–85 season contributed to Branagh’s emergence as a stage director soon thereafter.

He left the RSC to direct an independent production of Romeo and Juliet (in which he also starred) and, primarily, to form (with actor David Parfitt) his own production group, which became a reality in 1987 as the Renaissance Theatre Company. Renaissance acquired a high profile in rapid time, with Branagh and other major British actors directing a variety of productions in which they also appeared, in London and on national and international tours. Hamlet (with Branagh in the title role, directed by Derek Jacobi)—which, like Henry V, would become a play with which Branagh would be permanently linked—and Twelfth Night (directed by Branagh and later remounted for television) were among Renaissance’s most successful late-1980s productions. The company’s success enabled Branagh to make his first film, now financed through the production company he called Renaissance Films PLC.

Most actors who turn to film directing do so in mid-career, ordinarily after they have obtained considerable experience in front of the camera. Even Laurence Olivier, whose professional path Branagh’s career so frequently appears to emulate, did not direct his first film until he was in his late thirties, and by then, after twenty-two screen appearances, he was a major star. In 1989, when Branagh directed his first film at the age of twenty-nine, his scant movie experience included just two feature films. By that time, however, he had achieved remarkable success as an actor, director, and producer on the British stage and in a variety of important television roles. And, as it happened, he had already written several plays of his own, one of them (Tell Me Honestly) produced by the RSC, another (Public Enemy) produced to launch the first Renaissance season. In this unusual, multitalented respect, Branagh’s formative years most resemble the early career of Orson Welles—who made Citizen Kane, his first film, when he was twenty-six, after establishing a formidable theatre and radio presence in the late 1930s. Welles had the Mercury Theatre as his special training ground; Branagh had the Renaissance.

It is surely no accident, however, that the first film Branagh directed (and adapted and starred in) was the same first film which Laurence Olivier directed (and adapted and starred in): Henry V, the final history play in Shakespeare’s tetralogy on kingship, which begins with Richard II and also includes King Henry IV, Parts One and Two. The comparisons and contrasts between the two films are genuinely striking, reflective of the periods in which they were made and of the imposing talents of the men who made them.

Olivier, responding to Winston Churchill’s plea for a film to rally Britain in the final days of World War II, creates a ringingly, unambiguously heroic Henry for the ages, an idealized monarch who leads England to victory against France with commanding force tempered by humanity. Olivier’s Henry V ensures that English history is represented as comedy. The excision of lines spoken by the Chorus in the play’s final scene makes the romantic pairing of Henry and Katherine appear deceptively permanent, thereby assuring the wartime spectator of a stable English future in fact contradicted by Shakespeare’s text and by English history. This interpretation is visually reinforced: Olivier’s Henry V artfully shot to highlight a deliberate sense of artificial cinema space; a Disneyesque mise-en-scene, with its heightened technicolored landscapes, illustrates a fairy-tale universe in which battles are won with little serious injury.

Olivier’s and Branagh’s versions of Henry V have virtually identical running times (136 and 138 minutes, respectively). Like Olivier’s version, Branagh’s attempts to create a reflexive illusion of theatre itself in the film’s opening section, though Branagh alters and reduces Olivier’s reconstruction of Shakespeare’s Globe Theatre to insinuations of a movie sound stage. Like Olivier’s version, Branagh’s includes explicit references to Henry’s earlier relationship with Falstaff in the two Henry IV plays. And, like Olivier’s actors, Branagh’s dazzling cast (many of them associated with Renaissance) includes some of the finest Shakespearean verse speakers available.

In virtually every other respect, Branagh’s film diverges from Olivier’s. His Henry V represents history as tragedy. Significant passages omitted by Olivier, because they reflect flaws in Henry’s character or guilt at his father’s usurpation of the crown from Richard II, are restored by Branagh. Although he properly retains the heroic elements required by such set speeches as the Saint Crispian’s Day call to arms, his portrayal of the king emphasizes the dark and complex elements within Henry’s character. Unlike Olivier’s version, Branagh’s film includes the conspiracy against Henry. This portion of the film is dimly lit, heavily shadowed. Henry behaves in Machiavellian fashion and appears unsympathetic in his own conspiratorial behavior. In text restored to the Harfleur sequence, Henry looks and sounds downright pathological. War scenes feature death marches; soldiers die in mud and muck. Quick cuts, slow-motion photography, extended tracking shots, and unusual framing perspectives are employed to heighten the inescapable anti-war ideology vital to Branagh’s approach. A few more liberties are taken with the text than in Olivier’s version, including the placement of the king at the hanging of Bardolph. The inclusion of liturgical music in Patrick Doyle’s wonderfully evocative score contributes movingly to the film’s power. Most notable of all, perhaps, Branagh restores the lines Olivier cut from the Chorus’s speech which conclude the play on such a dark note. Henry V may, indeed, have created the world’s “best garden,” but the peaceful idyll he achieved was short-lived once his infant son inherited the throne: “Henry the Sixth, in infant bands crowned King/Of France and England, did this King succeed./Whose state so many had the managing/That they lost France, and made his England bleed.”

By any measure, Branagh’s Henry V is a stunning film. That it succeeded so powerfully in duplicating, perhaps surpassing, Olivier’s achievement is all the more striking in the context of its director’s youthful audacity. Branagh’s other Shakespeare films include the superb Much Ado about Nothing, Hamlet, and Othello (with Branagh cast as a vividly slimy Iago), which Branagh unfortunately did not direct. Othello is visually tame, the Shakespeare text excessively cut.

But Much Ado about Nothing proved that Branagh’s success with Henry V was no fluke. Co-starring Emma Thompson as Beatrice opposite Branagh’s Benedick, Much Ado certified his nimble approach in making Shakespeare accessible and entertaining, while preserving much of the original poetry and literacy. Branagh’s screen adaptations of Much Ado and Hamlet also confirm what had become strikingly evident in his leadership of the Renaissance Theatre Company: He is a keenly savvy—some might say cynically savvy—marketer of his projects. By casting such actors as Keanu Reeves, Denzel Washington, and Robert Sean Leonard alongside Branagh, Thompson, and other British actors in Much Ado, and by casting Robin Williams, Jack Lemmon, Gerard Depardieu, and Billy Crystal alongside Branagh, Derek Jacobi, John Gielgud, and Julie Christie in Hamlet, Branagh strengthens his films’ potential international markets, particularly in the United States. Such patterns of casting do not always work, but they do help to attract financing and have influenced recent attempts by others to adapt Shakespeare to the screen.

Although the text of Much Ado about Nothing has been severely pruned by Branagh, like his Henry V, it emerges on screen as a highly intelligent, clearly told story. Filmed on location in Tuscany, Much Ado is visually enchanting, as vibrantly bright and sensually warm as Henry V is consciously dark and (until the wooing scene) cold. Like so much of his film work, Branagh’s reading of Much Ado derives a great deal from his performance (also opposite Emma Thompson) in Renaissance’s stage production of the play, directed by Judi Dench in 1988. Branagh has written of the potentially filmic images that haunted him during performances of that production in his introduction to the published screenplay: “One night during Balthasar’s song ‘Sigh No More, Ladies,’ the title sequence of this film played over and over in my mind; heat, haze and dust, grapes and horseflesh, and a nod to The Magnificent Seven. The men’s sexy arrival, the atmosphere of rural Messina, the vigour and sensuality of the women, possessed me in the weeks, months, and years that followed.”

“Emotional volatility,” Branagh writes in this essay, was the key to the Beatrice-Benedick relationship. But, most especially—in Much Ado as in virtually all Renaissance stage and screen productions—the rehearsal process depended on a genuine desire to eliminate “artificial Shakespeare voices” in favor of acting “naturalness” which would retain the poetry while conveying the “realistic, conversational tone” present in much of the play’s original dialogue. The witty battle of the sexes, so often the essence of comedy, is splendidly articulated here in the Branagh-Thompson dueling lovers. Like Henry V, Much Ado proves in both visual and aural terms that, even when Branagh cuts Shakespeare’s text perhaps more than he should, he knows exactly how and why he is doing it.

Among Branagh’s non-Shakespearean films, Dead Again deserves special mention. A film in which Branagh and Emma Thompson both play dual roles, it reveals Branagh’s knowledge of other films, filmmakers, and genres—and his considerable versatility as both actor and director. Dead Again employs numerous conventions of film noir, including the periodic insertion of a 1940s plot-line, shot in black and white, into the film’s main story, which is photographed in color. Numerous references to specific films (including Citizen Kane, Psycho, Vertigo, and noir detective pictures) periodically appear. (Dead Again even makes droll reference to one of its featured actor’s early television successes: Derek Jacobi’s I, Claudius series.) The film’s detective hero, Mike Church, displays Branagh in James Cagney mode. The screenplay and performances are extremely witty, by turns frightening the spectator into total identification or saturating him with over-the-top red herrings that become self-reflexively and genuinely funny. Robin Williams’s uncredited appearance as a psychiatrist is among the film’s cleverest surprises.

Peter’s Friends and In the Bleak Midwinter are modest entertainments, partially autobiographical, it would appear, particularly In the Bleak Midwinter (released in the United States as A Midwinter’s Tale). Here, Branagh affectionately satirizes a group of actors attempting to mount a production of Hamlet, and the film appeals especially to admirers of British theatre. It should be noted, particularly in audience anticipation of Branagh’s Hamlet movie, that he returned to the RSC to play the title role in a magnificent, sold-out production of that play (directed by Adrian Noble) during the 1992–93 season. In numerous ways, Hamlet is likely to be the Shakespeare play with which Branagh (who also directed the all-star BBC radio version) remains most closely identified.

Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein is as “big” a Branagh film as Peter’s Friends and In the Bleak Midwinter are small ones. Produced by Francis Ford Coppola and costing forty-four million dollars, the film stars Branagh (who also directed) as Victor Frankenstein and Robert De Niro as the tormented creature. It contains numerous imaginative pleasures, but its overblown representation of an implicitly overblown story brought general critical wrath upon Branagh’s head at the time of its release. It has become a rare example of a Branagh film that (to date) is a commercial failure.

In January, 2000, Branagh was awarded the Golden Quill by the Shakespeare Guild, an American society devoted to fostering appreciation of the Bard in the United States. The award preceded by three months the American premiere of Branagh’s film Much Ado about Nothing—a work taking what might be considered substantial liberties with the Shakespearean text. Branagh, who starred, directed, and wrote the screenplay, set the story in the 1930s and made it a musical comedy, complete with period songs by Irving Berlin and Cole Porter. American critics tended to praise the film for its freshness and mixture of cinematic styles; British reviewers were, on the whole, considerably less generous.

The careers of Kenneth Branagh and Emma Thompson, as frequent co-stars and a prominent acting couple, have attracted considerable publicity, especially since their marriage in 1989 and separation in 1995. (Their relationship has invited frequent comparison to the one between Laurence Olivier and Vivien Leigh, who eventually divorced.) Each has always made films without the other; and Thompson has won Oscars for Best Actress in Howards End and for Best Screenplay Adaptation for Jane Austen’s Sense and Sensibility. Nevertheless, some of the most magical moments in Branagh’s films feature the two of them together (Henry V, Peter’s Friends, Dead Again, Much Ado about Nothing).

—Mark W. Estrin, updated by Justin Gustains

BREILLAT, Catherine

Nationality: French. Born: Bressuire, France, 13 July 1948. Education: Graduated high school at age 16; went to Paris to study Oriental languages, but dropped out to begin writing novels. Career: Wrote her first novel, L’Homme facile, at age eighteen, 1966; had supporting role in Bertolucci’s Last Tango in Paris, 1972; made directorial debut with Une vrai jeune fille, 1976; her third feature, 36 fillette, became her first to be released in the United States, 1989; retrospective of her work presented at the Rotterdam Film Festival, in conjunction with the world premiere of Romance, with other retrospectives held at the Museum of Fine Arts in Boston, Anthology Film Archives in New York, and Art Institute of Chicago, 1999. Address: c/o French Film Office, 745 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10151.

Films as Director/Screenwriter:

1976 Une vrai jeune fille (A True Young Woman)
1979 Tapage nocturne (Night Noises)
1988 36 fillette (Virgin) (co-sc)
1990 Sale comme un ange (Dirty Lake an Angel)
1995 A propos de Nice, la suite (d of segment, “Aux Nicois qui mal y pensant”)
1996 Parfait amour! (Perfect Love)
1999 Romance

Other Films:

1972 Last Tango in Paris (Bertolucci) (ro)
1975 Catherine et Cie (Catherine & Company) (Boisrond) (co-sc)
1977 Bilitis (Hamilton) (co-sc); Dracula pere et fils (Dracula and Son) (Molinaro) (ro)
1982 Gli Occhi, la bocca (The Eyes, the Mouth) (Belloccchio) (asst ed)
1984 E la nave va (And the Ship Sails On) (Fellini) (co-sc)
1985 Police (Pialat) (co-sc)
1987 Milan noir (Black Milan) (Chammah) (co-sc)
1988 Zanzibar (Pascal) (co-sc)
1990 Le Diable au corps (Vergez—for TV) (co-sc); Aventure de Catherine C. (Beuchot) (co-sc)
1992 La Thune (Money) (Galland) (co-sc)
1994 Couples et amants (Lvoff) (co-sc)
2000 Selon Mathieu (co-sc)

Publications

By BREILLAT: books—

Le Soupirail, Paris, 1974
Police, Paris, 1985

By BREILLAT: articles—

“Sex, Love, and ‘Romance,’” interview with Dana Thomas, in Newsweek (New York), 26 April 1999

On BREILLAT: articles—

Palmiere, Michel, “‘Le cinema a-t-il un sexe?’,” in Elle (Paris), 17 May 1999.
Bear, Liza, “‘Catherine Breillat’s Romance,’” in Bomb (New York), Fall 1999.
Murphy, Kathleen, “‘A Matter of Skin . . .’,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1999.

Darke, Chris, “‘Film: Yes, But Isn’t It Pornography?’,” in Independent (London), 19 September 1999.
Kirkland, Bruce, “‘Punching up the Sex? Romance, Fight Club Don’t Push the Envelope So Much as Rip It Wide Open,’” in Toronto Sun, 16 October 1999.

* * *

It is not so much her subject matter that makes novelist/actress-turned-director/screenwriter Catherine Breillat so provocative and controversial. Rather, it is the manner in which she depicts that subject matter, the choices she makes as a filmmaker as she portrays her characters and their sexual longings. None of the liaisons in Breillat’s films are “traditional,” because of the age differences between the characters or their stations in life. Their unions are injurious and obsessive, with Breillat not holding back in any way as she explores the manner in which duplicity, contrition, and rejection kindle sexual yearning. Her primary focus most often is on her female characters and their carnal appetites. In this regard, Breillat has spent her directorial career re-making the same film (albeit with heroines ranging in age from adolescence through early middle-age).

With boring regularity, Hollywood has churned out films focusing on teen-agers and their rampaging hormones. Yet Breillat’s 36 fillette is a different, and decidedly more adult, take on this theme. Breillat tells the story of Lili, a restless, alienated fourteen-year-old who attracts the attention of several men—and, in particular, a middle-aged playboy—while on vacation with her family. As the story unfolds, the question arises: Will she or won’t she lose her virginity?

What sets 36 fillette apart from other teen coming-of-age films is the way in which Breillat presents her lead character. Lili’s sexual curiosity does not lead her to boys her own age; instead, she is involved with males who might be her father. The focus of the story is on her, and not her potential sexual partners; she is depicted as being just as much of a sexual predator as any male. Despite her age and lack of sexual experience, Lili is no tentative, blushing innocent. Neither is she a sexual victim. She is instead an indecisive young woman whose fully developed body mirrors her craving for sexual initiation. As Breillat explores the social and sexual realities of the character, the men with whom she deals serve as mere props; they exist solely as a means for Lili to explore the power of her emerging sexuality. And the sexuality Breillat portrays is explicit; her character’s tender age is no excuse for the filmmaker to cut away from actress Delphine Zentou’s voluptuous body during the film’s sex scenes. 36 fillette—and, for that matter, all of Breillat’s films—may not be in the same artistic league as the all-time-best cinematic chronicles of sexuality and desire, adolescent or otherwise. What sets them apart are the choices the filmmaker makes for her lead characters, and the candid manner in which she portrays their sexuality.

Breillat began her career as a novelist, and was a published author while still in her teens; because of its salty language, her first book, L’Homme facile, was the subject of controversy in her native France. She started out in cinema as an actress—fittingly, she had a role in Bertolucci’s Last Tango in Paris—and then co-scripted such inconsequential sexploitation films as Michel Boisrond’s Catherine et Cie and David Hamilton’s Bilitis. Despite its trite handing, Catherine et Cie does offer up a tale of female sexual empowerment as it chronicles the attempt of a prostitute to incorporate herself. Then Breillat’s writing credits grew in stature: Fellini’s E la nave va (And the Ship Sails On) and Maurice Pialat’s Police. The latter deals with characteristic Breillat material as it charts the plight of a racist, sexist police detective who is drawn to a sensual, streetwise young woman involved in a drug smuggling case.

Breillat’s directorial debut, One vrai jeune fille, spotlights a young teen’s fixation on her burgeoning sexuality. However, Breillat really came into her own as a cinematic talent with 36 fillette, which allegedly is autobiographical (and also is based on one of her novels). In her subsequent films, she has not shied away from graphic sexual depictions. Sale comme un ange, her follow-up to 36 fillette, chronicles the relationship between the wife of a young cop and her husband’s partner, a self-hating, fifty-year-old police inspector. The sex scenes between the two are as fiercely candid as those in 36 fillette. Parfait amour! is the story of a middle-class divorcee in her late thirties and her disastrous affair with a self-involved man who not only is unsettled but is a decade her junior. In Parfait amour! Breillat also pushes the sexual envelope; the film includes a scene in which a hairbrush is utilized as a sexual apparatus.

Along with 36 fillette, Breillat’s highest-profile feature to date is Romance. Here, she explores the erotic desires of Marie, a twenty-something schoolteacher whose boyfriend refuses to have sexual relations with her; summarily, Marie sets out on a sexual odyssey in which she experiments with several different partners. Romance may not be the first mainstream film to feature oral sex, or a woman undergoing a gynecological examination. However, such sequences usually are discreetly filmed; the physical activity is suggested, rather than shown in detail. Yet in Romance, Breillat’s staging and camera placement allow the audience an unencumbered view of Caroline Ducey, the actress playing Marie, performing fellatio on Sagamore Steven, the actor playing her boyfriend. During the exam sequence, Marie is shown spread-eagled and in full view. And the male nudity in Romance is more than just full-frontal; Breillat shows the erect member of one of Marie’s sex partners (played by porn star Rocco Siffredi).

So why is Romance not an exploitation film? The fact that it has been made by a woman filmmaker is an inadequate explanation. After all, a woman is just as capable as a man of directing a film that exists solely to titillate the viewer with hardcore sex scenes. Romance is not pornographic because of the context in which its scenes are presented. Marie is, like Lili in 36 fillette, a sexual being. She is sexually empowered. In a more dated, traditional film depicting relations between men and women—the classics of this type might feature Doris Day and Rock Hudson—the male is the aggressor while the female is sexually withholding, heroically grasping onto her virginity until her wedding night. Yet in Romance, Marie is sexually experienced; she relishes her eroticism, and is anguished by her boyfriend’s ambivalence. Breillat illustrates her character’s desires by allowing the camera to reveal all during the sex scenes; she depicts Marie’s womanhood by her shot selection in the doctors’ exam sequence. By making these choices, Breillat presents images that might be disturbing to some, and might not be for all tastes, but that nevertheless feature an honesty and forthrightness that is not so much shocking as liberating.

—Rob Edelman

BRESSON, Robert

Films as Director:

1934 Affaires publiques (+ sc)
1943 Les Anges du péché (Angels of the Streets) (+ sc)
1945 Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne (The Ladies of the Bois de Boulogne) (+ sc)

Robert Bresson
1950 Journal d’un curé de campagne (Diary of a Country Priest) (+ sc)
1956 Un Condamné a mort s’est échappé (Le Vent souffle où il veut; A Condemned Man Escapes) (+ sc)
1959 Pickpocket (+ sc)
1962 Procès de Jeanne d’Arc (The Trial of Joan of Arc) (+ sc)
1966 Au hasard Balthazar (Balthazar) (+ sc)
1967 Mouchette (+ sc)
1969 Une Femme douce (+ sc)
1971 Quatre Nuits d’un rêveur (Four Nights of a Dreamer) (+ sc)
1974 Lancelot du Lac (Le Graal; Lancelot of the Lake) (+ sc)
1977 Le Diable probablement (+ sc)
1983 L’Argent (+ sc)

Other Films:

1933 C’était un musicien (Zelnick and Gleize) (dialogue)
1936 Les Jumeaux de Brighton (Heymann) (co-sc); Courrier Sud (Billon) (co-adaptation)

Publications

By BRESSON: book—

By BRESSON: articles—

Interview with Ian Cameron, in Movie (London), February 1963.
Interview with Jean-Luc Godard and M. Delahaye, in Cahiers du Cinéma in English (New York), February 1967.
Interview, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1976/77.

On BRESSON: books—

On BRESSON: articles—

Green, Marjorie, “Robert Bresson,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1960.

Bleecere, Sylvain De, “Bressons beelden,” in Film en Televisie (Brussels), October 1996.

Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 7, 1997.

On BRESSON: films—

* * *

Robert Bresson began and quickly gave up a career as a painter, turning to cinema in 1934. The short film he made that year, Affaires publiques, has not yet been shown. His next work, Les Anges du péché, was his first feature film, followed by Les Dames du Bois du Boulogne and Journal d’un curé de campagne, which firmly established his reputation as one of the world’s most rigorous and demanding filmmakers. In the next fifteen years he made only four films: Un Condamné à mort s’est échappé, Pickpocket, Procès de Jeanne d’Arc, and Au hasard Balthazar, each a work of masterful originality and unlike the others. From then until his death in 1999, he made films with more frequency and somewhat less intensity. In 1975 Gallimard published his gnomic Notes sur le cinématographe. As a whole Bresson’s œuvre constitutes a crucial investigation of the nature of cinematic narration. All three films of the 1950s are variations on the enigma of human will; they seem insufficiently motivated, but are pure acts of accepting death.

For the most part, Bresson employed only amateur actors. He avoided histrionics and seldom permitted his “models” (as he called them, drawing a metaphor from painting) to give a traditional performance. The emotional tensions of the films derive from the elaborate interchange of glances, subtle camera movements, offscreen sounds, carefully placed bits of baroque and classical music, and rhythmical editing.

The Bressonian hero is often defined by what he or she sees. We come to understand the sexual tensions of Ambricourt from a few shots seen from the country priest’s perspective; the fierce desire to escape helps the condemned man to see the most ordinary objects as tools for his purpose; the risk the pickpocket initially takes to prove his moral superiority to himself leads him to see thefts where we might only notice people jostling one another: the film initiates its viewers into his privileged perspective. Only at the end does he realize that this obsessive mode of seeing has blinded him to a love which he ecstatically embraces.

Conversely, Mouchette kills herself suddenly when she sees the death of a hare (with which she identified herself); the heroine of Une Femme douce kills herself because she can see no value in things, while her pawnbroker husband sees nothing but the monetary worth of everything he handles. The most elaborate form this concentration on seeing takes in Bresson’s cinema is the structure of Au hasard Balthazar, where the range of human vices is seen through the eyes of a donkey as he passes through a series of owners.

The intricate shot-countershot of Bresson’s films reinforces his emphasis on seeing, as does his careful use of camera movement. Often he reframes within a shot to bring together two different objects of attention. The cumulative effect of this meticulous and often obsessive concentration on details is the sense of a transcendent and fateful presence guiding the actions of characters who come to see only at the end, if at all, the pattern and goal of their lives.

Only in Un Condamné, Pickpocket, and Quatre Nuits does the protagonist survive the end of the film. A dominant theme of his cinema is dying with grace. In Mouchette, Une Femme douce, and Le Diable probablement the protagonists commit suicide. In Les Anges and L’Argent they give themselves up as murderers. Clearly Bresson, who was the most prominent of Catholic filmmakers, does not reflect the Church’s condemnation of suicide. Death, as he represented it, comes as the acceptance of one’s fate. The three suicides emphasize the enigma of human will; they seem insufficiently motivated, but are pure acts of accepting death.

—P. Adams Sitney

BROOKS, Albert

Nationality: American. Born: Albert Einstein, 22 July 1947, Beverly Hills, California; son of Harry (a radio comedian; professional name, Parkyakarkus) and Thelma (a singer; maiden name, Leeds) Einstein; brother of Bob Einstein (a comedy writer under his own name and a comedy performer under the name Super Dave Osborne). Education: Attended Carnegie Institute of Technology (now Carnegie-Mellon University), 1966–67. Family: Married Kimberly Shlain, 1997; two children. Career: Sportswriter for KMPC-Radio in Los Angeles, CA, 1962–63; wrote for Turn On ABC TV show, 1968;
Albert Brooks appeared on The Steve Allen Show, 1968; appeared on Dean Martin Presents the Golddiggers (variety show), 1969; voice of Mickey Barnes and Kip, Hot Wheels (animated), TV show, 1969–71; appeared as Rudy Mandel on The Odd Couple, 1970; wrote and directed short films for Saturday Night Live, NBC, 1975–76; wrote “Wall Street Blues” theme song for The Associates TV show, 1979; voice of several guest characters on The Simpsons TV show, 1989; appeared on several TV specials. Awards: National Society of Film Critics Award, best screenplay, for Lost in America, 1985; Funniest Supporting Male in a Motion Picture Award, American Comedy Awards, for Broadcast News, 1988. Address: c/o Gelfand & Rennert, 1880 Century Park East, Los Angeles, CA 90067, U.S.A. Agent: International Creative Management, 8942 Wilshire Blvd., Beverly Hills, CA 90211, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1979  Real Life (ro as Himself) (+ sc)
1981  Modern Romance (ro as Robert Cole) (+ sc)
1985  Lost in America (ro as David Howard) (+ sc)
1991  Defending Your Life (ro as Daniel Miller) (+ sc)
1996  Mother (ro as John Henderson) (+ sc)
1999  The Muse (ro as Steven Phillips) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1976  Taxi Driver (Scorsese) (ro as Tom)
1980  Private Benjamin (Zieff) (ro as Yale Goodman)
1983  Twilight Zone: The Movie (Dante, Landis, Miller, Spielberg) (ro as Driver)
1984  Unfaithfully Yours (Zieff) (ro as Norman Robbins)
1987  Broadcast News (James L. Brooks) (ro as Aaron Altman)
1994  I’ll Do Anything (James L. Brooks) (ro as Burke Adler); The Scout (Ritchie) (sc)
1997  Critical Care (Lumet) (ro as Dr. Butz)
1998  Doctor Dolittle (Thomas) (ro as voice of Tiger); Out of Sight (Soderbergh) (ro as Richard Ripley)
2000  My First Mister (Lahti) (ro)
Publications

By BROOKS: articles—

By BROOKS: albums—

Comedy Minus One, ABC, 1973.

On BROOKS: articles—

Albert Brooks has been called “the West Coast Woody Allen.” While Brooks does write, direct, and star in comedies set in California instead of New York, his films tend to reflect a more consistent tone of baby boomer self-involved angst than do Allen’s films, and are probably more revealing of the director himself and more universal. Brooks is a true comedian’s comedian (David Letterman has said, “He’s above all of us”), he has a cult following, and in 1997 Entertainment Weekly listed him as the fifth funniest human alive (after Robin Williams, Jerry Seinfeld, Roseanne, and Jim Carrey).

Born Albert Einstein, Albert changed his name to Brooks when he lived his life much too timidly—and while waiting to learn his fate he assuured the Yeager family of Phoenix that his camera crew will not disrupt their lives, then proceeds to totally demolish both family and home. Charles Grodin is hilarious as Warren Yeager, a father and veterinarian who commits major medical malpractice on camera, and Frances Lee McCain is touching as Jeannette Yeager, the bored housewife who thinks she’s falling in love with Brooks.

Modern Romance (1981) begins with Brooks breaking up with his girlfriend, Mary (Kathryn Harrold), and he then spends the rest of the film alternatively trying to win her back and driving her away. No other film has better captured a certain kind of obsessive behavior which, according to Brooks, is not driven by love but by sex (“A man in his twenties doesn’t drive around a woman’s house 400 times and act like a fool just to have a conversation with her”). Brooks said perhaps his greatest thrill in the film business was when director Stanley Kubrick called him to say, “This is the movie I’ve always wanted to make”—Kubrick’s final film being his own jealousy movie, Eyes Wide Shut (1999).

In Lost in America, when self-centered yuppie David Howard (Brooks) is passed over for a promotion, he quits his job and convinces his wife Linda (Julie Hagerty) to do likewise so they can at last fulfill their dream of seeing America like the free spirits of Easy Rider—except instead of motorcycles they do it in a huge Winnebago with a six-figure nest egg to fall back on. In no time, Linda has gambled away their entire nest egg in a Las Vegas casino, and David tries to convince the pit boss (Gary Marshall) that it would be good for business if the casino gave the money back. Brooks has said, “I always loved the idea of making a life-long decision and finding out four days later that it was wrong.” The film exposes the secret life of many middle-class Americans by letting its central characters realize their dreams of liberation, then watching them scurry back to the comfortable and familiar when their dreams go awry.

The main problem with each of Brooks’ first three features was their weak endings; they just sort of petered out. But his fourth and subsequent films have all managed to have splendid third acts. In Defending Your Life, “the first true story of what happens after you die,” Brooks plays Daniel Miller, an advertising executive who dies in a ridiculous auto accident and awakens in Judgment City, a way station where a trial determines who is returned to earth and who goes on to the next level. His trial does not go well—flashbacks reveal he lived his life much too timidly—and while waiting to learn his fate he meets and falls for Julia (Meryl Streep). The ending finds Daniel inspired by love and able to overcome his fears. Defending Your Life is a carpe diem movie that is neither preachy nor maudlin; an afterlife movie with no wings or halos. According to Brooks, this vision of the afterlife is the only one that made sense to him—this or dirt, but he “couldn’t get financing [for] two hours of dirt.”

Brooks’ most successful film, Mother, demonstrates that no one can push your buttons like your mother because she’s the one who installed them. After his second divorce, John Henderson (Brooks) becomes convinced that his problems with women stem from unresolved issues with his mother (Debbie Reynolds), so as an experiment he moves back in with her. The film is filled with insights both great and small, and is perhaps the best film ever made analyzing a mother-son relationship.

The Muse was less successful because it was less universal, more “inside Hollywood,” than his previous film. But its observations into Hollywood’s veneration of youth and having an “edge” are right on target. Sharon Stone plays the title character with true comedic flair, and such Hollywood heavyweights as James Cameron and Martin Scorcese have cameos.

What makes Brooks a true artist is his desire to reveal life as it’s lived today and thereby strike a universal chord. Brooks has said, “What I like best is when movies capture life. . . . If the result of something I do is that someone feels 10 percent less crazy because they see someone else is thinking what they’re thinking, then I provide a service.’’

—Bob Sullivan

BROOKS, Mel

Nationality: American. Born: Melvin Kaminsky in Brooklyn, New York, 28 June 1926. Education: Attended Virginia Military Institute, 1944. Family: Married 1) Florence Baum (divorced), two sons, one daughter; 2) actress Anne Bancroft, one son. Military Service: Combat engineer, U.S. Army, 1944–46. Career: Jazz drummer, stand-up comedian, and social director at Grossinger’s resort; writer for Sid Caesar’s “Your Show of Shows,” 1954–57; conceived, wrote, and narrated cartoon short The Critic, 1963; co-creator (with Buck Henry) of Get Smart TV show, 1965; directed first feature, The Producers, 1968; founder, Brooksfilms, 1981. Awards: Academy Award for Best Short Subject, for The Critic, 1964; Academy Award for Best Story and Screenplay, and Writers Guild Award for Best Written Screenplay, for The Producers, 1968; Academy Award nomination, Best Song, for Blazing Saddles, 1974; Academy Award nomination, Best Screenplay, for Young Frankenstein, 1975; American Comedy Awards Lifetime Achievement Award, 1987. Address: Brooksfilms, Ltd., Culver Studios, 9336 W. Washington Blvd., Culver City, CA 90212, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1963 The Critic (cartoon) (+ sc, narration)
1968 The Producers (+ sc, voice)
1970 The Twelve Chairs (+ co-sc, role)
1974 Blazing Saddles (+ co-sc, mus, role); Young Frankenstein (+ co-sc)
1976 Silent Movie (+ co-sc, role)
1977 High Anxiety (+ pr, co-sc, mus, role)
1981 The History of the World, Part I (+ pr, co-sc, mus, role)
1983 To Be or Not to Be (+ pr, co-sc, role)
1987 Spaceballs (+ pr, co-sc, role)
1991 Life Stinks! (+ co-sc, role)
1993 Robin Hood: Men in Tights (+ co-sc, role)
1995 Dracula: Dead and Loving It (co-sc, role, pr)

Films as Executive Producer:

1980 The Elephant Man (Lynch)
1985 The Doctor and the Devils (Francis)
1986 The Fly (Cronenberg); Solarbabies (Johnson)
1987 84 Charing Cross Road (Jones)
1992 The Vagrant (Walas)

Other Films:

1979 The Muppet Movie (Frawley) (role)
1991 Look Who’s Talking, Too! (Heckerling) (voice, role)

1994 Il silenzio dei prosciutti (The Silence of the Hams) (Greggio) (role); The Little Rascals (Spheeris) (role)
1997 I Am Your Child (for TV) (as himself)
1998 The Prince of Egypt (Chapman, Hickner) (role)
1999 Svitati (Greggio) (co-sc, ro)

Publications

By BROOKS: books—

By BROOKS: articles—

Interview with James Atlas, in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1975.
“Fond Salutes and Naked Hate,’’ interview with Gordon Gow, in Films and Filming (London), July 1975.
Interview with A. Remond, in Ecran (Paris), November 1976.
“Comedy Directors: Interview with Mel Brooks,’’ with R. Rivlin, in Millimeter (New York), October and December 1977.
Interview with Alan Yentob, in Listener (London), 8 October 1981.

On BROOKS: books—

On BROOKS: articles—

“Two Thousand Year Old Man,’’ in Newsweek (New York), 4 October 1965.
Mel Brooks’s central concern (with High Anxiety and To Be or Not to Be as possible exceptions) is the pragmatic, absurd union of two males, starting with the more experienced member trying to take advantage of the other, and ending in a strong friendship and paternal relationship. The dominant member of the duo, confident but ill-fated, is Zero Mostel in The Producers, Frank Langella in The Twelve Chairs, and Gene Wilder in Blazing Saddles and Young Frankenstein. The second member of the duo, usually physically weak and openly neurotic, represents the victim who wins, who learns from his experience and finds friendship to sustain him. These “Jewish weakling” characters include Wilder in The Producers, Ron Moody, and Cleavon Little. Though this character, as in the case of Little, need not literally be Jewish, he displays the stereotypical characteristics.

Women in Brooks’s films are grotesque figures, sex objects ridiculed and rejected. They are either very old or sexually gross and simple. The love of a friend is obviously worth more than such an object. The secondary male characters, belittling the intentional infantilism of the films, are men-babies given to crying easily. They are set up as examples of what the weak protagonist might become without the paternal care of his reluctant friend. In particular, Brooks sees people who hide behind costumes—cowboy suits, Nazi uniforms, clerical garb, homosexual affectations—as silly children to be made fun of.

The plots of Brooks’s films deal with the experienced and inexperienced men searching for a way to triumph in society. They seek a generic solution or are pushed into one. Yet there is no escape into generic fantasy in the Brooks films, since the films take place totally within the fantasy. There is no regard, as in Woody Allen’s films, for the pathetic nature of the protagonist in reality. In fact, the Brooks films reverse the Allen films’ endings as the protagonists move into a comic fantasy of friendship. (A further contrast with Allen is in the nature of the jokes and gags. Allen’s humor is basically adult embarrassment; Brooks’s is infantile taboo-breaking.)

In The Producers the partners try to manipulate show business and wind up in jail, planning another scheme because they enjoy it. In The Twelve Chairs they try to cheat the government; at the end Langella and Moody continue working together though they no longer have the quest for the chairs in common. In Blazing Saddles Little and Wilder try to take a town; it ends with the actors supposedly playing themselves, getting into a studio car and going off as pals into the sunset. In these films it is two men alone against a corrupt and childish society. Though their schemes fall apart—or are literally exploded as in The Producers and The Twelve Chairs—they still have each other.

Young Frankenstein departs from the pattern with each of the partners, monster and doctor, sexually committed to women. While the basic pattern of male buddies continued when Brooks began to act in his own films, he also winds up with the woman when he is the hero star (High Anxiety, Silent Movie, The History of the World, To Be or Not to Be). It is interesting that Brooks always tries to distance himself from the homosexual implications of his central theme by including scenes in which overtly homosexual characters are ridiculed. It is particularly striking that these characters are, in The Producers, Blazing Saddles, and The Twelve Chairs, stage or film directors.

Brooks’s late-career films have been collectively disappointing. Upon its release, Spaceballs already was embarrassingly dated. It is meant to be a spoof of Star Wars, yet it came to movie screens a decade after the sci-fi epic. Comic timing used to be Brooks’s strong point, yet the story has no momentum and the film’s funniest line—‘May the Schwartz be with you’—is repeated so often that the joke quickly becomes stale.

The bad-taste scenes in Brooks’s earlier films, most memorably Blazing Saddles and Young Frankenstein, used to be considered provocative. Now that young filmmakers and television writers have stretched comedy to the extreme limits, Brooks has lost his ability to astound and appall the audience. His most recent feature, Robin Hood: Men in Tights, a parody of Errol Flynn-style swashbuckling adventures, is sorely lacking in laughs. The sole exception: Dom DeLuise’s hilarious (but all too brief) Godfather spoof.

Life Stinks! is the most serious of all of Brooks’s films. Rather than being a string of quick gags, it offers a slower-paced, more conventional narrative. As with To Be or Not to Be (which is set in Poland at the beginning of World War II), he treats a sobering theme in a comic manner as he comments on the plight of the homeless. But while To Be or Not to Be is as deeply moving as it is funny, Life Stinks! stinks. It is episodic and all too often flat, with its satire much too broad and all too rarely funny.

—Stuart M. Kaminsky, updated by Audrey E. Kupferberg

BROWNING, Tod

Films as Director:

1915 The Lucky Transfer; The Slave Girl; The Highbinders; The Living Death; The Burned Hand; The Woman from Warren’s; Little Marie; The Story of a Story; The Spell of the Poppy; The Electric Alarm 1916 Puppets; Everybody’s Doing It; The Deadly Glass of Beer (The Fatal Glass of Beer) 1917 Jim Bludso (co-d, co-sc); Peggy, The Will o’ th’ Wisp; The Jury of Fate; A Love Sublime (co-d); Hands Up! (co-d) 1918 The Eyes of Mystery; The Legion of Death; Revenge; Which Woman; The Deciding Kiss; The Brazen Beauty; Set Free (+ sc) 1919 The Wicked Darling; The Exquisite Thief; The Unpainted Woman; A Petal on the Current; Bonnie, Bonnie Lassie (+ sc) 1920 The Virgin of Stamboul (+ sc) 1921 Outside the Law (+ co-sc); No Woman Knows (+ co-sc) 1922 The Wise Kid; Under Two Flags (+ co-sc); Man under Cover 1923 Drifting (+ co-sc); White Tiger (+ co-sc); Day of Faith 1924 The Dangerous Flirt; Silk Stocking Girl (Silk Stocking Sal) 1925 The Unholy Three (+ co-sc); The Mystic (+ co-sc); Dollar Down 1926 The Black Bird (+ co-sc); The Road to Mandalay (+ co-sc) 1927 London After Midnight (+ co-sc); The Show; The Unknown (+ co-sc) 1928 The Big City (+ co-sc); West of Zanzibar 1929 Where East Is East (+ co-sc); The Thirteenth Chair 1930 Outside the Law (+ co-sc) 1931 Dracula (+ co-sc); The Iron Man 1932 Freaks 1933 Fast Workers 1935 Mark of the Vampire (+ sc) 1936 The Devil-Doll (+ co-sc) 1939 Miracles for Sale
Other Films:

1913  Scenting a Terrible Crime (role); A Fallen Hero (role)
1914  A Race for a Bride (role); The Man in the Couch (role); An Exciting Courtship (role); The Last Drink of Whiskey (role); Hubby to the Rescue (role); The Deceivers (role); The White Slave Catchers (role); Wrong All Around (role); Leave It to Smiley (role); The Wild Girl (role); Ethel's Teacher (role); A Physical Culture Romance (role); The Mascot (role); Foiled Again (role); The Million Dollar Bride (role); Dizzy Joe's Career (role); Casey's Vendetta (role); Out Again—In Again (role); A Corner in Hats (role); The Housebreakers (role); The Record Breakers (role)

1914/15  Mr. Hadley in “Bill” series through no. 17; Ethel Gets Consent (role)
1915  The Queen of the Band (Myers) (story); Cupid and the Pest (role); Music Hath Its Charms (role); A Costly Exchange (role)
1916  Sunshine Dad (Dillon) (co-story); The Mystery of the Leaping Fish (Emerson) (story); Atta Boy’s Last Race (Seligmann) (sc); Intolerance (Griffith) (role, asst d for crowd scenes)

1919  The Pointing Finger (Kull) (supervisor)
1921  Society Secrets (McCarey) (supervisor)
1928  Old Age Handicap (Mattison) (story under pseudonym Tod Underwood)
1946  Inside Job (Yarborough) (story)

Publications

By BROWNING: articles—

“‘A Maker of Mystery,’” interview with Joan Dickey, in Motion Picture Classic (Brooklyn), March 1928.

On BROWNING: book—

On BROWNING: articles—

* * *

Although his namesake was the poet Robert Browning, Tod Browning became recognized as a major Hollywood cult director whose work bore some resemblance to the sensibilities of a much different writer: Edgar Allen Poe. However, unlike Poe, Tod Browning was, by all accounts, a quiet and gentle man who could nonetheless rise to sarcasm and sardonic remarks when necessary to bring out the best from his players or to ward off interference from the front office.

Browning came to Hollywood as an actor after working circus and vaudeville circuits. Browning tapped into this background in supplying elements of many of his films, notably The Unholy Three, The Show, and Freaks. He worked in the film industry as an actor until D.W. Griffith (for whom Browning had worked on Intolerance as both a performer and assistant director) gave him the chance to direct at the Fine Arts Company. Browning directed a few films for Metro, but came to fame at Universal with a series of features starring Priscilla Dean. Although The Virgin of Stamboul was admired by critics, it was his next film, Outside the Law, which has more historical significance, marking the first time that Browning directed Lon Chaney. (Browning remade the feature as a talkie.)

These Universal productions were little more than pretentious romantic melodramas, but they paved the way for a series of classic MGM horror films starring Lon Chaney, from The Unholy Three in 1925 through Where East Is East in 1929. These films were notable for the range of Chaney’s performances—a little old lady, a cripple, an armless circus performer, a gangster, and so on—and for displaying Browning’s penchant for the macabre. All were stylish productions, well directed, but all left the viewer with a sense of disappointment, of unfulfilled climaxes. Aside from directing, Tod Browning also wrote most of his films. He once explained that the plots of these works were secondary to the characterizations, a viewpoint that perhaps explains the dismal, unexciting endings to many of his features.

Tod Browning made an easy transition to sound films, although surprisingly he did not direct the 1930 remake of The Unholy Three. Instead, he directed the atmospheric Dracula, a skillful blend of comedy and horror that made a legend of the actor Bela Lugosi. A year later, Browning directed another classic horror talkie, Freaks, a realistic and at times offensive melodrama about the physically deformed members of a circus troupe. The film includes the marriage of midget Harry Earles to a trapeze artiste (Olga Baclanova).

Browning ended his career with The Mark of the Vampire, a remake of the Chaney feature London after Midnight; The Devil Doll, in which Lionel Barrymore appears as an old lady, a similar disguise to that adopted by Chaney in The Unholy Three; and Miracles for Sale, a mystery drama involving professional magicians. Tod Browning will, of course, be best remembered for his horror films, but it should also be recalled that during the first half of his directorial career he stuck almost exclusively to romantic melodramas.

—Anthony Slide

BUÑUEL, Luis

Madrid, graduated 1924. Family: Married Jeanne Rucar, 1933, two sons. Career: Assistant to Jean Epstein in Paris, 1925; joined Surrealist group, and directed first film, Un Chien andalou, 1929; worked for Paramount in Paris, 1933; executive producer for Filmofono, Madrid, 1935; served Republican government in Spain, 1936–39; worked at Museum of Modern Art, New York, 1939–42; produced Spanish versions of Warners films, Hollywood, 1944; moved to Mexico, 1946; returned to Spain to make Viridiana, 1961 (film suppressed). Awards: Best Director Award and International Critics Prize, Cannes Festival, for Los olvidados, 1951; Gold Medal, Cannes Festival, for Nazarín, 1959, and Viridiana, 1961; Golden Lion, Venice Festival, for Belle de jour, 1967. Died: In Mexico City, 29 July 1983.

Films as Director:

1929 Un Chien andalou (Andalusian Dog) (+ pr, co-sc, ed, role as Man with razor)

1930 L’Age d’or (+ co-sc, ed, mu)

1932 Las Hurdes—Tierra sin pan (Land without Bread) (+ sc, ed)

1935 Don Quixote el amargao (Marquina) (co-d uncredited, + pr, co-sc); La hija de Juan Simón (Sáenz de Heredia) (co-d uncredited, + pr, co-sc)

1936 Centinela alerta! (Grémillon) (co-d uncredited, + pr, co-sc)

1940 Las Hurdes—Tierra sin pan (+ co-sc, uncredited, + pr, co-sc, ed, mu)

1947 Gran Casino (Tampico)

1949 El gran calavera

1950 Los olvidados (The Forgotten; The Young and the Damned) (+ co-sc); Susana (Demonio y carne) (+ co-sc)

1951 La hija del enano (Don Quintín el amargao); Cuando los hijos nos juzgan (Una mujer sin amor); Subida al cielo (+ sc)

1952 El Bruto (+ co-sc); Las aventuras de Robinson Crusoe (Adventures of Robinson Crusoe) (+ co-sc, el) (+ co-sc)

1953 Abismos de pasión (Cumbres borrascoses) (+ co-sc); La ilusión viaja en tranvía (+ co-sc)

1954 El rio y la muerte (+ co-sc)

1955 Ensayo de un crimen (La Vida Criminal de Archibaldo de la Cruz; The Criminal Life of Archibaldo de la Cruz) (+ co-sc); Cela s’appelle l’Aurore (+ co-sc)

1956 La Mort en ce jardin (La muerte en este jardín) (+ co-sc)

1958 Nazarín (+ co-sc)

1959 La Fièvre monte à El Pao (Los Ambiciosos) (+ co-sc)

1960 The Young One (La Joven; La Jeune Fille) (+ co-sc)

1961 Viridiana (+ co-sc, story)

1962 El ángel exterminador (The Exterminating Angel) (+ co-sc, story)

1963 Le Journal d’une femme de chambre (+ co-sc)

1965 Simon del desierto (+ co-sc)

1966 Belle de jour (+ co-sc)

1969 La Voie lactée (The Milky Way; La via lattea) (+ co-sc, mu)

1970 Tristana (+ co-sc)

1972 Le Charme discret de la bourgeoisie (The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie) (+ co-sc)

1974 Le Fantôme de la liberté (The Phantom of Liberty) (+ sc, sound effects)

1977 Cet obscurs objet du désir (That Obsure Object of Desire) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1926 Mauprat (Epstein) (asst d, role as monk)

1927 La Sirène des tropiques (Etievant and Nalpas) (asst d)

1928 La Chute de la maison Usher (Epstein) (asst d)

1936 Quién me quiere a mí? (Sáenz de Heredia) (pr, co-sc, ed)

1937 Espagne 1937/España leal en armas! (compilation, ed)

1940 Triumph of Will (supervising ed, commentary, edited compilation of Riefenstahl’s Triumph des Willens and Hans Bertram’s Feuertaufe)

1950 Si usted no puede, yo sí (Soler) (co-story)

1964 Llanto por un bandido (Lament for a Bandit) (Saura) (role as the executioner; tech advisor on arms and munitions); En este pueblo no hay ladrones (Isaac) (role)

1972 Le Moine (Kyrou) (co-sc)

1973 La Chute d’un corps (Polac) (role)

Publications

By BUÑUEL: books—

L’Age d’or and Una Chien andalou, London, 1968.

By BUÑUEL: articles—

Interview with Daniel Aubry and Jean Lacor, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley, California), Winter 1958.

“Luis Buñuel—A Statement,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1960.

Interview with Kenji Kanesaka, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.

Interview with Aldo Tassone, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 24, no. 3, 1982.

"Dnevnaia krasavitsa," in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 6, 1992.

On BUÑUEL: books—

On BUÑUEL: articles—

Prouse, Derek, “Interviewing Buñuel,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

Harcourt, Peter, “Luis Buñuel: Spaniard and Surrealist,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1967.

“Buñuel Section” of Cinémagraphe (Paris), September-October 1983.
Yakir, Dan, and others, “Luis Buñuel, 1900–1983,” in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1983.
“Buñuel Section” of Positif (Paris), October 1983.
“Luis Buñuel,” in Film Dope (London), March 1985.
Durgat, R., “Theory of Theory—and Buñuel the Joker,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), vol. 44, no. 1, 1990.
Daney, S., “Luis Bunuel,” in EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), vol. 10, August 1993.

For all the critical attention (and furious critical controversy) his work occasioned over half a century, Luis Buñuel resisted our best taxonomical efforts. To begin with, while no artist of this century strikes one as more quintessentially Spanish than Buñuel, how can one apply the term “Spanish filmmaker” to a man whose oeuvre is far more nearly identified with France and Mexico than with the land of his birth? By the same token, can one speak of any film as “typical” of the man who made both L’Age d’or and Nazarín, both Los olvidados and Belle de jour, both Land without Bread and Le Charme discret de la bourgeoisie? Nonetheless, from Un Chien andalou to Cet obscur objet du désir, a Buñuel film is always (albeit, as in many of the Mexican pieces of the 1940s and 1950s, only sporadically), a Buñuel film.

Perhaps the easiest way to deal with Buñuel’s career is to suggest that certain avatars of Luis Buñuel may be identified at different (if sometimes slightly overlapping) historical periods. The first Luis Buñuel is the surrealist: the man who slit eyeballs (Un Chien andalou), the man to whom blasphemy was less a matter of specific utterances and gestures than a controlling style out of which might emerge new modes of feeling and of expression (L’Age d’or), the man who documentarized the unimaginable (Land Without Bread) and finally, the man who demonstrated more clearly than any other that surrealist perspectives demanded cinematographic realism. The second Luis Buñuel (and the saddest, and much the least identifiable, now as then) is the all-but-anonymous journeyman film professional: the collaborator, often unbillled and almost always unremarked, on Spanish films which to this day remain unknown to any but the most dogged researchers; the archivist and adapter and functionary in New York and Hollywood; the long-term absentee from the world’s attention. The third is the Mexican director, the man who achieved a few works that at the time attracted varying degrees of notice outside the sphere of Latin American commercial distribution (Los olvidados, El Archibaldo de la Cruz, Robinson Crusoe) but also of others that at the time attracted no notice at all. The fourth is the Luis Buñuel who gradually made his way back to Europe by way of a few French films made in alternation with films in Mexico; and who then, with Viridiana, returned to appall, and so to reclaim, his native land; and who thenceforth, and no matter where or under what conditions he operated, persuasively reasserted himself as a figure of unmistakable moment in world cinema. The last Luis Buñuel, following his emergence in the mid-1960s, was the past master, at once awesome and beloved, as serene in his command of his medium as he was cheerfully intrepid in his pursuit of whatever of value might be mined from the depths of the previously unexplored.

Each of the Buñuels of the preceding catalogue, except for the obscure and essentially uncreative second one, is manifest, or at least implicit, in the others. Even in his Mexican work, which included some otherwise less than exalted assignments (and Buñuel himself, unlike certain of his more indiscriminate adulators, was perfectly willing to acknowledge that much of his Mexican work was shoddy or aborted or simply dull), the scion of surrealism showed his hand.
There are several astonishing dream sequences, of course: the vision of slabs of raw meat hanging from the racks of a Mexico City streetcar (La ilusión viaja en tranvía), the incongruous verticality of the skeletal skyscrapers rising from the Mexico City slums (Los olvidados), and the necrophiliac ragings at the end of the Buñuel version of Wuthering Heights (Abismos de pasión). At the same time, it was in his Mexican studio movies, with their often absurdly brief shooting schedules, that Buñuel developed the unobtrusive but sovereign sway over narrative continuity and visual construction that so exhilarates admirers of such later works as Le Journal d’une femme de chambre or Cet obscur objet du désir. (According to Francisco Aranda, Alfred Hitchcock in 1972 called Buñuel “the best director in the world.”)

Similarly, one may recognize in Tristana that same merciless anatomy of a specific social milieu, and in The Exterminating Angel that same theme of inexplicable entrapment, that one first encountered in Land Without Bread. In El río y la muerte a man, all of him save his head imprisoned in an iron lung, submits to a round of face-slapping. We recognize in the image (and in the gasp of laughter it provokes) something of the merciless attack on our pieties of Buñuel’s early surrealist works and something of the more offhand wicked humor of, say, Le Charme discret. When such a recognition is reached, we know that the variety of styles and accents in which Buñuel addressed us over the years is almost irrelevant. The political and social (or anti-social) canons of early surrealism could not contain him, nor could the foolish melodramatic conventions of some of his Mexican films stifle his humor, nor could the elegant actors and luxurious color cinematography of some of the later French films finally seduce him. Against all odds, his vision sufficed to transcend any and all stylistic diversions.

“Vision,” perhaps the most exhausted word in the critical vocabulary, struggles back to life when applied to Buñuel and his camera. In the consistent clarity of its perception, in its refusal to distinguish between something called “reality” and something called “hallucination,” Buñuel’s camera always acts in the service of a fundamental surrealist principle, one of the few principles of any kind that Buñuel was never tempted to call into question. Whether focused on the tragic earthly destiny of an inept would-be saint (Nazarín) or on the bizarre obsessions of an inept would-be sinner (the uncle in Viridiana, among a good many others), Buñuel’s camera is the instrument of the most rigorous denotation, invoking nothing beyond that which it so plainly and patiently registers. The uncertainties and ambivalences we may feel as we watch a Buñuel film arise not from the camera’s capacity to mediate but from the camera’s capacity to record: our responses are inherent in the subjects Buñuel selects, in those extremes of human experiences that we recognize as his special domain.

—E. Rubinstein

BURNETT, Charles

Films as Director:

1969 Several Friends (short)
1973 The House (short)
1977 Killer of Sheep (+ sc, pr, ph, ed)
1983 My Brother’s Wedding (+ sc, pr, ph)
1989 Guests of Hotel Astoria (+ ph)
1990 To Sleep with Anger (+ sc)
1994 The Glass Shield (+ sc)
1995 When It Rains (short)
1996 Nightjohn (for TV)
1998 The Wedding (mini for TV); Dr. Endesha Ida Mae Holland (doc/short)
1999 Selma, Lord, Selma (for TV); The Annihilation of Fish; Olivia’s Story
2000 Finding Buck McHenry
Other Films:

1983  Bless Their Little Hearts (Woodbury) (sc, ph)
1985  The Crocodile Conspiracy (ph)
1987  I Fresh (sc)

Publications

By BURNETT: articles—

Burnett, Charles, and Charles Lane, “Charles Burnett and Charles Lane,” in American Film (Los Angeles), August 1991.
Burnett, Charles & Lippy, Tod, “To Sleep with Anger: Writing and Directing To Sleep with Anger,” in Scenario (Rockville), Spring 1996.

On BURNETT: articles—

* * *

Prior to the release of To Sleep with Anger in 1990, Charles Burnett had for two decades been writing and directing low-budget, little-known, but critically praised films that examined life and relationships among contemporary African Americans. Killer of Sheep, his first feature, is a searing depiction of ghetto life; My Brother’s Wedding knowingly examines the relationship between two siblings on vastly different life tracks; Bless Their Little Hearts (directed by Billy Woodbury, but scripted and photographed by Burnett) is a poignant portrait of a black family. But how many had even heard of these films, let alone seen them? Thanks to the emergence in the 1980s of the prolific Spike Lee as a potent box office (as well as critical) force, however, a generation of African-American moviemakers have had their films not only produced but more widely distributed.

Such was the case with To Sleep with Anger, released theatrically by the Samuel Goldwyn Company. The film, like Burnett’s earlier work, is an evocative, character-driven drama about relationships between family members and the fabric of domestic life among contemporary African Americans. It is the story of Harry Mention (Danny Glover), a meddlesome trickster who arrives in Los Angeles at the doorstep of his old friend Gideon (Paul Butler). The film details the manner in which Harry abuses the hospitality of Gideon, and his effect on Gideon’s family. First there is the older generation: Gideon and his wife Suzie (Mary Alice), who cling to the traditions of their Deep South roots. Gideon has attempted to pass on his folklore, and his sense of values, to his two sons. One, Junior (Carl Lumbly), accepts this. But the other, Babe Brother (Richard Brooks), is on the economic fast track—and in conflict with his family.

While set within an African-American milieu, To Sleep with Anger transcends the ethnic identities of its characters; it also deals in a generic way with the cultural differences between parents and children, the manner in which individuals learn (or don’t learn) from experience, and the need to push aside those who only know how to cause violence and strife. As such, it becomes a film that deals with universal issues.

The Glass Shield is a departure for Burnett in that his scenario is not set within an African-American universe. Instead, he places his characters in a hostile white world. The Glass Shield is a thinking person’s cop film. Burnett’s hero is a young black officer fresh out of the police academy, JJ Johnson (Michael Boatman), who becomes the first African American assigned to a corruption-laden, all-white sheriff’s station in Los Angeles. Johnson is treated roughly by the station’s commanding officer and some of the veteran cops. Superficially, it seems as if he is being dealt with in such a manner solely because he is an inexperienced rookie, in need of toughening and educating to the ways of the streets. But the racial lines clearly are drawn when one of his senior officers tells him, “You’re one of us. You’re not a brother.” Johnson, who always has wanted to be a cop, desires only to do well and fit in. And so he stands by idly as black citizens are casually stopped and harassed by his fellow officers. Even more telling, with distressing regularity, blacks seem to have died under mysterious circumstances while in custody within the confines of the precinct.

As the film progresses, Burnett creates the feeling that a bomb is about to explode. And it does, when Johnson becomes involved in the arrest of a black man, framed on a murder charge, and readily agrees to lie in court to protect a fellow officer. Burnett’s ultimate point is that in contemporary America it is impossible for a black man to cast aside his racial identity as he seeks his own personal destiny. First and foremost, he is an African American, existing within a society in which all of the power is in the hands of a white male elite. But African Americans are not the sole powerless entity in The Glass Shield. Johnson befriends his station’s first female officer (Lori Petty), who must deal with sexism within the confines of her precinct house as much as on the streets. Together, this pair becomes united in a struggle against a white male-dominated system in which everyday corruption and hypocrisy are the rule.

Burnett’s themes—African-American identity within the family unit and, subsequently, African-American identity within the community at large—are provocative and meaningful. It seems certain that he will never direct a film that is anything short of insightful in its content.

—Rob Edelman
BURTON, Tim

Films as Director:

1982 Vincent (animated short); Frankenweenie (live-action short)
1985 Pee-Wee’s Big Adventure
1988 Beetlejuice
1989 Batman
1990 Edward Scissorhands (+ co-sc, pr)
1992 Batman Returns (+ co-pr)
1994 Ed Wood (+ co-pr)
1995 Mars Attacks! (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1999 Sleepy Hollow

Other Films:

1992 Singles (role)
1993 Tim Burton’s The Nightmare before Christmas (co-sc, co-pr, des)
1994 Cabin Boy (co-pr); A Century of Cinema (Caroline Thomas) (as himself)
1995 Batman Forever (exec pr)

Publications

By BURTON: books—

The Nightmare before Christmas (for children), New York, 1993.

By BURTON: articles—

Interview, in Washington Post, 16 December 1990.
‘‘Introduction,’’ in Matthew Rolston, Big Pictures, Boston, 1991.
‘‘Punching Holes in Reality,’’ an interview with Gavin Smith, in Film Comment, November/December 1994.

Article in Andrew Kevin Walker, The Art of Sleepy Hollow, New York, 2000(?).

On BURTON: book—

On BURTON: articles—

Jean, Marcel, “‘Carnet de notes sur le corps martien,’” in 24 Images (Montreal), Spring 1997.

* * * *

Although in the last resort I find his work more distinctive than distinguished, Tim Burton compels interest and attention by the way in which he has established within the Hollywood mainstream a cinema that is, to say the least, highly eccentric, idiosyncratic, and personal.

Burton’s cinema is centered firmly on the figure of what I shall call (for want of a better term, and knowing that this one is now “politically incorrect”) the freak. I define this as a person existing quite outside the bounds of the conventional notion of normality, usually (but not exclusively, as I include Burton’s Ed Wood in this) because of some extreme physical peculiarity. Every one of the films, without exception, is built around at least one freak. One must then subdivide them into two categories: the “positive” freaks, who at least mean well, and the “negative” freaks, who are openly malignant. In the former category, in order of appearance: Pee-Wee Herman (Pee-Wee’s Big Adventure), Edward Scissorhands, Catwoman (Batman Returns), Jack (The Nightmare before Christmas), Ed Wood; in the latter, the Joker (Batman) and the Penguin (Batman Returns). Beetlejuice (or “Betelgeuse”) belongs ambiguously to both categories, though predominantly to the latter; to which one might also add, without stretching things too far, Riddler and Two-Face from Batman Forever—watered-down Burton, produced by him but written and directed by others, still owing a great deal to his influence. If one leaves aside Pee-Wee’s Big Adventure and The Nightmare before Christmas (which Burton conceived and produced but did not direct), this gives us an alternative but exactly parallel division: three films... with Michael Keaton, two with Johnny Depp (who might well have played Jack in The Nightmare before Christmas had Burton opted to make it as a live-action film).

Of the malignant freaks, Danny de Vito’s Penguin is at once the most grotesque (to the verge of unwatchability) and the only one with an excuse for his malignancy: unlike the others he was born a freak, cast out and presumed to die by his parents, surviving by chance. The Joker and (if one permits the inclusion) Two-Face are physical freaks because of disfigurement, but this has merely intensified a malignancy already there. They are colorful and vivid, but not especially interesting: they merely embody a somewhat simplistic notion of evil, the worked-up energy of the over-the-top performances a means of concealing the essential emptiness at the conceptual level.

The benign freaks are more interesting. They are invariably associated with creativity: Pee-Wee, Edward Scissorhands, and Ed Wood are all artists, of a kind every bit as idiosyncratic as their creator’s. This is set, obviously, against the determined destructiveness of the malignant freaks, who include in this respect Beetlejuice: the film’s sympathetic characters (notably Winona Ryder) may find him necessary at times, but his dominant characteristic is a delight in destruction for its own sake. What gives the positive freaks (especially those played by Johnny Depp) an extra dimension is their extreme fragileness and vulnerability (the negative freaks always regard themselves, however misguided, as invincible).

Credit must be given to Burton’s originality and inventiveness: he is an authentic artist in the sense that he is so clearly personally involved in and committed to his peculiar vision and its realization in film. What equally demands to be questioned is the degree of real intelligence underlying these qualities. The inventiveness is all on the surface, in the art direction, makeup, special effects. The conceptual level of the films does not bear very close scrutiny. The problem is there already, and in a magnified form, in Beetlejuice: the proliferation of invention is too grotesque and ugly to be funny, too wild, arbitrary, and unspectacular to reward any serious analysis. The two Batman movies are distinguished by the remarkably dark vision (in a film one might expect to be “family entertainment”) of contemporary urban/industrial civilization. But Michael Keaton’s Batman, while unusually and mercifully restrained, fails to make any strong impression, and one is thrown back on the freaks who, with one notable exception, quickly outstay their welcome. The exception is Michelle Pfeiffer’s Catwoman (in Batman Returns), and that is due primarily to one of the great screen presences of our time. Burton’s overall project (in his work as a whole) seems to be to set his freaks (both positive and negative) against “normality” in order to show that normality, today, is every bit as weird: a laudable enough project, most evident in Edward Scissorhands. But the depiction of normality in that film (here, small-town suburbia) amounts to no more than amiable, simple-minded parody (despite the charm of Dianne Wiest’s Avon Lady, but her role dwindles as the film proceeds). For all the grotesquerie of his monsters, Burton’s cinema is ultimately too soft-centered, lacking in rigor and real thinking. Ed Wood, however, may be taken as evidence that Burton is beginning to transcend the limitations of his previous work: it is far and away his most satisfying film to date. Here is surely one of cinema’s most touching celebrations of the sheer joy of creativity with the irony, of course, that it is manifested in an “artist” of no talent whatever. Johnny Depp, in what is surely, with Pfeiffer’s Catwoman, one of the two most complex and fully realized incarnations in Burton’s work, magically conveys his character’s absolute belief in the value of his own creations and his own personal joy and excitement in creating them, never realizing that they will indeed go down in film history as topping everyone’s list of the worst films ever made. Yet his Ed Wood never strikes us as merely stupid: simply as a man completely caught up in his own delight in creative activity—always longing for recognition, but never self-serving or mercenary. This self-delusion, at once marvelous and pathetic, goes hand in hand with his growing compassion for and commitment to the decrepit and drug-addicted Bela Lugosi (Martin Landau, in a performance that, for once, fully deserved its Oscar), and his equally delusory conviction that Lugosi is still a great star.

Burton’s two recent films, Mars Attacks! and Sleepy Hollow, neatly illustrate, respectively, his weaknesses and strengths. Mars Attacks!, a parody both of Independence Day and the science fiction invasion cycle of the 1950s, opens promisingly, apparently initiating a mordant satire on contemporary American civilization, the Martians’ approach to Earth, and the possibility that they represent a more advanced and enlightened culture producing a cross-section of possible reactions from a wide range of cultural positions, presented as variously vacuous, irrelevant, or self-serving. From the point where the Martians turn out to be, after all, stereotypically malevolent, within any redeeming features whatever, all that is lost: the film has nowhere to go, and disintegrates into a series of obvious gags ranging from the gratuitously ugly and grotesque (the fates of Pierce Brosnan and Sarah Jessica Parker) to the merely childish.

Sleepy Hollow is built around the talent and persona of Johnny Depp, star of the two most distinguished of Burton’s previous films (which can scarcely be coincidental). Once again, the collaboration with Depp brings out all Burton’s finest qualities, an aesthetic and emotional sensibility totally absent from the majority of his work. The film’s horrors are grotesque but never offered as funny, becoming a perfect foil for Depp’s essential gentleness, elegance, and underlying strength. The art direction shows Burton and his designer at their finest, creating effects that are at once frightening, beautiful, and authentically strange. It seems clear that Tim Burton needs Johnny Depp more than Johnny Depp needs Tim Burton.

—Robin Wood
CACOYANNIS, Michael

Nationality: Greek. Born: Limassol, Cyprus, 11 June 1927. Education: Greek Gymnasium; Gray’s Inn Law School, London, called to the Bar, 1948; Central School of Speech and Drama, London; Stage Directing course, Old Vic School, London. Career: Radio Producer for BBC and actor in London, early 1950s; returned to Greece and directed first film, Windfall in Athens, 1953; later directed stage productions in London and on Broadway. Lives in Greece. Awards: Grand Jury Prize, Cannes Film Festival, 1962, for Electra.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>Windfall in Athens</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>Stella (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>A Girl in Black (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>The Final Lie (A Matter of Dignity) (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>Our Last Spring</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>The Wastrel (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Electra (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Zorba the Greek (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>The Day the Fish Came Out (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>The Trojan Women (Women of Troy) (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Atilla 74 (doc) (+ ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>Iphigenia (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Sweet Country (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>Up, down, and Sideways (+ sc, ed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999</td>
<td>Varya (+ sc, pr)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By CACOYANNIS: articles—

Interview in Screen International (London), 13 May 1978.
Interview with James Potts, in Educational Broadcasting International, September 1978.
Interview with Lindsay Amos, in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), June 1998.

On CACOYANNIS: book—

On CACOYANNIS: articles—

Stanbrook, Alan, “‘Rebel with a Cause,’” in Film (London), no. 24, 1960.
Bianco e Nero (Rome), December 1963.
“‘Michael Cacoyannis,’” in Film Dope (London), November 1974.
National Film Theatre Booklet (London), April 1978.

* * *

A man between two worlds—this is how the life and work of Michael Cacoyannis could be characterized. The first world is one which draws on classical drama, his background in the modern theatre, and modern European cinema. The second world incorporates a mixture of the cultural knowledge acquired during his training in England with an inborn sense of the Greek tradition. This is the background from which Cacoyannis creates an original cinematographic depiction of contemporary life.
At the beginning of his career, Cacoyannis’s inspiration came from the film classics as much as from his theatrical background; for his debut, Kyriakatiko kypriówna, it is René Clair who appears to be his spiritual tutor. Cacoyannis’s creative path then led from comedy to drama, to an analysis of the fragile nature of human relations. His stories, of Stella the singer, of the “girl in black” on the island of Hydros, or the story of the lost hopes of a broken family, are attempts to interpret contemporary Greek reality in a very raw way. The films capture the archaic rigidity of social relations and the feelings of loneliness. The random tragic moments in which city intellectuals as well as ordinary village people find themselves are milestones along their path to happiness. City streets, forgotten villages on lonely islands, and scorched foothills provide a suitably poignant backdrop for the fates of Cacoyannis’s characters. It is said—with good reason—that early Cacoyannis films carry the spiritual heritage of Italian neo-realism.

These efforts culminated, through directly drawing upon literature, in the creation of a full-blooded renaissance figure, Alexis Zorba in Zorba the Greek—a portrait of a man who lives (and loves) life to the full. The friendship of this “Man of Nature” with a young writer as shown in a confrontation of dramatically realistic (but also poetic) scenes, is the victory of the human spirit over convention. Also here in “sotto voce” is the pathos of sights and thoughts, a ghost-like echo of ancient Greek tragedy. This element of contemporary drama is expanded to incorporate classic Greek traditions. Using locations in Greece under a blazing sun, Cacoyannis reworks not only the story of Elektra, but from mythology picks the story of the Trojans in The Trojan Women, while in the grand scenery of olive groves he sets Euripides talking about the Princess in Iphigenia. Cacoyannis does all this in order to address, for a contemporary audience, the eternal question of crime and punishment, to show that evil among people ultimately produces only more evil. For him the ancient myths encapsulate eternal conflicts of the human soul. Thus is Michael Cacoyannis a poet of the modern Greek cinema.

—Vacláv Merhaut

CAMERON, James

Nationality: American. Born: James Francis Cameron in Kapuskasing, Ontario, Canada, 26 August, 1954; moved to the United States in 1971. Education: Graduated in physics at California State University, Fullerton. Family: Married 1) Sharon Williams, 1974 (divorced 1985); 2) Gale Anne Hurd, 1985 (divorced 1989); 3) Kathryn Bigelow, 1989 (divorced 1991); 4) Linda Hamilton, 1997 (separated); one daughter with Hamilton: Josephine Archer, born 1993. Career: Financed early screenwriting with truck-driving; first professional film job as special effects man and art director for Roger Corman, 1980; set up production company, Lightstorm Entertainment, 1990; co-founder and CEO of visual effects company Digital Domain, 1993; True Lies first film to cost over $100 million, 1994; Titanic first film to cost over $200 million, 1997. Awards: Razzie Award (USA) for Worst Screenplay, for Rambo: First Blood Part II (shared with Sylvester Stallone and Kevin Jarre), 1986; ShoWest (USA) Producer of the Year, 1995; Broadcast Film Critics Association Award for Best Director, Directors’ Guild of America Award for Outstanding Directorial Achievement in Motion Pictures for Titanic (shared with others), Golden Globe for Best Director-Motion Picture, Golden Satellite Awards for Best Director of Motion Picture, Best Motion Picture-Drama (shared with John Landau), and Best Motion Picture Film Editing (shared with Richard A. Harris and Conrad Buff), American Cinema Editors Eddie Award for Best Edited Feature Film (shared with Buff and Harris), and Academy Awards for Best Director, Best Film Editing (shared with Buff and Harris), and Best Picture (shared with Landau), all for Titanic, 1998; Academy of Science Fiction, Horror and Fantasy Films President’s Award, 1998; Golden Eddie Filmmaker of the Year Award, 2000. Address: Lightstorm Entertainment, 919 Santa Monica Boulevard, Santa Monica, California 90401–2704, USA.

Films as Director:

1984 The Terminator (+ co-sc)
1986 Aliens (+ co-sc)
1989 The Abyss (+ sc)
1991 Terminator 2: Judgment Day (T2) (+ co-sc, pr)
1994 True Lies (+ sc, co-pr)
1996 T2 3-D: Battle across Time (Terminator 2: 3) (+ co-sc)
1997 Titanic (+ sc, co-pr, co-ed, ro as extra)

Other Films

1980 Battle beyond the Stars (co-ph)
1981 Escape from New York (co-ph)
1984 Rambo: First Blood Part II (co-sc)
1991 Point Break (exec pr)
1999 The Muse (as himself)
2000 Dark Angel (for TV) (sc)

Publications

By CAMERON: books—

By CAMERON: articles—

Interview with Garth Pearce, in Total Film (London), February 1998.

Interview with Anne Thompson, in Premiere (New York), February 1999.

On CAMERON: books—

On CAMERON: articles—

Ebert, Roger, review of Aliens, in Chicago Sun-Times (Chicago), 18 July 1986.

In his acceptance speech at the Golden Globe awards in 1998, James Cameron asked whether the success of Titanic proved once and for all that size matters. Everything about the film was big. At over $200 million, its budget was the biggest in movie history; an entire new studio had to be constructed for the production, including a huge water tank to hold a ninety-percent sized replica of the original ship. In fact, Cameron’s remark could have applied to any one of his films since the mid-1980s. Titanic, which he once called his “‘190 million-dollar chick flick,’” was merely the biggest of a series of films that have earned the director a reputation for taking on groundbreaking and ambitious projects.

Known in Hollywood as “Iron Jim,” it has been said that working on one of Cameron’s projects is like waging a military campaign. Cameron can now demand the highest standards from his cast and crew, but it was as a special effects expert for Roger Corman, providing additional direction on Battle beyond the Stars (1980), that Cameron made his first professional steps as a filmmaker. His first solo work as a director, Pirhana II, from which he was fired before completion, did not suggest the beginnings of a glittering career. Its clumsy special effects and ludicrous storyline about pirhana fish that learn to fly are closer to B-movie horrors from the 1950s than the director’s polished later output. It was not until 1984, and The Terminator, that Cameron had his first major success.

With Arnold Schwarzenegger as the T800, a cyborg back from the future, The Terminator cost only $6.4 million, about the same as six minutes’ footage from Titanic. The Terminator became something of a surprise hit, rescuing Schwarzenegger from a career of bodybuilding films and Conan sequels, and launching Cameron into the big league. It brought thoughtful science fiction to a wide audience, addressing concerns about nuclear war and the revolution in computing and robotics that was taking hold in the early 1980s. Widely recognized as a science-fiction classic, The Terminator confirmed Cameron’s abilities as a director and led to him being hired to make the high-profile sequel to Ridley Scott’s Alien. With Sigourney Weaver reprising her role as Ripley, Aliens sees her awakened from hibernation fifty-seven years after her first ordeal and returning to the mysterious planet from which she escaped in the earlier film. Although the plot is rather derivative, the special effects are impressive and the action relentless. One critic, Roger Ebert, advised viewers not to eat before going to see it, but declared it “a superb example of filmmaking craft.” Aliens, and later films like The Abyss and Terminator 2, all contain strong female characters, and Cameron is often noted for creating positive roles for women, but in reality his feminist credentials are far from certain. Writing in Entertainment Weekly, Ty Burr even goes as far as to suggest that the presence of strong female characters is thanks to Cameron’s collaborators, Gale Ann Hurd and Linda Hamilton, and notes the misogynistic language in True Lies, which is all Cameron’s own work.

Special effects and slick direction redeem the otherwise disappointing The Abyss, which opened in 1989 to less than enthusiastic reviews. Set on a drilling rig on the seabed, the film is slower paced than Aliens and contains few sympathetic characters. It is a landmark film, however, because of the way computerized images are integrated with live action. Cameron has been a pioneer of computer generated effects, and in the early 1990s co-founded the IBM-backed digital effects company, Digital Domain, in order to develop the technology further. After the lessons learned on The Abyss, Computer Generated Images (CGI) were used still more effectively in his next film, Terminator 2. Like the column of water in The Abyss, the ‘‘liquid metal’’ T-1000 can change into any shape. But Terminator 2 set new standards for the integration of digital images and live action by applying the ‘‘morphing’’ technique to a live actor. Even apart from the stunning effects, Terminator 2 is a better film than the original, combining humor, real human drama, and large-scale set pieces in what is probably Cameron’s most balanced work.

Cameron’s third Schwarzenegger vehicle, True Lies, is a comedy about a spy whose wife doesn’t know what he really does for a living. Like Terminator 2, it is also heavy with CGI, but whereas Terminator 2 put the special effects on display, in True Lies, Cameron aimed to make the action as realistic as possible, concealing computerized shots from the audience. In one stunt, for example, a truck was supposed to leap off the end of a broken bridge and land in the water. When it unexpectedly made it to the other side, Cameron had it removed digitally from the bridge and made to plunge into the sea. Impressive for its technical accomplishments, True Lies is rather bloated and too long for its flimsy plot.

Because of the enormous financial success of his films, Cameron is one of the most influential figures in filmmaking, while his production company, Lightstorm Entertainment, allows him almost total autonomy in choosing film projects. Titanic is Cameron’s most ambitious project to date, and its earnings take the gross box office income of his films to over $1 billion. But although the film was successful at the box office and at the awards, it has been criticized for the weakness of the romantic plot at its center, and for its failures as a human drama. In a Cameron film, however, none of this really matters: the director’s real strengths lie in his technical brilliance and his willingness to take risks. After Titanic, it is difficult to imagine filmmaking on a grander scale. Yet as Cameron himself explains, in the era of digital movie making, “There are no limits to what you can do. Only money.”

—Chris Routledge

CAMPION, Jane

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Wellington, 30 April 1954. Education: Victoria University, Wellington, B.A. in structural arts; Chelsea School of Arts, London, diploma in fine arts (completed at Sydney College of the Arts); Australian Film and Television School, diploma in direction. Family: Parents are opera/theater director Richard Campion and actress/writer Edith Campion; sister is director/screenwriter Anna Campion; married television producer/director Colin Englert. Career: Became interested in filmmaking and began making short films, late 1970s; short film, Tissues, led to her acceptance into the Australian Film and Television School, 1981; took job with Australia’s Women’s Film Unit, 1984; directed an episode of the television drama Dancing Daze, 1986; short films Peel, Passionless Moments, and Girls Own Story released theatrically in the United States, 1989–90. Awards: Melbourne Film Festival Diploma of Merit, Palme d’Or Best Short Film Cannes Film Festival, for Peel, 1983–86; Melbourne Film Festival Unique Artist Merit, Best Experimental Film Australian Film Institute Award, Most Popular Short Film Sydney Film Festival, for Passionless Moments, 1984–85; Rouben Mamoulian Award Best Overall Short Film/Unique Artist Merit Melbourne Film Festival, Best Direction Australian Film Institute Award, Best Screenplay Australian Film Institute Award, First Prize Cinestud Amsterdam Film Festival, for Girls Own Story, 1984–85; X. L. Elders Award Melbourne Film Festival, Best Short Fiction Melbourne Film Festival, for After Hours, 1985; Chicago International Film Festival Golden Plaque, Best Director Australian Film Institute Award, Best TV Film Australian Film Institute Award, for 2 Friends, 1987; Georges Sadoul Prize Australian Critics Award, Best Foreign Film Australian Critics Award, Best Film Australian Critics Award, Best Director Australian Critics Award, Los Angeles Film Critics Association New Generation Award, Best Foreign Film Independent Spirit Award, for Sweetie, 1989–90; Venice Film Festival Grand Special Jury Prize, Venice Film Festival O.C.I.C. Award, Toronto International Film Festival Critics Award, Best Foreign Film Independent Spirit Award, for An Angel at My Table, 1990; Best Screenplay Academy Award, Cannes Film Festival Golden Palm, Best Foreign Film Cesar Award, Best Screenplay Written Directly for the Screen Writers Guild of America Award, Best Foreign Film Independent Spirit Award, Best Director Australian Film Institute Award, Best Screenplay Australian Film Institute Award, Best Director Los Angeles Film Critics Association, Best Screenplay Los Angeles Film Critics Association, Best Screenplay National Society of Film Critics, Australian Film Critics Best Director, Australian Film Critics Best Screenplay, Guild of Regional Film Writers Best Director Award, Best Screenplay Chicago Film Critics, Robert Festival Best Foreign Film, Bodil Festival Best European Film, for The Piano, 1993. Address: Hilary Linstead & Associates, Level 18, Plaza II, 500 Oxford Street, Bondi Junction, NSW 2022, Australia.

Films as Director:

1982  Peel (short) (+ sc, ed)
1984  Mishaps of Seduction and Conquest (video short) (+ sc);
      Passionless Moments (short) (co-d, + co-sc, co-pr, ph);
      Girls Own Story (short) (+ sc); After Hours (short) (+ sc)
1985  2 Friends (for Australian TV) (+ co-pr)
1989  Sweetie (+ co-sc, story, casting dir)
1990  An Angel at My Table (for Australian TV; edited version released theatrically)
1993  The Piano (+ sc)
1996  Portrait of a Lady
1999  Holy Smoke (+ sc)
2001  In the Cut (+ sc)

Other Films:

1989  The Audition (Anna Campion) (ro)
1999  Soft Fruit (Andreef) (exec pr)

Publications

By CAMPION: books—

Sweetie, the Screenplay, with Gerard Lee, St. Lucia, Queensland, 1991.

By CAMPION: articles—

Interview with Carla Hall, in Washington Post, 4 March 1990.
Interview with Elizabeth Drucker, in American Film (Los Angeles), July 1991.
Interview with Christian Viviani and Catherine Axelrad, in Positif (Paris), December 1996.

“Jane Campion’s Passage to India,” interview with Kathleen Murphy, in Film Comment (New York), January/February 2000.

On CAMPION: books—

On CAMPION: articles—

Quart, Barbara, “‘The Short Films of Jane Campion,’” in Cineaste (New York), no. 1, 1992.

Gordon, Suzy, “‘I Clipped Your Wing, That’s All’: Auto-Erotism and the Female Spectator in The Piano Debate,” in Screen (Oxford), Summer 1996.
Murphy, Kathleen, “Jane Campion’s Shining Moment: Portrait of a Director,” in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1996.
Chumo, Peter N., II, “Keys to the Imagination: Jane Campion’s The Piano,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), July 1997.

Whatever their quality, all of Jane Campion’s feature films have remained consistent in theme. They depict the lives of girls and women who are in one way or another separate from the mainstream, because of physical appearance (if not outright physical disability) or personality quirk, and she spotlights the manner in which they relate to and function within their respective societies.

Campion began directing features after making several highly acclaimed, award-winning short films which were extensively screened on the international film festival circuit. Her first two features are similar in that they focus on the relationships between two young women, and how they are affected by the adults who control their world. Her debut, 2 Friends, was made for Australian television in 1985 and did not have its American theatrical premiere until 1996. It depicts the connection between a pair of adolescents, focusing on the changes in their friendship and how they are influenced by adult authority figures. The narrative is told in reverse time: at the outset, the girls are a bit older, and their developing personalities have separated them; as the film continues, they become younger and closer.

Sweetie, Campion’s initial theatrical feature, is a pitch-black comedy about a young woman who is overweight, overemotional, and even downright crazy, with the scenario charting the manner in which she relates to her parents and her skinny, shy, easily manipulated sister. The film was controversial in that critics and viewers either raved about it or were turned off by its quirky sensibility. While not without inspired moments, both Sweetie and 2 Friends lack the assurance of Campion’s subsequent work.

The filmmaker’s unequivocal breakthrough as a world-class talent came in 1990 with An Angel at My Table. The theatrical version of the film is 158 minutes long and is taken from a three-part mini-series made for New Zealand television. An Angel at My Table did not benefit from the media hype surrounding The Piano, Campion’s 1993 international art house hit, but it is equally as fine a film. It is an uncommonly literate portrait of Janet Frame, a plump, repressed child who was destined to become one of New Zealand’s most renowned writers. Prior to her fame, however, she was falsely diagnosed as a schizophrenic, passed eight years in a mental hospital, and received over 200 electric shock treatments.

Campion evocatively depicts the different stages of Frame’s life; the filmmaker elicits a dynamic performance from Kerry Fox as the adult Janet and, in visual terms, she perfectly captures the essence of the writer’s inner being. At the same time, Campion bitingly satirizes the manner in which society patronizes those who sincerely dedicate their lives to the creation of art. She depicts pseudo-artists who would not know a poem from a Harlequin Romance, and publishers who think that for Frame to truly be a success she must have a best-seller and ride around in a Rolls Royce.

If An Angel at My Table spotlights the evolution of a woman as an intellectual being, Campion’s next work, The Piano, depicts a woman’s development on a sexual and erotic level. The Piano, like The Crying Game before it and Pulp Fiction later on, became the cinematic cause celebre of its year. It is a deceptively simple story, beautifully told, of Ada (Holly Hunter, in an Academy Award-winning performance), a Scottish widow and mute who arrives with her nine-year-old daughter (Anna Paquin, who also won an Oscar) in remote New Zealand during the 1850s. Ada is to be the bride in an arranged marriage with a stern, hesitant farmer (Sam Neill). But she becomes sexually and romantically involved with Baines (Harvey Keitel), her illiterate, vulnerable neighbor to whom she gives piano lessons: an arrangement described by Campion as an “erotic pact.”

Campion succeeds in creating a story about the development of love, from the initial eroticism between the two characters to something deeper and more romantic. Ada has a symbolic relationship with the piano, which is both her refuge and way of self-expression. The Piano is an intensely haunting tale of exploding passion and deep, raw emotion, and it puts its maker at the forefront of contemporary, world-class cinema.

Unfortunately, Campion’s follow-up features have not been as cinematically successful as The Piano and An Angel at My Table. The Portrait of a Lady, a static adaptation of the Henry James novel, opens in 1872 and tells the story of orphaned American expatriate Isabel Archer (Nicole Kidman), a young woman with vague feminist inclinations. Isabel pronounces that she values her independence and probably never will marry, yet she inexplicably falls for and wedds the boorish, self-centered Gilbert Osmond (John Malkovich). The Portrait of a Lady is one of the more disappointing films of its year. Sheer dullness is what does it in. The film is worth seeing only for the deservedly lauded, icy-cool performance of Barbara Hershey as Madame Merle, Osmond’s mistress.

Campion’s next feature, Holy Smoke, may be linked to The Piano for the underlying eroticism that bonds its two key characters. But here is where all comparisons end. Holy Smoke is the story of Ruth Barron (Kate Winslet), another free-spirited Campion heroine: a young woman who has come of age in an Australian suburb and chosen to reject Western materialism by running off to India and joining a religious cult. Her free will is compromised first by her manipulative, male-dominated family, and then by macho American deprogrammer P.J. Waters (Harvey Keitel), the “cult-exiter” hired to toy with her mind and return her to her family in spirit as well as body. Ruth is an intelligent woman, strongly committed to her new faith; her embracing the cult is her way of rejecting the vapidity of contemporary society. She may be directly contrasted to her sister-in-law, who dyes her hair, wears clothes that appear to be made out of plastic, and fantasizes about movie stars while making love to her husband. Yet the core of the story spotlights the battle of wills and physical, sexual, and psychological grappling between Ruth and Waters, resulting in an exploration of clashing cultures and the nature of sexual desire and fantasy.

Granted, Holy Smoke is a serious-minded film. But dramatically speaking, it is shrill and obvious. The members of Ruth’s family are clichés, superficially trite characters who view suspicion anything they do not understand. As they float through their lives as pop culture consumers, mindlessly watching television and munching on junk food, they are painted in the broadest of strokes. The same may be said for the P.J. Waters character. As a professional who is supposed to be tops at his trade, he too-easily is out-finessed by Ruth. In his one-dimensional narcissism—he wears cool “shades” indoors, and exudes vanity while combing his hair and spraying his mouth with breath enhancer—Waters is an obvious target for ridicule.

Given Campion’s cinematic mission, however, it is obligatory that she present Waters as a hypocrite. While he harangues cults for controlling their members, he is just as guilty of manipulating his clients; he is a deprogrammer precisely because he has nothing substantial in which to believe. When he sleeps with Ruth—a professionally irresponsible action—Waters is depicted as being just another guy who wants to get laid. Yet when Ruth cracks his shell, and he ends up garbed in a dress and lipstick, crawling on the ground and begging her to marry him, the profundity of the moment is obliterated by unintentional laughter.

—Rob Edelman

CAPRA, Frank

Films as Director:

1922 Fultah Fisher’s Boarding House
1926 The Strong Man (+ co-sc)
1927 Long Pants; For the Love of Mike
1928 That Certain Thing; So This Is Love; The Matinee Idol; The Way of the Strong; Say It with Sables (+ co-story); Submarine; The Power of the Press; The Swim Princess; The Burglar (Smith’s Burglar)
1929 The Younger Generation; The Donovan Affair; Flight (+ dialogue)
1930 Ladies of Leisure; Rain or Shine
1931 Dirigible; The Miracle Woman; Platinum Blonde
1932 Forbidden (+ sc); American Madness
1933 The Bitter Tea of General Yen (+ pr); Lady for a Day
1934 It Happened One Night; Broadway Bill
1936 Mr. Deeds Goes to Town (+ pr)
1937 Lost Horizon (+ pr)
1938 You Can’t Take It with You (+ pr)
1939 Mr. Smith Goes to Washington (+ pr)
1941 Meet John Doe (+ pr)
1942 Why We Fight (Part 1): Prelude to War (+ pr)
1943 Why We Fight (Part 2): The Nazis Strike (co-d, pr); Why We Fight (Part 3): Divide and Conquer (co-d, pr)
1944 Why We Fight (Part 6): The Battle of China (co-d, pr); Tunisian Victory (co-d, pr); Arsenic and Old Lace (+ pr) (filmed in 1942)
1945 Know Your Enemy: Japan (co-d, pr); Two Down, One to Go (+ pr)
1946 It’s a Wonderful Life (+ pr, co-sc)
1948 State of the Union (+ pr)
1950 Riding High (+ pr)
1951 Here Comes the Groom (+ pr)
1956 Our Mr. Sun (+ pr, sc) (Bell System Science Series Numbers 1 to 4)
1957 Hemo the Magnificent (+ pr, sc); The Strange Case of the Cosmic Rays (+ pr, co-sc)
1958 The Unchained Goddess (+ pr, co-sc)
1959 A Hole in the Head (+ pr)
1961 Pocketful of Miracles (+ pr)

Other Films:

1924 (as co-sc with Arthur Ripley on films featuring Harry Longdon): Picking Peaches; Smile Please; Shanghaied Lovers; Flickering Youth; The Cat’s Meow; His New Mama; The First Hundred Years; The Luck o’ the Foolish; The Hansom Cabman; All Night Long; Feet of Mud
1925 (as co-sc with Arthur Ripley on films featuring Harry Langdon): The Sea Squawk; Boobs in the Woods; His Marriage Wow; Plain Clothes; Remember When?; Horace Greeley Jr.; The White Wing’s Bride; Lucky Stars; There He Goes; Saturday Afternoon
1926 (as co-sc with Arthur Ripley on films featuring Harry Langdon): Fiddlesticks; The Soldier Man; Tramp, Tramp, Tramp
1943 Why We Fight (Part 4): The Battle of Britain (pr)
1944 The Negro Soldier (pr); Why We Fight (Part 5): The Battle of Russia (pr); Know Your Ally: Britain (pr)
1945 Why We Fight (Part 7): War Comes to America (pr); Know Your Enemy: Germany (pr)
1950 Westward the Women (story)
1973 Frank Capra (Schickel) (as himself)
1980 Hollywood (Brownlow, Gill—doc) (as himself)
1982 The 10th American Film Institute Life Achievement Award: A Salute to Frank Capra
1984 George Stevens: A Filmmaker’s Journey (as himself)

Publications

By CAPRA: books—

The Name above the Title, New York, 1971.
It’s a Wonderful Life, with Frances Goodrich and Albert Hackett, New York, 1986.
By CAPRA: articles—

“Sacred Cows to the Slaughter,” in Stage (New York), 13 July 1936.

“We Should All Be Actors,” in Silver Screen (New York), September 1946.

“Do I Make You Laugh?,” in Films and Filming (London), September 1962.

“Capra Today,” with James Childs, in Film Comment (New York), vol.8, no.4, 1972.

“Why We (Should Not) Fight,” interview with G. Bailey, in Take One (Montreal), September 1975.

Interview with J. Mariani, in Focus on Film (London), no.27, 1977.

Interview with H.A. Hargreave, in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 9, no. 3, 1981.

On CAPRA: books—

Silke, James, Frank Capra: One Man—One Film, Washington, D.C., 1971.

Maland, Charles, Frank Capra, Boston, 1980.

On CAPRA: articles—

Deming, Barbara, “‘Non-Heroic Heroes,’” in Films in Review (New York), April 1951.

“Capra Issue” of Film Comment (New York), vol.8, no.4, 1972.

“Lost and Found: The Films of Frank Capra,” in Film (London), June 1975.

Rose, B., “‘It’s a Wonderful Life: The Stand of the Capra Hero,’” in Journal of Popular Film (Bowling Green, Ohio), vol.6, no.2, 1977.

“Capra Issue” of Film Criticism (Edinboro, Pennsylvania), Winter 1981.

Edgerton, G., “Capra and Altman: Mythmaker and Mythologist,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.

American Film (Washington, D.C.), December 1987.

Obituary, in Newsweek, 16 September 1991.

Obituary, in Film Monthly (Berkhamstead), November 1991.

The critical stock of Frank Capra has fluctuated perhaps more wildly than that of any other major director. During his peak years, the 1930s, he was adored by the press, by the industry and, of course, by audiences. In 1934 It Happened One Night won nearly all the Oscars, and through the rest of the decade a film of Frank Capra was either the winner or the strong contender for that honor. Long before the formulation of the auteur theory, the Capra signature on a film was recognized. But after World War II his career went into serious decline. His first post-war film, It's a Wonderful Life, was not received with the enthusiasm he thought it deserved (although it has gone on to become one of his most-revered films). Of his last five films, two are remakes of material he treated in the thirties. Many contemporary critics are repelled by what they deem indestructible “Capracorn” and have even less tolerance for an ideology characterized as dangerously simplistic in its populism, its patriotism, its celebration of all-American values.

Indeed, many of Capra’s most famous films can be read as excessively sentimental and politically naive. These readings, however, tend to neglect the bases for Capra’s success—his skill as a director of actors, the complexity of his staging configurations, his narrative economy and energy, and most of all, his understanding of the importance of the spoken word in sound film. Capra captured the American voice in cinematic space. The words often serve the cause of apple pie, mom, the little man and other greeting card clichés (indeed, the hero of Mr. Deeds Goes to Town writes verse for greeting cards). But often in the sound of the voice we hear uncertainties about those very clichés.

Capra’s career began in the pre-talkie era, when he directed silent comic Harry Langdon in two successful films. His action films of the early thirties are not characteristic of his later work, yet already, in the films he made with Barbara Stanwyck, his individual gift can be discerned. The narrative pretext of The Miracle Woman is the urgency of Stanwyck’s voice, its ability to move an audience, to persuade listeners of its sincerity. Capra exploited the raw energy of Stanwyck in this and other roles, where her qualities of fervor and near-hysterical conviction are just as essential to her persona as her hard-as-nails implacability would be in the forties. Stanwyck’s voice is theatricalized, spatialized in her revivalist circus-tent in The Miracle Woman and on the hero’s suicide tower in Meet John Doe, where her feverish pleadings are the only possible tenor for the film’s unresolved ambiguities about society and the individual.

John Doe is portrayed by Gary Cooper, another American voice with particular resonance in the films of Capra. A star who seems to have invented the “strong, silent” type, Cooper first plays Mr. Deeds, whose platitudinous doggerel comes from a simple, do-gooder heart, but who enacts a crisis of communication in his long silence at the film’s climax, a sanity hearing. When Mr. Deeds finally speaks it is a sign that the community (if not sanity) is restored—the usual resolution of a Capra film. As John Doe, Cooper is given words to voice by reporter Stanwyck, and he delivers them with such conviction that the whole nation listens. The vocal/dramatic center of the film is located in a rain-drenched ball park filled with John Doe’s “people.” The hero’s effort to speak the truth, to reveal his own imposture and expose the fascistic intentions of his sponsor, is stymied when the lines of communication are literally cut between microphone and loudspeaker. The Capra narrative so often hinges on the protagonist’s ability to speak and be heard, on the drama of sound and audition.

The bank run in American Madness is initiated by a montage of telephone voices and images, of mouths spreading a rumor. The panic is quelled by the speech of the bank president (Walter Huston), a situation repeated in more modest physical surroundings in It’s a Wonderful Life. The most extended speech in the films of Capra occurs in Mr. Smith Goes to Washington. The whole film is a test of the hero’s voice, and it culminates in a filibuster, a speech that, by definition, cannot be interrupted. The climax of State of the Union involves a different kind of audience and audition. There, the hero confesses his political dishonesty and his love for his wife on television.

The visual contexts, both simple and complex, never detract from the sound of Capra’s films. They enhance it. The director’s most elaborately designed film, The Bitter Tea of General Yen (recalling the style of Josef von Sternberg in its chiaroscuro lighting and its exoticism) expresses the opposition of cultural values in its visual elements, to be sure, but also in the voices of Stanwyck and Nils Asther, a Swedish actor who impersonates a Chinese war lord. Less usual but not less significant harmonies are sounded in It Happened One Night, where a society girl (Claudette Colbert) learns “real” American speech from a fast-talking reporter (Clark Gable). The love scenes in Mr. Deeds are for Gary Cooper and Jean Arthur, another quintessential Capra heroine, whose vocal personality is at least as memorable as her physical one. In James Stewart Capra finds his most disquieting voice, ranging in Mr. Smith from ingenuousness to hysterical desperation and in It’s a Wonderful Life to an even higher pitch of hysteria when the hero loses his identity.

The sounds and sights of Capra’s films bear the authority of a director whose autobiography is called The Name above the Title. With that authority comes an unsettling belief in authorial power, the power dramatized in his major films, the persuasiveness exercised in political and social contexts. That persuasion reflects back on the director’s own power to engage the viewer in his fiction, to call upon a degree of belief in the fiction—even when we reject the meaning of the fable.

—Charles Affron

CARAX, Léos

His name is entirely made up—for nothing as prosaic as “Alexandre Dupont,” the birth name of Léos Carax, could possibly contain the delirium of his sensibility. Léos Carax is, however, an anagram that includes his original name, Alex, mixed together with Oscar. This may be the only Oscar Carax ever wins, since his deeply personal style is probably too purely poetic, too elliptical for Academy Award consideration. But the merging of his real identity with the symbol of movie illusion is a clue to appreciating this singular director, arguably the most talented French filmmaker of his generation.

Carax was born in 1960, to a French father and American mother, and began writing sporadic contributions to Cahiers du Cinéma while a teenager. He also worked on short films, including Strangulation Blues (1980), before directing his first feature, Boy Meets Girl, in 1984. A spare, black-and-white picture, Boy Meets Girl announced the arrival of a distinct, if not quite developed, talent. In this monochrome ode to Paris at night, a drifter (Denis Lavant) keeps track of his own wanderings, while an actress (Mireille Perrier) escapes to the boulevards to avoid a lover. The title, so suggestive of the most conventional of all plot lines, is ironic in a variety of ways, not least because the boy doesn’t meet the girl for a very long time. On its own terms an evocative paean to Paris, Boy Meets Girl is also an attempt to re-create the French New Wave—in an even more self-conscious light than the New Wave itself.

Boy Meets Girl brought its young director some status in Europe, even if he was irrelevantly lumped together with two young compatriots, Jean-Jacques Beineix and Luc Besson. It also established Carax’s working relationship with three important partners: producer Alain Dahan, who died after the completion of Les Amants du Pont-Neuf; cinematographer Jean-Yves Escoffier, who would shoot the director’s subsequent two features; and Denis Lavant. A strange leading man by any measure, Lavant’s troll-like face, gymnast’s physicality, and near-autistic acting style embodied the Carax alter ego; he plays characters named Alex in the loose trilogy that begins with Boy Meets Girl.

Capable of self-contained watchfulness and sudden eruptions of violence, Lavant’s presence is obviously key to Carax’s Baudelairean conception of a movie hero.

Their next film was Mauvais Sang (Bad Blood/The Night Is Young), in 1987. Although its plot about a mysterious blood-borne virus touches on the specter of AIDS, Mauvais Sang is really another excursion into romantic (and movie) love. Carax’s real-life companion at the time, future Oscar-winner Juliette Binoche, is also the star of the film, deliberately molded by her director-lover to resemble Jean-Luc Godard’s wife-muse-star of the 1960s, Anna Karina.
Although susceptible, like all of Carax’s films, to a certain murkiness, Mauvais Sang bursts with sheer filmmaking ecstasy. A sequence of Denis Lavant running/dancing/exploding down city streets, as the camera tracks breathlessly alongside him and David Bowie sings “Modern Love” on the soundtrack, is pure exhilaration, and evidence of Carax’s talent for the set-piece.

At this time, Carax acted in a couple of films, including Godard’s bizarre doodle on King Lear (1987). He also prepared his greatest film and greatest folly, Les Amants du Pont-Neuf (The Lovers on the Bridge, 1990), again starring Lavant and Binoche. Most of the film is set on the oldest bridge in Paris, the Pont-Neuf, closed for restoration during the French Revolution bicentennial. A scruffy street performer (Lavant) lives on the bridge, with an older mentor. They are soon joined by an artist (Binoche) who is going blind—a postmodern echo of Chaplin’s City Lights, one of the film’s varied inspirations.

Though Carax may allude to his cinematic forbears—L’Atalante being one touchstone—Les Amants is, gloriously and astonishingly, unlike any other film. It begins with a grueling sequence, apparently shot in a police drunk tank with real street people, that promises a documentary-like approach. But the film quickly enters the realm of gutters-level fable, including a Bastille Day sequence that depicts the lovers gamboiling across the Pont-Neuf as fireworks streak across the bridge and music blares from a dozen different sources—later followed by an eye-popping water-skiing stunt down the Seine. The actors themselves appear to be in danger at various moments in the movie.

Les Amants was plagued by serious production problems, with stop-and-start shooting from summer 1988 to spring 1990. An injury to Denis Lavant, cost overruns, and the expensive re-creation of the Pont-Neuf in southern France all contributed to the lengthy process. It received a chilly box-office reception in France, and for years failed to secure an American distributor (finally finding an arthouse release in 1999, after its existence had become semi-legendary). Carax, according to his own cryptic description, went “to hell” during the 1990s, returning with Pola X in time for the Cannes Festival of 1999.

Pola X is a contemporary adaptation of Melville’s Pierre, or The Ambiguities (the title is whimsical shorthand: Pola for the French title of the novel, Pierre ou les ambiguities, X for the tenth draft of Carax’s script). The saga of a privileged young writer (Guillaume Depardieu) who leaves his golden existence for the squalor of bohemia (and the bed of his long-lost sister), Pola X pleased few critics, even as it raised eyebrows for its explicit sex scene; in Film Comment, Phillip Lopate declared that the film “never comes alive, never is believable for a second.” Some of the criticism missed the picture’s deadpan humor—like the original novel, it is partly a parody of a certain kind of melodrama—but Carax did seem to be in a holding pattern of sorts. However, his ability to create rich and dizzy images, and to explore the far reaches of l’amour fou, remains excitingly intact.

—Robert Horton

CARNÉ, Marcel

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1929</td>
<td>Nogent, Eldorado du dimanche</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1936</td>
<td>Jenny</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1937</td>
<td>Drôle de drame (Bizarre Bizarre)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1938</td>
<td>Quai des brumes (Port of Shadows); Hotel du Nord</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1939</td>
<td>Le Jour se lève (Daybreak); École communale (abandoned due to war)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1942</td>
<td>Les Visiteurs du soir (The Devil’s Envosys)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1945</td>
<td>Les Enfants du paradis (Children of Paradise)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1946</td>
<td>Les Portes de la nuit (Gates of the Night)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1947</td>
<td>La Fleur de l’âge (not completed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1949</td>
<td>La Marie du port (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1951</td>
<td>Juliette ou la Clé des songes (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>Thérèse Raquin (The Adulteress) (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1954</td>
<td>L’Air de Paris (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>Le Pays d’où je viens (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Les Tricheurs (The Cheaters)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
1960 Terrain vague (+ co-sc)
1962 Du mouron pour les petits oiseaux (+ co-sc)
1965 Trois Chambres à Manhattan (+ co-sc)
1967 Les Jeunes Loups (The Young Wolves)
1971 Les Assassins de l’ordre (+ co-sc)
1974 La Merveilleuse Visite (+ co-sc)
1976 La Bible (feature doc for TV and theatrical release)

Publications

By CARNÉ: book—

By CARNÉ: articles—

Interview, with F. Cuel and others, in Cinématographe (Paris), May 1978.

Interview in Film Comment (New York), November-December 1991.

On CARNÉ: books—

On CARNÉ: articles—

Manvell, Roger, “Marcel Carné,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1946.

Lambert, Gavin, “Marcel Carné,” in Sequence (London), Spring 1948.

“Carné Issue” of Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Winter 1972.

Obituary, in Sequences (Haute-Ville), November/December 1996.

Obituary, in Film en Télévisie (Brussels), December 1996.

* * *

At a time when film schools were non-existent and training in filmmaking was acquired through assistantship, no one could have been better prepared for a brilliant career than Marcel Carné. He worked as assistant to René Clair on the first important French sound film, Sous les toits de Paris, and to Jacques Feyder on the latter’s three great films of 1934–35. Though he had also made a successful personal documentary, Nogent, Eldorado du dimanche, and a number of publicity shorts, it was only thanks to the support of Feyder and his wife, the actress Françoise Rosay, that Carné was able to make his debut as a feature filmmaker with Jenny in 1936. If this was a routine melodrama, Carné was able in the next three years to establish himself as one of Europe’s leading film directors.

During the period up to the outbreak of war in 1939 Carné established what was to be a ten-year collaboration with the poet and screenwriter Jacques Prévert, and gradually built up a team of collaborators—including the designer Alexandre Trauner and composer Maurice Jaubert—which was unsurpassed at this period. In quick succession Carné made the comedy Drole de drame, which owes more to Prévert’s taste for systematic absurdity and surreal gags than to the director’s professionalism, and a trio of fatalistic romantic melodramas, Quai des brumes, Hotel du nord and Le Jour se lève. These are perfect examples of the mode of French filmmaking that had been established by Jacques Feyder: a concern with visual style and a studio-created realism, a reliance on detailed scripts with structure and dialogue separately elaborated, and a foregrounding of star performers to whom all elements of decor and photography are subordinate. Though the forces shaping a character’s destiny may be outside his or her control, the story focuses on social behavior and the script offers set-piece scenes and confrontations and witty or trenchant dialogue that enables the stars to display their particular talents to the full.

The various advocates of either Prévert or Carné have sought to make exclusive claims as to which brought poetry to the nebulous and ill-defined “poetic realism” that these films are said to exemplify. In retrospect, however, these arguments seem over-personalized, since the pair seem remarkably well-matched. The actual differences seem less in artistic approach than in attitude to production. From the first, Carné, heir to a particular mode of quality filmmaking, was concerned with an industry, a technique, a career. Prévert, by contrast, though he is a perfect example of the archetypal 1930s screenwriter, able to create striking star roles and write dazzling and memorable dialogue, is not limited to this role and has a quite separate identity as surrealist, humorist and poet.
The pair share a certain fantastic conception of realism, with film seen as a studio construct in which fidelity to life is balanced by attention to a certain poetic atmosphere. Carné’s coldly formal command of technique is matched by Prévert’s sense of the logic of a tightly woven narrative. If it is Prévô’s imagination that allows him to conceive both the amour fou that unites the lovers and the grotesque villains who threaten it, it is Carné’s masterly direction of actors that turns Jean Gabin and Michèle Morgan into the 1930s’ ideal couple and draws such memorable performances from Michel Simon, Jules Berry and Arletty.

The collaboration of Prévert and Carné was sustained during the very different circumstances of the German Occupation, when they together made two films that rank among the most significant of the period. Since films in the mode of 1930s poetic realism were now banned, it is hardly surprising that Carné and Prévert should have found the need to adopt a radically new style. Remaining within the concept of the studio-made film, but leaving behind the contemporary urban gloom of Le Jour se lève, they opted for a style of elaborate and theatrical period spectacle. The medieval fable of Les Visiteurs du soir was an enormous contemporary success but it has not worn well. Working with very limited resources the filmmakers—assisted clandestinely by Trauner and the composer Joseph Kosma—succeeded in making an obvious prestige film, a work in which Frenchmen could take pride at a dark moment of history. But despite the presence of such players as Arletty and Jules Berry, the overall effect is ponderous and stilted.

Carné’s masterpiece is Les Enfants du Paradis, shot during the war years but released only after the Liberation. Running for over three hours and comprising two parts, each of which is of full feature length, Les Enfants du paradis is one of the most ambitious films ever undertaken in France. Set in the twin worlds of theatre and crime in nineteenth century Paris, this all-star film is both a theatrical spectacle in its own right and a reflection on the nature of spectacle. The script is one of Prévô’s richest, abounding in wit and aphorism, and Carné’s handling of individual actors and crowd scenes is masterly. The sustained vitality and dynamism of the work as it moves seemingly effortlessly from farce to tragedy, from delicate love scenes to outrageous buffoonery, is exemplary, and its impact is undimmed by the years.

Marcel Carné was still only thirty-six and at the height of his fame when the war ended. Younger than most of those who now came to the fore, he had already made masterly films in two quite different contexts and it seemed inevitable that he would continue to be a dominant force in French cinema despite the changed circumstances of the postwar era. But in fact the first post-war Carné-Prévô film, Les Portes de la nuit, was an expensive flop. When a subsequent film, La Fleur de l’âge, was abandoned shortly after production had begun, one of the most fruitful partnerships in French cinema came to an end. Carné directed a dozen more films, from La Marie du port in 1950 to La Merveilleuse Visite in 1973, but he was no longer a major force in French filmmaking.

Marcel Carné was an unfashionable figure long before his directing career came to an end. Scorned by a new generation of filmmakers, Carné grew more and more out of touch with contemporary developments, despite an eagerness to explore new subjects and use young performers. His failure is a measure of the gulf that separates 1950s and 1960s conceptions of cinema from the studio era of the war and immediate prewar years. He was, however, the epitome of this French studio style, its unquestioned master, even if—unlike Renoir—he was unable to transcend its limitations. While future critics are unlikely to find much to salvage from the latter part of his career, films like Drole de drame and Quai des brumes, Le Jour se lève and Les Enfants du paradis, remain rich and complex monuments to a decade of filmmaking that will reward fresh and unbiased critical attention.

—Roy Armes

CARPENTER, John

Films as Director:

1970 The Resurrection of Bronco Billy (short) (+ ed, mus)
1974 Dark Star (+ pr, co-sc)
1977 Assault on Precinct 13 (+ sc, mus)
1978 Someone’s Watching Me! (+ sc); Halloween (+ co-sc)
1979 Elvis (for TV)
1980 The Fog (+ sc, mus)
1981 Escape from New York (+ co-sc, co-pr)
1982 The Thing

John Carpenter
CARPENTER

1983 Christine
1984 Starman
1986 Big Trouble in Little China
1987 Prince of Darkness; Armed and Dangerous
1988 They Live (+ co-mus)
1991 Memoirs of an Invisible Man
1995 In the Mouth of Madness (+ co-sc); Village of the Damned (+ co-sc, role)
1996 Escape from L.A. (+ co-sc, co-mus)
1998 Vampires (+ mus)
2001 Ghosts of Mars (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1962–70 (short films, as director): Revenge of the Colossal Beasts; Gorgon versus Godzilla; Terror from Space; Sorcerer from Outer Space; Warrior and the Demon; Gorgon, the Space Monster
1978 The Eyes of Laura Mars (Kershner) (sc)
1981 Halloween II (Rosenthal) (pr, co-sc)
1983 Halloween III: Season of the Witch (Wallace) (mus)
1984 The Philadelphia Experiment (Raffill) (sc)
1986 Black Moon Rising (Cokliss) (co-sc)
1988 Halloween 4: The Return of Michael Meyers (Little) (mus)
1989 Halloween 5: The Revenge of Michael Meyers (Othenin-Girard) (mus)
1990 El Diablo (Markle—for TV) (co-sc)
1991 Blood River (Damski—for TV) (co-sc)
1993 Body Bags (role)
1994 The Silence of the Hams (Greggio) (role)
1995 After Sunset: The Life & Times of the Drive-in Theater (Bokenkamp) (as himself)
1998 Halloween H20: Twenty Years Later (mus)
1999 Silent Predators (Nosseck—for TV) (co-sc); Meltdown (de Jong—for TV) (story)

Publications

By CARPENTER: articles—

Interview in Starburst (London), nos. 36 and 37, 1981.
Interview in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1982.
Interview in Films (London), May 1985.
Interview in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), September 1988.
“Damned Again!” an interview with Robert Sokol and Sean Farrell, in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), Fall 1995.

On CARPENTER: books—

On CARPENTER: articles—

* * *

While his career has been neither as erratic as Wes Craven’s nor as disaster-littered as that of Tobe Hooper, John Carpenter currently stands as an out-of-time B specialist. His later directorial output has not exactly failed to live up to the promise of his earliest films, but nor has it been able to match their perfect achievements.

Carpenter’s first three movies are marvelously economical, deftly exciting, genuinely distinctive, and slyly amusing, and cover a wide range of generic bases. Dark Star, which he made as a student in collaboration with Dan O’Bannon, is one of the miracles of the 1970s, an intelligent and approachable science-fiction film made in the wake of 2001 but fresh and lively, with a satiric bite carried over from the written sf of the 1950s—its surfing punchline is an apt borrowing from Ray Bradbury—and a near-absurdist sense of humour. Its storyline concerns the crew of the spaceship Dark Star and its plunge into isolation-fueled insanity as their twenty-year mission to demolish useless planets with sentient bombs drags on and on. It is a film that repays many repeat viewings. Assault on Precinct 13, an urban Western rooted in Rio Bravo and Night of the Living Dead, is at once a lean, generic, action machine (its plot centers around a nightmarish street gang as it besieges and lays waste to an isolated police station) and a witty transposition of the certainties of a Hawsian ensemble piece into the racially and sexually tense 1970s. In these films, Carpenter demonstrated that suspense and humour could be combined. He also showed that he was a skilled handler of unfamiliar actors, concentrating unusually on nuances of character in forms where spectacle and effects often take precedence. Finally, he established himself as a talented composer of driving, minimalist, synthesizer-oriented musical themes.

Halloween is every bit as good as the first few films, but seems less fresh because it has been so influential. Itself a psycho suspense horror movie in the vein of The Spiral Staircase or Black Christmas (and Carpenter’s lady-stalking 1978 TV movie Someone’s Watching Me), Halloween single-handedly revived the drive-in horror movie in the late 1970s, inspiring such nasty pieces of work as Friday the 13th and literally hundreds of blatant imitations. It also inspired a series of sequels, including the intriguing Nigel Kneale-scripted box office failure Halloween III: Season of the Witch, the Carpenter-produced Halloween II, and a couple of Halloween films with which he was not involved in any capacity, except for their re-use of parts of his scores for the original film and its sequel, particularly the title theme.

The original Halloween, which featured Jamie Lee Curtis pursued by an unkillable, masked madman and Donald Pleasence as a hammer shrink on the killer’s trail, establishes its own world of horror, as enclosed and unreal as the Transylvanian backlots of the Universal or Hammer series. Carpenter utilizes a mythic American small town teenage milieu, where Halloween is a magical evocation of terror and delight, and where babysitting, trick-or-treating, and blind-dating hold possibilities of joy and/or terror. With its absolute mastery of the hand-through-the-window shock moment, cunning use of the Panavision shape, and a shivery theme tune, Halloween is a slender but masterly confection, and it should not be blamed for the floodgates it opened when it became an unexpected box office bonanza (in fact, one of the most successful independent films in history). Before Halloween took off at the box office, however, Carpenter returned to TV to helm a biopic of Elvis Presley for Dick Clark productions. The telefilm marked the beginning of Carpenter’s long association with Kurt Russell, a former Disney child star then trying to break away from his image and land more serious (read adult) roles. Russell was one of many actors who tested for the high profile part, but he got it, and turned in a bravura (at times even uncanny) performance as the legendary King of Rock ‘n Roll in what many critics still consider to be Carpenter’s best film away from the horror/SF genre.

Although there are pleasures to be found in most of his subsequent works, Carpenter has never quite recaptured the confidence and streamlined form of the early pictures. The Fog, a maritime ghost story, and Escape from New York, a science-fiction action picture, are enjoyable, entertaining movies that struggle through illogical plots, but nevertheless find performers—particularly Carpenter’s then-wife Adrienne Barbeau, but also regulars Kurt Russell, Donald Pleasence, Tom Atkins, Nancy Loomis, and Chuck Cyphers—doing nice little things with characters, and individual suspense sequences in these films at times override the general messiness of the stories. The same feel can be found in films made by others from scripts he wrote in this period, such as Stewart Raffill’s The Philadelphia Experiment and Harley Cokliss’s Black Moon Rising, not to mention the 1990 TV Western El Diabolo. Stepping up into the studio big leagues, Carpenter was then given a chance to remake Hawks’s and Nyby’s The Thing from Another World (1950). He came through with The Thing, a controversially downbeat but genuinely effective movie in which an Arctic base is undermined by the presence of a shape-changing alien. The film is buoyed by the edgy, paranoid performances of a well-chosen cast of flabby, unreliable types and frequently punctuated by incredible bursts of special effects activity. The Thing handles its setpieces—severed heads sprouting spiderlegs, a stomach opening up into a toothy mouth, a dog exploding into tentacular gloopiness—remarkably well, but Carpenter is also in control of the funny, tense, questioning passages in between. Like so many of his later films, though, he seems unable to bring it to a satisfying conclusion.

It was the commercial failure of The Thing, which having arrived on Earth just as the box office was embracing E.T., a film that rendered evil aliens temporarily unfashionable, appears to have sufficiently disconcerted Carpenter to force him into a succession of blighted big studio movies. Christine is the regulation Stephen King adaptation, loud and watchable but essentially empty and ordinary. Starman is an uncomfortable and impersonal hybrid of It Happened One Night and The Man Who Fell to Earth. Finally, Big Trouble in Little China is a wacky kung fu-monster-comedy-musical-action- adventure-horror-fantasy that features Kurt Russell’s funniest Carpenter hero role and some weird and wayward sequences, but it never quite catches the magic of the Hong Kong films upon which it is obviously based.

Subsequently, Carpenter deserted the big studios and handled a pair of smaller projects in an attempt to get back to the basics of his best work. The first of these, Prince of Darkness, is a labyrinthine and diffuse horror movie with a nuclear physics subplot, while They Live is a funny and pointed update of Invasion of the Body Snatchers in which the aliens have invaded earth to exploit it economically. These two films display traces of Carpenter’s old flair, even if they both open a great deal better than they close; They Live, in particular, is as interesting and offbeat a movie as The Fog or Escape from New York. But neither film arrested the general drift of Carpenter’s career. By this time, while he had not yet settled into the rut that Tobe Hooper has dug for himself, he had also not achieved the generic apotheosis of a George Romero or a David Cronenberg, either.

In the early 1990s, Carpenter harkened back to another of his favorite films of yesteryear, James Whale’s The Invisible Man. Carpenter’s variation on the theme, Memoirs of an Invisible Man, was based on a novel by H. F. Saint. The film presented huge challenges for Carpenter and his FX team in terms of making star Chevy Chase’s escapades in invisibility absolutely convincing. Fanciful, funny, and a technical knockout, Memoirs of an Invisible Man was nonetheless not the kind of film that his fans wanted to see from cinema’s “titant of trick or treat.”

Carpenter’s fans wanted Carpenter to return to his traditional landscape of chills and thrills. He did so with a vengeance, creating what many of his fans consider to be the most terrifying film he’d made since the halcyon days of Halloween and The Thing: the Lovecraftian In the Mouth of Madness. Determined to stay the course in the cinema of fear and fright, Carpenter turned again to remaking another classic of his youth, Village of the Damned, originally a 1960 shocker about menancing, otherworldly children, but the results were disjointed and anemic. Escape from L.A. teamed him again with Kurt Russell in a splashier, bigger-budgeted sequel to and rehash of their successful Escape from New York, which did little for the reputations or coffers of either man. With Vampires, Carpenter’s name appeared resoundingly above the title. Boasting a superb premise—the Vatican has created a Special Forces team (led by James Woods) to track down and destroy the King of the Vampires and his unholy minions — the film surrendered itself completely to the gore and sleaze that had become endemic to the horror genre by this point. And the opportunity to produce a genre classic was unfortunately missed.

John Carpenter once called his movie Halloween the film equivalent of a haunted house exhibit at an old country fair. The scares are carefully calculated, coming at you at just the right moments between lulls to ensure a thrilling ride. Without apology, he notes that the film sums up the escapist entertainment that his movies are all about. After all, he says, it is the kind of entertainment he enjoys most himself.

—Kim Newman, updated by John McCarty

CASSAVETES, John

Nationality: American. Born: New York City, 9 December 1929. Education: Mohawk College, Colgate University, and New York Academy of Dramatic Arts, graduated 1950. Family: Married actress Gena Rowlands, 1958, two sons, one daughter. Career: Title character in TV series Johnny Staccato, 1959–60; directed first film, Shadows, 1960; hired by Paramount, then by Stanley Kramer, 1961; worked as independent filmmaker, from 1964. Awards: Critics Award, Venice Festival, for Shadows, 1960; Best Screenplay, National Society of Film Critics, and five awards from Venice Festival, for Faces, 1968; Golden Lion, Venice Festival, for Gloria, 1980; Golden Bear, Berlin Festival, for Love Streams, 1984; Los Angeles Film Critics Career Achievement Award, 1986. Died: Of cirrhosis of the liver, in Los Angeles, 3 February 1989.

Films as Director:

1960 Shadows (+ sc)
1961 Too Late Blues (+ sc, pr)
1962 A Child Is Waiting
1968 Faces (+ sc)
1970 Husbands (+ sc, role as Gus)
1971 Minnie and Moskowitz (+ sc, role as Husband)
1974 A Woman under the Influence (+ sc)
1976 The Killing of a Chinese Bookie (+ sc)
1977/78 Opening Night (+ sc)
1980 Gloria
1984 Love Streams
1986 Big Trouble

Other Films:

1951 Fourteen Hours (Hathaway) (role as extra)
1953 Taxi (Ratoff) (role)
1955 The Night Holds Terror (Stone) (role)
1956 Crime in the Streets (Siegel) (role)
1957 Edge of the City (Ritt) (role)
1958 Saddle the Wind (Parrish) (role); Virgin Island (P. Jackson) (role)
1962 The Webster Boy (Chaffey) (role)
1964 The Killers (Siegel) (role as Johnny North)
1967 The Dirty Dozen (Aldrich) (role as Victor Franko); Devil’s Angels (Haller) (role)
1968 Rosemary’s Baby (Polanski) (role as Rosemary’s husband); Gli Intoccabili (Machine Gun McCain) (Montaldo) (role)
1969 Roma com a Chicago (Bandits in Rome) (De Martino) (role); If It’s Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium (M. Stuart) (cameo role)
1976 Two-Minute Warning (Pearce) (role); Mikey and Nicky (May) (role)
1978 The Fury (De Palma) (role)
1982 The Tempest (Mazursky) (role)

Publications

By CASSAVETES: books—

By CASSAVETES: articles—

“‘What’s Wrong with Hollywood,’” in Film Culture (New York), April 1959.

Interview in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1988.

On CASSAVETES: books—

On CASSAVETES: articles—

Mekas, Jonas, “‘Cassavetes, the Improvisation,’” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1962.

Sarris, Andrew, “‘Oddities and One-Shots,’” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

Guérin, A., “‘After Faces, a Film to Keep the Man-Child Alive,’” in Life (New York), 9 May 1969.

Doorn, F. van, “‘Wonderkind en eeuwige angry young man,’” in Skoop, vol. 25, February 1989.

Seisslen, G., “‘Liebesstreome, Todesbilder,’” in EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), vol. 6, June 1989.

As perhaps the most influential of the independently produced feature films of its era (1958–1967), Shadows came to be seen as a virtual breakthrough for American alternative cinema. The film and its fledgling writer-director had put a group of young, independent filmmakers on the movie map, together with their more intellectual, less technically polished, decidedly less commercial, low-budget alternatives to Hollywood features.
Begun as an improvisational exercise in the method-acting workshop that actor John Cassavetes was teaching, and partly financed by his earnings from the Johnny Staccato television series, Shadows was a loosely plotted, heavily improvised work of cinema verité immediacy that explored human relationships and racial identity against the background of the beat atmosphere of the late 1950s, given coherence by the jazz score of Charles Mingus.

The origins and style of Shadows were to characterize John Cassavetes’s work throughout his directorial career, once he got the studio-financed production bug out of his system—and his system out of theirs.

The five prizes garnered by Shadows, including the prestigious Critics Award at the 1960 Venice Film Festival, led to Cassavetes’s unhappy and resentful experience directing two studio-molded productions (Too Late Blues, A Child Is Waiting), both of which failed critically and commercially. Thereafter, he returned to independent filmmaking, although he continued to act in mainstream movies such as The Dirty Dozen, Rosemary’s Baby, and Two Minute Warning. He continued directing feature films, however, in his characteristic, controversial style.

That style centers around a freedom afforded his actors to share in the creative process. Cassavetes’s scripts serve as sketchy blueprints for the performers’ introspective explorations and emotional embellishments. Consequently, camera movements, at the command of the actor’s intuitive behavior, are of necessity spontaneous.

The amalgam of improvisational acting, hand-held camera work, grainy stock, loose editing, and threadbare plot give his films a texture of recreated rather than heightened reality, often imbuing them with a feeling of astonishing psychodramatic intensity as characters confront each other and lay bare their souls. Detractors, however, see Cassavettes as too dedicated to the performers’ art and too trusting of the actor’s self-discipline. They charge that the result is too often a mild form of aesthetic anarchy.

At worst Cassavetes’s films are admittedly formless and self-indulgent. Scenes are stretched excruciatingly far beyond their climactic moments, lines are delivered falteringly, dialogue is repetitious. But, paradoxically, these same blemishes seem to make possible the several lucid, provocative, and moving moments of transcendent human revelation that a Cassavetes film almost inevitably delivers.

As his career progressed, Cassavetes changed his thematic concerns, upgraded his technical production values, and, not surprisingly, attracted a wider audience—but without overhauling his actor-as-author approach.

Faces represents Cassavetes’s return to his favored semi-documentary style, complete with the seemingly obliged excesses and gaffes. But the film also contained moments of truth and exemplary acting. Not only did this highly charged drama about the disintegration of a middle-class marriage in affluent Southern California find favor with the critical and filmmaking communities, it broke through as one of the first independent films to find a sizable audience among the general moviegoing public.

In Husbands, Cassavettes continued his exploration of marital manners, morals, and sexual identity by focusing on a trio of middle-class husbands—played by Cassavettes, Ben Gazzara, and Peter Falk—who confront their own mortality when a friend dies. Director Cassavettes’s doubled-edged trademark—brilliant moments of intense acting amid the banal debris of over-indulgence—had never been in bolder relief.

Minnie and Moskowitz was Cassavettes’s demonstration of a lighter touch, an amusing and touching interlude prior to his most ambitious and commercially successful film. The film starred Gena Rowlands (Cassavettes’s wife) and Seymour Cassel as a pair of dissimilar but similarly lonely people ensnared in a manic romance. Cassavettes again examined miscommunication in Minnie and Moskowitz, but in a much more playful vein.

A Woman under the Influence was by far Cassavettes’s most polished, accessible, gripping, and technically proficient film. For this effort, Cassavettes departed from his accustomed style of working by writing a fully detailed script during pre-production. Starring Gena Rowlands in a magnificent performance as a lower-middle class housewife coming apart at the seams, and the reliable Peter Falk as the hardhat husband who is ill-equipped to deal with his wife’s mental breakdown, Woman offered a more palatable balance of Cassavettes’s strengths and weaknesses. The over-long scenes and overindulgent acting jags are there, but in lesser doses, while the privileged moments and bursts of virtuoso screen acting seem more abundant than usual.

Financed by Falk and Cassavettes, the film’s crew and cast (including many family members) worked on deferred salaries. Promoted via a tour undertaken by the nucleus of the virtual repertory company (Cassavettes, Rowland, Falk) and booked without a major distributor, Woman collected generally ecstatic reviews, Academy Award nominations for Cassavettes and Rowlands, and impressive box office returns.

Cassavettes’s next two films (The Killing of a Chinese Bookie, Opening Night) feature a return to his earlier structure (or lack thereof)—inaccessible, interminable, and insufferable for all but diehard buffs. However, Gloria, which showcased Rowlands as a former gangster’s moll, while uneven in tone and erratic in pace, represented a concession by Cassavettes to filmgoers seeking heightened cinematic energy and narrative momentum.

“People who are making films today are too concerned with mechanics—technical things instead of feeling,” Cassavettes told an interviewer in 1980. “Execution is about eight percent to me. The technical quality of a film doesn’t have much to do with whether it’s a good film.”

—Bill Wine

CASTELLANI, Renato

Nationality: Italian. Born: Finale Ligure (Savona), 4 September 1913. Education: Educated in Argentina to 1925, then in Geneva; studied architecture in Milan. Career: Journalist, then scriptwriter for Camerini, Genina, Soldati, and Blasetti in 1930s; assistant to Blasetti, 1940; directed first film, Un Colpo di pistola, 1941. Awards: Best Film, Venice Festival, for Sotto il sole di Roma, 1948; Best Film, Cannes Festival, for Due Soldi di speranza, 1952; Golden Lion, Venice Festival, for Giulietta e Romeo, 1954. Died: 28 December 1985.

Films as Director:

1941 Un Colpo di pistola (+ co-sc)
1942 Zaza (+ sc)
Renato Castellani

1943
La Donna del Montagna (+ sc)

1946
Mio Figlio Professore (Professor My Son) (+ co-sc)

1948
Sotto il sole di Roma (Under the Sun of Rome) (+ sc)

1949
E’primavera (It’s Forever Springtime) (+ co-sc)

1952
Due Soldi di speranza (Two Cents Worth of Hope) (+ sc)

1954
Giulietta e Romeo (Romeo and Juliet) (+ sc)

1957
I sogni nel cassetto (+ sc)

1959
Nella città l’inferno (And the Wild, Wild Women) (+ co-sc)

1961
Il Brigante (+ sc)

1962
Mare Matto (+ co-sc)

1964
“La Vedova” episode of Tre notti di amore (Three Nights of Love) (+ co-sc); “Una Donna d’Afari” episode of Controsesso (+ co-sc)

1967
Questi fantasmi (Ghosts Italian Style) (+ co-sc)

1969
Una breve stagione (+ co-sc)

1972
Leonardo da Vinci (condensed from five-part TV series) (+ co-sc)

Publications

By CASTELLANI: article—

On CASTELLANI: books—

On CASTELLANI: articles—

Other Films:

1938
L’oròlogio a Cucu (Mastrocinque) (co-sc); Batticuore (Camerini) (co-sc); Castelli in aria (Camerini) (co-sc)

1939
Grandi magazzini (Camerini) (co-sc, asst d); Il documento (Camerini) (co-sc); Un’avventura di Salvator Rosa (Blasetti) (co-sc, asst d); Due milioni per un sorriso (Borghesio and Soldati) (co-sc)

1940
Centomila dollari (Camerini) (asst d); Una romantica avventura (Camerini) (co-sc); La corona di ferro (Blasetti) (co-sc, asst d)

1941
La cena della beffe (Blasetti) (co-sc)

1942
Malombra (Soldati) (co-sc)

1944
Quartieri alti (Soldati) (co-sc)

1945
Malia (Amato) (co-sc); Notte di tempesta (Franciolini) (sc)

1958
Resurrezione (Auferstehung) (Hansen) (co-sc)

1962
Venere imperiale (Delannoy) (idea only—begun by Castellani in 1958, discontinued due to dispute with producers and star Gina Lollobrigida)

1964
Matrimonio all’italiana (de Sica) (co-sc)

---

Poggioli, Lattuada, Chiarini, Soldati—the “calligraphers”—were the directors, novelists, and critics with which Castellani was associated at the beginning of his film career (1940–1948). The “calligraphers” were interested in form above all, strongly attached to the narrative tradition of the nineteenth century, committed to an essentially bourgeois cinema, refined, cultivated, intellectual. Their aesthetic was articulated in theory and in practice, and resistant, even antithetical, to the demands of the new realism voiced by De Santis and others in Cinema, and by Visconti in Ossessione. Un colpo di pistola, Zaza (a comedy in the French manner set during the “belle époque”), and La donna della montagna are films of escape. Through them Castellani managed his own flight: from the reality of the present, to be sure, but also from fascist propaganda and fascist censorship. The opposition between “calligraphy” and neorealism must be treated cautiously, as Roy Armes points out in Patterns of Realism. Not only did the two tendencies share a number of temptations (to historicism, for example), but individual artists, Castellani among them, passed with apparent ease from one to the other. A “Calligrapher” as late as 1946, Castellani joined the neo-realists with Sotto il sole di Roma, announcing his new allegiance in the very first frame with this intertitle: “This film was inspired by events that actually took place. It was performed by non-professional actors, and shot entirely in Rome, in the neighborhoods depicted in the film.” While the presence of Alberto Sordi undermined the claim of a non-professional cast, his performance as a shoe salesman (recalling, in comic mode, the shoes of Paisà and Shoe Shine), the music of Nino Rota, the theme of black marketeering, the Roman locales and dialect, and the coverage of events of early summer 1943 to the end of summer of 1944 (from the invasion of Sicily to the liberation of Rome) cast the film firmly in the honored mold of Rossellini and De Sica. The chronology of Sotto il sole di Roma is that of Paisà; it is the story of the coming of age of a group of adolescent boys, matured by destruction and death. At its conclusion, unlike the children of Open City, Bicycle Thief, and Shoe Shine, they face the future with confidence—in themselves and in the society of which they are a part.

Two films followed in the wake of Sotto il sole di Roma to shape a trilogy on youth and young love: E primavera and Two Cents Worth of Hope. To their scripts are linked the names of Suso Cecchi d’Amico, Cesare Zavattini, and Titina de Filippo, names in turn allied with Visconti, De Sica, and the master family of Italian comedy. Shot on location from one end of the peninsula to the other, the burning questions of the day—the mezzogiorno, unemployment, Communist vs. Christian Democrat—addressed in the films are cloaked in humor and, more importantly, an optimism that, as Leprohon notes in The Italian Cinema, official Italy found reassuring. Threatened by the bleak view of Italy exported by the post-war Italian cinema, the government reacted by passing the Andreotti Law (1948) in the same year Castellani launched what came to be known as “rosy neorealism.”

The trilogy was followed by Giulietta e Romeo. This story of young love thwarted by parents and convention had already found expression in the contemporary working class settings of the three previous films, and was drawn from two Renaissance versions: Shakespeare’s and Luigi Da Porto’s. Professional and non-professional actors, including a Juliet chosen from an avalanche of responses to a talent search conducted in the neorealist style, combined to create a tension of text and performance that elicited considerable critical controversy. Once again, Castellani had adapted neorealism to his own uses. This time it was a literary neorealism, redefined to suit his inspiration, and dependent as always on the rejection of mimicry and doctrine.

—Mirella Jona Affron

CAVALCANTI, Alberto

Nationality: Brazilian. Born: Alberto de Almeida Cavalcanti in Rio de Janeiro, 6 February 1897. Education: Attended law school, Brazil, and Geneva Fine Art School, Switzerland. Career: Art director in Paris, early 1920s; directed first film, Rien que les heures, 1926; directed French language versions of American films for Paramount, Joinsville, 1929–30; joined General Post Office (GPO) Film Unit, London, 1937 (head of unit, 1937); joined Ealing Studios as feature director, 1940; head of production, Vera Cruz group, Brazil, and co-founder, Brazilian Film Institute, 1949–50; settled in Europe, 1955; director, British and French television, 1950s to 1968; film teacher, UCLA, 1963–65. Awards: American States Medal for Superior Artistic Achievement, 1972. Died: In Paris, 23 August 1982.

Films as Director:

1925 Le Train sans yeux (+ sc, ed)
1926 Rien que les heures (Only the Hours) (+ pr, sc, ed)
1927 Yvette (+ sc, ed); En rade (Sea Fever) (+ co-sc, ed); La P’tite Lilie (+ sc, ed supervisor)
1928 La Jalouseie du barbouillé (+ sc, ed, art d); Le Capitaine Fracasse (+ co-sc, ed)
1929 Le Petit Chaperon rouge (+ sc, ed, art d); Vous verrez la semaine prochaine (+ sc, ed); A michelin du ciel (French language version of George Abbott’s Half Way to Heaven)
1930 Toute sa vie (French language version of Dorothy Arzner’s Sarah and Son); A cançao do berço (Portuguese version of Dorothy Arzner’s Sarah and Son); Les Vacances du diable (French language version of Edmund Goulding’s The Devil’s Holiday); Dans une île perdue (French language version of William Wellman’s Dangerous Paradise)
1932 En lisant le journal; Le Jour du frotteur (+ sc, ed); Revue Montmartroise (+ sc); Nous ne ferons jamais de cinéma; Le Truc du brésilien; Le Mari garçon (Le Garçon divorcé)
1933 Plaisirs défendus; Tour de chant (+ sc); Coralie et Cie (+ sc)
1934 Pett and Pott (+ sound supervisor, bi role); New Raies
1936 Coalface (+ sound supervisor)
1936 Message from Geneva
1937 We Live in Two Worlds (+ pr); The Line to Tschiera Hut (+ pr); Who Writes to Switzerland (+ pr)
1938 Four Barriers (+ pr); The Chiltern Country (+ pr)
1939 Alice in Switzerland (+ pr); Midsummer Day’s Work (+ pr, sc)
1940 La Cause commune (+ pr) (made in Britain for showing in France); Factory Front (+ pr) (British version of preceding film); Yellow Caesar (The Heel of Italy) (+ pr)
1941 Young Veteran (+ pr); Mastery of the Sea (+ pr)
1942 Went the Day Well? (48 Hours)
1943 Watertight (Ship Safety)
1944 Champagne Charlie; Trois Chansons de la résistance (Trois Chanst pour la France)
1945 ‘The Ventriloquist’s Dummy’ episode of Dead of Night
1947 The Life and Adventures of Nicholas Nickleby; They Made Me A Fugitive (I Became a Criminal)
1948 The First Gentleman (Affairs of a Rogue)
1949 For Them That Trespass
1952 Simao o caolho (Simon the One-Eyed) (+ pr)
1953 O canto do mar (The Song of the Sea) (+ pr, co-sc) (remake of En rade)
1954 Mulher de verdade (A Real Woman) (+ pr)
1955 Herr Puntila und sein Knecht Matti (+ co-sc)
Alberto Cavalcanti (left) with John Mervyn

1956  Die Windrose (d prologue only, collective film co-supervised with Joris Ivens)
1958  La Prima notte (Les Noces vénitiennes)
1960  The Monster of Highgate Ponds
1967  Thus Spake Theodor Herzl (The Story of Israel) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1923  L’Inhumaine (L’Herbier) (co-art d)
1924  L’Inondation (Delluc) (art d); La Galerie des monstres (Catelain) (asst d, art d); Feu Mathias Pascal (L’Herbier) (art d)
1926  The Little People (Pearson) (art d)
1931  Au pays du scalp (de Wavrin) (ed)
1934  Windmill in Barbados (Wright) (sound supervisor); Granton Trawler (Anstey) (sound supervisor); Song of Ceylon (Wright) (sound supervisor)
1935  Book Bargain (McLaren) (pr); Big Money (Watt) (pr)
1936  Rainbow Dance (Lye) (pr); Night Mail (Wright and Watt) (pr, sound supervisor); Calendar of the Year (Spice) (pr)
1937  The Saving of Bill Blevitt (Watt) (pr); Roadways (Coldstream and Legg) (pr)
1938  North or Northwest (Lye) (pr); North Sea (Watt) (pr, sound supervisor); Distress Call (Watt) (pr) (shortened silent version of preceding title); Many a Pickle (McLaren) (pr); Happy in the Morning (Jackson) (pr)
1939  The City (Elton) (pr); Men in Danger (Jackson) (pr); Spare Time (Jennings) (pr); Health of a Nation (Health for the Nation, Forty Million People) (Monck) (pr); Speaking from America (Jennings) (pr); Spring Offensive (An Unrecorded Victory) (Jennings) (pr); The First Days (Watt, Jennings, and Jackson) (pr)
1940  Men of the Lightship (Macdonald) (pr); Squadron 992 (Watt) (pr); Sea Fort (Dalrymple) (pr); Salvage with a Smile (Brunel) (pr)
1941  Guests of Honour (Pitt) (pr); The Big Blockade (Frend) (assoc pr); Merchant Seamen (Merchant Convoy) (Holmes) (pr); The Foreman Went to France (Somewhere in France) (Frend) (assoc pr); Find, Fix and Strike (Bennett) (pr)
1942  Greek Testament (The Shrine of Victory) (Hasse) (pr)
1944  The Halfway House (Dearden) (assoc pr)
1950 Caicara (Loafer) (Celi) (pr, supervisor)
1951 Terra sempere terra (Land Is Forever Land) (Payne) (pr); Painel (Panel) (Barreto) (pr); Santuário (Sanctuary) (Barreto) (pr)
1952 Volta redonda (Round Trip) (Waterhouse) (pr); Film and Reality (selection and compilation)
1969 Lettres de Stalingrad (Katz) (role)

Publications

By CAVALCANTI: book—

Film and Reality, London, 1942; as Film e realidade, Rio de Janeiro, 1952.

By CAVALCANTI: articles—

‘‘Sound in Films,’’ in Film (London), November 1939.
‘‘Cavalcanti in Brazil,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), April/June 1953.
Interview with J. Hillier and others, in Screen (London), Summer 1972.

On CAVALCANTI: books—

On CAVALCANTI: articles—

De La Roche, Catherine, “Cavalcanti in Brazil,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), January/March 1955.

Alberto Cavalcanti was multi-national to a remarkable extent. Brazilian by birth, he worked in French commercial and avant-garde cinema of the 1920s, in British documentaries of the 1930s, and in British features of the 1940s. He also returned briefly to Brazil in an effort to revitalize its production, then lived in Paris during his last years, although he visited and made films elsewhere. In the long view, however, Cavalcanti may be most closely associated with British film, especially with British documentary.

Even Cavalcanti’s early years in France led to that subsequent connection. Following work as a set designer, most notably for Marcel L’Herbier, he made the seminal Rien que les heures in 1926. Though part of the avant-garde experimentation of the 1920s, Rien inaugurated the “city symphonies,” one of the lines picked up by John Grierson as he was molding the British documentary of the 1930s. (The other lines came from the work of Flaherty, and of the Soviets, notably Vertov, Eisenstein, and Turin.)

Before being invited by Grierson to join the General Post Office Film Unit, Cavalcanti had experience in the early sound films produced by the French studios. As he became involved in British documentary he distinguished himself, especially through his work with sound in relation to image. Graniton Trawler, The Song of Ceylon, Coal Face, Night Mail, and North Sea offer evidence of his contributions. It might be argued that these films contain more sophisticated multi-layered sound and edited images—what Eisenstein called vertical montage—than that evident in narrative fiction films of the time. Cavalcanti’s personal creativity became the basis for teaching other, younger members of the documentary group. Harry Watt, Basil Wright, and others have attested to Cavalcanti’s significance as a teacher of conception and technique.

Though Grierson always acknowledged Cavalcanti’s importance to the artistry of British documentary, there developed a split between the Grierson faction (dedicated to making films to bring about social change) and the Cavalcanti faction (more concerned with ways in which realist film technique and style could be brought to the larger audiences of the theatres). In fact, an anthology surveying the documentary film, The Film and Reality, co-produced by Cavalcanti and Ernest Lindgren in 1942, created a furor behind the scenes when it was released. It presented essentially an aesthetic history of documentary (Cavalcanti selected the excerpts), ending with coverage of feature fiction films embodying some of the characteristics of documentary. The Grierson group was reputedly outraged that no attention was paid to what they viewed as the dominant purpose of British documentary, which was a sort of citizenship education—communication by the government to the citizenry.

For his part, Cavalcanti said late in life that he always thought he and Grierson were up to the same thing essentially—that of course he had a social sense, as surely as did Grierson. The real trouble was that he had not received adequate screen credits for the work he had done for the GPO Film Unit during Grierson’s regime. (Grierson favored the idea of anonymous collective rather than individual auteurs.)

When Cavalcanti returned to entertainment filmmaking early in the war he was missed by the documentary bunch. At the same time it must be said that Cavalcanti (like Watt, who followed him shortly) brought with him a documentary influence to Ealing Studios that extended into the wartime fiction film. The impact of his experiences in the documentary world can be seen, for example, in The Foreman Went to France, which he produced, and in Went the Day Well?, which he directed. On the other hand, Cavalcanti’s finest achievement as fictional producer/director may well be Dead of Night, a mingling of fantasy and actuality. The surrealistic elements of the film recalled the French avant-garde.

In summary it can be said that Cavalcanti seemed always to be the artist, personal creator and, especially, consummate technician. He applied himself to the basic modes of film art—narrative fiction, avant-garde, and documentary—in a full range of capacities—set designer, sound recordist, producer, and director. A charming journeyman artist with a cosmopolitan and tasteful flair, he taught and influenced a lot of other filmmakers and was responsible for noteworthy innovation and experimentation in many of the films with which he was associated.

—Jack C. Ellis

CHABROL, Claude

Films as Director:

1958 Le Beau Serge (Bitter Reunion) (+ pr, sc, bit role)
1959 Les Cousins (The Cousins) (+ pr, sc); A double tour (Web of Passion; Leda) (+ bit role)
1960 Les Bonnes Femmes (+ adapt, bit role)
1961 Les Godelureaux (+ co-adapt, bit role); “L’Avarice” episode of Les Sept Péchés capitaux (The Seven Deadly Sins) (+ bit role)
1962 L’œil du malin (The Third Lover) (+ sc); Ophélie (+ co-sc)
1963 Landra (Bluebeard) (+ co-sc)
1964 “L’Homme qui vendit la tour Eiffel” episode of Les Plus Belles Escroqueries du monde (The Beautiful Swindlers); Le Tigre aime la chair fraîche (The Tiger Likes Fresh Blood); La Chance et l’amour (Tavernier, Schlumberger, Bitsch, and Berry) (d linking sequences only)
1965 “La Muette” episode of Paris vu par . . . (Six in Paris) (+ sc, role); Marie-Chantal contre le Docteur Kha (+ co-sc, bit role); Le Tigre se parfume à la dynamite (An Orchid for the Tiger) (+ bit role)
1966 La Ligne de démarcation (Line of Demarcation) (+ co-sc)
1967 Le Scandale (The Champagne Murders); La Route de Corninthe (Who’s Got the Black Box?; The Road to Corinth) (+ role)
1968 Les Biches (The Does; The Girlfriends; Bad Girls) (+ co-sc, role)
1969 La Femme infidèle (Unfaithful Wife) (+ co-sc): Que la bête meure (This Man Must Die; Killer!)
1970 Le Boucher (+ sc); La Rupture (Le Jour des parques; The Breakup) (+ sc, bit role)
1971 Juste avant la nuit (Just before Nightfall) (+ sc)
1972 La Décade prodigieuse (Ten Days’ Wonder) (+ co-sc); Docteur Popaul (High Heels) (+ co-song); De Grey–Le Banc de Desolation (for TV)
1973 Les Noces rouges (Wedding in Blood) (+ sc)
1974 Nada (The NADA Gang); Histoires insolites (series of 4 TV films)
1975 Une Partie de plaisir (A Piece of Pleasure; Pleasure Party); Les Innocents aux mains sales (Dirty Hands; Innocents with Dirty Hands) (+ sc); Les Magiciens (Initiation à la mort; Profezia di un delitto)
1976 Folies bourgeoises (The Twist) (+ co-sc)
1977 Alice ou La Dernière Fugue (Alice or the Last Escapade) (+ sc)
1978 Blood Relatives (Les Liens de sang) (+ co-sc); Violette Nozière (Violette)
1980 Le Cheval d’Orgueil (The Horse of Pride; The Proud Ones)
1982 Les Fantômes du chapelier (The Hatmaker)
1983 Le Sang des autres (The Blood of Others)
1984 Poulet au vinaigre (The Blood of Others)
1985 Le Jour des parques (The Blood of Others)
1986 Les Magiciens (Initiation à la mort; Profezia di un delitto)
1987 Folies bourgeoises (The Twist) (+ co-sc)
1988 Alice ou La Dernière Fugue (Alice or the Last Escapade) (+ sc)
1989 Blood Relatives (Les Liens de sang) (+ co-sc); Violette Nozière (Violette)
1990 Le Cheval d’Orgueil (The Horse of Pride; The Proud Ones)
1992 Les Fantômes du chapelier (The Hatmaker)
1993 Poulet au vinaigre (The Blood of Others)
1994 Juste avant la nuit (Just before Nightfall) (+ sc)
1995 La Décade prodigieuse (Ten Days’ Wonder) (+ co-sc); Docteur Popaul (High Heels) (+ co-song); De Grey–Le Banc de Desolation (for TV)
1996 Les Noces rouges (Wedding in Blood) (+ sc)
1997 Nada (The NADA Gang); Histoires insolites (series of 4 TV films)
1998 Une Partie de plaisir (A Piece of Pleasure; Pleasure Party); Les Innocents aux mains sales (Dirty Hands; Innocents with Dirty Hands) (+ sc); Les Magiciens (Initiation à la mort; Profezia di un delitto)
1999 Folies bourgeoises (The Twist) (+ co-sc)
2000 Alice ou La Dernière Fugue (Alice or the Last Escapade) (+ sc)
2001 Blood Relatives (Les Liens de sang) (+ co-sc); Violette Nozière (Violette)
2002 Le Cheval d’Orgueil (The Horse of Pride; The Proud Ones)
2004 Les Fantômes du chapelier (The Hatmaker)
2005 Le Sang des autres (The Blood of Others)
2006 Poulet au vinaigre (The Blood of Others)
2007 Le Jour des parques (The Blood of Others)
2008 Les Magiciens (Initiation à la mort; Profezia di un delitto)
2009 Folies bourgeoises (The Twist) (+ co-sc)
2010 Alice ou La Dernière Fugue (Alice or the Last Escapade) (+ sc)
2011 Blood Relatives (Les Liens de sang) (+ co-sc); Violette Nozière (Violette)
2012 Le Cheval d’Orgueil (The Horse of Pride; The Proud Ones)
2014 Les Fantômes du chapelier (The Hatmaker)
2015 Le Sang des autres (The Blood of Others)
2016 Poulet au vinaigre (The Blood of Others)
2017 Le Jour des parques (The Blood of Others)
2018 Les Magiciens (Initiation à la mort; Profezia di un delitto)
Claude Chabrol

1995  Le ceremonie (The Ceremony); A Judgment in Stone (+ sc)
1997  Rien ne va plus (The Swindle) (+ sc)
1999  Au coeur du mensonge (The Color of Lies) (+ co-sc)
2000  Merci pour le chocolat (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1956  Le Coup de berger (Rivette) (co-sc, uncred co-mu, role)
1959  A bout de souffle (Godard) (tech adv); Les Jeux de l’amour (de Broca) (role)
1960  Paris nous appartient (Rivette) (role); Saint-Tropez blues (Moussy) (role); Les Distractions (Dupont) (role)
1961  Ples v dezu (Dance in the Rain) (Hladnik) (supervisor); Les Menteurs (Greville) (role)
1964  Les Durs à cuire (Pinoteau) (role)
1965  Brigitte et Brigitte (Moulet) (role)
1966  Happening (Bokanowski) (tech adv); Zoe bonne (Deval) (role)
1968  La Femme ecarlate (Valere) (role)
1969  Et crac! (Douchet) (role); Version latine (Detre) (role); Le Travail (Detre) (role)
1970  Sortie de secours (Kahane) (role)
1971  Eglantine (Brialy) (tech adv); Aussi loin que l’amour (Rossif) (role)
1972  Piège à pucelles (Leroi) (tech adv); Un Meurtre est un meurtre (Périer) (role)
1973  Le Flipping (Volatron) (role as interviewee)
1987  Sale destin! (Sylvain Madigan) (role)
1992  Sam Suffit (role as Mr. Denis)
1993  Jean Renoir (Thompson); François Truffaut: Portraits volés (François Truffaut: Stolen Portraits)
1997  Cannesples 400 coups (Nadeau—for TV) (as himself)

Publications

By CHABROL: books—

By CHABROL: articles—

Regular contributor to Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), under pseudonyms “Charles Eitel” and “Jean-Yves Goute,” 1950s.
“Tout ce qu’il faut savoir pour mettre en scène s’apprend en quatre heures,” an interview with François Truffaut, in Arts (Paris), 19 February 1958.
Interview with Gilles Jacob, in Cinéma (Paris), September/October 1966.
Interview with Michel Ciment and others, in Positif (Paris), April 1970.
Interview with Noah James, in Take One (Montreal), September/October 1970.
Interviews with G. Brau court, in Ecran (Paris), May 1975 and February 1977.
Interview with D. Simmons, in Film Directions (Belfast), vol. 5, no. 18, 1983.
Conversation with Georges Simenon, in Filmkritik (Munich), February 1983.

On CHABROL: books—

Moscriello, Angelo, Chabrol, Firenze, 1976.
Grongaard, Peter, Chabrols Filmkunst, Kobenhavn, 1977.
Austin, Guy, Claude Chabrol, Autoportrait, Manchester, 1999.

On CHABROL: articles—

“Chabrol Issue” of Filmcritica (Rome), April/May 1972.
Jenkins, Steve, “And the Chabrol We Haven’t Seen. . . ,” in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), July 1982.
Dossier on Chabrol, in Cinématurgophile (Paris), September 1982.

Pally, Marcia, “‘Women’s Business,’” in Film Comment, September/October 1989.

Chase, Donald, “‘A Day in the Country,’” in Film Comment, November/December 1991.

Diana, M., “‘Una commedia borghese,’” in Segnocinema (Vicenza), July-August 1996.

Kihar, O., “‘En seremoniell obduksjon,’” in Film and Kino (Oslo), no. 3, 1996.

Signorelli, A., “‘A Firenze la ‘sorpresa’ Chabrol,’” in Cineforum (Bergamo), January/February 1996.

On CHABROL: film—

* * *

If Jean-Luc Godard appeals to critics because of his extreme interest in politics and film theory, if François Truffaut appeals to the popular audience because of his humanism and sentimentality, it is Claude Chabrol—film critic, filmmaker, philosopher—whose work consistently offers the opportunity for the most balanced appeal. His partisans find especially notable the subtle tone of Chabrol’s cinema: his films are apparently cold and objective portraits of profoundly psychological situations; and yet that coldness never approaches the kind of fashionable cynicism, say, of a Stanley Kubrick, but suggests, rather, something closer to the viewpoint of a god who, with compassion but without sentiment, observes the follies of his creations.

Chabrol’s work can perhaps best be seen as a cross between the unassuming and popular genre film and the pretentious and elitist art film: Chabrol’s films tend to be thrillers with an incredibly self-conscious, self-assured style—that is, pretentious melodrama, aware of its importance. For some, however, the hybrid character of Chabrol’s work is itself a problem: indeed, just as elitist critics sometimes find Chabrol’s subject matter beneath them, so too do popular audiences sometimes find Chabrol’s style and incredibly slow pace alienating.

Chabrol’s films are filled with allusions and references to myth (as in La rupture, which begins with an epigraph from Racine’s Phaedra: “What an utter darkness suddenly surrounds me!”). The narratives of his films are developed through a sensuousness of decor, a gradual accumulation of psychological insight, an absolute mastery of camera movement, and the inclusion of objects and images—beautiful and evocative, like the river in Le boucher or the lighthouse in Dirty Hands—which are imbued with symbolic intensity. Like Balzac, whom he admires, Chabrol attempts, within a popular form, to present a portrait of his society in microcosm.

Chabrol began his career as a critic for Cahiers du Cinéma. With Eric Rohmer, he wrote a groundbreaking book-length study of Alfred Hitchcock, and with his friends (Truffaut, Godard, Rohmer, Jacques Rivette, and others) he attempted to turn topsy-turvy the entire cinematic value system. That their theories of authorship remain today a basic (albeit modified and continuously examined) premise certainly indicates the success of their endeavor. Before long, Chabrol found himself functioning as financial consultant and producer for a variety of films inaugurating the directorial careers of his fellow critics who, like himself, were no longer content merely to theorize.

Chabrol’s career can perhaps be divided into five semi-discrete periods: 1) the early personal films, beginning with Le beau Serge in 1958 and continuing through Landru in 1962; 2) the commercial assignments, beginning with The Tiger Likes Fresh Blood in 1964 and continuing through The Road to Corinth in 1967; 3) the mature cycle of masterpieces, beginning with Les biches in 1968 and continuing through Wedding in Blood in 1973, almost all starring his wife Stéphane Audran, and produced by André Génoèves; 4) the more diverse (and uneven) accumulations of films from 1974 to the mid-1980s which have tended neither to garner automatic international release nor to feature Audran in a central role; and 5) the more recent films of higher quality, if sometimes uneven still, produced in the 1980s and 1990s by Marin Karmitz’s company MK2 and including a new set of regular collaborators.

If Hitchcock’s Shadow of a Doubt, as analyzed by Chabrol and Rohmer, is constructed upon an exchange of guilt, Chabrol’s first film, Le beau Serge, modeled after it, is constructed upon an exchange of redemption. Chabrol followed Le beau Serge, in which a city-dweller visits a country friend, with Les cousins, in which a country-dweller visits a city friend. Most notably, Les cousins offers Chabrol’s first “‘Charles’” and “‘Paul,’” the names Chabrol would continue to use throughout much of his career—Charles to represent the more serious bourgeois man, Paul the more hedonistic id-figure. A double tour, Chabrol’s first color film, is especially notable for its striking cinematography, its complex narrative structure, and the exuberance of its flamboyant style; it represents Chabrol’s first studied attempt to examine and criticize the moral values of the bourgeoisie as well as to dissect the sociopsychological causes of the violence which inevitably erupts as the social and family structures prove inadequate. Perhaps the most wholly successful film of this period is the infrequently screened L’œil du malin, which presents the most typical Chabrol situation: a triangle consisting of a bourgeois married couple—Hélène and her stolid husband—and the outsider whose involvement with the couple ultimately leads to violence and tragedy. Here can be found Chabrol’s first “Hélène,” the recurring beautiful and slightly aloof woman, generally played by Stéphane Audran.

When these and other personal films failed to ignite the box office, despite often positive critical responses, Chabrol embarked on a series of primarily commercial assignments (such as Marie-Chantal contre le Docteur Kha), during which his career went into a considerable critical eclipse. Today, however, even these fairly inconsequential films seem to reflect a fetching style and some typically quirky Chabrolian concerns.

Chabrol’s breakthrough occurred in 1968 with the release of Les biches, an elegant thriller in which an outsider, Paul, disrupts the relationship between two women. All of Chabrol’s films in this period are slow psychological thrillers which tend basically to represent variations upon the same theme: an outsider affecting a central relationship until violence results. In La femme infidèle, one of Chabrol’s most self-assured films, the marriage of Hélène and Charles is disrupted when Charles kills Hélène’s lover. In the Jansenist Que la bête meure, Charles tracks down the unremittingly evil hit-and-run killer of his young son, and while doing so disrupts the relationship between the killer, Paul, and his sister-in-law Hélène. In Le boucher, the butcher Popaul, who is perhaps a homicidal killer, attempts a relationship with a cool and frigid schoolteacher, Hélène, who has displaced her sexual energies onto her teaching of her young pupils, particularly onto one who is conspicuously given the name Charles.

In the extravagantly expressive La rupture, the outsider Paul attempts a plot against Hélène in order to secure a better divorce settlement, desired by the rich parents of her husband Charles, who has turned to drug addiction to escape his repressive bourgeois existence. In Juste avant la nuit, it is Charles who has taken a lover, and Charles’s wife Hélène who must ultimately resort to an act of calculated violence in order to keep the bourgeois surface intact. In the detective variation Ten Days’ Wonder, the relationship between Charles and Hélène is disrupted by the intervention of a character named Théo (Theos, representing God), whose false image must be unmasked by the outsider Paul. And in Wedding in Blood, based on factual material, it is the wife and her lover who team together to plot against her husband.

Jean Renoir said that all great directors make the same film over and over; perhaps no one has taken this dictum as seriously as Chabrol; indeed, all these films represent a kind of formal geometry as Charles, Hélène, and Paul play out their fated roles in a universe strongly influenced by Fritz Lang, the structures of their bourgeois existence unable to contain their previously repressed passions. Noteworthy too is the consistency of collaboration on these films: usually with Stéphane Audran, Michel Bouquet, and Jean Yanne as performers; Jean Rabier as cinematographer; Paul Gégauff as co-scriptwriter; André Génovès as producer; Guy Littaye as art director; Pierre Jansen as composer; Jacques Gaillard as editor; Guy Chichignoud on sound.

In the late 1970s and 1980s, Chabrol has increasingly explored different kinds of financing, making television films as well as international co-productions. Some of these interesting films seem quite unusual from what he has attempted before, perhaps the most surprising being Le cheval d’orgueil, an ethnographic drama chronicling the simplicity and terrible harshness of peasant life in Brittany prior to World War I with a straightforwardness and lack of sentimentality which is often riveting. Indeed, the film seems so different from much of Chabrol’s work that it forces a kind of re-evaluation of his career, making him seem less an emulator of Hitchcock and more an emulator of Balzac, attempting to create his own Comédie humaine in a panoramic account of the society about him.

Meanwhile, without his regular collaborators, most notably Stéphane Audran, Chabrol has had to establish a new “team”—now including his son, Matthieu Chabrol, as composer replacing the superior Pierre Jansen. Although the series of films directed for producer Marin Karmitz seems laudable and superior to Chabrol’s non-Karmitz films of the 1980s and 1990s, with three exceptions they do not match the unity or quality of Chabrol’s earlier masterpieces.

One of the exceptions is Une affaire des femmes, starring Isabelle Huppert (who had previously starred in Violette Nozière). The story of an abortionist who ends up the last female guillotined in France (by the Vichy government), Une affaire des femmes, unlike the majority of Chabrol’s recent films, received international distribution as well as a variety of awards and critical recognition. Chabrol’s achievement here is extraordinary: offering a complex three-dimensional portrait of a woman who is not really very likeable, Une affaire des femmes turns out, by its end, to be the most fair, progressive, passionate film ever made about abortion, dissecting the sexual politics of the “crime” without ever resorting to polemics; and Chabrol’s unsparing gaze becomes the regard of an all-knowing God. Madame Bovary, again with Huppert, is perhaps one notch below in quality: but is it surprising that Chabrol turns Madame Bovary into one of his tragic bourgeois love triangles, only this time with the protagonist named Emma, rather than Hélène? Also impressive—and perhaps Chabrol’s last masterpiece—is the 1995 film La cérémonie, again with Huppert. Released several years after the fall of the Soviet Union and its Eastern European satellites, La cérémonie (which was based on the thriller A Judgement in Stone written by Ruth Rendell) was characterized by its director as “the last Marxist film” and presents a polite, likable, stylish, bourgeois French family who is ultimately dispatched by the help. That those who are supposed to provide service should instead gradually institute chaos and revolution within a well-appointed home redolent of privilege and manners, creates an atmosphere of slowly sustaining tension and violent inevitability; that “la cérémonie” is also the French term for the ritual of the guillotine makes Chabrol’s sly ideological point all the clearer. Notably, La cérémonie was moderately successful in the United States (unusual for Chabrol), winning significant box office as well as the best foreign film citation from the National Society of Film Critics. The success of Une affaire des femmes, Madame Bovary, and La cérémonie, as well as the earlier Violette Nozière (all four starring Isabelle Huppert), may indicate that Chabrol’s films—cold as an inherent result of the director’s personality and formal interests—may absolutely require an extraordinary, expressive female presence in order to contribute a human, empathic dimension—else they seem slow, tedious exercises. Clearly, Stéphane Audran’s contributions to Chabrol’s earlier masterpieces—both as fellow artist and muse—may have been seriously underestimated.

More typical of Chabrol’s recent career are films like Les Fantômes du Chapelier, Poulet au vinaigre, Inspecteur Lavardin, Masques, Le cri du hibou, and Rien ne va plus, which, though worthy of note, by no means measure up to Chabrol’s greatest and therefore disappoint. What becomes indisputably clear is that Chabrol is one of the most uneven great directors; and without a producer like André Génovès and forceful, talented collaborators on Chabrol’s wavelength, Chabrol can sometimes make bad or very odd movies. The 1976 Folies bourgeoises, for instance, is all but unwatchable, and while Docteur M and Betty may have interesting concepts, one is a dreary re-interpretation of Fritz Lang, and the other a lifeless adaptation of a Simenon novel, containing a wooden performance by Marie Trintignant. L’enfer (directed in 1994) is certainly better, if still minor—a smoldering tale of growing jealousy based on the unproduced script of a master director with a somewhat kindred soul, Henri-Georges Clouzot. Nevertheless, the true cinephile loves Chabrol despite his failures—because in the midst of his overprodigious output, he can change gears and make a fascinating documentary, such as his 1993 L’œil de Vichy (which compiles French film propaganda in service of the Nazi cause), or can surprise everyone with a major, narrative film of startling ideas and unity, such as his 1995 L’œil de Vichy. One hopes for at least one more definitive Claude Chabrol masterpiece.

—Charles Derry

CHAHINE, Youssef

Films as Director:

1950 Baba Amine (Father Amine)
1951 Ibn el Nil (The Nile’s Son); El Muharraj el Kabir (The Great Clown)
1952 Saydet el Kitar (The Lady in the Train); Nessa bala Rejal (Women without Men)
1953 Sera’a fil Wadi (Struggle in the Valley)
1954 Shaitan el Sahara (Devil of the Desert)
1955 Sera’a fil Mina (Struggle on the Pier)
1956 Inta Habibi (You Are My Love)
1957 Wadaat Hobak (Farewell to Your Love)
1958 Bab el Hadid (Iron Gate; Cairo Station; Gare centrale) (+ role as Kennawi); Gamila Bohraid (Djamila)
1959 Hub illal Abad (Forever Yours)
1960 Bayn Ideak (Between Your Hands)
1961 Nedaa el Ochak (Lover’s Call); Rajol fi Hayati (A Man in My Life)
1963 El Naser Salah el Dine (Saladin)
1964 Fajr Yum Jadid (Dawn of a New Day)
1965 Baya el Khawatim (The Ring Seller)
1966 Rimal min Zahab (Sand of Gold)
1968 El Nas wal Nil (People and the Nile)
1969 El Ard (The Land)
1970 Al Ekhtiar (The Choice)
1973 Al Asfour (The Sparrow)
1976 Awdat al Ibn al Dal (Return of the Prodigal Son)
1978 Iskindiria . . . Leh? (Alexandria . . . Why?) (+ sc)
1982 Hadota Misreya (An Egyptian Story; La Memoire) (+ sc)
1984 Al Wedaa ya Bonaparte (Adieu Bonaparte)
1986 Sarikat Sayfeya (+ ph)
1990 Iskindiriah Kaman Oue Kaman (Alexandria Again and Forever) (+ sc)
1991 Cairo as Told by Youssef Chahine (+ sc)
1994 The Emigrant (+ co-sc)
1995 Lumière et compagnie (Lumière and Company)
1997 al-Massir (Destiny) (+ co-sc)
1999 L’Autre (El Akhar) (+ co-sc)

Publications

By CHAHINE: articles—

On CHAHINE: books—

On CHAHINE: articles—

* * *

Youssef Chahine is one of the most forceful and complex of Egyptian filmmakers whose progress over the forty years or so since his debut at the age of twenty-four offers remarkable insight into the evolution of Egyptian society. A series of sharply critical social studies—of which The Sparrow in 1975 is undoubtedly the most successful—was interrupted by a heart attack while the director was still in his early fifties. This led him to question his own personal stance and development in a manner unique in Arab cinema, and the result was the splendidly fluent autobiography Alexandria . . . Why? in 1978, which was followed four years later by a second installment titled An Egyptian Story, shot in a style best characterized as an amalgam of Fellini and Bob Fosse’s All That Jazz. As such references indicate, Chahine is an eclectic filmmaker whose cosmopolitan attitudes can be traced back to his origins. He was born in Alexandria in 1926 of middle-class parents. His father, a supporter of the nationalist Wafd party, was a scrupulous but financially unsuccessful lawyer, and Chahine was brought up as a Christian, educated first at religious school and then at the prestigious Victoria College, where the language of tuition was English. After a year at Alexandria University he persuaded his parents to allow him to study drama for two years at Pasadena Playhouse, near Los Angeles, and on his return to Egypt he plunged into the film industry, then enjoying a period of boom in the last years of King Farouk’s reign.

Alexandria . . . Why? presents a vividly drawn picture of this vanished world: Alexandria in 1942, awaiting the arrival of Rommel’s troops, who, it is hoped, will finally drive out the British. The film is peopled with English soldiers and Egyptian patriots, aristocrats, and struggling bourgeoises, the enthusiastic young and their disillusioned or corrupt elders. Chahine mocks the excesses of the nationalists (his terrorist patriots are mostly caricatures), leaves condemnation of Zionism to Jews, and tells love stories that cross the neatly drawn barriers separating Muslim and Jew, Egyptian aristocrat and English Tommy. The revelation of Chahine’s own background and a few of his personal obsessions (as with the crucified Christ) seems to have released fresh creative powers in the director. His technique of intercutting the action with scenes from Hollywood musicals and newsreel footage from the Imperial War Museum in London is as successful as it is audacious, and the transitions of mood are brilliantly handled.

Chahine is a key figure in Third World cinema. Unlike some of the other major filmmakers who also emerged in the 1950s—such as Satyajit Ray or Lester James Peries—he has not turned his back on commercial cinema. He has always shown a keen desire to reach a wide audience, and Alexandria . . . Why?, though personal, is by no means an inaccessible or difficult work. Chahine’s strength as a filmmaker lies indeed in his ability to combine mainstream production techniques with a very individual style and approach. Though intensely patriotic, he has shown a readiness to criticize government policies with which he does not agree, such as those of the late President Sadat. It is ironic therefore that the appearance of Alexandria . . . Why? should have coincided with the Camp David agreements between Egypt and Israel. As a result, Chahine’s very personal statement of his belief in a tolerant society came to be widely criticized in the Arab world as an opportunistic political statement and a justification of Sadat’s policies.

His underlying commitment to the making of an Egyptian identity, history, and memory is evident in his more recent works as well. The 1984 Adieu Bonaparte, a Franco-Egyptian co-production, portrays an East-West encounter through an Egyptian family during Napoleon’s invasion of Egypt. Chahine’s continuous efforts to reconstruct and forge an Egyptian-ness, “to be nothing but Egyptian,” can be most clearly seen in the ways in which he strives to retell this history from a strictly Egyptian perspective and none other. Chahine’s endeavor may not be unique among the whole array of Third World filmmakers who act and/or react against the West. However, given his own involvement and interests in the Western arts and influences, which not too many non-Western filmmakers could in fact claim to be devoid of, it is his inventiveness in forms and consistency in content that make Chahine an important filmmaker in Egypt in particular and in the non-Western filmmaking world in general.

—Roy Armes, updated by Guo-Juin Hong
CHAPLIN, (Sir) Charles (Charlie)

Films as Director, Actor and Scriptwriter:

1914 Caught in a Cabaret (Jazz Waiter; Faking with Society) (co-d, co-sc); Caught in the Rain (Who Got Stung?; At It Again); A Busy Day (Lady Charlie; Militant Suffragette); The Fatal Mallet (The Pile Driver; The Rival Suitors; Hit Him Again) (co-d, co-sc); Her Friend the Bandit (Mabel’s Flirtation; A Thief Catcher) (co-d, co-sc); Mabel’s Busy Day (Charlie and the Sausages; Love and Lunch; Hot Dogs) (co-d, co-sc); Mabel’s Married Life (When You’re Married; The Squarehead) (co-d, co-sc); Laughing Gas (Tuning His Ivories; The Dentist); The Property Man (Getting His Goat; The Roustabout; Vamping Venus); The Face on the Bar Room Floor (The Ham Artist); Recreation (Spring Fever); The Masquerader (Putting One Over; The Female Impersonator); His New Profession (The Good-for-Nothing; Helping Himself); The Rounders (Two of a Kind; Oh, What a Night!); The New Janitor (The Porter; The Blundering Booby); Those Love Pangs (The Rival Mashees; Busted Hearts); Dough and Dynamite (The Doughnut Designer; The Cook); Gentlemen of Nerve (Some Nerve; Charlie at the Races); His Musical Career (The Piano Movers; Musical Tramps); His Trusty Place (Family Home); Getting Acquainted (A Fair Exchange; Hullo Everybody); His Prehistoric Past (A Dream; King Charlie; The Caveman)

1915 (for Essanay): His New Job; A Night Out (Champagne Charlie); The Champion (Battling Charlie); In the Park (Charlie on the Spree); A Jimey Elopement (Married in Haste); The Tramp (Charlie the Hobo); By the Sea (Charlie’s Day Out); Work (The Paper Hanger; The Plumber); A Woman (The Perfect Lady); The Bank; Shanghaied (Charlie the Sailor; Charlie on the Ocean); A Night in the Show

1916 (for Essanay): Carmen (Charlie Chaplin’s Burlesque on Carmen); Police! (Charlie the Burglar); (for Mutual): The Floorwalker (The Store); The Fireman; The Vagabond; One A.M.; The Count; The Pawnshop; Behind the Screen; The Rink

1917 (for Mutual): Easy Street; The Care; The Immigrant; The Adventurer

1918 (for First National): A Dog’s Life; (for Liberty Loan Committee): The Bond; Triple Trouble (compiled from 1915 footage: additional non-Chaplin film by Essanay after he left); (for First National): Shoulder Arms

1919 (for First National): Sunnyside; A Day’s Pleasure

1921 The Kid; (+ pr); The Idle Class (+ pr)

1922 Pay Day (+ pr); Nice and Friendly (+ pr) (made privately and unreleased)

1923 The Pilgrim (+ pr); A Woman of Paris (+ pr)

1925 The Gold Rush (+ pr, narration, mus for sound reissue)

1926 A Woman of the Sea (The Sea Gull) (von Sternberg) (unreleased) (pr, d additional scenes)

1927 The Circus (+ pr, mus, song for sound reissue)

1931 City Lights (+ pr, mus)

1936 Modern Times (+ pr, mus)

1940 The Great Dictator (+ pr, mus)

1947 Monsieur Verdoux (+ pr, mus)

1952 Limelight (+ pr, mus, co-choreographer)

1959 A King in New York (+ pr, mus)

1959 The Chaplin Revue (+ pr, mus) (comprising A Dog’s Life, Shoulder Arms, and The Pilgrim, with commentary and music)

1967 A Countess from Hong Kong (+ mus)

Other Films:

1914 Making a Living (A Busted Johnny; Troubles; Doing His Best) (Lehrman) (role as reporter); Kid Auto Races at Venice (The Kid Auto Race) (Lehrman) (role as Charlie); Mabel’s Strange Predicament (Hotel Mixup) (Lehrman and Sennett) (role as Charlie); Between Showers (The Flirts; Charlie and the Umbrella; In Wrong) (Lehrman) (role as Charlie); A Film Johnnie (Movie Nut; Million Dollar Job; Charlie at the Studio) (Sennett) (role as Charlie); Tango Tangles (Charlie’s Recreation; Music Hall) (Sennett) (role as Charlie); His Favorite Pastime (The Bonehead; His Reckless Fling) (Nichols) (role as Charlie); Cruel, Cruel Love (Sennett) (role as Charlie); The Star Boarder (The Hash-House Hero) (Sennett) (role as Charlie); Mabel at the Wheel (His Daredevil Queen; Hot Finish) (Normand and Sennett) (role as Charlie); Twenty Minutes of Love (He Loved Her So; Cops and Watches) (Sennett) (role as Charlie, + sc); The Knock Out (Counted Out; The Pugilist) (Arbuckle) (role as Charlie); Tillie’s Punctured Romance (Tillie’s Nightmare; For the Love of Tillie; Marie’s Millions) (Sennett) (role as Charlie); His Regeneration (Anderson) (guest appearance)

1921 The Nut (Reed) (guest appearance)

1923 Souls for Sale (Hughes) (guest appearance)

1928 Show People (King Vidor) (guest appearance)
Charlie Chaplin

Publications

By CHAPLIN: books—

Charlie Chaplin's Own Story, Indianapolis, 1916.
My Trip Abroad, New York, 1922.

By CHAPLIN: articles—

Interview with Margaret Hinxman, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1957.
“Chaplin est mort, vive Charlot!,” interview with Philippe Soupault, text by Chaplin from 1921, and round-table discussion, in Ecran (Paris), March 1978.

On CHAPLIN: books—

On CHAPLIN: articles—

Eisenstein, Sergei, “Charlie the Kid,” and “Charlie the Grown Up,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring and Summer 1946.

“Chaplin Issue” of Film Comment (New York), September/October 1972.

Cott, J., “The Limits of Silent Film Comedy,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1975.

“Chaplin Issue” of Film and Fernsehen (Berlin), March 1978.

“Chaplin Issue” of University Film Association Journal (Houston), no.1, 1979.

Ingrao, P., “Chaplin: The Antagonism of the Comic Hero,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Fall 1981.

“Chaplin Section” of American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1984.

Naremore, J., “Film and the Performance Frame,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Winter 1984–85.

Weisman, S.M. “Charlie Chaplin’s Film Heroines,” Film History (London), vol. 8, no. 4, 1996.

On CHAPLIN: films—

Hurwitz, Harry, Chaplinesque, My Life and Hard Times, for TV, 1967 (also released as The Eternal Tramp).

* * *

Charles Chaplin was the first and the greatest international star of the American silent comic cinema. He was also the twentieth century’s first media “superstar,” the first artistic creator and popularized creature of our global culture. His face, onscreen antics, and offscreen scandals were disseminated around the globe by new media which knew no geographical or linguistic boundaries. But more than this, Chaplin was the first acknowledged artistic genius of the cinema, recognized as such by a young and influential generation of writers and artists whose number included George Bernard Shaw, H.G. Wells, Bertolt Brecht, Pablo Picasso, James Joyce, Samuel Beckett, and the surrealist painters and poets of both Paris and Berlin. Chaplin may be the one cinema artist who might truly be called a seminal figure of the century—if only because of his influence on virtually every other recognized seminal figure of the century.

Chaplin was born in London into a theatrical family; his mother and father alternated between periods of separation and union, activities onstage and difficulties offstage (his father was an alcoholic, his mother fell victim to insanity). The young Chaplin spent his early life on the London streets and in a London workhouse, but by the age of eight he was earning his living on the stage.

Chaplin’s career, like that of Buster Keaton and Stan Laurel, indicates that gifted physical comedians often develop their talents as children (as do concert pianists and ballet dancers) or never really develop them at all. By the time he was twenty years old, Chaplin had become the star attraction of the Fred Karno Pantomime Troupe, an internationally acclaimed English music-hall act, and it was on his second tour of America that a representative of the Keystone comedy film company (either Mack Sennett, comedienne Mabel Normand, or co-owner Charles Bauman) saw Chaplin. In 1913 he was offered a job at Keystone. Chaplin went to work at the Keystone lot in Burbank, California, in January of 1914. To some extent, the story of Chaplin’s popular success and artistic evolution is evident from even a cursory examination of the sheer volume of Chaplin’s works (and the compensation he received). In 1914 at Keystone, Chaplin appeared in thirty-five one- and two-reel films (as well as the six-reeler Tillie’s Punctured Romance), about half of which he directed himself, for the yearly salary of $7,800. The following year, Chaplin made fourteen one- and two-reel films for the Essanay Film Company—all of which he wrote and directed himself—for a salary of $67,000. In 1916–17, Chaplin wrote, directed and starred in twelve two-reel films for the Mutual Film company, and then signed a million-dollar contract with First National Corporation to write, direct, produce, and star in twelve more two-reel films. The contract allowed him to build his own studio, which he alone used until 1952 (it is now the studio for A&M Records), but his developing artistic consciousness kept him from completing the contract until 1923 with nine films of lengths ranging from two to six reels. Finally, in 1919, Chaplin became one of the founders of United Artists (along with Mary Pickford, Douglas Fairbanks, and D.W. Griffith), through which Chaplin released eight feature films, made between 1923 and 1952, after which he sold his interest in the company.

In his early one- and two-reel films Chaplin evolved the comic tools and means that would lead to his future success. His character of the Tramp, the “little fellow,” a figure invariably garbed with derby, cane, floppy shoes, baggy pants, and tight jacket, debuted in his second Keystone film, Kid Auto Races at Venice. Because the tramp was a little guy, he made an easy target for the larger and tougher characters who loomed over him, but his quick thinking, agile body, and surprising ingenuity in converting ordinary objects into extraordinary physical allies helped him more than hold his own in a big, mean world. Although he was capable of lechery (The Masquerader, Dough and Dynamite) he could also selflessly aid the innocent woman under attack (The New Janitor, The Tramp, The Bank). Although he deserved her affection as a reward, he was frequently rejected for his social or sexual inadequacies (The Tramp, The Bank, The Vagabond, The Adventurer). Many of his early films combined his dexterous games with physical objects with deliberate attempts at emotional pathos (The Tramp, The Vagabond, The Pawnshop) or with social commentary on the corruption of the police, the brutality of the slums, or the selfishness of the rich (Police, Easy Street, The Adventurer).

Prior to Chaplin, no one had demonstrated that physical comedy could be simultaneously hilariously funny, emotionally passionate, and pointedly intellectual. While his cinema technique tended to be invisible—emphasizing the actor and his actions—he gradually evolved a principle of cinema based on framing: finding the exact way to frame a shot to reveal its motion and meaning completely, thus avoiding disturbing cuts.

Chaplin’s later films evolved and featured increasingly complicated or ironic situations in which to explore the Tramp’s character and the moral paradoxes of his existence. His friend and ally is a mongrel dog in A Dog’s Life; he becomes a doughboy in Shoulder Arms; acquires a child in The Kid; becomes a preacher in The Pilgrim; and explores the decadent Parisian high life in A Woman of Paris, a comedy-melodrama of subtle visual techniques in which the Tramp does not appear. Chaplin’s four feature films between 1925 and 1936 might be called his “marriage group,” in which he explores the circumstances by which the tramp might acquire a sexual-romantic mate. In The Gold Rush the Tramp succeeds in winning the dance-hall gal who previously rejected him, because she now appreciates his kindness and his new-found wealth. The happy ending is as improbable as the Tramp’s sudden riches—perhaps a comment that kindness helps but money gets the girl. But in The Circus, Charlie turns his beloved over to the romantic high-wire daredevil Rex; the girl rejects him not because of Charlie’s kindness or poverty but because he cannot fulfill the woman’s image of male sexual attractiveness. City Lights builds upon this problem as it rises to a final question, deliberately and poignantly left unanswered: can the blind flower seller, whose vision has been restored by Charlie’s kindness, love him for his kindness alone since her vision now reveals him to look so painfully different from the rich and handsome man she imagined and expected? And in Modern Times, Charlie successfully finds a mate, a social outcast and child of nature like himself; unfortunately, their marriage can find no sanctification or existence within contemporary industrial society. So the two of them take to the road together, walking away from society toward who knows where—the Tramp’s final departure from the Chaplin world.

Although both City Lights and Modern Times used orchestral music and cleverly comic sound effects (especially Modern Times), Chaplin’s final three American films were talking films—The Great Dictator, in which Chaplin burlesques Hitler and Nazism, Monsieur Verdoux, in which Chaplin portrays a dapper mass murderer, and Limelight, Chaplin’s nostalgic farewell to the silent art of pantomime which nurtured him. In this film, in which Buster Keaton also plays a major role, Chaplin bids farewell not only to a dead movie tradition—silent comedy—but to a two-hundred-year tradition of physical comedy on both stage and screen, the tradition out of which both Keaton and Chaplin came, which would produce no clowns of the future.

Chaplin’s later years were scarred by personal and political difficulties produced by his many marriages and divorces, his supposed sexual philanderings, his difficulties with the Internal Revenue Service, his outspoken defence of liberal political causes, and his refusal to become an American citizen. Although he was never called to testify before the House Un-American Activities Committee, Chaplin’s films were picketed and boycotted by right-wing activist groups. When Chaplin left for a trip abroad in 1952, the State Department summarily revoked his automatic re-entry permit. Chaplin sent his young wife Oona O’Neill, daughter of the playwright Eugene O’Neill, back to America to settle their business affairs. Chaplin established his family in Switzerland and conveyed his outrage against his former country by not returning to America for twenty years and by refusing to let any of his films circulate in America for two decades. In 1957 he made a very uneven, often embarrassing satire of American democracy, A King in New York. This film, like A Countess from Hong Kong, made ten years later, was a commercial and artistic disappointment, perhaps in part because Chaplin was cut off from the familiar studio, the experienced production team, and the painstakingly slow production methods he had been using for over three decades. In 1971 he enjoyed a triumphant return to Hollywood to accept an honorary Academy Award for a lifetime of cinematic achievement.

—Gerald Mast

CHEN Kaige

Nationality: Chinese. Born: Beijing, 12 August 1952; son of film director Chen Hui’ai. Education: Sent to work on a rubber plantation in Yunnan province to “learn from the people,” as part of the Cultural Revolution, 1967; attended the Beijing Film Academy. Military Service: Served in Army. Career: Worked in film processing lab, Beijing, 1975–78, then studied at Beijing Film Academy, 1978–82; assigned to Beijing Film Studio, assistant to Huang Jianzhong; transferred (with Zhang Yimou and He Qun) to Guangxi Film Studios, and directed first feature, Huang Tu di, 1984. Awards: Berlin Film Festival Best Film and Locarno International Film Festival Silver Leopard, for Yellow Earth, 1984; Istanbul International Film Festival Golden Tulip, for Life on a String, 1991; Best Film (not in the English language) British Academy Award, Cannes Film Festival Golden Palm (tied with The Piano), and FIPRESCI Award, for Farewell My Concubine, 1993; Cannes Film Festival Technical Grand Prize, for The Emperor and the Assassin, 1999.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Huang tu di (Yellow Earth) (+ co-sc)</td>
<td>Qi xing qin wei</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>(Forced Take-Off)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td></td>
<td>(for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>Da yue bing (The Big Parade) (released in 1987)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Hai zi wang (King of the Children)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>Bian zao bian chang (Life on a String)  (+ sc, song lyrics)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993</td>
<td>Ba wang bie ji (Farewell My Concubine)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>Feng yue (Temptress Moon) (+ co-story)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999</td>
<td>Jing ke ci qin wang (The Assassin, The Emperor and the Assassin) (+ co-sc, exec pr, ro as Lu Buwei)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2001</td>
<td>Killing Me Softly</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>The Last Emperor (Bertolucci) (ro as Captain of Imperial Guard)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>Yang + Yin: Gender in Chinese Cinema (Kwan) (doc) (ro as Interviewee)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By CHEN: articles—

Interview in Positif, November 1993.

‘‘La longue marche,’’ an interview with Laurent Tirard and Christophe d’Yvoire, in Studio Magazine (France), no. 80, 1993.

‘‘It’s All About Trust,’’ interview with Tony Rayns, in Cinema Papers (Victoria, Australia), August 1996.

Interview with A. Pastor, in Filmcritica (Rome), September 1996.

‘‘Shanghai Charade,’’ an interview with Andrew O. Thompson, in American Cinematographer (Orange Drive), April 1997.

‘‘Concubines and Temptresses,’’ interview with K. Lally, in Film Journal (New York), May 1997.

‘‘Die Kunst ist wie der Wind und das Wasser,’’ an interview with Stefan Kramer, in EPD Film (Frankfurt/Main), April 1997.

Interview with A. Lu., in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1997.

On CHEN: books—

On CHEN: articles—

Noigret, Hubert, ‘‘Dossier sur Farewell My Concubine,’’ in Positif, November 1993.

Chen, Pauline, ‘‘History Lessons,’’ in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1994.

Rayns, Tony, ‘‘Motion and Emotion,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), March 1996.

Xu, Ben, ‘‘Farewell My Concubine and Its Nativist Critics,’’ in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), September 1997.

* * *

Chen Kaige is, with Zhang Yimou, the leading voice among the Fifth Generation of Chinese filmmakers, the first group of students to have graduated following the reopening of the Beijing Film Academy in 1978 after the depredations of the Cultural Revolution. As both a participant in (as a Red Guard he denounced his own father) and a victim of the Cultural Revolution (his secondary education was curtailed and, like the protagonist of King of the Children, he was sent to the country to ‘‘learn from the peasants’’), Chen is particularly well-placed to voice concerns about history and identity.

The majority of his films constitute an intelligent and powerfully felt meditation on recent Chinese history, within which, for him, the Cultural Revolution remains a defining moment. ‘‘It made,’’ he has said, ‘‘cultural hooligans of us.’’ He has a reputation within China as a philosophical director, and his style is indeed marked by a laconic handling of narrative and a classical reticence. This is largely deceptive: underneath is an unyielding anger and unflinching integrity.

Chen in interviews has stressed the complementary nature of his first three films. Yellow Earth examines the relationship of ‘‘man and the land,’’ The Big Parade looks at ‘‘the individual and the group,’’ and King of the Children considers ‘‘man and culture.’’ Yellow Earth seems to adopt the structure of the folk ballads that provide a focus for its narrative, with its long held shots and almost lapidary editing. The Big Parade alternates static parade ground shots with the chaos of barrack room life, while the third film mobilises a more rhetorical style of poetic realism. Together the films act as a triple rebuttal of any heroic reading of Maoism and the revolution, precisely by taking up subjects much used in propagandist art—the arrival of the People’s Liberation Army in a village, the training of new recruits, the fate of the teacher sent to the country—and by refuting their simplifications and obfuscations, shot for shot, with quite trenchant deliberation. Attention in Yellow Earth is focused not on the Communist Army whose soldier arrives at the village collecting songs, but on the barren plateau from which the peasantry attempts to sing a meager existence. In the process the account of Yenan which sees it as the birthplace of Communism is marginalized. King of the Children banishes the bright-eyed pupils and spotless classrooms of propaganda in favour of a run-down schoolroom, graffitied and in disrepair, from which the social fabric seems to have fallen away. Likewise The Big Parade banishes heroics and exemplary characters in favour of a clear-eyed look at the cost of moulding the individual into the collective.

In Chen’s films what is unsaid is as important as that which is said; indeed the act of silence becomes a potent force. The voiceless appear everywhere—the almost mute brother in Yellow Earth, the girl’s unspoken fears for her marriage (‘‘voiced’’ in song), the mute cowherd in King of the Children. In Yellow Earth the girl’s voice is silenced by the force of nature as she drowns singing an anthem about the Communist Party. It is almost better, Chen implies, not to speak at all, than—as he suggests in King of the Children—to copy, to repeat, to ‘‘shout to make it right.’’

Life on a String, a leisurely allegory whose protagonists are an elderly blind musician and his young acolyte, has as tangible a sense of physical terrain as Yellow Earth. It also has an icy twist. Dedicatedly following his own master’s instructions all his life, the old man finds himself, in the end, to have been duped. The film, fitting no fashionable niche, was largely ignored. With Farewell My Concubine Chen seems, superficially, to have taken a leaf from his rival Zhang Yimou’s book. The film has lavish studio sets and costumes and features Zhang’s favourite performer, Gong Li. Funded by Hong Kong actress Hsu Feng’s Tomson Films and based on a melodramatic novel by Lilian Lee, the film traces the relationship between a young boy, sold by his prostitute mother into the brutal regime of the Peking Opera School in 1920s China, and an older, tougher boy. Deiyi is destined to play female roles, and before he is accepted he undergoes a symbolic castration. The title is taken from the title of the opera in which they make their names—set during the last days of the reign of King Chu. The film follows their fortunes up to 1977, the end of the Cultural Revolution, and closes on a note of betrayal and sacrifice. Scrupulously performed, finely filmed, the subject allows its director scope to investigate the tortuous intersection of performance, identity, self, gender, and history.

Farewell My Concubine is one of a number of Chen’s films that depict the indoctrination and degradation of children by those who should be loving and responsible. Such also is the case in Temptress Moon, which tells the story of a brother and sister who are introduced to opium by their father. The film may be set during the pre-communist 1920s, yet it clearly is allegorical in that the father’s irresponsibility symbolizes a present-day political machine that has so often callously abused its citizenry. The Emperor and the Assassin is set even farther back in Chinese history—the third century B.C.—yet it too tells a story with contemporary reverberations. It is the based-on-fact account of Ying Zheng, a manipulative, increasingly ruthless ruler who is intent on taking over the country’s other kingdoms, and becoming the initial Chinese emperor. Ying Zheng might be viewed as the counterpart of Mao. Furthermore, his story, as presented here, could be a camouflaged allegory mirroring the failure of the Cultural Revolution.

Unsurprisingly Chen’s films have met with varying degrees of disapproval from the official regime. Yellow Earth was criticised in an anti-elitist policy. The Big Parade had its final sequence cut and ends with sounds of the eponymous parade in Tianenmen Square over an empty shot. Life on a String and Temptress Moon were banned. Farewell My Concubine was shown, withdrawn, then shown again. The Emperor and the Assassin initially was rejected by the censors; roughly 30 minutes of footage reportedly were excised to make it more ‘regime friendly.’ To young filmmakers in China Chen’s work, and that of other Fifth Generation directors, can seem academic or irrelevant. To the rest of us, the care with which Chen Kaige observes his protagonists’ struggles for integrity amid lethally shifting political tides makes for a perennially relevant body of work.

—Verina Glaessner, updated by Rob Edelman

CHRISTENSEN, Benjamin

Nationality: Danish. Born: Viborg, Denmark, 28 September 1879. Education: Educated in medicine; entered dramatic school of the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen, 1901. Family: Married 1) Ellen Arctander in 1904; 2) Sigrid Stahl in 1922; 3) Kamma Winther in 1927. Career: Actor in Aarhus Theatre (Jutland), then Folkteatret, Copenhagen, to 1907; left stage, became agent for French champagne firm Lanson, 1907; began as film actor, 1912; directed first film, 1913; went to Germany, worked for Erich Pommer, 1923; worked in United States, 1926–34; returned to Denmark and, in 1939, went to work for Nordisk Films Kompagni; left film production, 1942, and became manager of a movie theater. Died: 2 April 1959.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1913</td>
<td>Det hemmelighedsfulde X (The Mysterious X) (+ role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1915</td>
<td>Haevnens Nat (Blind Justice) (+ role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1922</td>
<td>Häxan (Witchcraft through the Ages) (+ sc, role as Devil and doctor)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1923</td>
<td>Seine Frau, die Unbekannte (His Mysterious Adventure)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1924</td>
<td>Die Frau mit dem schlechten Ruf (The Woman Who Did) (not completed)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1926</td>
<td>The Devil’s Circus</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1927</td>
<td>Mockery</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1928</td>
<td>Hawk’s Nest; The Haunted House; House of Horror</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1929</td>
<td>Seven Footprints to Satan</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1939</td>
<td>Rumaensk Blod or Streneri Corrodi (role); Vingeskudt (role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1940</td>
<td>Barnet</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1941</td>
<td>Gaa med mig hjem</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1942</td>
<td>Damen med de lyse handsker</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1912</td>
<td>Skaebnebaellet (role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1913</td>
<td>Gidslet (role); Scenens Brni (role); Store Klaus og Lille Klaus (role); Rumaensk Blod or Streneri Corrodi (role); Vingeskudt (role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1922</td>
<td>Haevnens Nat (Blind Justice) (+ role)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By CHRISTENSEN: book—

On CHRISTENSEN: book—

Ernst, John, Benjamin Christensen, Copenhagen, 1967.

On CHRISTENSEN: articles—

* * *

Benjamin Christensen’s first film was one of the most amazing directorial debuts in the history of film. Det hemmelighedsfulde X is a spy melodrama about a lieutenant accused of betraying his country, but who is saved at the last minute. If the story is conventional, the handling of it shows a natural instinct for film that is way ahead of its time. Told in often very imaginatively composed pictures, the film is completely free from literary clichés in its narrative style. Throughout the length of the work, Christensen demonstrates an ability to transform the psychology of his characters into physical action. The camerawork (by Emil Dinesen) is full of significant contrasts, while the cutting is dynamic and gives the film a marvelous drive. The film was received with admiration; everybody was stunned by its remarkable visual style, and Christensen was immediately recognized as the individualist and the experimenter of the Danish film of his day. His next film, Haevnens Nat, was a social melodrama, burdened by a pathetic story, but also distinguished by an inventive camera style. Christensen played lead roles in both these films.

Benjamin Christensen provoked his contemporaries and set himself in opposition to the filmmaking practices of his time. He had a strong belief in himself and worked consciously with film as a new art form. He considered the director as the author of the film and stated that “like any other artist he should reveal his own individuality in his own work.” Thus Christensen can be regarded as one of the first auteurs of the cinema. Carl Dreyer characterized Christensen as “a man who knew exactly what he wanted and who pursued his goal with uncompromising stubbornness.” Christensen’s main work is Häxan, an ambitious and unique film and a pioneering achievement in both the documentary and the fiction film. In this film Christensen combined his rationalistic ideas with his passionate temperament.

Christensen was always an isolated director in the Danish film world, and after Häxan he left Denmark. He made an insignificant film in Germany and was seen in Dreyer’s Michael as the master. He got an offer from Hollywood and made six films there. He used his talent for the strange and peculiar Seven Footprints to Satan, a witty horror comedy. Christensen returned to Denmark in the 1930s and in 1939 he was hired by Nordisk Films Kompagni. Again Christensen showed himself to be a controversial filmmaker. Determined to break the trivial pattern of Danish cinema at that time, he made three films which dealt with topical problems arising from conflicts between generations. One film depicted children from divorce-ridden homes, another was about abortion. Christensen’s last film was a spy thriller set against an international setting. It was a total failure, and Christensen left film production. For the rest of his life he lived in splendid isolation as manager of a small and insignificant cinema in the suburbs of Copenhagen.

—Ib Monty
CHYTILOVÁ, Věra

Films as Director:

1962 Strop (The Ceiling) (+ sc); Pytel blech (A Bag of Fleas) (+ sc)
1963 O něčem jiném (Something Different; Something Else; Another Way of Life) (+ sc)
1965 “Automat Svět” (The World Cafe) segment of Perličky na dně (Pearls of the Deep) (+ co-sc)
1966 Sedmikrásky (Daisies) (+ co-sc)
1969 Ovoce strom rajských jíme (The Fruit of Paradise; The Fruit of the Trees of Paradise) (+ co-sc)
1977 The Apple Game (+ sc)
1979 Panelstory (Prefab Story) (+ co-sc)
1980 Kalamita (Calamity) (+ co-sc)
1981 Chytilova versus Forman
1983 Faunovo prilis pozdni odpoledne (The Very Late Afternoon of a Faun)
1985 Praha, neklidne srace Europy (Prague, the Restless Heart of Europe) (short)
1986 Vici bouda (Wolf’s Hole)
1987 Sasek a kralovna (The Jester and the Queen); Kopytem Sem, Kopytem Tam (Tainted Horseplay) (+ sc)
1991 Mi Prazane me Rozumi (My Praguers Understand Me)
1990 T.G.M.—Osvoboditel (Tomas G. Masaryk—The Liberator) (+ sc)
1992 Dedictví aneb Kurvahosigutntag (The Legacy)
1993 Kam Parenky; The Inheritance of Fackoffsugaygogbye (+ sc)
1998 Pasti, pasti, pasticky (Trap, Trap, Little Trap) (+ co-sc)
1986 Vzlety a pády

Other Films:

1958 Konec jasnovídce (End of a Clairvoyant) (role as girl in bikini)
1991 Face of Hope (sc)

Publications

By CHYTILOVÁ: articles—

“Neznám opravduvý čín, který by nebyl riskantní” [I Don’t Know Any Action That Would Not Be Risky], an interview with Galina Kopanérová, in Film a doba (Prague), no. 1, 1963.

“Režijní explicace k filmu O něčem jiném” [The Director’s Comments on Something Different], in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 1, 1964.

“Sedmikrásky: režijní explikace” [Daisies: The Directress Comments], in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 4, 1966.

“A Film Should Be a Little Flashlight,’’ interview with H. Polt, in Take One (Montreal), November 1978.

Interview with H. Heberle and others, in Frauen & Film (Berlin), December 1978.

Interview with B. Eriksson-Vodakova, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 27, no. 6, 1985.

Interview with Kateřina Poštová, in Film a Doba (Prague), June 1989.

On CHYTILOVÁ: books—

Boček, Jaroslav, Modern Czechoslovak Film 1945–1965, Prague, 1965.
Janoušek, Jiří, 3 i, Prague, 1965.
Skvorecký, Josef, All the Bright Young Men and Women, Toronto, 1971.
Habova, Milada, and Jitka Vysekalova, editors, Czechoslovak Cinema, Prague, 1982.

On CHYTILOVÁ: articles—

Boček, Jaroslav, “Podobenství Věry Chytilové” [The Parable of Věra Chytilová], in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 11, 1966.
Martinek, Karel, “Filmový svět Věry Chytilové” [The Film World of Věra Chytilová], in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 3, 1982.
Z na, Miroslav, and Vladimir Solec, in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 5, 1982.
Waller, E., in Skrien (Amsterdam), September-October 1984.

So far the only important woman director of the Czech cinema is Věra Chytilová, its most innovative and probably most controversial personality. She is the only contemporary Czech filmmaker to work in the Eisensteinian tradition. She combines didacticism with often daring experimentation, based in essence on montage. Disregarding chronology and illustrative realism, she stresses the symbolic nature of images as well as visual and conceptual shock. Influenced to some extent also by cinema verité, particularly by its female representatives, and militantly feminist in her attitudes, she nevertheless made excellent use of the art of her husband, the cameraman Jaroslav Kučera, in her boldest venture to date, Daisies. This film, Chytilová’s best known, is a dazzling display of montage, tinting, visual deformation, film trickery, color processing, etc.—a multifaceted tour de force which, among other things, is also a tribute to the classics of the cinema, from the Lumière Brothers to Chaplin and Abel Gance. It contains shots, scenes, and sequences that utilize the most characteristic techniques and motives of the masters. Daisies is Chytilová at her most formalist. In her later films, there is a noticeable shift towards realism. However, all the principles mentioned above still dominate the more narrative approach, and a combination of unusual camera angles, shots, etc., together with a bitterly sarcastic vision, lead to hardly less provocative shock effects.

The didactical content of these highly sophisticated and subtly formalist works of filmic art, as in Eisenstein, is naive and crude: young women should prefer “useful” vocations to “useless” ones (The Ceiling); extremes of being active and being inactive both result in frustration (Something Different); irresponsibility and recklessness lead to a bad end (Daisies); a sexual relationship is something serious, not just irresponsible amusement (The Apple Game); people should help each other (Panel Story, The Calamity). Given the fact that Chytilová has worked mostly under the conditions of an enforced and harshly repressive establishment, a natural explanation of this seeming incongruity offers itself: the “moral messages” of her films are simply libations that enable her, and her friends among the critics, to defend the unashamedly formalist films and the harshly satirical presentation of social reality they contain. This is corroborated by Chytilová’s many clashes with the political authorities in Czechoslovakia: from an interpellation in the Parliament calling for a ban of Daisies because so much food—“the fruit of the work of our toiling farmers”—is destroyed in the film, to her being fired from the Barrandov studios after the Soviet invasion in 1968, and on to her open letter to President Husák printed in Western newspapers. In each instance she won her case by a combination of publicly stated kosher ideological arguments, stressing the alleged “messages” of her works, and of backstage manipulation, not excluding the use of her considerable feminine charm. Consequently, she is the only one from among the new wave of directors from the 1960s who, for a long time, had been able to continue making films in Czechoslovakia without compromising her aesthetic creed and her vision of society, as so many others had to do in order to remain in business (including Jaromíl Jireš, Hynek Bočan, Jaroslav Papoušek, and to some extent Jiří Menzel).

Panel Story and Calamity earned her hateful attacks from establishment critics and intrigues from her second-rate colleagues, who are thriving on the absence of competition from such exiled or banned directors as Miloš Forman, Ivan Passer, Jan Němec, Evald Schorm, and Vojtěch Jasny. The two films were practically withdrawn from circulation and can be occasionally seen only in suburban theatres. The only critical film periodical, Film a doba, published, in 1982, a series of three articles which, in veiled terms and using what playwright Václav Havel calls “dialectical metaphysics” (“on the one hand it is bad, but on the other hand it is also good”), defended the director and her right to remain herself. In her integrity, artistic boldness, and originality, and in her ability to survive the most destructive social and political catastrophes, Chytilová was a unique phenomenon in post-invasion Czech cinema. Unfortunately, during the last years of Communist rule in Czechoslovakia, she seems to have lost something of her touch, and her latest films—such as The Very Late Afternoon of a Faun or The Jester and the Queen—are clearly not on the level of Daisies or Panel Story. Since the “velvet revolution” she has maintained her independence as idiosyncratically as ever. Refusing to take up any comfortably accommodating position, she has been accused of nostalgia for the Communist years. This would be to misrepresent her position. A fierce campaigner for a state establishment, she has been accused of nostalgia for the Communist years. This would be to misrepresent her position. A fierce campaigner for a state subsidy for the Czech film industry, she cannot but lament the extent to which the implementation of the ideology of the “free market” has been allowed to accomplish what the Soviet regime never quite could—the extinguishing of Czech film culture.

She has made a number of documentary films for television as well as a 1992 comedy about the deleterious effects of sudden wealth, which was publicly well received but met with critical opprobrium. She has so far failed to find funding for a long-cherished project, Face of Hope, about the nineteenth-century humanist writer Bozena Nemcova. The continuing relevance of Daisies, and its depiction of philistinism in several registers, is surely the strongest argument in support of Chytilová’s position. It is a film that shines with the sheer craftsmanship Czech cinema achieved in those years.

—Josef Skvorecký, updated by Verina Glaessner

CIMINO, Michael

Films as Director:

1974 Thunderbolt and Lightfoot (+ sc)
1978 The Deer Hunter (+ co-sc, co-pr)

1980 Heaven’s Gate (+ sc)
1985 Year of the Dragon (co-sc)
1987 The Sicilian (+ co-pr)
1988 Santa Anna Winds
1990 Desperate Hours (+ pr)
1996 The Sunchaser (+ pr)
1999 The Dreaming Place

Other Films:

1972 Silent Running (Trumbull) (co-sc)
1973 Magnum Force (Post) (co-sc)

Publications

By CIMINO: articles—

“Stalking the Deer Hunter: An Interview with Michael Cimino,” with M. Carducci, in Millimeter (New York), March 1978.
Interview with Herb Lightman, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1980.
Interview with Jean Narboni, and others, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1985.
Interview with Serge Toubiana, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), June 1996.
Interview with M. Ciment and L. Vachaud, in Positif (Paris), July/August 1996.

On CIMINO: books—

On CIMINO: articles—

“Heaven’s Gate Issue” of American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1980.
‘‘Deer Hunter Section’’ of Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1983.
Greene, N., ‘‘Coppola, Cimino: The Operatics of History,’’ in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Winter 1984–85.
Burke, F., ‘‘Reading Michael Cimino’s The Deer Hunter: Interpretation as Melting Pot,’’ in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 20, no. 3, 1992.
Crespi, Alberto, and Federico Nazzaro, in Cineforum (Bergamo), November 1996.

* * *

Erratic as his achievement has been, Michael Cimino is, with Martin Scorsese, one of the two most important filmmakers to have emerged in the Hollywood cinema of the 1970s. His reputation must rest, so far, essentially on two enormously ambitious and controversial films, The Deer Hunter and Heaven’s Gate, and his stature will only receive due recognition when the latter is re-released (in its ‘‘original,’’ three-and-one-half-hour version) and revalued. One can confidently prophesy that it will come as a major revelation.

In one respect, Scorsese and Cimino appear opposites of each other. Scorsese (prior, at least, to The Last Temptation of Christ) characteristically starts from a small, precise, concrete subject and radically explores it until it reveals strains, tensions, and contradictions central to our culture; Cimino begins with a vague and grandiose ‘‘vision’’ and proceeds to map in its salient features and attempts to render it concrete by developing its detail. That Scorsese’s method is by far the more conducive to assured artistic success is obvious, and Cimino has yet to produce work as secure in its aim and tone as Raging Bull or King of Comedy. We may start with Heaven’s Gate and its critical reception: the peak of Cimino’s achievement to date (it remains, for me, the greatest Hollywood film of the past fifteen years), it was almost universally savaged by the American press. The pervasive complaint was that Cimino ‘‘can’t tell a story,’’ despite the fact that he had already managed to do so very successfully, as the screenwriter of Silent Running and the director of Thunderbolt and Lightfoot; that he might wish to attempt something rather different was not considered as a possibility. Much critical and theoretical work has now been done attacking the overwhelming dominance in Hollywood cinema of the rules of classical narrative, centred on individual psychology and scene-by-scene causality: the dominance, to adopt Barthesian terminology, of the proaeretic and hermeneutic codes. These form the basis of the kind of cinema to which Hollywood has so long accustomed us, but there is no reason why custom should be institutionalized as an unchallengeable and absolute system of construction, permitting no divergence.

The structure of Heaven’s Gate is quite other, the best analogy being with architecture. Each scene or segment can be viewed as a building block enacting (though not in any obviously didactic or explicit way) a “history lesson” in the Brechtian sense of the term. Within obvious limits (the film does have a discernible narrative, with a beginning, middle, and end in that order), these blocks relate to each other freely across the entire film, rather than forming a causal a, b, c... progression; they gradually add up to a complex structure of thematic interrelatedness. It is significant that when Cimino, after the disastrous North American premières, himself edited a two-and-one-half-hour version for general release, he produced not just a shorter version but a different film: not only does he use perceptibly different takes of certain shots, but whole narrative segments are transposed to different parts of the film, and one brief incident is included which he cut from the original version. This also explains why the film, in whatever version, always appears unfinished: the addition, removal, or transposition of the “blocks” could be an interminable process, the structure (freed from the strictures of narrative causality) being logically incompletable (there was once, according to Steven Bach, a five-and-one-half-hour version). It is also significant that one of the film’s finest set-pieces, the magnificent roller-skating sequence, has no narrative necessity whatever, neither developing character nor furthering the plot, though it is crucial to the film’s “grand design.”

There are no precedents in Hollywood cinema for this type of formal strategy; to find them, one must go further afield, to the Kurosawa of High and Low and Ikiu, or to the Pasolini of Medea.

Another initial critical objection was to the film’s “Marxist content.” By denying the viewer the traditional narrative pleasures of causality and close identification, Cimino transfers attention from individuals to movements, and the film’s overall movement is toward the destruction of a genuinely multi-cultural, non-sexist, and potentially socialist America by the capitalist greed for wealth and power.

In view of this, it is ironic that The Deer Hunter has been widely perceived as a right-wing movie. In fact, the two films are generally consistent. More intuitive than theoretical, more emotional than perceived as a right-wing movie. In fact, the two films are generally consistent. More intuitive than theoretical, more emotional than consistent. More intuitive than theoretical, more emotional than.

Cimino does not have a completely consistent ideological position which the films dramatize: they seem, on the contrary, often ideologically incoherent, insufficiently thought (particularly the case with Year of the Dragon, which disintegrates under the strain of its own internal contradictions). Though less formally radical than Heaven’s Gate, The Deer Hunter is also characterized by great architectural strength. It is composed of five “blocks,” two set in Vietnam alternating with three set in Clairton, Pennsylvania; in both sets, each block is substantially shorter than its predecessor, enacting on the formal level the theme of “dwindling” on which the action of the film is constructed. The controversial ending, in which the survivors sing “God Bless America,” is neither affirmative (i.e., right wing) nor ironic (i.e., leftist); the singing is characterized by an extreme tentativeness, a failure of confidence in both an available...

...“America” that might be blessed or a God to bless it. As in Heaven’s Gate (and the point relates back interestingly to the work of John Ford and the whole complex American tradition for which it speaks), the “America” that might be affirmed, represented by social outsiders (in Cimino’s case immigrant ethnic groups), is felt to be irredeemably lost, overwhelmed by the Nixonite/Reaganite America of corporate capitalism.

Cimino’s career since Heaven’s Gate has been as disappointing as Scorsese’s since King of Comedy. There is perhaps a common cause: the sheer difficulty of setting up intelligent, personal, original, or challenging work in the era of endless mindless sequels and “packages,” in a Hollywood dominated by precisely the kind of capitalist concern that Heaven’s Gate assaults, more concerned with “business” than with cinema. In Cimino’s case there is a more specific cause: the general distrust generated by the now almost proverbial financial catastrophe of Heaven’s Gate. For all that, Year of the Dragon and The Sicilian, though neither can be counted an artistic success, seem far more interesting than The Color of Money or The Last Temptation of Christ. The former contains scenes of stunning brilliance and virtuosity, but is centrally flawed by its inability to construct a coherent attitude toward its protagonist (Mickey Rourke). The film’s three most sympathetic characters—his young Chinese assistant, his wife, his mistress—are all given speeches denouncing him; he is indirectly responsible for the deaths of the first two and the gang-rape of the third. Yet Cimino also clearly wishes to affirm the character, an impulse culminating in a conclusion which even Mahler cannot save. The Sicilian, like Heaven’s Gate, is an epic that precludes identification: with the possible exception of Giuliano’s fiancée (a relatively minor and somewhat stereotypical role), every position dramatized in the film (including that of the hero) is shown to be severely compromised and untenable. Unlike Heaven’s Gate, however, the detail of the film only intermittently comes alive, and then only in the supporting roles (Joss Ackland, John Turturro). Cimino seems seriously hampered by the doubtless mandatory fidelity to Mario Puzo’s elephantine and cliché-ridden novel, and by the casting of Christopher Lambert, who totally lacks the charisma that alone would make Giuliano plausible. More importantly, perhaps, Cimino has shown himself in all his previous films intensely concerned with “America” (the ideological image more than the appalling reality), and relates rather distantly to a foreign environment.

Desperate Hours, a remake of William Wyler’s 1955 thriller, was a surprisingly modest project for one of Hollywood’s great overreachers, but one that offered the potential of grappling with American values at their core. Desperate Hours must be accounted partially unsatisfactory, however, and its commercial failure, with that of The Sicilian, has made Cimino’s future in Hollywood increasingly problematic. It is, however, an enormously more interesting and challenging film than the original version. Wyler’s film was “safe” in every way: his usual thoroughly sound, if thoroughly uninspired, direction, and an eminently respectable and sensible bourgeois entertainment. Cimino’s film is neither safe nor sensible. It is characterized by an all-pervasive nervous tension, a relentless edginess expressed by all the characters and communicated strongly to the audience. The value and stability of bourgeois family life (a “given” in Wyler) are no longer guaranteed; the parents are separated, and can scarcely address a sentence to each other without an eruption; the children are disturbed and potentially rebellious. The corollary of this is that the gang who take over the household are no longer automatically invalidated: dangerous and vicious (with Mickey Rourke’s leader prone to psychotic explosions at the slightest provocation), they nonetheless embody the justifiable revolt of the underprivileged in a society riddled with class tensions. Like Rourke’s character, the film is jagged, unpredictable, incomplete. Character motivations are often unclear (Lindsay Krouse’s role suffered from severe cuts), opaque, and eccentric, yet all the characters have vivid life, a spontaneity of action and reaction, beside which the conventional figures of Wyler’s film seem pallid. As usual, Cimino’s crime (in terms of commercial success) is to deny the audience any feeling of comfort, stability, or satisfaction; that is also what makes his films so fascinating.

There is no other filmmaker of whom my own view is quite so completely at odds with the generally accepted one. Heaven’s Gate, above all, stands up magnificently to the test of time and repeated viewings; I have used it in film classes every year, and students greet it invariably as a revelation. Yet “accepted opinion,” once established, is notoriously difficult to erode.

—Robin Wood

CISSÉ, Souleymane

Nationality: Malian. Born: Bamako, 21 April 1940; lived in Dakar during his adolescence until the Senegalese-Mali Federation broke up in 1960, at which point he moved back to Mali. Education: Obtained a three-month grant to study in the Soviet Union, 1961; received a scholarship to study film direction at the VGIK (State Institute of Cinema), Moscow, 1963–1969; made three short films as a student, L’homme et les idoles (1965), Sources d’inspiration (1966), and L’aspirant (1968). Career: Film director for SCINFOMA (Service Cinématographique du Ministère de l’Information du Mali), Mali, 1969–1972; with his direction of Cinq jours d’une vie (1972) he decided to work on his own projects; established the NFa Cissé, an annual award for artistic creation in Mali. 1991. Awards: Bronze prize, Carthage Film Festival (Tunisia), for Cinq jours d’une vie, 1972; Bronze prize, Carthage Film Festival, for Den Muso, 1974; Grand prize, Fespaco (Burkina Faso), Grand prize, Nantes Festival (France), Silver prize, Carthage Film Festival, for Baara, 1977; Gold prize, Carthage Film Festival, Grand prize, Fespaco (Burkina Faso), A Certain Regard section, Cannes Festival (France), for Finyé, 1982; Chevalier du Mérite National and Jury prize, Cannes Film Festival (France), for Yeelen, 1987; Gold medal, Congress of the International Confederation of Societies of Authors and Composers, for entire works, 1996. Address: Sisé Filimu/Les Films Cissé, BP 1236, Bamako, Mali.

Films as Director:

1972  Cinq jours d’une vie (+ sc, d, ph)
1975  Den Muso (The Girl) (+ sc)
1977  Baara (The Work) (+ sc)
1982  Finyé (The Wind) (+ sc)
1987  Yeelen (The Light) (+ sc)
1995  Waati (The Time) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1970–71  Degal à Dialloube (doc); Fête du Sanke (doc)
1973  Dixième anniversaire de l’O.U.A. (doc)
1978  Chanteurs traditionnels des îles Seychelles (doc)

Publications

By CISSÉ: articles—

“Rencontre avec Cissé,” in Calao (Abidjan), May-June 1983.

“We Make Films... but We Do Not Exist,” interview with H. Goutier, in The Courier (Brussels), November-December 1996.

On Cissé: books—

On Cissé: articles—

On Cissé film—

Panh, Rithy, Souleymane Cissé (videocassette), 1991

* * *

Souleymane Cissé was the most recognized African filmmaker of the twentieth century. A participant in a general movement toward social realism in African cinema, Cissé was the first African to win a major prize at the Cannes Film Festival. While the success of both Finyé and Yeelen at the Cannes Film Festival garnered Cissé acclaim and increased attention for African cinema, Cissé has spent his career filming African subjects. Such concentration requires a special devotion because Africa is prone to economic and social precariousness. But after studying in Moscow, Cissé returned to his home land to perfect his craft. In doing so he has contributed significantly to the development of social realism in African cinema.

Cissé used his creative skills to tell stories of everyday Africans. While working at the SCINOMA he made more than thirty newsreels and documentary films that examined different African societies. His projects carefully depicted the cultural heritage and typical lives of Malian and other African people. Using the very limited technical means provided by the government for which he was still working at that time, Cissé created Cinq jours d’une vie, a short movie relating the disappointments of an unemployed young man from Mali in 1972. Cissé’s realistic style garnered Cinq jours d’une vie considerable attention at the Carthage Festival. Buoyed by the success of the film, Cissé formed his own company, Les Films Cissé, to produce his own films without government support.

Den Muso is both Cissé’s first feature movie and the first film in Bambara language in African cinema. This movie deals with the suicide of Ténin, a deaf-mute urban Muslim young woman who is rejected by her family when she bears the child of one of her father’s employees. Though the story sadly relates the story of Ténin it also comments on the value of social classes in modern society. Highlighting the moral conflicts of adhering to traditional values in contemporary society, Cissé accounts for the condition of the modern Malian woman.

The first great African movie dealing with the proletarian class, Baara is the most Marxist of Cissé’s movies, both in its liberal form. and its topics. The film grapples with the greed and corruption of the business elite and highlights the emerging social awareness of workers and women. In the film, Balla Traoré, a young engineer newly graduated in Europe, decries the economic exploitation in the textile factory he supervises and the corruption of his manager who will eventually have him murdered.

_Finyé_ is one of the finest and densest movies made on the African continent. Centered around a love affair between two university students with very different backgrounds—one father is a traditional chief and the other is a military governor—the film tackles the friction between tradition and modernity in African society. In the film, the students join a mass protest against the falsification of exam results and are later supported by the chief who renounces his powers and allies himself with the youth. Meanwhile the military governor, whose authoritarianism bears some similarities to Moussa Traoré’s politics when he ruled Mali from 1968 to 1991, remains firm in his defense of the government. In the end, Cissé succeeds in illustrating the power of mass protests against the government. Although not the equal of his later film, _Yeelen, Finyé_ offers a complex reflection on African culture and politics. Yet the complexity of the film is portrayed with a lightness and efficient simplicity that has come to typify Cissé’s work. With a certain virtuosity Cissé combines scenes of everyday life with dreamlike sequences or magic rituals.

Despite the seemingly effortless simplicity conveyed in his films, Cissé works diligently to achieve these results. He aspires to technical perfection and wants his movies to reach the same esthetic level as western cinema. To create his films, Cissé must rely heavily on western help and other non-African technicians. And, unlike other filmmakers who consider a movie as primarily a political tool, Cissé has cultural and esthetic visions for his movies.

Paramount to Cissé’s work is his use of feminine themes to highlight the feminine condition and to evoke the symbolic sense of femininity in Africa. Cissé has often given feminine themes a central role in his films. In his first feature film _Den Muso_ , one can interpret Tenin’s dumbness as a way to show Malian women’s submissiveness to patriarchal values. In his later film _Waati_ , the character Nandi illustrates the role of African women in general. All of Cissé’s films use these feminine themes as a metaphor for life in Africa.

Working within these feminine themes, Cissé also brings historical perspective to his films. Each film provides a complex web of historically inspired stories, situations, settings, and speech. A full understanding of Cissé’s films requires careful attention to his efforts to place his films in historical context. In _Finyé_ , for example, Cissé juxtaposes the film’s fictional youth protest with footage from a real protest in Mali in the early 1980s. Unfortunately censorship concerns forced Cissé to only touch on the issues surrounding the ensuing fall of Traoré’s regime in Mali. Nevertheless, the force of his Cissé’s film highlighted the power of popular protests and, during the events of 1991, _Finyé_ has been remembered for its political significance.

For all his efforts, his self-proclaimed masterpiece, _Yeelen_ , won him international acclaim. Undoubtedly one of the most famous African movies, _Yeelen_ relates the cultural heritage of the Bambara and other Mande-speaking peoples of West Africa. Like _Finyé_ , the film reflects on the tensions between tradition and modernity in a generational conflict; the Chief of the Komo secret society tries to murder his son who is accused of having disclosed some important secrets.

In _Yeelen_ , Cissé strays from the social realism typical of his previous movies and adapts a style that is influenced by the Bambara culture—the language of which predominates in the whole western Africa—and its cosmology and concepts of time and space. For some, the film brought to the screen aspects of their culture or experience never before seen. The film shows a complete ceremony of the Komo secret society, which many Malians are familiar with but few have seen. Indeed the cultural content of the film is incredibly rich. While based on the Bambara culture, the Peul and Dogon cultures are also highlighted. In the end, _Yeelen_ goes beyond the theories about a cultural unity in Africa to provide an argument for the preservation of distinct African cultures. In addition to its cultural complexity, _Yeelen_ focuses on the political complexity in an African nation by perfectly representing the Pan-African aspirations of African filmmakers.

In the early 1990s, Cissé crossed the Malian border to film _Waati_ , a film about apartheid. In _Waati_ , Southern Africa is described as submitting to apartheid whereas Western Africa is almost depicted as an idyllic place. _Waati_ can be considered as the first genuine Pan-African creation at a time when Pan-Africanism was still a theoretical discourse promoted by the Pan-African Federation of Filmmakers (FEPACI). While offering a rather predictable description of apartheid, _Waati_ reveals the artistic limits of the topic. Images of the arbitrary violence under apartheid permeate the film. Despite the limited artistic success of the film, the African vision on the barbarism of apartheid was not ineffective. One of the first scenes has obvious cathartic and emotional virtues: on a beach prohibited to Black people, Nandi, the heroine, sees her father and little brother slaughtered by an Afrikaner rider. Using her supernatural powers, Nandi succeeds in killing the rider. All the members of the audience, whether they are African or Westerner, can identify with her gesture as the ultimate defense against evil.

Misunderstandings about his work have been increasing since the release of _Waati_. Some have severely criticized Cissé as the director of an agonizing Pan-Africanism, while others favor his approach. These contradictory receptions may illustrate the intrinsic paradox of Cissé’s work: his aspirations toward technical and esthetic quality as well as his desire to concentrate on African cultures. While critics and scholars usually consider speech as the main element in African cinema, Cissé emphasizes the visual aspects of his movies. Concerned with pictures and camera movement, his portrayal of everyday life and religious rituals—especially since _Finyé_—dramatizes the political nature of the activities. Cissé’s work seems to be increasingly focused on a reflection of cultures to the detriment of a realistic description of Malian or African societies. But in addition to bringing various cultures to the screen, Cissé’s contribution to African cinema is based on the development of a style that superposes traditional and modern elements, creating an art that is neither traditionalist nor modernist but rather within post-modernity.

—Samuel Lelievre

---

CLAIR, René

Nationality: French. Born: René Chomette in Paris, 11 November 1898. Education: Lycée Montaigne, and Lycée Louis-le-Grand, Paris, 1913–17. Military Service: Served in Ambulance Corps, 1917. Family: Married Bronya Perlmutter, 1926, one son. Career: Retired to Dominican monastery, 1918; began acting at Gaumont studios, 1920; as René Clair, became film editor of _Le Théâtre et comédie illustré_, Paris, 1922; directed first film, _Paris qui dort_, 1922. Parasites:
René Clair

1923; directed for Alexander Korda in Britain, 1935–38; immigrated to United States and signed to Universal, 1940; returned to Paris, 1946. Awards: Honorary doctorate, Cambridge University, 1956; elected to Academie Française, 1960; Doctor Honoris Causa, Royal College of Arts, London, 1967; Commander of the Legion of Honour; Commander of the Order of Merit. Died: In Neuilly, France, 15 March 1981.

Films as Director:

1923 Paris qui dort (+ sc, ed)
1924 Entr'acte; Le Fantôme du Moulin Rouge (+ sc)
1925 Le Voyage imaginaire (+ sc)
1926 La Proie du vent (+ sc)
1927 Un Chapeau de paille d'Italie (+ sc)
1928 La Tour (+ sc); Les Deux Timides (+ sc)
1930 Sous les toits de Paris (+ sc)
1931 Le Million (+ sc); A Nous la liberté (+ sc)
1932 Quatorze Juillet (+ sc)
1934 Le Dernier Milliardaire (+ sc)
1935 The Ghost Goes West (+ co-sc)
1937 Break the News (+ co-sc)
1939 Air pur (+ sc) (uncompleted)

1940 The Flame of New Orleans (+ co-sc)
1942 Sketch featuring Ida Lupino in Forever and a Day (Lloyd) (+ sc; I Married a Witch (+ co-sc, pr)
1943 It Happened Tomorrow (+ co-sc)
1945 And Then There Were None (+ co-sc, pr)
1947 Le Silence est d'or (+ pr, sc)
1949 La Beauté du diable (+ co-sc, pr)
1952 Les Belles-de-nuit (+ sc, pr)
1955 Les Grandes Manoeuvres (+ co-sc, pr)
1957 Porte des Lilas (+ co-sc, pr)
1960 ‘‘Le Mariage’’ episode of La Francaise et l’amour (+ sc)
1961 Tout l’or du monde (+ co-sc, pr)
1962 ‘‘Les Deux Pigeons’’ episode of Les Quatres vérités (+ sc)
1965 Les Fêtes galantes (+ pr, sc)

Other Films:

1920 Le Lys de la Vie (Fuller) (role); Les Deux Gamines (Feuillade—serial) (role)
1921 Le Sens de la mort (Protozanoff) (role); L’Orpheline (Feuillade) (role); Parisette (Feuillade—serial) (role)
1922 Parisette (Feuillade) (role)
1930 Prix de beauté (Miss Europe) (Genina) (sc contribution)
1939 Un Village dans Paris (co-pr)
1959 La Grande Époque (French version of Robert Youngson’s The Golden Age of Comedy) (narrator)

Publications

By CLAIR: books—

De fil en aiguille, Paris, 1951.
‘‘À nous la liberté’’ and ‘‘Entr’acte,’’ New York, 1970.

By CLAIR: articles—

‘‘A Conversation with René Clair,’’ with Bernard Causton, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1933.
‘‘It Happened Tomorrow,’’ with Dudley Nichols, in Theatre Arts (New York), June 1944.
‘‘Television and Cinema,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), January 1951.
‘‘René Clair in Moscow,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1955/56.
Interview in Encountering Directors by Charles Samuels, New York, 1972.

“René Clair at 80,” an interview with G. Mason, in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 10, no. 2, 1982.

On CLAIR: books—

On CLAIR: articles—

Potamkin, Harry, “‘René Clair and Film Humor,’” in Hound and Horn (New York), October/December 1932.

“‘Clair Issue’” of Bianco e Nero (Rome), August/September 1951.

Grignaffini, Giovanna, “‘René Clair’ (special issue), Castoro Cinema (Firenze), no. 69, 1979.

Adair, Gilbert, “‘Utopia Ltd., the Cinema of René Clair,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1981.

Kramer, S.P., “‘René Clair: Situation and Sensibility in A nous la liberté,’” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1984.

On CLAIR: film—

* * *

During the 1930s, when the French cinema reigned intellectually preeminent, René Clair ranked with Renoir and Carné as one of its greatest directors—perhaps the most archetypally French of them all. His reputation has since fallen (as has Carné’s), and comparison with Renoir may suggest why. Clair’s work, though witty, stylish, charming, and technically accomplished, seems to lack a dimension when compared with the work of Renoir; there is a certain oversimplification, a fastidious turning away from the messier, more complex aspects of life. (Throughout nearly the whole of his career, Clair rejected location shooting, preferring the controllable artifice of the studio.) Critics have alleged that his films are superficial and emotionally detached. Yet, at their best, Clair’s films have much of the quality of champagne—given so much sparkle and exhilaration, it would seem churlish to demand nourishment as well.

At the outset of his career, Clair directed one of the classic documents of surrealist cinema, Entr’acte, and this grounding in surrealism underlies much of his comedy work. The surrealists’ love of sight gags (Magritte’s cloud-baguette, Duchamp’s urinal) and mocking contempt for bourgeois respectability can be detected in the satiric farce of Un Chapeau de paille d’Italie, Clair’s masterpiece of the silent era. Dream imagery, another surrealist preoccupation, recurs constantly throughout his career, from Le Voyage imaginaire to Les Belles-de-nuit, often transmuted into fantasy—touchingly poetic at its best, though in weaker moments declining into fey whimsicality.

The key films in Clair’s early career, and those which made him internationally famous, were his first four sound pictures: Sous les toits de Paris, Le Million, A Nous la liberté, and Quatorze Juillet. Initially sceptical of the value of sound—“an unnatural creation”—he rapidly changed his opinion when he recognized the creative, nonrealistic possibilities which the soundtrack offered. Sound effects, music, even dialogue could be used imaginatively to counterpoint and comment on the image, or to suggest a new perspective on the action. Words and pictures, Clair showed, need not, and in fact should not, be tied together in a manner that clumsily duplicates information. Dialogue need not always be audible; and even in a sound picture, silence could claim a validity of its own.
In these four films, Clair created a wholly individual cinematic world, a distinctive blend of fantasy, romance, social satire, and operetta. Song and dance are introduced into the action with no pretence at literal realism, characters are drawn largely from stock, and the elaborate sets are explored with an effortless fluidity of camera movement which would be impossible in real locations. These qualities, together with the pioneering use of sound and Clair’s knack for effective pacing and brilliant visual gags, resulted in films of exceptional appeal, full of charm, gaiety, and an ironic wit which at times—notably in the satire on mechanised greed in A Nous la liberté—darkened toward an underlying pessimism.

As always, Clair wrote his own scripts, working closely on all four films with designer Lazare Meerson and cinematographer Georges Périnal. Of the four, Le Million most effectively integrated its various elements, and is generally rated Clair’s finest film. But all were successful, especially outside France, and highly influential: both Chaplin (Modern Times) and the Marx Brothers (A Night at the Opera) borrowed from them.

In some quarters, though, Clair was criticized for lack of social relevance. Ill-advisedly, he attempted to respond to such criticisms; Le Dernier Millionnaire proved a resounding flop. This led to Clair’s long exile. For thirteen years he made no films in France other than the abortive Air pur, and his six English-language pictures—two in Britain, four in America—have an uneasy feel about them, the fantasy strained and unconvincing. By the time Clair finally returned to France in 1946, both he and the world had changed.

The films that Clair made after World War II rarely recapture the light-hearted gaiety of his early work. In its place, the best of them display a new-found maturity and emotional depth, while preserving the characteristic elegance and wit of his previous films. The prevailing mood is an autumnal melancholy that at times, as in the elegiac close of Les Grandes Manoeuvres, comes near to tragedy. Characters are no longer the stock puppets of the pre-war satires, but rounded individuals, capable of feeling and suffering. More serious subjects are confronted, their edges only slightly softened by their context: Porte des Lilas ends with a murder, La Beauté du diable with a vision of the atomic holocaust. Nearest in mood to the earlier films is the erotic fantasy of Les Belles-de-nuit, but even this is darkly underscored with intimations of suicide.

In the late 1950s Clair came under attack from the writers of Cahiers du Cinéma, François Truffaut in particular, who regarded him as the embodiment of the “Old Guard,” the ossified cinéma de papa against which they were in revolt. To what he saw as Clair’s emotionless, studio-bound artifice, Truffaut proposed an alternative, more “truly French” cinematic tradition, the lyrical freedom of Renoir and Jean Vigo. Clair’s reputation never fully recovered from these onslaughts, nor from the lukewarm reception which met his last two films, Tout l’or du monde and Les Fêtes galantes. Although Clair no longer commands a place among the very first rank of directors, he remains undoubtedly one of the most original and distinctive stylists of the cinema. His explorations of sound, movement, and narrative technique, liberating at the time, still appear fresh and inventive. For all his limitations, which he readily acknowledged—“a director’s intelligence,” he once wrote, “can be judged partly by his renunciation”—Clair succeeded in creating a uniquely personal vision of the world, which in his best films still retains the power to exhilarate and delight.

—Philip Kemp

CLARKE, Shirley

Films as Director:

1954 A Dance in the Sun (+ pr, ph, ed, co-choreo); In Paris Parks (+ pr, ph, ed, co-choreo)
1955 Bullfight (+ pr, co-ph, ed, co-choreo)
1957 A Moment in Love (+ pr, co-ph, ed, co-choreo)
1958 The Skyscraper (pr, co-d only); Brussels “Loops” (12 film loops made for Brussels Exposition, destroyed) (+ pr, co-ph, ed)
1959 Bridges-Go-Round (+ pr, co-ph, ed)
1960 A Scary Time (+ co-sc, ph)
1961 The Connection (+ co-pr, ed)
1963 The Cool World (+ co-sc, ed); Robert Frost: A Lover’s Quarrel with the World (co-d)
1967 Portrait of Jason (+ pr, ed, voice); Man in Polar Regions (11-screen film for Expo ’67)
1978 Trans; One Two Three; Mysterium; Initiation (all video)
1981 Savage/Love (video)
1982 Tongues (video/theatre collaboration with Sam Shepard)
1985 Ornette, Made in America

Shirley Clarke
Other Films:

1959 Opening in Moscow (Pennebaker) (co-ed)
1969 Lion’s Love (Varda) (role as herself)

Publications

By CLARKE: articles—

“The Expensive Art.,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1960.
Interview with James Blue, in Objectif (Paris), February/March 1965.
Interview with Gretchen Berg, in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1967.
“A Statement on Dance and Film,” in Dance Perspectives (New York), Summer 1967.
“What Directors Are Saying,” in Action (Los Angeles), March/April 1975.

On CLARKE: books—

On CLARKE: articles—

Breitrose, Henry, “‘Films of Shirley Clarke,’” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1960.
Cooper, K., “‘Shirley Clarke,’” in Filmmakers Newsletter (Ward Hill, Massachusetts), June 1972.
Bebb, Bruce, “‘The Many Media of Shirley Clarke,’” in Journal of University Film Association (Carbondale, Illinois), Spring 1982.

Grant, Barry Keith, “‘When Worlds Collide: The Cool World,’” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 28, no. 3, July 1990.
Obituary, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), vol. 14, no. 12, December 1997.
Obituary, in Sight and Sound (London), March 1998.

* * *

Shirley Clarke was a leader and major filmmaker in the New York film community in the 1950s and 1960s. Her films, which exemplify the artistic directions of the independent movement, are classic examples of the best work of American independent filmmaking. Clarke began her professional career as a dancer. She participated in the late 1940s in the avant-garde dance community centered around New York City’s Young Men’s-Young Women’s Hebrew Association’s (YM-YWHA) performance stage and Hanya Holm’s classes for young choreographers. In 1953, Clarke adapted dancer-choreographer Daniel Nagrin’s Dance in the Sun to film. In her first dance film, Clarke relied on editing concepts to choreograph a new cinematic space and rhythm. She then applied her cinematic choreography to a non-dance subject in In Paris Parks, and further explored the cinematic possibilities for formal choreography in her dance films, Bullfight and A Moment in Love. During this time period, Clarke studied filmmaking with Hans Richter at City College of New York and participated in informal filmmaking classes with director and cinematographer Peter Glushanok. In 1955, she became an active member of Independent Filmmakers of America (IFA), a short-lived New York organization that tried to improve promotion and distribution for independent films. Through the IFA, Clarke became part of the Greenwich Village artistic circle that included avant-garde filmmakers Maya Deren, Stan Brakhage, and Jonas Mekas. It also introduced her to the importance of an economic structure for the growth of avant-garde film, a cause she championed throughout the 1960s. Clarke worked with filmmakers Willard Van Dyke, Donn Alan Pennebaker, Ricky Leacock, and Wheaton Galentine on a series of film loops on American life for the United States Pavilion at the 1958 World’s Fair in Brussels. With the leftover footage of New York City bridges, she then made her experimental film masterpiece, Bridges-Go-Round, utilizing editing strategies, camera choreography, and color tints to turn naturalistic objects into a poem of dancing abstract elements. It is one of the best and most widely seen examples of a cinematic Abstract Expressionism in the 1950s.

Clarke made the documentary film Skyscraper in 1958 with Van Dyke, Pennebaker, Leacock, and Galentine, followed by A Scary Time (1960), a film commissioned by the United Nations International Children’s Emergency Fund (UNICEF). Clarke also began work on a public television film on Robert Frost, A Lover’s Quarrel with the World, but due to artistic disagreements and other commitments she left the project before the film’s completion while retaining a credit as co-director.

Influenced by the developing cinema-verité style in documentary films of Leacock and Pennebaker, Clarke adapted cinema verité to two feature-length dramatic films, The Connection and *The Cool World. The Connection was a landmark for the emergence of a New York independent feature film movement. It heralded a new style that employed a greater cinematic realism and addressed relevant social issues in black-and-white low budget films. It was also important because Clarke made the film the first test case in the courts in a successful fight to abolish New York State’s censorship rules. Her next feature film, The Cool World, was the first movie to dramatize a story on black street gangs without relying upon Hollywood-style moralizing, and it was the first commercial film to be shot on location in Harlem. In 1967, Clarke directed a 90-minute cinema verité interview with a black homosexual. Portrait of Jason is an insightful exploration of one person’s character while it simultaneously addresses the range and limitations of cinema verité style. Although Clarke’s features had only moderate commercial runs and nominal success in the United States, they have won film festival awards and critical praise in Europe, making Clarke one of the most highly regarded American independent filmmakers among European film audiences. In the 1960s, Clarke also worked for the advancement of the New York independent film movement. She was one of the 24 filmmakers and producers who wrote and signed the 1961 manifesto, “Statement for a New American Cinema,” which called for an economic, artistic, and political alternative to Hollywood moviemaking. With Jonas Mekas in 1962, she co-founded Film-Makers Cooperative, a non-profit distribution company for independent films. Later, Clarke, Mekas and filmmaker Louis Brigante co-founded Film-Makers Distribution Center, a company for distributing independent features to commercial movie theatres. Throughout the 1960s, Clarke lectured on independent film in universities and museums in the United States and Europe, and in 1969 she turned to video as her major medium in which to work.

—Lauren Rabinovitz

CLAYTON, Jack

Films as Director:

1944 Naples Is a Battlefield (+ sc, co-ph—uncredited)
1955 The Bespoke Overcoat (+ pr)
1958 Room at the Top
1961 The Innocents (+ pr)
1964 The Pumpkin Eater
1967 Our Mother's House
1974 The Great Gatsby
1983 Something Wicked This Way Comes

1988 The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne
1992 Memento Mori (for TV) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1948 Bond Street (Parry) (2nd unit d); An Ideal Husband (A. Korda) (pr mgr); The Queen of Spades (Dickinson) (assoc pr)
1951 Flesh and Blood (Kimmins) (assoc pr)
1952 Moulin Rouge (Huston) (assoc pr)
1953 Beat the Devil (Huston) (assoc pr)
1954 The Good Die Young (Gilbert) (assoc pr)
1955 I Am a Camera (Cornelius) (assoc pr)
1956 Sailor Beware! (Panic in the Parlor) (Parry) (pr); Dry Rot (Elvey) (pr); Three Men in a Boat (Annakin) (pr)
1957 The Story of Esther Costello (Miller) (assoc pr, 2nd unit d)
1958 The Whole Truth (Guillermin) (pr)

Publications

By CLAYTON: articles—

“I’m Proud of That Film,” an interview with M. Rosen, in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1974.

Interview in American Film (Washington, D.C.), December 1987.

Interview in Cinéma (London), November-December 1983.

On CLAYTON: book—

On CLAYTON: articles—

Cowie, Peter, “Clayton’s Progress,” in Motion (London), Spring 1962.

Houston, Penelope, “Gatsby,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1974.

Mclrory, Brian, “Tackling Aloneness: Jack Clayton’s The Lonely Passions of Judith Hearne,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 21, no. 1, January 1993.

Obituary, in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 14 March 1995.

Loban, Lelia, “The Haunting and The Innocents,” in Scarlet Street (Glen Rock), no. 20, Fall 1995.

* * *

Though nearly forty before directing his first feature, Clayton had a solid professional grounding as associate producer. His credits, though few, have been mostly major productions. Though he disclaims consciously auteurial choices, his films evince a heavily recognisable temperament. True, his approach is national-generational, insofar as his heavy, faintly expressionistic, blocking-in of a basic mood perpetuates the lyrical emphasis conspicuous in such “quality” films of the 1940s as Brief Encounter, Odd Man Out, and Dead of Night. His penchant for themes of melancholy, frustration, obsession, hallucination, and hauntings are also amply evident.

Clayton attracted much critical praise, and an Academy Award, with The Bespoke Overcoat, a “long short” brought in for $5,000; writer Wolf Mankowitz adapted Gogol’s tale of a haunted tailor to London’s East End. Clayton’s first feature was Room at the Top, from John Braine’s novel. Laurence Harvey played the ambitious young Northerner who sacrifices his true love, played by Simone Signoret, to a cynical career-move, impregnating an industrialist’s innocent daughter. Its sexual frankness (as the first “quality” film to carry the new X certificate) and its class-consciousness (its use of brand-names being as snobbery-conscious as James Bond’s—though lower-class) elicited powerful audience self-recognition. It marked a major breakthrough for British cinema, opening it to other “angry young men” with their “kitchen-sink realism” and social indignation (though politically more disparate than legend has it).

Clayton kept his distance from such trends, turning down both Saturday Night and Sunday Morning and The L-shaped Room, to select a very “literary,” Victorian, ghost story, The Innocents, from Henry James’s The Turn of the Screw. Deborah Kerr played the children’s governess who sees ghosts by sunlight while battling to save her charges from possession by the souls of two evil, and very sexual, servants. Is the lonely governess imagining everything, or projecting her own evil? The Pumpkin-Eater adapted Penelope Mortimer’s novel about a mother of eight (Anne Bancroft) whose new husband, a film scriptwriter, bullies her into having a hysterectomy. In Our Mother’s House, a family of children conceal their mother’s death from the authorities to continue living as a family—until their scapegrace father (Dirk Bogarde) returns and takes over, introducing, not so much “reality,” as his, disreputable, reality.

The three films are all but a trilogy, brooding with “haunted realism” over the psychic chaos between parental—especially mother—figures and children caught in half-knowledge of sexuality, death, and individuality. Atmospheres sluggish or turbulent, strained or cavernous, envelope women or child-women enmeshed in tangles of family closeness and loneliness. If The Innocents arraigns Victorian fears of childhood sexuality, it acknowledges also the evil in children. The Pumpkin Eater balances assumptions of “excessive” maternal instinct being a neurotic defence by raising the question of whether modern superficiality is brutally intolerant of maternal desire. Our Mother’s House concerns a “lost tribe” of children, caught between the modern, “small-family” world, infatuate oversensitivity (with dangers of a Lord of the Flies situation) and adult dissipation (with Dirk Bogarde somewhat reminiscent of The Servant). Its echoes of other films may do it injustice.

Several years and aborted projects later came The Great Gatsby, an ultra-lavish version of Scott Fitzgerald’s tale of the lost love of a bootlegger turned socialist. It’s a 1920s yuppie story, but its glitzy surfaces and characters even wispier than their originals acquire an icy, sarcophagal air. Almost as expensive, Something Wicked This Way Comes, from Ray Bradbury, about an eerie carnival touring lonely prairie towns to snare unsatisfied souls, evokes children’s storybook illustrations, but proved a heavy commercial failure. The Lonely Passion of Judith Hearne reverted to more intimate and lacerating material—Brian Moore’s novel of a genteel but alcoholic spinster (Maggie Smith) courted by an opportunist (Bob Hoskins) for the money he mistakenly thinks she has.

197
Clayton’s “family trilogy” achieves a strange osmosis of 1940s “lyrical realism” and a more “calligraphic” sensitivity, of strong material and complicated interactions between profoundly different people. The resultant tensions between a central subjectivity and “the others,” emphasise the dark, confused, painful gaps between minds. If the films border on the “absurdist” experience (Pinter adapted the Mortimer), they retain the richness of “traditional” themes and forms. Critics (and collaborators) keenly discussed shifts between Mortimer’s first person narration and the camera as third person, and the relegation of Fitzgerald’s narrator to onlooker status. Even in the lesser films, “shifting emphases” (between gloss and core in Gatsby, space and emotion in Wicked) repay re-seeing, and Clayton’s combinations of fine literary material with a troubling temperament make powerful testimony to their time and to abiding human problems.

—Raymond Durgnat

CLÉMENT, René

Films as Director:

1936 Soigne ton gauche (short)
1937 L’Arabie interdite (short)
1938 La Grande Chartreuse (short)
1939 La Bièvre, fille perdue (short)
1940 Le Triage (short)
1942 Ceux du rail (short)
1943 La Grande Pastorale (short)
1944 Chefs de demain (short)
1945 La Bataille du rail (Battle of the Rails) (+ sc)
1946 Le Père tranquille (Mr. Orchid)
1947 Les Maudits (The Damned) (+ co-adapt)
1948 Au-delà des grilles Le Mura di Malapaga (The Walls of Malapaga)
1950 Le Chateau de verre (+ co-sc)
1951 Les Jeux interdits (Forbidden Games) (+ co-sc)
1954 Monsieur Ripois (Knife of Hearts); Lovers, Happy Lovers (+ co-sc)
1956 Gervais
1958 Barrage contre le Pacifique (La Diga sul Pacifico); This Angry Age; The Sea Wall (+ co-sc)
1959 Plein soleil (Purple Noon; Lust for Evil) (+ co-sc)
1961 Che gioia vivere (Quelle joie de vivre) (+ co-sc)
1962 Le Jour et l’heure (The Day and the Hour) (+ co-sc)
1964 Les Félines (Joy House); The Love Cage (+ co-sc)
1966 Paris brûle-t-il? (Is Paris Burning?)
1969 Le Passager de la pluie (Rider on the Rain)
1971 La Course du lièvre à travers les champs (And Hope to Die)
1975 Jeune fille libre le soir (L.A. Babysitter) (+ co-sc)

Publications

By CLÉMENT: articles—

On CLÉMENT: books—

On CLÉMENT: articles—

Queval, Jean, in L’Écran Français (Paris), 16 October 1946.
Bellour, Raymond, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 11 June 1964.

Oliva, L., “René Clément idyli—a potom,” in Film a Doba (Prague), November 1983.
Lyons, Donald, “Purple Noons and Quiet Evenings,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 22, no. 3, May-June 1996.
Obituary, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), no. 462, May 1996.
Obituary, in Classic Images (Muscatine), May 1996.
Obituary, in Séquences (Haute-Ville), no. 184, May/June 1996.
Austin, Guy, “Gangsters in Wonderland: René Clément’s And Hope to Die as a Reading of Lewis Carroll’s Alice stories,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), vol. 26, no. 4, October 1998.

René Clément was the most promising filmmaker to emerge in France at the end of World War II. He became the most technically adroit and interesting of the makers of “quality” films during the 1950s, only to see his career begin to disappoint the critics. In the years of the New Wave it was Clément, above all, who tied the older generation to the younger, especially through a film like Purple Noon. In a more recent phase he was associated with grand-scale dramas (Is Paris Burning?) and with small, personal, lyric films (Rider on the Rain). Clément began his career auspiciously, helping Cocteau with Beauty and the Beast and directing France’s only great resistance epic, The Walls of Malapaga. Clément recovered his audience. This film, which won the Academy Award for best foreign film, was in fact a Franco-Italian co-production and brought together on the screen the most popular star of each country: Jean Gabin and Isa Miranda. The plot and style returned Clément to the poetic-realist films of pre-war France and continued to exhibit that tension of realism and abstraction that characterized all his work.

Unquestionably he was, along with Claude Autant-Lara, the most important figure in the French film industry during the 1950s. His Forbidden Games remains a classic today and is notable both for the ingenuous performances of his child actors against a natural location and for the moral incisiveness of its witty plot and dialogue, scripted by the team of Aurenche and Bost. Doubtless because he had begun working with these writers, Truffaut condemned Clément in his notorious 1954 essay, “A Certain Tendency in French Cinema,” but Bazin, commenting on this essay, found Truffaut to have been too harsh in Clément’s case. Indeed Bazin lobbied to have the Cannes Film Festival award its Golden Palm to Clément’s next feature, Monsieur Riposte. Starring Gérard Philipe, this film makes extensive use of subjective camera and voice over. Shot on location in London, it is clearly an experimental project.

But Clément’s experiments are always limited. Technical problems continue to interest him, but he has never relinquished his belief that a film must be well-crafted in the traditional sense of that term. This is what must always distinguish him from the New Wave filmmakers with whom he otherwise has something in common. His all-knowing pessimism, and his literary good taste, finally put him in the camp of the “quality” directors. Clément, then, must be thought of as consummately French. His technical mastery sits well with his advanced political and moral ideas. He is cultured and trained. He makes excellent films both on a grand scale and on a smaller, more personal one. But finally there is something impersonal about even these small films, for, before representing himself, René Clément represents the institution of filmmaking in France. He is a good representative, perhaps the best it had after the war right up through the New Wave.

—Dudley Andrew

CLOZOT, Henri-Georges

Films as Director:

1931 La Terreur des Batignolles (short)
1942 L’Assassin habite au vingt-et-un (+ co-sc)
1943 Le Corbeau (+ co-sc)
1947 Quai des Orfèvres (+ co-sc)
1948 Manon (+ co-sc)
1949 “Le Retour de Jean” in Retour à la vie (+ co-sc); Miquette et sa mère (+ co-sc)
1952 Le Salaire de la peur (+ sc)
1954 Les Diaboliques (+ co-sc)
1955  Les Espions (+ co-sc)
1956  Le Mystère Picasso
1960  La Vérité (+ sc)
1968  La Prisonnière (+ sc)

Other Films:
1931  Ma Cousine de Varsovie (Gallone) (co-sc); Un Soir de Rafle (Gallone) (adaptation); Je serai seule après minuit (de Baroncelli) (co-sc): Le Chanteur inconnu (Tourjansky) (co-adapt)
1932  Le Roi des palaces (Gallone) (co-sc); Le Dernier Choc (de Baroncelli) (co-sc); La Chanson d’une nuit (French language version of Anatole Litvak’s Das Lied einer Nacht) (co-adapt, dialogue); Faut-il les marier? (French version of Carl Lamac’s Die grausame Freundin, co-d with Pierre Billon) (adapt, dialogue)
1933  Caprice de princesse (French version of Karl Hartl’s Ihre Durchlacht, die Verkäuferin) (adapt, assoc d, ed, sc); Chateau de rêve (French version of Geza von Bolvary’s Das Schloss im Süden) (sc, adapt, assoc d, ed); Tout pour l’amour (French version of Joe May’s Ein Lied für dich) (sc, adapt, co-dialogue, lyrics, assoc d)
1934  Itto d’Afrique (Benoit-Lévy) (lyrics)
1938  Le Révolté (Mathot) (co-sc, lyrics, dialogue)
1939  Le Duel (Fresnay) (co-sc, lyrics, dialogue); Le Monde tremblera (Le Révolté des vivants) (Pottier) (co-sc, lyrics, dialogue)
1941  Le Dernier des six (Lacombe) (lyrics, dialogue); Les Inconnus dans la maison (Decoin) (co-adapt, lyrics, dialogue)
1955  Si tous les gars du monde . . . (Christian-Jaque) (co-adapt)

Publications

By CLOUZOT: books—

Retour à la vie, with others, Paris, 1949.

By CLOUZOT: articles—

On CLOUZOT: books—

On CLOUZOT: articles—

Tennant, Sylvia, “Henri-Georges Clouzot,’’ in Film (London), March/April 1956.
Yakir, Dan, “Clouzot: The Wages of Film,’’ in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1981.

*  *  *
In a country like France where good taste is so admired, Henri-Georges Clouzot has been a shocking director. A film critic during the age of surrealism, Clouzot was always eager to assault his audience with his style and concerns.

Like so many others, Clouzot found his chance to move from scriptwriting to directing during the Occupation, a time when there was a paucity of directors in France. His first effort, L’Assassin habite au 21, was a safe film. Its script followed two similar films he had written which had been well received by audiences. These witty police dramas were exercises in style and cleverness, befitting the epoch. Le Corbeau, made the next year, was in contrast a shattering film, unquestionably hitting hard at the society of the war years. Retaining all the conventions of the thriller, Clouzot systematically exposed the physical and psychological grotesqueries of every character in the film. A grim picture of small-town mores, Le Corbeau was condemned by the Nazis and French patriots alike.

When the war ended Clouzot found himself barred from the industry for two years by the ‘‘purification committee,’’ an industry-appointed watchdog group that self-righteously judged complicity with the Germans. Clouzot’s crime was to have made films for a German-financed company, though he was officially arraigned on charges of having maligned the French character and having demoralized the country during its dark hours. But even at this time many critics claimed that Le Corbeau was the only authentically engaged film made during the entire Occupation.

When he did resume his career, Clouzot’s grim view of life had not improved. Both Quai des Orfèvres and his 1948 adaptation of Manon emulated American film noir with their lowlife settings. Both are extremely well acted, but ultimately small works. Clouzot’s fame in the United States came in the mid-1950s when The Wages of Fear and Diabolique gave him a reputation as a French Hitchcock, interested in the mechanics of suspense. In France, however, these films, especially Diabolique, were seen as only well-made studio products. His 1960 La Vérité, starring Brigitte Bardot, was designed to win him favor in the youth culture of the time, which was obsessed by New Wave life and movies. While the film outgrossed its New Wave competition, its cloyingly paternalistic style showed how far Clouzot was from the spontaneity of the New Wave. The café scenes in the film are insincere, and the inevitable indictment of society rings false.

All of Clouzot’s films, even up to the 1968 La Prisonnière, were financial successes, but in the end he ceased being the instrumental force in the film industry he had been twenty years earlier.

—Dudley Andrew

COCTEAU, Jean

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1925</td>
<td>Jean Cocteau fait du cinéma (+ sc) (neg lost?)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1930</td>
<td>Le Sang d’un poète (originally La Vie d’un poète) (+ ed, sc, voice-over)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1946</td>
<td>La Belle et la bête (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1947</td>
<td>L’Aigle à deux têtes (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1948</td>
<td>Les Parent terribles (+ sc, voice-over)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>Orphée (+ sc); Coriolan (+ sc, role); a 1914 ‘‘dramatic scene’’ by Cocteau included in Ce siècle a cinquante ans (Tual) (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1952</td>
<td>La Villa Santo-Sospir (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>Le Testament d’Orphée (Ne me demandez pas pourquoi) (+ sc, role as le poète)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1940</td>
<td>La Comedie du bonheur (L’Herbier) (co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1942</td>
<td>Le Baron fantôme (de Poligny) (sc, role as Le Baron)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1943</td>
<td>L’Éternel Retour (Delannoy) (sc); La Malibran (Guity) (narration + role as Alfred de Musset)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1945</td>
<td>Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne (Bresson) (co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1946</td>
<td>L’Amitie noire (Villiers and Krull) (role and narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1947</td>
<td>Ruy Blas (Billon) (sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1948</td>
<td>La Voix humaine (Rossellini, from Cocteau’s play); Les Noces de sable (Zvoboda) (sc, voice-over); La Légende de Sainte Ursule (Emmer) (role and narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1949</td>
<td>Tennis (Martin) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>Les Enfants terribles (Melville) (sc); Colette (Bellon) (role + narration); Venise et ses amants (Emmer and Gras) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1951</td>
<td>Desordre (Baratier) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1952</td>
<td>La Couronne noire (Saslavski) (co-sc); 8 x 8 (Richter) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>Le Rouge est mis (Barrère and Knapp) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>A l’aube d’un monde (Lucot) (role + narration); Pantomimes (Lucot) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>Le Bel indifferant (Demy, from Cocteau’s play)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Django Reinhardt (Paviot) (role + narration); Le Musée Grevin (Demy and Masson) (role + narration)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>Charlotte et son Jules (Goddard, from same play as Demy 1957 film)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>La Princesse de Cleves (Delannoy) (co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Anna la bonne (Jutra, from song by Cocteau)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>Thomas l’imposteur (Franju) (co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>La Voix humaine (Delouche, from Poulenc and Cocteau opera)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By COCTEAU: books—

Diary of a Film [La Belle et la bête], New York, 1950.

Cocteau on the Film, New York, 1954.

Jean Cocteau

Le Sang d’un poète, with drawings, Monaco, 1957.
Cocteau on the Film, New York, 1972.
Le Testament d’Orphée: Le Sang d’un poète, Monaco, 1983.

By COCTEAU: articles—

Interview with Francis Koval, in Sight and Sound (London), August 1950.
“Cocteau,” in Film (London), March 1955.
Interview in Film Makers on Filmmaking, edited by Harry Geduld, Bloomington, Indiana, 1967.

On COCTEAU: books—

On COCTEAU: articles—

Oxenhandler, Neal, “On Cocteau,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1964.

* * *

Jean Cocteau’s contribution to cinema is as eclectic as one would expect from a man who fulfilled on occasion the roles of poet and novelist, dramatist and graphic artist, and dabbled in such diverse media as ballet and sculpture. In addition to his directorial efforts, Cocteau also wrote scripts and dialogue, made acting appearances, and realized amateur films. His work in other media has inspired adaptations by a number of filmmakers ranging from Rossellini to Franju and Demy, and he himself published several collections of eclectic and stimulating thoughts on the film medium.

Though Cocteau took his first real steps as a filmmaker at the very beginning of the sound era, his period of greatest involvement was in the 1940s, when he contributed to the scripts of a half-dozen films, at times dominating his director (as in L’Eternel Retour), at other times submitting to the discipline of contributing to another’s vision (as in his dialogue for Bresson’s Les Dames du Bois de Boulogne). In addition, he directed his own adaptations of such diverse works as the fairy tale La Belle et la bête, his own period melodrama L’Aigle à deux têtes, and his intense domestic drama, Les Parents terribles. But Cocteau’s essential work in cinema is contained in just three wholly original films in which he explores his personal myth of the poet as Orpheus: Le Sang d’un poète, Orphée, and Le Testament d’Orphée. Though made over a period of thirty years, these three works have a remarkable unity of inspiration. They are works of fiction in a double sense. They convey Cocteau’s fascination with poetry and his own creative processes, and at the same time display his openness to the all the ways of fascinating an audience, utilizing stars and trickery, found material and sheer fantasy. The tone is characterized by a unique mixture of reality and dream, and his definition of Le Sang d’un poète as “a realistic documentary of unreal events” is a suitable description of all his finest work.

Crucial to the lasting quality of Cocteau’s work, which at times seems so light and fragile, is the combination of artistic seriousness and persistent, but unemphatic, self-mockery. For this reason his enclosed universe, with its curiously idyllic preoccupation with death, is never oppressive or constricting; instead, it allows the spectator a freedom rare in mainstream cinema of the 1930s and 1940s. In technical terms Cocteau displays a similar ability to cope with the contributions of totally professional collaborators, while still retaining a disarming air of ingenuity, which has sometimes been wrongly characterized as amateurism.

Revised by the Surrealists as a literary poseur in the 1920s and 1930s and distrusted as an amateur in the 1940s, Cocteau nonetheless produced films of lasting quality. In retrospect he is to be admired for the freedom with which he expressed a wholly personal vision and for his indifference to the given rules of a certain period of French “quality” filmmaking. He was one of the few French filmmakers of the past to whom the directors of the New Wave could turn for inspiration, and it is totally fitting that Cocteau’s farewell to cinema, Le Testament d’Orphée, should have been produced by one of the most talented of these newcomers, François Truffaut.

—Roy Armes
COEN, Joel

Career: Worked as an assistant film editor on Fear No Evil and Evil Dead; collaborated on screenplays with brother Ethan Coen (b. 1958); with Ethan produced first film, Blood Simple, 1984. Awards: Grand Jury Prize, U.S. Film Festival, for Blood Simple, 1984; Best Director Award, Cannes Film Festival, for Barton Fink, 1991.

Address: c/o UTA, 9560 Wilshire Blvd., Suite 500, Beverly Hills, California 90212, U.S.A.

FILMS AS DIRECTOR AND CO-SHRTWRITER:

(All co-written and produced by brother, Ethan Coen)

1984 Blood Simple
1987 Raising Arizona
1990 Miller’s Crossing
1991 Barton Fink
1994 The Hudsucker Proxy
1996 Fargo
1998 The Big Lebowski
2000 To the White Sea

Publications

By COEN: articles—

‘‘Bloodlines,’’ an interview with Hal Hinson, in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1985.

Interview, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), July 1994.
Interview, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 38, no. 5(266), 1996.
‘‘Back to Basics,’’ an interview with P. Zimmerman, in Film Threat (Beverly Hills), April 1996.
‘‘Hell Freezes Over,’’ an interview with Lizzie Francke, in Sight and Sound (London), May 1996.
Interview, in Positif (Paris), May 1998.

On COEN: books—

Korte, Peter, and Georg Seesslen, Joel and Ethan Coen, Boston, 1995.
Mottram, James, Coen Brothers, New York, 2000.

On COEN: articles—

Seidenberg, Robert, “Miller’s Crossing: John Turturro Meets the Coen Brothers,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1990.
Ferguson, K., “From Two Directions,” in Film Monthly, February 1992.
Lally, K., “Up North with the Coen Brothers,” in Film Journal (New York), February 1996.
Budreau, Emmanuel, and Nicolas Saada, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), September 1996.

* * *

Although Joel Coen had worked as an assistant film editor on commercial projects and had made valuable contacts within the industry (particularly director Sam Raimi), he and brother Ethan decided to produce their first feature film independently, raising $750,000 to shoot their jointly written script for Blood Simple, a neo-noir thriller with a Dashiell Hammett title and a script full of homages to Jim Thompson. Though Joel received screen credit for direction and Ethan for the script, this distinction is somewhat artificial both here and in their subsequent productions. Joel and Ethan co-write their scripts and meticulously prepare storyboards in a collaborative effort unusual for the American cinema (the closest analogy perhaps comes from abroad with the British team of Powell and Pressburger). Blood Simple was hardly the first film the brothers Coen made together. Addicted to TV and movies at an early age, they spent a good deal of their childhood writing films and then shooting them on a Super-8 camera. Movie brats in the Spielberg tradition, Ethan and Joel desired commercial success but were determined to retain control over what they produced. Hence their initial decision to make an independent film rather than continue working in an industry where Joel was already beginning to be established.
A hit with many on the art film/independent circuit but also a commercial success in art house and cable release, Blood Simple was the perfect choice to achieve this aim. Here was a film that succeeded because of its individual, even quirky vision. Using the film noir conventions popular with American audiences for half a century, the Coens offer a clear narrative, solidly two-dimensional characters, and the requisite amount of riveting violent spectacle (including one scene that pictures a dying man buried alive and another featuring close-ups of a white-gloved hand suddenly impaled by a knife). Blood Simple, however, is by no means an ordinary thriller. The plot turns expertly and unexpectedly on a number of dramatic ironies (no character knows what the spectator does, and even the spectator is sometimes taken by surprise). Unlike hardboiled narrative à la Raymond Chandler, the narrative delights in its Aristotelian neatness, in its depiction of experiences that make perfect sense, climaxing in a poetic justice that the main character and narrator, a venal private detective, finds humorous even as it destroys him. Thematically, the Coens offer a compelling analysis of mauvaise foi in the Sartrean vein as they develop characters doomed by bad intentions or a failure to trust and communicate (an existentialist theme that results perhaps from the fact that Ethan majored in philosophy at Princeton). Blood Simple’s most notable feature, however, is an expressive stylization of both sound and image that creates an experiential correlative for the viewer of the characters’ confusion and disorientation. These effects are achieved by a Wellesian repertoire of tricks (wide-angle lenses, tracking set-ups, unusual framings, an artfully selected score of popular music, etc.). The film noir genre naturalizes this stylization to some degree, but Blood Simple exudes a riotous self-consciousness, a delight in the creation of an exciting cinema that offers moments of pure visceral or visual pleasure.

Though some critics thought Blood Simple a kind of pointless film-school exercise, audiences were impressed—as were the major studios who competed for releasing rights to the brothers’ next project. The Coens’ subsequent five films have all been made with substantial commercial backing; but these films continue to be independent in the sense that none fits into the routine categories of contemporary Hollywood production. In fact, the art cinema tradition of the seventies has been kept alive by the Coens and the few other mavericks (e.g., Quentin Tarantino) who have emerged to prominence. The least successful of these films—Miller’s Crossing—is the most traditional. A “realistic” drama (though the scenes of violence are highly stylized) with a well-developed plot line, this saga of Prohibition-era mobsters, like Scorsese’s Goodfellas (released the year before), aims to debunk the romantic tradition of the gangster film most tellingly exemplified by The Godfather (1972). The central character, a “good guy” high up in the organization, confusingly seems more a victim of his poor circumstances than a force to be reckoned with. The plot is otherwise dependent upon unbelievable characters and unlikely twists and turns. Some elements of parody are present, but are not well integrated into the film’s structure, indicating that the Coens were uncertain about how to proceed, whether to make a gangster film or send up the conventions of the genre.

The other films share a different representational regime, a magical realism that does not demand verisimilitude or logical closure, but has the virtue—for the Coens—of permitting more stylization, more moments of pure cinema. Raising Arizona and The Hudsucker Proxy offer postmodern versions of the traditional Hollywood madcap comedy; in both films, a series of zany adventures climax in romantic happiness for the male and female leads. Raising Arizona concerns the ultimately unsuccessful attempt of a zany and childless couple to kidnap a baby; The Hudsucker Proxy sends up, in mock Capra-corn style, the triumph of the virtuous, if obfuscatory, hero over the evil system that attempts to use him for its own purposes. Barton Fink, in contrast, is a darker story, heavily indebted to German Expressionism (an influence to be noted as well in the elaborately artificial sets and unnaturalistic acting of The Hudsucker Proxy). The film’s main character is a thirties stereotype, a left-wing Jewish playwright committed to representing the miseries of what he calls “the common man.” Hired away from Broadway by a Hollywood studio, he embarks unwittingly on a penitential journey that lays bare the forces of the id both in the apparently common man he meets (a salesman who is actually a serial killer) and in himself (abandoning his writing responsibility, he finds himself at film’s end at the beach with the beautiful woman whose picture he first saw in a calendar).

All three of these films abound in bravura stylizations. A man dives out a skyscraper window and the camera traces the stages of his fall (Hudsucker); a baby’s meanderings across the floor are captured by a camera literally at floor level (an elaborate mirror shot in Arizona); wallpaper peels off a hotel room wall revealing something warm and gooey like human flesh underneath (Barton Fink); exaggerated sounds—a mosquito’s flight, a noisy bed, a whirling fan—perfectly express the main character’s self-absorption and anxiety (Barton Fink again). With Fargo, their 1996 release, the Coen brothers return to the crime drama. Set primarily in Minnesota, the film follows an immensely likable and very pregnant sheriff (played by Frances McDormand, Joel Coen’s wife) as she pursues a couple of dimwitted and cold-blooded kidnappers. A macabre thriller veined with moments of comedy, Fargo features the Coen brothers’ trademark cinematic flair (though the landscape mutes this somewhat) and intelligent narrative focus.

The Coens appear to have abandoned for good the stylized realism and Aristotelian narrative that made Blood Simple such a success. But in an era that has witnessed the commercial success of cartoonish anti-realism (Dick Tracy, the Batman films), their concern with striking visual and aural effects may provide the basis for a long career, though difficult films like Barton Fink, despite critical acclaim, will never gain a wide audience.

—R. Barton Palmer

---

COOLIDGE, Martha

Nationality: American. Born: New Haven, Connecticut, 17 August 1946. Education: Studied animation at the Rhode Island School of Design; studied filmmaking at New York University’s School of Film and Television, where she earned an MFA; also studied film at the School of Visual Arts and Columbia University. Career: Acted with Blackfriars, a Cheshire, Connecticut, acting company, 1960s; began making short films while studying at the Rhode Island School of Design, worked behind the camera on commercials and documentary shorts, and produced a children’s program for Canadian television, mid-to-late 1960s; directed first documentary, David: Off and On, 1972; directed an episode of the TV series Winners, 1978; hired by Francis Coppola’s Zoetrope Studio to develop the film Photoplays, which never was produced, 1978; directed first feature, City Girl, which was not released for two years, 1982; directed episodes of the TV series The Twilight Zone, 1985–1987; directed episodes of the TV series Sledge Hammer, 1986. Awards: Best Director Independent Spirit Award, for Rambling Rose, 1991; Women in Film Crystal Award, 1992; Directors Guild of America Robert B. Aldrich Achievement Award, 1998. Address: 2129 Coldwater Canyon, Beverly Hills, CA 90212, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

- 1972 David: Off and On (doc) (+ pr, ed)
- 1974 More than a School (doc) (+ ed); Old-Fashioned Woman (doc) (+ pr, ed)
- 1975 Not a Pretty Picture (doc) (+ sc, pr, co-ed)
- 1976 Employment Discrimination: The Troubleshooters (doc)
- 1978 Bimbo (doc) (+ pr, ed)
- 1980 Strawberries and Gold (for TV)
- 1983 Valley Girl (Bad Boys, Rebel Dreams)
- 1984 City Girl (+ pr) (completed in 1982); Joy of Sex
- 1985 Real Genius
- 1988 Plain Clothes (for TV); Roughhouse
- 1989 Trenchcoat in Paradise (for TV)
- 1990 The Friendly; Rope Dancing
- 1991 Bare Essentials (for TV); Rambling Rose
- 1992 Crazy in Love (for TV)
- 1993 Lost in Yonkers
- 1994 Angie
- 1995 Three Wishes
- 1997 Out to Sea
- 1999 Introducing Dorothy Dandridge (for TV)
- 2000 If These Walls Could Talk 2 (co-d) (for TV)

Other Films:

- 1971 Passing Quietly Through (pr, ed)
- 1979 The London Connection (The Omega Connection) (Clouse) co-story)
- 1989 That’s Adequate (Hurwitz) (ro as Herself)
- 1993 In Search of Oz (for TV) (doc) (ro as Interviewee)
- 1994 Beverly Hills Cop III (Landis) (ro as Security Woman)
- 2000 Rip Girls (Chopra) (exec-pr)
Publications

By COOLIDGE: articles—

Interview with Chris Chase, in New York Times, 6 May 1983.
Interview with Claire-France Perez, in L.A. Woman (Los Angeles), August 1985.
“Dialogue on Film: Martha Coolidge,” in American Film (Los Angeles), December 1988.

On COOLIDGE: articles—

* * *

Martha Coolidge began her career as one of the high-profile women filmmakers whose initial credits parallel the rise of post-1960s feminism. Through the 1970s she worked exclusively within the independent sector, directing a series of savvy feminist/humanist documentaries that explore political and social issues. Perhaps her best-known film from the period is Not a Pretty Picture, an uncompromising, autobiographical portrait of a woman filmmaker directing a narrative re-staging of her own rape.

In 1983, Coolidge “went Hollywood” and directed Valley Girl, a mainstream comedy as well as her first fiction feature to earn theatrical distribution. (The independently-produced City Girl was made a year earlier, but released a year later.) On one level, it is a mark of social progress that, in the intervening years, Coolidge has been able to forge a mainstream commercial career; had she been a generation older, her gender would have excluded her from entering the ranks of studio directors. Yet conversely, after perusing her filmography, one might dismiss her as a careerist who sold out her artistic independence, with her early credits merely serving as her Tinseltown calling card. For after all, Coolidge is no Woody Allen, Martin Scorsese, John Sayles, or Spike Lee: independent-minded filmmakers who, throughout their careers, have cannily used the system as a means to produce their own distinctive projects.

It would be unjust to imply, however, that all filmmakers working within the confines of Hollywood are sell-outs. So with regard to Coolidge, more meaningful questions arise: Has she become merely a cookie cutter commercial director, content to bask in the spotlight as a Hollywood player? Or has she been able to successfully operate within the commercial constraints of the industry, directing films that are viable at the box office—and, thus, insuring that she will continue working—while maintaining a semblance of the intelligence, commitment, and political sensibility that characterizes her early films?

What can be said for Coolidge is that quite a few of her mainstream features are non-exploitive, and spotlight the trials of female characters. Yet despite their noble intentions, too many have been commercial throwaways or failed efforts. Valley Girl, a teen comedy, may be admired for transcending the limitations of its genre, and Real Genius may be lauded for its depiction of college students who are not all-consuming by sex. Yet both are disposable, forgettable satires. Lost in Yonkers, based on a Neil Simon play and Coolidge’s highest-pedigreed film, is a slightly-better-than-average adaptation. Three Wishes is a slow-moving 1950s reminiscence, while Joy of Sex is an insipid farce about a high school virgin and how she reacts when she thinks she is dying. Introducing Dorothy Dandridge, produced for television, is a by-the-numbers biography of the tragic African-American actress. Despite its star power—it features Jack Lemmon and Walter Matthau—Out to Sea is a dopy comedy. Easily the apex of Coolidge’s Hollywood career is Angie, charting the plight of the independent-minded title character, a working-class Brooklynite who is being pressured to marry and, instead, decides to have a baby out of wedlock.

Unsurprisingly, Coolidge’s very best features—those that offer genuine insight along with entertainment value—are independent productions. Given her cinematic origins, City Girl is a logical starting point for her narrative career: a penetrating (albeit little-seen) portrait of an ambitious young photographer and her assorted, unsatisfactory involvements with men. By far, Coolidge’s very best film is Rambling Rose. Based on an autobiographical novel by Calder Willingham, Rambling Rose offers a compassionate portrait of the title character, a troubled, orphaned 19-year-old. Rose is a vulnerable young woman who confuses sex with affection, and the scenario records the impact she has on the family with whom she comes to live—and, in particular, on a sensitive young teen-aged boy.

Angie and Rambling Rose aside, one hopes that the banal Out to Sea and the disappointing Introducing Dorothy Dandridge, her final two credits of the 1990s, do not represent the creative maturation of Martha Coolidge.

—Rob Edelman

COPPOLA, Francis Ford

Nationality: American. Born: Detroit, Michigan, 7 April 1939. Education: Hofstra University, B.A., 1959; University of California, Los Angeles, M.F.A. in cinema, 1967. Family: Married Eleanor Neil, 1963; children: Sophia, Giancarlo (died, 1987), Roman. Career: Worked in various capacities for Roger Corman at American International, 1962–64; director for Seven Arts, 1964–68; founder, American Zoetrope production organization, San Francisco, 1969; director for American Conservatory Theatre and San Francisco Opera Company, 1971–72; founder, with Peter Bogdanovich and William Friedkin, Directors Company, 1972; publisher, City magazine, 1975–76; opened Zoetrope Studios, San Francisco, 1980. Awards: Oscar for Best Screenplay (with Edmund H. North), for Patton, 1970; Oscar for Best Screenplay (with Mario Puzo), and Best Director Award, Directors Guild of America, for The Godfather, 1973; Palme d’or, Cannes Festival, for The Conversation, 1974; Oscars for Best Director and Best Screenplay (with Puzo) for The Godfather II, 1975; Palme d’or and FIPRESCI Prize, Cannes Festival, 1979, for Apocalypse Now, 1979. Address: Zoetrope Studios, 916 Kearny Street, San Francisco, CA 94133, U.S.A.
Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1962 The Playgirls and the Bellboy (co-d, co-sc); Tonight for Sure (+ pr);
1963 The Terror (Lady of the Shadows) (co-d, + assoc pr); Dementia 13 (The Haunted and the Hunted) (co-sc)
1966 You’re a Big Boy Now
1968 Finian’s Rainbow (d only)
1969 The Rain People
1972 The Godfather (co-sc)
1974 The Conversation (+ pr); The Godfather, Part II (co-sc, + co-pr)
1979 Apocalypse Now (co-sc, + pr, role, co-mus)
1981 One from the Heart (co-sc, + pr)
1983 The Outsiders (+ pr); Rumble Fish (co-sc, + pr)
1984 The Cotton Club (co-sc)
1986 Peggy Sue Got Married (+ pr)
1987 Gardens of Stone (+ pr)
1988 Tucker: The Man and His Dream (+ pr)
1989 episode in New York Stories
1991 The Godfather, Part III
1992 Bram Stoker’s Dracula (+ co-pr)
1996 Jack (+ co-pr)
1997 The Rainmaker (co-sc)

Other Films:

1962 The Premature Burial (Corman) (asst-d); Tower of London (dialogue d); The Magic Voyage of Sinbad (adaptor)
1963 The Young Racers (Corman) (sound, 2nd unit ph—uncredited); Battle beyond the Sun (Corman) (sc)
1966 This Property Is Condemned (Pollack) (co-sc); Is Paris Burning? (Paris brûle-t-il?) (Clément) (co-sc)
1967 Reflections in a Golden Eye (Huston) (sc)
1970 Patton (Schaffner) (co-sc)
1971 THX 1138 (Lucas) (exec pr)
1973 American Graffiti (Lucas) (exec pr)
1974 The Great Gatsby (Clayton) (sc)
1979 The Black Stallion (Ballard) (exec pr)
1982 Hummett (Wenders) (exec pr); The Escape Artist (Deschanel) (exec pr)
1983 The Black Stallion Returns (Dalva) (exec pr)
1985 Mishima: A Life in Four Chapters (Schrader) (exec pr)
1987 Tough Guys Don’t Dance (Mailer) (exec pr)
1992 Wind (exec pr)
1993 The Secret Garden (exec pr)
1994 Mary Shelley’s Frankenstein (co-pr)
1995 My Family, Mi Familia (exec pr); Haunted (exec pr); Don Juan DeMarco (pt)
1996 Dark Angel (exec pr)
1997 The Odyssey (series for TV) (exec pr); Buddy (exec pr)
1998 Lanai-Lou (pt); Outrage (exec pr); Moby Dick (for TV) (exec pr); First Wave (series for TV) (exec pr)
1999 The Florentine (pt); The Virgin Suicides (pt); The Third Miracle (exec pr); Goosed (exec pr); Sleepy Hollow (exec pr)

Publications

By COPPOLA: book—

By COPPOLA: articles—

“‘The Dangerous Age,’” an interview with John Cutts, in Films and Filming (London), May 1969.

Interview with Marjorie Rosen, in Film Comment (New York), August 1974.

“‘Ten Years of a Dreamer,’” interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Stills (London), September-October 1983.

“‘Idols of the King,’” an interview with D. Thomson and L. Gray, in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1983.

Interview with P. Biskind, in Premiere (Boulder), September 1996.

On COPPOLA: books—

On COPPOLA: articles—

Pearce, Christopher, “San Francisco’s Own American Zoetrope,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), October 1972.

Greene, N., “Coppola, Cinemo: The Oper!atics of History,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Winter 1984/85.

Braudy, Leo, “The Sacraments of Genre: Coppola, De Palma, Scorsese,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Spring 1986.

Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring-Summer 1987.

Cahir, Linda, “Narratological Parallels in Conrad’s Heart of Darkness and Coppola’s Apocalypse Now,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1992.

Greiff, Louis, “Conrad’s Ethics and Margins of Apocalypse Now,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1992.

Whalen, Tom, “Romancing Film: Images of Dracula,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1995.

24 Images (Montreal), no. 81, Spring 1996.

On COPPOLA: film—

* * *

Francis Ford Coppola became the first major American film director to emerge from a university degree program in filmmaking. He received his Master of Cinema degree from UCLA in 1968, after submitting his first film of consequence, You’re a Big Boy Now (1967), a free-wheeling comedy about a young man on the brink of manhood, to the university as his master’s thesis.

The Rain People* (1969), based on an original scenario of his own, followed in due course. The plot of this tragic drama concerns a depressed housewife who impulsively decides to walk out on her family one rainy morning to make a cross-country trek in her station wagon, in the hope of getting some perspective on her life. For the first time Coppola’s overriding theme, which centers on the importance of the role of a family spirit in people’s lives, is clearly delineated in one of his films.

Coppola’s preoccupation with the importance of family in modern society is brought into relief in his Godfather films, which depict an American family over a period of more than seventy years. Indeed, the thing that most attracted him to the project in the first place was the fact that the best-selling book on which the films are based is really the story of a family. It is about “this father and his sons,” he says, “and questions of power and succession.” In essence, The Godfather (1972) offers a chilling depiction of the way in which young Michael Corleone’s loyalty to his flesh-and-blood family gradually turns into an allegiance to the larger Mafia family to which they in turn belong—a devotion that in the end renders him a cruel and ruthless mass murderer. With this film Coppola definitely hit his stride as a filmmaker, and the picture was an enormous critical and popular success.

The Godfather II (1974) treats events that happened before and after the action covered in the first film. The second Godfather movie not only chronicles Michael’s subsequent career as head of the “family business,” but also presents, in flashback, the early life of his father in Sicily, as well as his rise to power in the Mafia in New York City’s Little Italy. The Godfather II, like The Godfather, was a success both with the critics and the public, and Coppola won Oscars for directing the film, co-authoring the screenplay, and co-producing the best picture of the year. In 1990 he made his third Godfather film. This trilogy of movies, taken together, represents one of the supreme achievements of the cinematic art.

In contrast to epic films like the Godfather series, The Outsiders was conceived on a smaller scale; it revolves around a gang of underprivileged teenage boys growing up in Tulsa, Oklahoma, in the 1960s. The Outsiders was a box-office hit, as was Peggy Sue Got Married, a remarkable fantasy. The title character is a woman approaching middle age who passes out at a high-school reunion and wakes up back in high school in 1960. But she brings with her on her trip down memory lane a forty-two-year-old mind, and hence views things from a more mature perspective than she possessed the first time around.

Coppola has made two films about the Vietnam War. Apocalypse Now, the first major motion picture about the war, is a king-sized epic shot on location in the Philippines; and it contains some of the most extraordinary combat footage ever filmed. But there are no such stunning battle sequences in its companion film, Gardens of Stone, since it takes place state-side, and is concerned with the homefront during the same period.

His next subject was a biographical film about Preston Tucker, a maverick automobile designer, titled Tucker: The Man and His Dream. Coppola contends that Tucker developed plans for a car that was way ahead of its time in terms of engineering; yet the auto industry at large stubbornly resisted his ideas. Unfortunately, Coppola comments, creative people do not always get a chance to exercise their creativity.

Coppola demonstrated once more that he had mastered his craft in making Bram Stoker’s Dracula. In it he created a more faithful rendering of the Stoker novel than had been the case with previous film versions of the celebrated horror tale, and the film turned out to be a huge critical and popular success. Francis Coppola is one creative person who has continued to exercise his considerable talent throughout his career. Admittedly, he has had his occasional failure, such as the off-center teen movie Rumble Fish (1983). But the majority of the films he has directed over the years have demonstrated that he is one of the most gifted directors to come across the Hollywood horizon since Stanley Kubrick.

Coppola himself observes that he looks upon the movies he has directed in the past as providing him with the sort of experience that will help him to make better films in the future. So the only thing for a filmmaker to do, he concludes, is to just keep going.

—Gene D. Phillips

CORMAN, Roger

Films as Producer and Director:

1954 Guns West
1955 Apache Woman; Day the World Ended
1956 The Oklahoma Woman; It Conquered the World; Gunslinger; Swamp Woman; The Undead
1957 She-Gods of Shark Reef (Shark Reef); Naked Paradise; Not of This Earth; Rock All Night; Attack of the Crab Monsters; Carnival Rock; Teenage Doll; Sorority Girl (The Bad One);
The Saga of the Viking Women and Their Voyage to the Waters of the Great Sea Serpent (Viking Women and the Sea Serpent; Viking Women)

1958 War of the Satellites (+ role); Machine Gun Kelly; Teenage Caveman (Out of the Darkness); I, Mobster (The Mobster); Last Woman on Earth (+ role)

1959 The Wasp Woman (+ role); A Bucket of Blood

1960 Ski Troop Attack (+ role); The Fall of the House of Usher (House of Usher); The Little Shop of Horrors (+ role); Creature from the Haunted Sea (+ role); Atlas

1961 Pit and the Pendulum; The Intruder (I Hate Your Guts)

1962 The Premature Burial; Tales of Terror, Tower of London

1963 The Raven; The Young Racers (+ role); The Haunted Palace; The Terror; X (The Man with the X-Ray Eyes)

1964 The Secret Invasion; The Masque of the Red Death; The Tomb of Ligeia

1966 The Wild Angels

1967 The St. Valentine’s Day Massacre

1969 What’s In It for Harry

1970 Student Nurses; Targets

1971 The Dunwich Horror; Queen of Blood

1972 The Final Comedown (Williams); Boxcar Bertha (Scorsese); The Big Bird Cage (Hill); The Unholy Rollers (Zimmerman); Night Call Nurses (Kaplan); Fly Me (Santiago); The Young Nurses (Kimbro); The Hot Box (Viola); Night of the Cobra Woman (Meyer)

1973 I Escaped from Devil’s Island (Meyer); The Arena (Carver); The Student Teachers (Kaplan); Tender Loving Care (Naughty Nurses) (Edmonds)

1974 Cheap (Swenson); Candy Stripe Nurses (Holleb); Cockfighter (Born to Kill) (Hillman); Big Bad Mama (Carver); Caged Heat (Demme); TNT Jackson (Santiago); Street Girls (Miller); The Woman Hunt (Romero)

1975 Capone (Carver); Death Race 2000 (BarTEL); Crazy Mama (Demme); Summer School Teachers (Peeters); Dark Town Strutters (Winrey); Cover Girl Models (Santiago)

1976 Hollywood Boulevard (Arkush and Dante); Fighting Mad (Demme); Cannonball (Carquade) (BarTEL); Jackson County Jail (Miller); Nashville Girl (New Girl in Town) (Trikonis); Moving Violation (Dubin); God Told Me To (Demon) (Cohen); Dynamite Women (The Great Texas Dynamite Chase) (Pressman); Eat My Dust! (Wilson)

1977 Black Oak Conspiracy (Kelljian); Grand Theft Auto (Howard); I Never Promised You a Rose Garden (Page); Thunder and Lightning (Allen); Andy Warhol’s Bad (Johnson); Moonshine County Express (Trikonis); Dirty Duck (Swenson); Maniac (Assault on Paradise) (Compton); A Hero Ain’t Nothin’ but a Sandwich (Nelson)

1978 Deathsport (Assuno and Arkush); Piranha (Dante); Avalanche (Allen); Outside Chance (Miller); The Bees (Zacharias)

1979 Rock ‘n’ Roll High School (Arkush); Saint Jack (Bogdanovich)

1980 Battle beyond the Stars (Colchart)

1981 Smokey Bites the Dust (Griffith); Galaxy of Terror (Clark)

1982 Forbidden World (Holzman)

1983 Star Child (Cohne); Space Raiders (Howard Cohen); Suburbia (Spheeris); Warrior and the Sorceress (Bruderick)

1984 Love Letters (Jones); Deathstalker (John Watson)

1985 Barbarian Queen (Olivera); Streetwalkin’ (Freeman)

1986 Cocaine Wars (Olivera); Big Bad Mama II (Wynorski)

1987 Munchies (Hirsch); Stripped to Kill (Ruben); The Lawless Land (Hess); Amazons (Sessa); Slumber Party Massacre (Amy Jones); Hour of the Assassin (Llosa); Sweet Revenge (Sobel)

1988 The Drifter (Brand); Daddy’s Boys (Minion); Half Life (Ruben); Saturday the 14th Strikes Back (Howard Cohen); Nightfall (Mayersberg); Dangerous Love (Ollstein); Watchers (Hess)

1989 Two to Tango (Olivera); Crime Zone (Llosa); Stripped to Kill (Shea Ruben); Dance of the Damned (Shea Ruben); The Terror Within (Notz); Time Trackers (Howard Cohen); Bloodfist (Winkless); Masque of the Red Death (Brando); Wizards of the Lost Kingdom II (Griffith); Heroes Stand Alone (Griffiths); Transylvania Twist (Wynorski)

1990 Overexposed (Brand); Streets (Shea Ruben); Morella (Wynorski); Cry in the Wild (Griffiths); Back to Back (Kincade); Primary Target (Henderson); Watchers II (Notz); Silk 2 (Santiago); Full Fathom Five (Franklin); Bloodfist II (Blumenthal)

1991 Terror Within II (Stevens); Hollywood Boulevard (Dante and Arkush); Rock ‘n’ Roll High School Forever (Feldman); Futurekick (Klaus)

Films as Producer or Executive Producer:

1954 Highway Dragnet (Juran) (+ co-sc); Monster from the Ocean Floor (Ording); The Fast and the Furious (Ireland and Sampson)

1955 Beast with 1,000,000 Eyes (Kramarsky)

1958 Stake out on Dope Street (Kershner); The Cry Baby (Addiss); Monster from Galaxy 27 (Kowalski); Hot Car Girl (Kowalski); Night of the Blood Beast (Kowalski); The Brain Eaters (Ve Sota); Paratroop Command (Witney); The Wild Ride (Berman)

1959 Tank Commando (Tank Commandos) (Topper); Crime and Punishment U.S.A. (Sanders); High School Big Shot (The Young Sinners) (Rapp); Attack of the Giant Leeches (Demons of the Swamp) (Kowalski); Beast from a Haunted Cave (Hellman); T-Bird Gang (The Pay-Off) (Harbinger); Battle of Blood Island (Rapp)

1961 Night Tide (Harrington); The Mermaids of Tibeton (Aquasex) (Lamb)

1962 The Magic Voyage of Sinbad (Posco) (re-edited version of Putschko’s 1952 film Sadko); Battle beyond the Sun (Colchart) (re-edited version of Kozyr and Karyukov’s 1960 film Nebo zovet/The Heavens Call)

1963 Dementia (The Haunted and the Hunted) (Coppola)

1965 The Girls on the Beach (Witney); Sky Party (Rafkin); Beach Ball (Weinrib); The Shooting (Hellman); Ride in the Whirlwind (Hellman); Blood Bath (Hill and Rothman)

1966 Queen of Blood (Harrington)

1967 Targets (Bogdanovich); Devil’s Angels (Haller)

1969 The Dunwich Horror (Haller); Naked Angels (Clark); Pit Stop (Hill); Paddy (Haller)

1970 Student Nurses (Rothman); Angels Die Hard! (Compton)

1971 Angels Hard as They Come (Viola); Women in Cages (de Leon); Private Duty Nurses (Armitage); The Big Doll House (Hill); The Velvet Vampire (Rothman)
1992 Play Murder for Me (Oliveira); Eye of the Eagle 3 (Santiago); In the Heat of Passion (Flender); Deakistalker 4 (Hill); Bloodfist 3 (Sassone); Immortal Sins (Hachuel); Berlin Conspiracy (Winkless); Field of Fire (Santiago); Dance with Death (Moore); Ultra Violet (Griffiths); Bodywaves (Pesci); Blackbelt (C.P. Moore); Sorority House Massacre 2 (Wynorski); Munchie (Wynorski); Body Chemistry 2 (Simon); Assassination Game (Winfrey); Final Embrace (Sassone); Homicidal Impulse (Tausik); Bloodfist 4 (Ziller)

1993 Firehawk (Santiago); To Sleep with a Vampire (Friedman); Stepmonster (Stanford); Dracula Rising (Gallo); Carnosaur (Simon); 800 Leagues down the Amazon (Llosa); Live by the Fist (Santiago); Dragonfire (Jacobson)

1994 Cheyenne Warrior (Griffiths); Unborn 2 (Jacobson); Watchers 3 (Stanford); In the Heat of Passion II (Cyran); Revisions in the Dark (Purdy)

1995 Carnosaur 2 (Morneau); Spy Within (Railback); Crazysitter (McDonald); Dillinger and Capone (Purdy); Twisted Love (Lottimer) (exec pr); One Night Stand (Shire) (exec pr)

1996 Vampirella (Wynorski) (exec pr); The Unspeakable (McCain) (exec pr); Subliminal Seduction (Stevens) (exec pr); Rumble in the Streets (McCormick) (exec pr); Last Exit to Earth (Shea) (exec pr); Ladykiller (Winkless); Humanoids from the Deep (Yonisi—for TV) (exec pr); House of the Damned (Levy) (exec pr); Death Game (Cheveldave—for TV); Bloodfist VIII: Trained to Kill (Jacobson) (exec pr); Black Scorpion II: Aftershock (Winfrey) (exec pr); Black Rose of Harlem (Gallo) (exec pr); Bio-Tech Warrior (McCormick) (exec pr); Alien Avengers (Spirio) (exec pr); Carnosaur 3: Primal Species (Winfrey)

1997 Urban Justice (Payne) (exec pr); * Strikeseater II* (Ernest) (exec pr); Starquest II (Galio) (exec pr); Shadow Dancer (M.P. Girard) (exec pr); The Sea Wolf (McDonald) (exec pr); Overdrive (Spio) (exec pr); Macon County Jail (Musratt) (exec pr); Haunted Sea (Golden) (exec pr); Future Fear (Baumander) (exec pr); Falling Fire (D’Or) (exec pr); Eruption (Gibby) (exec pr); Don’t Sleep Alone (Andrew) (exec pr); Detonator (Clancy) (exec pr); Criminal Affairs (Cullinan) (exec pr); Club Vampire (Ruben) (exec pr); Circuit Breaker (Musratt) (exec pr); Born Bad (Yonisi) (exec pr); Black Thunder (Jacobson); Alien Avenger 2 (Payne) (exec pr); Spacejacker (Cullinan) (exec pr)

1998 Stray Bullet (Wood) (exec pr); Running Woman (Samuels); Watchers Reborn (Buechler); A Very Unlucky Leprechaun (Kelly)

1999 The Protector (McCormick); The Phantom Eye (Gibby)—mini for TV (+ role as Dr. Gorman); The Haunting of Hell House (Marcus); Shepherd

2000 The Doorway; The Suicide Club

Other Films:

1967 A Time for Killing (The Long Ride Home) (Karlsom) (uncredited co-d); Wild Racers (Haller) (uncredited 2nd unit d)

1969 De Sade (Enfield) (uncredited co-d)

1974 The Godfather, Part II (Coppola) (role)

1980 The Howling (Dante) (role)

1983 Der Stand der Dinge (The State of Things) (Wenders) (role)

1984 Swing Shift (Demme) (role)

1991 Silence of the Lambs (Demme) (role as FBI Director Hayden Burke)

1993 Philadelphia (Demme) (role as Mr. Laird)

1995 Apollo 13 (Howard) (role as Congressman)

1997 The Second Civil War (Dante) (role as Sandy Collins)

2000 Scream 3 (Craven) (role as Studio Executive)

Publications

By CORMAN: book—

By CORMAN: articles—

Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1963.

Image et Son (Paris), March 1967.

“A Letter from Roger Corman,” in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1968.

Interview in The Film Director as Superstar, by Joseph Gelmis, New York, 1970.

Interview with Joe Medjuck, in Take One (Montreal), July-August 1970.

Interview with Charles Goldman, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.

Séquences (Montreal), October 1974.

Interview in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1988.

Interview with Mark A. Miller, in Filmfax (Evanton), July-August 1995.

Interview with Edward L. Mitchell, in Filmfax (Evanton), May-June 1996.

On CORMAN: books—

On CORMAN: articles—

Positif (Paris), March 1964.
Film (London), no. 43, 1965.
French, Philip, ‘‘Incitement against Violence’’ in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1967–68.
Action (Los Angeles), July-August 1969.
Montage (London), April 1970.
Ecran Fantastique (Paris), December 1970.
Koszarski, Richard, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.
National Film Theatre booklet (London), February 1981.
Chute, David, in Film Comment (New York), March-April 1982.
Strick, Philip, ‘‘The Return of Roger Corman,’’ in Films and Filming (London), March 1986.
Exline, P., ‘‘King of the B’s,’’ in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1987.
Dixon, W., article in Postscript (Commerce, Texas), Fall 1988.
Garsault, A., article in Positif (France), February 1990.

Solman, G., ‘‘Roger Corman,’’ in Millimeter, May 1990.
Peary, Gerald, ‘‘Roger Corman: They Call Him Cheap, Quick, and ‘America’s Greatest Independent Filmmaker,’’’ in American Film, June 1990.
Combs, R., article in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1990/91.
Pede, R., and D. DuFour, article in Film en Televisie (Bruxelles, Belgium), May-June 1991.
Soria, G., ‘‘Comix,’’ in Film Threat (Beverly Hills), February 1996.
Biodrowski, S., ‘‘Roger Corman,’’ in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), vol. 27:36, no. 8, 1996.
Marsilius, Hans Jörg, in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 9 April 1996.
Alford, H., ‘‘The Merchant of Venice,’’ in Vanity Fair (New York), April 1996.
Scapperotti, D., ‘‘Roger Corman Presents,’’ in Cinefantastique (Forest Park), vol 27, no. 7, 1996.
Oosterom, Chris and René Wolf, in Skrien (Amsterdam), February-March 1997.

On CORMAN: film—

The Roger Corman Special (for TV), 1995.

* * *

Grand master and patron saint of the American exploitation film, Roger Corman has forged a reputation for creative filmmaking on means so minimal as to seem absurd. He began his career in the mid-1950s producing and directing Westerns, gangster movies, mythological “spectacles,” teen pictures, and sci-fi/horror films distinguished largely by their five-digit budgets and shooting schedules as short as three days. By the early 1960s his business savvy and understanding of the developing “youth” market had made him the most valuable commodity at American International Pictures, and his shrewd innovations in production and distribution contributed substantially to that company’s pre-eminence in the exploitation market.

Backhandedly dubbed by critics “the King of Schlock” and “the Orson Welles of Z-Pictures,” Corman has become a symbol of the creativity available to those willing to accept the economic limitations of working outside the mainstream. As a producer, he was able to provide decisive career breaks for a number of actors (Jack Nicholson, Ellen Burstyn, Robert De Niro, Cindy Williams), screenwriters (Robert Towne), and directors (Francis Ford Coppola, Peter Bogdanovich, Martin Scorsese, Jonathan Demme) who were to rise toward the upper echelons of the New Hollywood. Meanwhile, Corman insisted on maintaining his own kingdom on the fringes. When AIP’s growing budgets and pretenses began to tighten studio control over individual projects, Corman left and, in 1970, established his own studio, New World Pictures, which quickly usurped AIP’s place in the exploitation field. Corman did not direct at New World, but instead exerted a decisive influence as producer, cultivating the drive-in/inner-city audience by developing specialized sub-genres (women’s prison pictures; soft-core nurse/teacher films; hard-core action and horror movies) and a strict formula, requiring given amounts of violence, nudity, humor, and social commentary. The social element not only reflected Corman’s own attitudes (a self-characterized “liberal to radical” politically, he independently financed his anti-racist The Intruder when no studio would put up the money), but also an understanding of the politically disfranchised groups which comprised the New World audience. At the same time, Corman used the company to provide some of the first intelligent American marketing of foreign “art films,” accruing respectable successes with Bergman’s Cries and Whispers, Fellini’s Amarcord, Truffaut’s Adele H., and Kurosawa’s Dersu Uzala. Yet it would not be quite fair to dismiss Corman, as Andrew Sarris did in 1968, as a producer “miscast” as a director. Admittedly, at that time Corman’s most accomplished, complex, and disturbing film, Bloody Mama, was still to be made. But Corman had hit his artistic stride in the early 1960s with a series of seven flamboyantly artificial color horror films, loosely based on Poe and ranging in tone from slightly tongue-in-cheek to openly parodic. The cycle peaked with Masque of the Red Death, which made ingenious use of imagery borrowed from Bergman’s Seventh Seal, to the disbelief of American critics and the delight of the Europeans, who have always seemed willing to take Corman fairly seriously. Indeed, even in the 1950s Corman had learned to make artistic virtue of low-budget tawdriness, which contributed greatly to the existential bleakness of such tortured morality plays as the existential bleakness of such tortured morality plays as Yet, even if one is unwilling to recognize the philosophical despair of the moralist struggling against nihilism which underlies the straightforward lunacy of It Conquered the World, the visionary metaphysics of X (The Man with the X-Ray Eyes), and even the Ubiriker picture of the 1960s, The Wild Angels, Corman’s audacious independence has at least earned him the right to symbolize the myriad contradictions between artistic ambition and fiscal responsibility which seem inherent to commercial filmmaking.

Circumstances caused Corman to put his directorial career in the deep freeze in 1971. A rare foray into TV with What’s in It for Harry (1969) had resulted in a film rejected as too violent by ABC, which released the film theatrically without a Corman credit. Studio interference with his youth movement paean, Gas-s-s-s (1970), eased his break with long-term home-base AIP, but he fared even worse when United Artists slashed his pet World War I drama, Von Richthofen and Brown (1971), into unrecognizability. It was critical savagery of the latter that drove him to assume mogul status full-time by forming New World Pictures, where he served as mentor to Ron Howard, Jonathan Kaplan, John Sayles, and Joe Dante, among others.

After selling New World Pictures in 1983 and then suing the purchasers for renegotiating on a distribution agreement, Corman returned to the pre-sold production whirl with a new outfit, Concorde/New Horizons. Although Corman is still a vital, hands-on moviemaker and a godsend to untried auteurs, his current product is indistinguishable from other direct-to-video fodder. In addition to expanding into family escapism and exploitation noirs, Corman has been remaking his AIP classics for Showtime, along with some cable-TV originals like Runaway Daughters and Suspect Device, but none of these Cormanized revamps and remakes demonstrates the verve of the compact originals.

Cleverly conceived and infused with an undertow of nostalgic tristesse, Corman’s directorial comeback, Frankenstein Unbound, is truly a monster movie for the backward-glancing 1990s. Responsible for precipitating an apocalypse in the future through his unchecked experimentations, a scientist travels back to the nineteenth century, where he tries to bridle Victor Frankenstein’s excesses as mea culpa for his own God-complex.

A cinematic Victor Frankenstein, Corman goes on robbing genre graveyards to bring new life to exploitation filmmaking. While Corman is irreplaceable as a studio chief, his Frankenstein Unbound is idiosyncratic enough to raise hopes for an occasional slumming into personal expression. An unselfish artist with a healthy respect for profits, Corman genuinely gets gratification out of his hired guns’ success stories, and this shining example of vicarious creativity may be the only producer in Hollywood history who could be considered a father figure. As a cinematic icon, Corman’s cameo appearances in his protegee’s blockbusters like Godfather: Part Two, Philadelphia, and Apollo 13 reveal a soft-spoken, mysterious man with immense powers of focus; he looks like the archotypical American loner who simply gets the job done.

—Ed Lowry, updated by Robert J. Pardi

COSTA-GAVRAS, Constantin

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1966 Compartment tueurs (The Sleeping Car Murders)
1968 Un Homme de trop (Shock Troops)
Constantin Costa-Gavras

1969  Z (co-sc)
1970  L’Aveu (The Confession)
1973  Etat de siège (State of Siege) (co-sc)
1975  Section spéciale (Special Section) (co-sc)
1979  Clair de femme (Womanlight)
1982  Missing (co-sc)
1983  Hanna K (co-sc, + pr)
1985  Family Business
1988  Summer Lightning (Sundown); Betrayed (d only)
1990  Music Box (d only)
1993  La Petite Apocalypsite (The Minor Apocalypsite) (co-sc)
1995  Les kankobals, episode in A propos de Nice, la suite; Lumière et compagnie
1997  Mad City

Other Films:

1977  La Vie devant soi (Madame Rosa) (Mizrahi) (role as Ramon)
1985  Spies like Us (Landis) (role as Tazhik); Thé au harem d’Archimède (Tea in the Harem) (sc)
1996  The Stupids (Landis) (role as Gas Station Guy)
1998  Enredando sombras (as himself)

Publications

By COSTA-GAVRAS: articles—

Interview with David Austen, in Films and Filming (London), June 1970.
“A Film Is like a Match: You Can Make a Big Fire or Nothing at All,” an interview with H. Kalishman and Gary Crowdus, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 6, no. 1, 1973.
Interview with F. Guerif and S. Levy-Klein, in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring/Summer 1978.
Interview with John Pilger, in Time Out (London), 8 December 1983.
There’s Always a Point of View,” an interview with Dan Georgakas, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 16, no. 4, 1988.

Interview in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1988.

On COSTA-GAVRAS: books—

On COSTA-GAVRAS: articles—

Yakir, Dan, “Missing in Action,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1982.

* * *

The films of Constantin Costa-Gavras are exciting, enthralling, superior examples of dramatic moviemaking, but the filmmaker is far from being solely concerned with keeping the viewer in suspense.

On further review, both Betrayed and Music Box prove to be deeply flawed films. Both are set in America, and spotlight quintessentially American characters: an all-American farmer and an Costa-Gavras’s scenarios are often based on actual events in which citizens are deprived of human rights and expose the hypocrisies of governments to both the left and right of center. In Z, Greek pacifist leader Yves Montand is killed by a speeding truck, a death ruled accidental by the police. Journalist Jean-Louis Trintignant’s investigation leads to a right-wing reign of terror against witnesses and friends of the deceased, and to revelations of a government scandal. The Confession is the story of a Communist bureaucrat (Montand) who is unjustifiably tortured and coerced into giving false testimony against other guiltless comrades. State of Siege is based on the political kidnapping of a United States official in Latin America (Montand); the revolutionaries slowly discover the discreetly hidden function of this “special advisor”—to train native police in the intricacies of torture. In Special Section, a quartet of young Frenchmen are tried and condemned by an opportunistic Vichy government for the killing of a German naval officer in occupied Paris. In Missing, an idealistic young American writer (John Shea) is arrested, tortured, and killed in a fascist takeover of a Latin American country. His father, salt-of-the-earth businessman Jack Lemmon, first feels it’s all a simple misunderstanding. After he realizes that he has been manipulated and lured to by the American embassy, he applies enough pressure and embarrassing enough people so that he can finally bring home the body of his son. Despite these sobering, decidedly non-commercial storylines, Costa-Gavras has received popular as well as critical success, particularly with Z and Missing, because the filmmaker does not bore his audience by structuring his films in a manner that will appeal only to intellectuals. Instead, he casts popular actors with significant box office appeal. Apart from a collective message—that fascism and corruption may occur in any society anywhere in the world—Costa-Gavras’s films also work as mysteries and thrillers. He has realized that he must first entertain in order to bring his point of view to a wider, more diversified audience, as well as exist and even thrive within the boundaries of motion picture economics in the Western world. As Pauline Kael so aptly noted, Z is “something very unusual in European films—a political film with a purpose and, at the same time, a thoroughly commercial film.” Costa-Gavras, however, is not without controversy: State of Siege caused a furor when it was cancelled for political reasons from the opening program of the American Film Institute theater in Washington.

Not all of Costa-Gavras’s features are “political”: The Sleeping Car Murders is a well-made, atmospheric murder mystery, while Clair de femme is the dreary tale of a widower and a woman scarred by the death of her young daughter. Both of these films star Yves Montand. But while Costa-Gavras’s most characteristic works do indeed condemn governments that control other governments or suppress human rights, his concerns as a filmmaker have perhaps shifted towards the more personal. The two features made with scriptwriter Joe Eszterhaus, Betrayed and Music Box, focused on the relationship between the central female character and a man (a lover in Betrayed, a father in Music Box) who is subsequently revealed as a fascist.

A Greek exile when he made Z, set in the country of his birth, Costa-Gavras is most interested in the motivations and misuses of power: politically, he may be best described as an anti-fascist, a humanist. As such, his films are as overtly political as any above-ground, internationally popular and respected filmmaker in history.
up-by-the-bootstraps immigrant. Yet both reveal deeply prejudicial, preconceived notions about the essence of the American character. Betrayed covers a difficult, explosive topic: Racism and white supremacy in mainstream America. Gary Simmons (Tom Berenger) is a Vietnam war hero and widowed farmer who, outwardly at least, is a likable, salt-of-the-earth American. His mother is the type whose apple pies win blue ribbons at county fairs. His two kids, a boy and a girl, are fine, well-behaved youngsters. On the Fourth of July, this family joins with its neighbors for an afternoon of picnicking and an evening of fireworks.

Yet underneath this picture-perfect view of Main Street lies something warped and sinister. Through changing times and economic realities beyond their understanding and control, Gary and those like him have been losing their farms and their way of life. This powerlessness has been translated into a violent, horrific extremism. Gary—and, it is implied, thousands of others like him—has become a clandestine terrorist. He spouts the gospel that “the Jews are running the country.” He claims that blacks are not human, but rather “mud people.” In a sequence that is among the most jarring of any movie of the late 1980s, he and his cronies hunt down and kill a black man strictly for sport. Most disturbing of all, Gary’s sweet, cuddly daughter repeats what she’s learned from her father. On to the scene comes a government investigator (Debra Winger), posing as an itinerant farm laborer. Before she is certain of his true nature, she finds herself becoming involved with him sexually and romantically.

Betrayed is ultimately an outsider’s view of the American heartland and the Vietnam veteran. While Gary and his ilk objectify blacks, Jews, Asians, and gays, Costa-Gavras and screenwriter Joe Eszterhaus are equally as guilty of objectifying white midwesterners. The film would lead you to believe that every last American farmer is a closet cross-burner. And Gary Simmons, a psycho in sheep’s clothing, is yet one more superficial celluloid Vietnam veteran.

In Music Box, Armin Mueller-Stahl takes on the Berenger role: a Hungarian-immigrant father accused of horrible war crimes and thus faces deportation. Jessica Lange plays his devoted attorney daughter who defends him in a high-profile trial. Of course, the sweet old man eventually is shown to be guilty as charged. The generalization here is that all working-class immigrants hold equally sinister views, and equally clandestine pasts.

Costa-Gavras’ most recent film, La Petite Apocalypse (The Minor Apocalypse), is a decidedly minor affair, a satire of 1960s radicals, capitalist greed, the demise of communism, and an overzealous media. It premiered in New York in 1995 not on a theatrical run, but as the opening film in the Sixth Annual Human Rights Watch International Film Festival.

—Rob Edelman

---

CRAVEN, Wes

Nationality: American. Born: Wesley Earl Craven in Cleveland, Ohio, 2 August 1939. Education: Wheaton College, B.A.; John Hopkins University, M.A. Family: Married, one son, one daughter. Career: College humanities professor, left to work as a messenger in a film production house, New York City; assistant editor for Sean Cunningham, from 1970; directed first feature, Last House on the Left, 1972, for $90,000 (it made $20 million); also TV director, from 1985. Awards: Best Director Award, Madrid Festival, 1988. Agent: International Creative Management, 8899 Beverly Boulevard, Los Angeles, CA 90048, U.S.A. Address: c/o Alive Films, 8271 Melrose Avenue, Los Angeles, CA 90046, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>Last House on the Left (+ ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>The Hills Have Eyes (+ sc, ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>Stranger in Our House (Summer of Fear) (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>Deadly Blessing (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>Swamp Thing (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>The Hills Have Eyes, Part II (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>A Nightmare on Elm Street (+ sc); Invitation to Hell (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>Chiller (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>Deadly Friend (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1988</td>
<td>Serpent and the Rainbow (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Shocker (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>Night Visions (for TV) (+ co-sc, exec pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>The People under the Stairs (+ co-sc, exec pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1994</td>
<td>Wes Craven’s New Nightmare (+ co-sc, pr, role as himself)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>Vampire in Brooklyn (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>Scream (+ exec pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
1997  Scream 2 (+ exec pr)
1999  Music of the Heart
2000  Scream 3 (+ exec pr)

Other Films:

1971  Together (Sensual Paradise) (Cunningham) (asst-pr); You’ve Got to Walk It like You Talk It or You’ll Lose That Beat (Cunningham) (co-ed)
1972  It Happened in Hollywood (Cunningham) (ed)
1978  A Nightmare on Elm Street 3: Dream Warriors (co-sc, exec pr)
1987  Flowers in the Attic (co-sc)
1990  Bloodfist II (advisor)
1992  Nightmare Cafe (TV series) (creator, exec pr, sc of pilot)
1995  The Fear (role as Dr. Arnold); Wes Craven Presents Mind Ripper: Live in Horror, Die in Fear (for TV) (exec pr)
1997  Wishmaster (Kurtzman) (pr)
1998  Don’t Look Down (Shaw—for TV) (pr); Carnival of Souls (Grossman) (exec pr)
2000  Dracula 2000 (Lussier) (pr)

Publications

By CRAVEN: book—

By CRAVEN: articles—

Interview with T. Williams, in Journal of Popular Film (Washington, D.C.), Fall 1980.

Interview in Starburst (London), April 1982.

Interview with A. Martin, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), November 1988.

Williamson, Kevin, and Tod Lippy, “‘Scream / Writing Scream / Directing Scream’” (script and interview), in Scenario (Rockville, Maryland), vol. 3, no. 1, Spring 1997.

On CRAVEN: books—

On CRAVEN: articles—

Starburst (London), April and July 1985, and April 1986.

Mancini, Marc, “‘Professor Gore,’” in Film Comment, September-October 1989.

*  *  *

Of all the horror specialists who came to prominence during the 1970s, Wes Craven has had the least settled career. While Tobe Hooper and John Carpenter have had major creative slumps, George Romero and Larry Cohen have carved out their own areas of independent endeavour, and David Cronenberg and Brian De Palma have, with various levels of success, graduated to major studio projects, Craven has been bouncing between successes (The Hills Have Eyes, A Nightmare on Elm Street) and failures (Swamp Thing, Deadly Friend) with a manic energy, forced occasionally to take work on television to keep going. While his best work exhibits a canny grasp of genre and a disturbing understanding of the place of violence within society, and Elm Street—after a long and difficult gestation period—emerged as one of the most influential horror movies of the 1980s, his worst films literally floundered in the wake of his successes, frequently (as in The Hills Have Eyes, Part 2 and Shocker) resorting to self-plagiarism to tie together blatantly misconceived projects, suggesting a desperate intellect which too often tries to find a short cut.

Craven’s first movie, Last House on the Left, a hard-gore remake of Bergman’s The Virgin Spring, was an ultra-low-budget sleeper that hit the drive-ins well before The Texas Chain-Saw Massacre and served to drag the genre away from the then-tired mists of Hammer-style gothic towards the more fruitful modern fields of gritty psychosis and social unrest. As with the early films of Romero, Hooper, and Cohen, the focus of Last House is on the destructive potential of the family, as a group of homicidal maniacs torture a pair of innocent girls. and are themselves slaughtered by the martyr heroine’s “normal” parents. Filmed with a raw style and a sense of fascination and revulsion, Last House—still banned in the United Kingdom—is one of the strongest of horror pictures, and remains so tough that most audiences cannot take it, either when the maniacs are disembowelling their victims or the parents are fighting back. The Hills Have Eyes is a more expansive, more fantastically horrid re-run of the first movie, stirring in some black humour and a DC Comics-style set of inbred mutants as it replays the wagon train Western scenario out in the desert, where a vacationing family of normals clash with their degenerate mirror image. Although it tackles the same thematic territory as Last House, The Hills Have Eyes is a more approachable work and shows off Craven’s special skills with simple action, even daring to turn the heroes’ dog into a modern movie hero who relates to Rin-Tin-Tin much as Dirty Harry relates to George Dixon.

Despite these two powerful pictures, which at once demonstrated Craven’s competence as a director and his flair for the intriguingly horrific, he then fell into a career hole of botched projects, including TV work and an interesting attempt to film David Morell’s First Blood, Deadly Blessing, a hodge-podge of psychotic and demonology themes, is alarmingly inconsistent, featuring some of the best and the worst of Craven as it deals with a series of murders in a cleverly evoked Hittite community. Swamp Thing, an adaption of the DC comic, is a misconceived and childish superhero picture dragged under by ridiculous monster suits and an underdeveloped screenplay, although it has one memorably unchildish scene when Adrienne Barbeau takes a nude swim in the swamp. After this, it is easy to see how Craven could resort to making The Hills Have Eyes, Part 2, which contains an inordinate amount of flashback footage from the first film simply because the budget ran out before the movie was actually completed. Although Deadly Friend and Shocker are more expensively bad, the misconceived Hills 2 stands as Craven’s worst film to date with its use of flashbacks upon flashbacks to the original film (so as to cut costs by re-using old footage?); even the recurring character of the dog gets to have a flashback!

However, Craven then turned his career round, dashing off the unexceptional but acceptable Invitation to Hell and Chiller and several pretty good Twilight Zone segments—including “Shatterday,” a Harlan Ellison story with Bruce Willis, and the disorienting “Word Play”—before finally getting the green light on A Nightmare on Elm Street. Last House and Deadly Blessing had experimented with surreal, disorienting dream sequences—a bit of nightmare dentistry, and a spider-falling-into-mouth shock—but Elm Street is built around such moments, and features a dreamstalking bogeyman, Freddy Krueger (Robert Englund), who somehow became a cult hero through the course of four sequels—only one of which, A Nightmare on Elm Street, Part 3: Dream Warriors, did Craven have anything to do with, as a writer—and a TV series. The first Elm Street is a seamless stalk-and-scare horror movie that fully deserved its success for its clever reassembly of the elements of teenage horror established by Carpenter with Halloween and Stephen King in Carrie and Christine. However, it is a less rigorous, less satisfying movie than Craven’s best early films, reducing their ambiguous culture clash to a simple conflict between an innocent heroine (Heather Langenkamp) and an unredemable monster villain. Part of the disturbing quality of Last House and Hills comes from their occasionally sympathetic approaches to their villains, and in the way the heroes’ violent revenge is seen to degrade them to the level of the monsters; Langenkamp’s guerilla-style assault on Freddy, meanwhile, is simply a cheery demonstration of American resourcefulness.

Leaving the Elm Street sequels, which had been set up by a fairly annoying last-minute logical lapse at the end of the first film, to other hands, Craven departed the independent sector for a pair of big studio projects—the execrable Deadly Friend, a cute-robot-cum-teen-zombie movie adapted from Diana Henstell’s novel Friend, and The Serpent and the Rainbow, an interesting and seductive voodoo picture adapted from Wade Davis’s nonfiction novel. Both films carry over the dream theme from Elm Street, in the first case to beef up a badly sagging storyline, and in the second as part of a bizarre and affecting cultural travelogue that develops the old Craven’s fascination with magical and monstrous societies as opposed to individuals. However, following that experience, Craven returned to the independents, like John Carpenter before him, and produced another carbon copy of his own most successful work in Shocker, a failed attempt to come up with another franchise series that is nothing but an identikit of A Nightmare on Elm Street with more ideas than it can handle and severe lapses of script, characterisation, and tone to pull it down between its undeniably brilliant sequences (a grand guignol electro-cution, a final chase through “television land”). Craven’s entire career has been like Shocker, with moments of startling inspiration and genre craftsmanship let down by hurried scripts and just plain wrong decisions.

Craven bounced back from the erratic Shocker with The People under the Stairs. The film fuses the time-honored “wicked stepmother” concept with Craven’s familiar predilections for home-style booby-traps and nightmare sequences. The house itself is one big booby-trap, wired with explosives and rigged with electronic doors of solid steel. It is also one big, bad Nightmare on Elm Street dreamscape, seemingly designed by the same deranged architect responsible for the labyrinthine yet claustrophobic cabin in Sam Raimi’s The Evil Dead. Craven returned to Elm Street with the film-within-a-film Ves Craven’s New Nightmare. The film brought back Freddy Krueger as well as some of the cast members of the original Elm Street as themselves, now victims of the horror series, which is mysteriously being acted out in “real life.” Craven appears as himself in the film. Cynics viewed the film as a run-for-cover effort on Craven’s part to renew the Freddy Krueger franchise following the lukewarm reception of People under the Stairs. Others viewed it as the ultimate Craven statement on dream psychology. It confused many, scared few, and was not a box-office winner. Craven then abandoned horror cinema’s most famous street for equally tried and true genre territory with Vampire in Brooklyn. A mixture of comedy and splatter, it marked another attempt by former superstar Eddie Murphy to jump-start his fading career—which he [Murphy] eventually did with his remake of The Nutty Professor.

Craven’s persistent attempts to find another successful franchise finally hit paydirt with Scream, a throwback to the teenagers-in-jeopardy slasher genre of Friday the 13th and, of course, A Nightmare on Elm Street. Kevin Williamson’s script, with its solid ear for Generation X slang, cast many knowing winks at past slasher films, particularly Elm Street, in its story of a masked killer on the loose in suburbia. It spawned two blockbuster sequels, Scream 2 and Scream 3, which Craven cleverly turned into films-within-the-film a la his Wes Craven’s A New Nightmare, albeit this time successfully. In between Scream 2 and Scream 3, Craven also made the anomalous Music of the Heart, the true story of an indefatigable New York City music teacher played by Meryl Streep. He also found time to pen his first novel, Fountain Society, a conspiracy tale with futuristic elements.

—Kim Newman, updated by John McCarty
CRICHTON, Charles

Films as Director:

1944 For Those in Peril
1945 Painted Boats (The Girl on the Canal); “The Golfing Story” episode of Dead of Night
1946 Hue and Cry
1948 Against the Wind; Another Shore
1949 “The Orchestra Conductor” episode of Train of Events
1950 Dance Hall
1951 The Lavender Hill Mob; Hunted (The Stranger in Between)
1952 The Titfield Thunderbolt
1953 The Love Lottery
1954 The Divided Heart
1956 The Man in the Sky (Decision against Time)
1958 Law and Disorder; Floods of Fear (+ sc)
1959 The Battle of the Sexes
1960 The Boy Who Stole a Million (+ co-sc)

Publications

By CRICHTON: book—

By CRICHTON: article—

Interview in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1988.

Interview in Positif (Paris), February 1989.

Interview in American Film, January-February 1989.

On CRICHTON: books—

On CRICHTON: articles—

Other Films:

1932 Men of Tomorrow (Sagan) (asst ed)
1933 Cash (For Love or Money) (Z. Korda) (asst ed); The Private Life of Henry VIII (A. Korda) (asst ed); The Girl from Maxim’s (A. Korda) (asst ed)
1935 Sanders of the River (Z. Korda) (ed); Things to Come (Menzies) (co-assoc ed)
1937 Elephant Boy (Flaherty and Z. Korda) (ed); Twenty-one Days (The First and the Last; Twenty-one Days Together) (Dean) (ed)
1938 Prison without Bars (Hurst) (ed)
1940 Old Bill and Son (Dalrymple) (ed); The Thief of Bagdad (Berger, Powell, Whelan) (ed); Yellow Caesar (The Heel of Italy) (Cavalcanti) (ed)
1941 The Big Blockade (Frend) (co-ed); Guests of Honour (Pitt) (ed); Young Veteran (Cavalcanti) (ed); Find, Fix, and Strike (Bennett) (ed, assoc pr)
1942 Nine Men (Watt) (ed, assoc pr); Greek Testament (The Shrine of Victory) (Hasse) (assoc pr)

* * * *

The demise of Ealing Studios seemed to cast a blight on the careers of those who worked there. Within ten years of the final Ealing release virtually all the studio’s leading directors—Mackendrick, Hamer, Harry Watt, Charles Frend—had shot their last film; only Basil Dearden was still active. And until the late 1980s the career of Charles Crichton appeared to have followed the same dispiriting pattern. His triumphant comeback at the age of seventy-eight, with the huge international success of A Fish Called Wanda, was as heartening as it was wholly unexpected.

Wanda kicks off with a jewel heist sequence notable for the wit and precision of its editing. Like several of his Ealing colleagues, Crichton started out in the cutting room, working for Korda on Things to Come and The Thief of Bagdad, and was said to be one of the finest editors in the British film industry. (Among his uncredited achievements is the rescue of Mackendrick’s Whisky Galore, which he recut after it had been botched by its original editor.) A sense of pace and timing, the skilled editor’s stock-in-trade, distinguishes all his best work. Comedy has always been seen as Crichton’s forte. His reputation, prior to Wanda, rested on the three comedies he directed at Ealing to scripts by T. E. B. Clarke: Hue and Cry, The Lavender Hill Mob, and The Titfield Thunderbolt. If all three seem to belong more to the writer’s oeuvre than to the director’s, this may be because Crichton has always been dependent in his comedies on the quality of the script. The Lavender Hill Mob, perhaps the archetypal comedy of the Ealing mainstream, gains enormously from Crichton’s supple comic timing; but given stodgy material, as in The Love Lottery or Another Shore, his lightness of touch deserts him. Even Titfield, with Clarke writing some way below his best, feels sluggish and under-directed beside its two predecessors.

Though the serious side of Crichton’s output, the dramas and thrillers, has attracted little attention, he often seems here less at the mercy of his script, able to make something personal even of flawed material. His one non-comedy with Clarke, the Resistance drama Against the Wind, has a downbeat realism and a refusal of easy heroics that recalls Thorold Dickinson’s Next of Kin (and probably ensured its failure at the post-war box-office). Hunted, a killer-on-the-run thriller, builds up a complex tension as well as offering Dirk Bogarde a rare intelligent role amid the dross of his early career. Crichton’s cool, unemphatic handling of the central conflict in The Divided Heart deftly avoids emotional overkill—though nothing, perhaps, could have prevented the film’s final slide into sentimentousness.

After Ealing, projects attuned to his talents became increasingly rare. Given the darker aspects of his work, black comedy was clearly well within his range, and The Battle of the Sexes, with Peter Sellers as the Scots clerk trying to bump off efficiency expert Constance Cummings, would have been ideal—were it not for a script that janked the quiet implacability of the original (Thurber’s caustic tour-de-force The Catbird Seat) for cautious whimsy and a vapid happy-ending. After a couple of interestingly off-beat thrillers—The Third Secret and He Who Rides a Tiger—both marred by clumsy writing and uncertainty of tone, Crichton cut his losses and retreated into television. From there, directing corporate videos must have seemed like a further downhill step. But the company involved was John Cleese’s Video Arts, and it was Cleese’s enthusiastic backing—and his status as a bankable star—that enabled Crichton, after more than twenty years, to return to the cinema. A Fish Called Wanda, with its four ill-assorted crooks, its central portrait of respectability undermined by larcenous urges, and its running theme of internecine treachery, crosses The Lavender Hill Mob with The Ladykillers—and adds a degree of sex and violence that would certainly have alarmed Michael Balcon. But had Ealing comedy survived Balcon’s death and lived on into the late 1980s, Wanda is most likely what it would have looked like—and its bite and vitality only inspire regret for the films left unmade during Crichton’s years in the wilderness.

—Philip Kemp

CROMWELL, John

1929; hired by RKO, 1933; President, Screen Actors’ Guild, 1944–45; returned to Broadway, 1951, and to repertory theatre, 1960s. Died: In Santa Barbara, California, 26 September 1979.

Films as Director:

1929  Close Harmony (co-d); The Dance of Life (co-d with Sutherland, role as doorkeeper); The Mighty (+ role as Mr. Jamieson)
1930  The Street of Chance (+ role as Imbrie); The Texan; Seven Days’ Leave (Medals); For the Defense; Tom Sawyer
1931  Scandal Sheet; Unfaithful; Vice Squad; Rich Man’s Folly
1932  The World and the Flesh
1933  Sneepings; The Silver Cord
1934  Of Human Bondage; The Fountain; Jalna; I Dream Too Much
1936  Little Lord Fauntleroy; To Mary with Love; Banjo on My Knee
1937  The Prisoner of Zenda
1938  Algiers
1939  Made for Each Other; In Name Only
1940  Abe Lincoln in Illinois (Spirit of the People) (+ role as John Brown); Victory
1941  So Ends Our Night
1942  Son of Fury
1944  Since You Went Away
1945  The Enchanted Cottage
1946  Anna and the King of Siam
1947  Dead Reckoning; Night Song
1950  Caged
1951  The Company She Keeps; The Racket
1958  The Goddess
1959  The Scavengers
1960  De Sista Stegen (A Matter of Morals)

Other Films:

1929  The Dummy (R. Milton) (role as Walter Babbing)
1957  Top Secret Affair (Their Secret Affair) (Potter) (role as General Grimshaw)
1977  Three Women (Altman) (role)
1978  A Wedding (Altman) (role as cardinal)

Publications

By CROMWELL: articles—

Interview with D. Lyons, in Interview (New York), February 1972.
Interview with Leonard Maltin, in Action (Los Angeles), May/June 1973.

On CROMWELL: articles—

Prouse, Derek, in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1958.
Sarris, Andrew, “Likable but Elusive,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
Obituary in Cinéma (Paris), March 1980.

* * *

John Cromwell, a fine New York actor, had a distinguished list of credits when he was hired by Paramount in 1928. Talking films were a new medium then, and Cromwell was eminently qualified to direct dialogue. He started in collaboration with Edward Sutherland on Close Harmony and The Dance of Life (from the play Broadway). Paramount then promoted him to solo status on such films as The Street of Chance, with William Powell, and The Texan and Seven Days’ Leave, both with Gary Cooper.

Once established as an ace director, he went over to the new RKO studios, where in 1933 he directed such movies as The Silver Cord (from Sidney Howard’s play), starring Irene Dunne with Joel McCrea; and the adaptation of Maugham’s novel Of Human Bondage, with Leslie Howard and Bette Davis. He met David O. Selznick at this time, and subsequently directed such Selznick films as Little Lord Fauntleroy, The Prisoner of Zenda, Made for Each Other, and Since You Went Away. Meanwhile, Cromwell continued as director of other RKO successes, including In Name Only, with Cary Grant, Carole Lombard, and Kay Francis; and Robert Sherwood’s Abe Lincoln in Illinois, starring Raymond Massey. He also directed Hedy Lamarr’s American film debut with Charles Boyer in Algiers; Victory, from the Joseph Conrad novel; and So Ends Our Night, a remarkably tense melodrama of World War Two, with Fredric March, Margaret Sullivan, Glenn Ford, Frances Dee, and Erich von Stroheim.

In 1944 Harriet Parsons at RKO signed Cromwell to direct The Enchanted Cottage, a sensitive drama of a plain girl (Dorothy McGuire) and a scarred, crippled war veteran (Robert Young) who begin to see one another as straight and beautiful through the power of love. By this time, Cromwell was a thorough craftsman. He believed in full rehearsals with camera before any shooting took place. “For every day of full rehearsal you give me,” he was fond of saying, “I’ll knock off a day on the shooting schedule.” At RKO they gave him three days for rehearsal, and he obligingly came in three days early. The Enchanted Cottage was a tricky assignment; the love story was so sensitive that it could easily slip into sentimentality, but it never did. He treated it realistically, an approach that, as he said, is “the only way to treat a fantasy. It always works.”

Cromwell then directed Irene Dunne and Rex Harrison in Anna and the King of Siam, a film of great pictorial beauty. His best subsequent efforts were a woman’s prison story, Caged, and The Goddess, a realistic story about a film star. Cromwell was falsely accused by Howard Hughes of being a communist during the McCarthy era. “I was never anything that suggested a Red,” he said, “and there never was the slightest evidence with which to accuse me of being one.’’ He was blacklisted, however, and the assignments ceased coming his way. He simply returned to the theatre as an actor, and was brilliant as Henry Fonda’s father in the stage play of John Marquand’s Point of No Return.

—DeWitt Bodeen

CRONENBERG, David

Films as Director:

1966  Transfer (short) (sc, ph, ed)
1967  From the Drain (short) (sc, ph, ed)
1969  Stereo (pr, sc, ph, ed + role as Dr. Luther Stringfellow)
1970  Crimes of the Future (pr, sc, ph + role as Antoine Rouge)

1975  Shivers (They Came from Within; The Parasite Murders; Frissons) (sc)
1976  Rabid (Rage) (sc)
1978  Fast Company; The Brood
1979  Scanners (sc)
1982  * Videodrome* (sc)
1983  The Dead Zone
1986  The Fly (co-sc, + role as gynaecologist)
1988  Dead Ringers (Twins) (co-sc, + pr)
1991  Naked Lunch (sc)
1992–93  M. Butterfly
1996  Crash (sc + role as Auto Wreck Salesman)
1999  eXistenZ (sc)

Other Films:

1985  Into the Night (Landis) (as Group Supervisor)
1990  Nightbreed (Barker) (as Decker)
1992  Blue (McKellar) (role)
1994  Trial by Jury (Gould) (as Director); Booze Can (Campbell) (role); Henry & Verlin (Ledbetter) (as Doc Fisher)
1995  To Die For (Van Sant) (as Man at Lake); Blood and Donuts (Dale) (as Stephen)
1996  Moonshine Highway (Armstrong—for TV) (as Clem Clayton); The Stupids (Landis) (as Postal Supervisor); Extreme Measures (Apted) (as Hospital Lawyer)
1997  The Grace of God (L’Ecuyer) (role)
1998  Last Night (McKellar) (as Duncan)
1999  Resurrection (Mulcahy) (as Priest); David Cronenberg, I Have to Make the World Be Flesh (as himself)
2000  Dead by Monday (Truninger) (role)
2001  Jason X: Friday the 13th Part 10 (Isaac) (role as Dr. Wimmer)

Publications

By CRONENBERG: books—

By CRONENBERG: articles—

Interview in Cinema Canada (Montreal), September/October 1978.
Interview in Starburst (London), nos. 36/37, 1981.
Interview in Films (London), June 1981.
Interviews in Ecran Fantastique (Paris), June and November 1983.
Interview with S. Ayscough, in Cinema Canada (Montreal), December 1983.
Interview in Starburst (London), May 1984.
Interview in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1988.
Interview in Cinefex (Riverside, California), November 1988.
Interview in Film and Television, no. 419, April 1992.
Interview in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 4, no. 12, December 1994.
Interview in Sight and Sound (London), vol. 6, no. 6, June 1996.
Interview in Take One (Toronto), no. 13, Fall 1996.
Interview in Time Out (London), no. 1368, 6 November 1996.
Interview in Film Comment (New York), vol. 33, no. 2, March-April 1997.
Interview in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, no. 4, April 1997.

On CRONENBERG: books—

On CRONENBERG: articles—

Film Comment (New York), March/April 1980.
“Cronenberg Section” of Cinema Canada (Montreal), March 1981.
“Cronenberg Section” of Cinefantastique (Oak Park, Illinois), Spring 1981.
Lucas, Tim, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), September 1986.
Morris, Peter, “Up from the Underground,” in Take One (Toronto), no. 6, Fall 1994.
“Special Section,” in Mensuel du Cinéma (Nice), no. 16, April 1994.

Cowan, Noah, and Angela Baldassare, “Canadian Science Fiction Comes of Age,” in Take One (Toronto), vol. 4, no. 11, Spring 1996.
Sanjek, David, “Dr. Hobbe’s Parasites: Victims, Victimization, and Gender in David Cronenberg’s Shivers,” in Cinema Journal (Austin, Texas), vol. 36, no. 1, Fall 1996.

* * *

David Cronenberg’s breakthrough movie, Shivers, carries over the Burroughsian mind-and-body-bending themes of his underground pictures—Stereo and Crimes of the Future—but also benefits from the influence of Romero’s Night of the Living Dead and Siegel’s Invasion of the Body Snatchers in its horror movie imagery, relentless pacing, and general vision of a society falling apart. Thus the film locates Cronenberg at the centre of the thriving 1970s horror movement that produced such figures as Romero, Larry Cohen, John Carpenter, Wes Craven, and Toho Hooper. While a mad scientist’s creation—a horde of creeping phallic-looking parasites—infects people with a combination of venereal disease and aphrodisiac; a chilly, luxurious, modernist skyscraper apartment building becomes a Boschian nightmare of blood and carnality. An undisciplined film, Shivers gains from its scattershot approach. Cronenberg has since proved himself capable of more control but, in a movie about the encroachment of chaos upon order, it is appropriate that the narrative itself should break down. While strong enough in its mix of sex and violence to give fuel to critics who view Cronenberg as a reactionary moralist, it is clear that his approach is ambiguous, and that he is as concerned with the anomic of the normality disrupted as he is with the nature of the outbreak. The orgiastic solution of the blood parasites may be too extreme, but the soulless routine they replace suggests the straight world deserves to be eaten away from within.

His follow-up movies, Rabid, The Brood, and Scanners, develop the themes of Shivers—although his odd-man-out film, the drag-racing drama Fast Company, comes from this period also—and gradually struggle away from impersonal nihilism. Rabid is a plagued story, with Marilyn Chambers quite affecting as the Typhoid Mary, while The Brood is an intense family melodrama that triggers by Nola (Samantha Eggar), a mad mother who can manifest her anger as murderous malformed children, and Scanners concerns itself with the fears of a race of telepaths who co-exist with humanity and are unsure whether to conquer or save the world. With its exploding heads and car chases, Scanners is a progression away from the venereal apocalypse of the earlier films and is almost an upbeat movie after the icy down-ness of The Brood. Scanners has the typical early Cronenberg construction: it crams in more ideas than it can possibly deal with and tears through its overly complex plot so quickly that the holes only become apparent when it is all over. The unrelenting action of Shivers and Rabid show a society tearing itself apart; and, given the breakup of Nola’s family, the incestuous cruelty of The Brood is inevitable; but Scanners follows a purposeful conflict between opposing, highly motivated sides, out of which a new world will emerge. If The Brood finds a balance between mind and body, Scanners finally achieves a hard-won harmony. Crimes of the Future, Shivers, Rabid, and The Brood all end with the persistent disease threatening to spread. In Scanners, for the first time in a David Cronenberg film, the good guys win.

Cronenberg closed this phase of his career with Videodrome, which summed up his work to date. Structurally reminiscent of Shivers, the film follows Max Renn (James Woods), a cable TV hustler whose justification for his channel’s output of “softcore pornography and hardcore violence” is “better on television than in the streets.” Renn is trying to track down a pirate station that is transmitting Videodrome, “a show that’s just torture and murder. No plot. No characters. Very realistic,” because he thinks it’s “the coming thing.” Underneath the stimulating images of sex and violence is a signal which causes a tumor in Renn’s brain that makes him subject to hallucinations which increasingly take over the flow of the film, completely fracturing reality with disturbing developments of Cronenberg’s by-now familiar bodily evolutions. A television set pulses with life and Renn buries his head in its mammary screen as he kisses the image of his fantasy lover (Deborah Harry). A vaginal slot grows from a rash on his stomach and the villains plunge living videocassettes into it which program him as an assassin. His hand and gun grow together to create a sickening biomechanical synthesis. Once Renn has been exposed to Videodrome, the film cannot hope to sustain its storyline, and, as Paul Taylor wrote in Monthly Film Bulletin, “becomes most akin to sitting before a TV screen while someone else switches channels at random.”

After traveling so far into his own personal—and uncommercial—nightmare, Cronenberg felt the need to ease off by tackling an uncomplicated project, The Dead Zone, a bland but efficient adaptation of Stephen King’s novel, is one of the few films he has directed without having been involved in writing the screenplay. Having proved that he could work in the mainstream, Cronenberg turned to more personal projects that still somehow pass as commercial cinema, keeping up a miraculous balancing act that has put him, in a career sense, on a much more solid footing than Romero, Hooper, Cohen, Carpenter, or Craven, all of whom he has outstripped. The Fly, a major studio remake of the 1958 monster movie, is despite its budget and lavish special effects a quintessentially Cronenbergian movie, prun ing away the expected melodrama to concentrate on a single relationship, between Seth Brundle (Jeff Goldblum), a gawky scientist whose teleportation device has set in motion a metamorphosis that turns him into an insect, and his horrified but compassionate lover (Geena Davis). The Fly is an even more concentrated, intimate movie than The Brood, with only three main characters and one major setting. Like Rabinic Roth and Max Renn, Brundle remains himself as he changes, tossing away nervous remarks about his collection of chopped-off body parts, giving an amusingly disgusting TV-chef-style demonstration of the flylike manner in which the new creature eats a doughnut, humming, “I know an old lady who swallowed a fly,” and treating his mutation as a voyage of discovery.

Based on a true-life National Enquirer headline (“‘Twin Docs Found Dead in Posh Pad’”), Dead Ringers follows the lives of Beverly and Elliot Mantle (Jeremy Irons), identical twins who develop a precocious interest in the problems of sex and the female anatomy and grow up to be a world-beating team of gynecologists. Their intense relationship, when unbalanced by the presence of a third party (Genevieve Bujold), eventually leads to their destruction. The film takes fear of surgery about as far as it can go when Beverly, increasingly infuriated that women’s bodies do not conform to his textbooks, brings in a Giger-ish surrealist metalworker to create a set of “Gynecological Instruments for Operating on Mutant Women.”

In the theatre, Beverly is killed up in scarlet robes more suited to a mass and horrifyingly blunders through a supposedly simple operation, wielding these bizarre and distorted implements. The home stretch is profoundly depressing, and yet deeply moving, as the twins come to resemble each other more and more in their degradation. The calculating Elliot follows Beverly into drug addiction on the theory that only if the Mantle brothers really become identical can the two inadequate personalities separate from each other and get back to some kind of functioning normality. Too often genre publications sneer at filmmakers who achieve success with horror but then claim they want to move on, but notions of genre are inherently limiting, and Cronenberg is entirely justified in leaving behind the warmed-over science-fiction elements of his earlier films and concentrating on a more intellectual, character-based mode. For the first time, he is able to present the inhuman condition without recourse (one slightly too blatant dream sequence apart, as in The Fly) to slimy special effects, borrowings from earlier horror films, and the trappings of conventional melodrama. This is not the work of someone trying for the commercial high ground, and it certainly is not by any stretch of the imagination a mainstream movie. Dead Ringers is not a horror film. It is a David Cronenberg film, and entering the 1990s, that put it at the cutting edge of the nightmare cinema.

Cronenberg used his commercial clout to bring to the screen William S. Burroughs’ novel Naked Lunch, a book that had long preoccupied him. It proved a challenge because the book is almost “unfilmable” (“It would cost hundreds of millions of dollars and be banned in every country on earth.” Cronenberg has noted), so, rather than adapt the book in the traditional sense, he opted to make a film about what it was like to be William S. Burroughs. Where Dead Ringers had largely eschewed the fantastic while retaining the horrific, Naked Lunch grows from the fantastic, relegating the horrific to a minor position, in order to become a dissection of the act of creativity itself, which Cronenberg presents in the film as subversive, cathartic, and sexual act to the artist. Whereas Cronenberg had presented art as a viable outlet for release in Scanners, in Naked Lunch he seems to be saying that such a release can also lead to an inescapable trap for the artist, as well. Peter Weller’s Burroughs would like to be a “normal” person, but can’t. He has no choice in the matter—a viewpoint many critics interpreted as self-justification on Cronenberg’s part for the nightmare images he puts on the screen.

With Naked Lunch, Cronenberg came full-circle, arriving back where he started—with an original, unsettling, dangerous, and subversive “art film” reminiscent of his earliest work. These qualities made him a seemingly natural choice to direct the film version of David Henry Hwang’s bizarre, gender- and identity-bending Broadway hit M. Butterfly, about a French diplomat’s (Jeremy Lyons) love affair with a Chinese opera diva whom he never realizes is a man (and spy to boot). Remarkably, the film turned out to be rather subdued and orthodox—most unCronenberg-like. He turned that around with his next film, however, the very Cronenberg-like Crash. A lover of cars in his youth (perhaps this is what the anomalous Fast Company derived from), Cronenberg had long been fascinated by J.G. Ballard’s controversial science-fiction novel Crash, the story of a group of people turned on by revisiting the sites of, and even recreating, famous car wrecks such as the one that killed teen idol James Dean. The novel is disturbingly perverse, and, like Naked Lunch, “unfilmable,” except that Cronenberg went ahead and filmed it anyway. As the characters keep raising the bar on their twisted hobby in order to increase their kicks and feel more alive, they start having sex with each other using their accident wounds as orifices—bizarre and horrific behavior from which Cronenberg does not avert his camera’s eye. As a result, the film was slapped with the dreaded NC-17 rating until Cronenberg agreed to make some cuts to get it an “R.” The NC-17 version was eventually released on video. Either version, though, is a powerful viewing experience—albeit an unwholesome and unpleasant viewing experience that makes one question, “Why am I watching this?” This is undoubtedly the kind of audience response Cronenberg was striving for (as he has throughout his career), and sought to elicit as well with his next film, eXistenZ, another twisted allegory about the sexual and others extremes people feel the need to go to keep feeling alive in today’s Virtual Reality world.

—Kim Newman, updated by John McCarty

---

CUKOR, George

Nationality: American. Born: New York, 7 July 1899. Education: DeWitt Clinton High School, New York. Military Service: Served in U.S. armed forces; directed film for the Signal Corps., 1943. Career: Stage manager on Broadway, 1919–24; manager, stock company in Rochester, New York, and director, New York City, 1924–26; stage director, New York, 1926–29; co-director for Paramount in Hollywood, 1929–32; joined RKO, began association with Katharine Hepburn, 1932; began association with writers Ruth Gordon and Garson Kanin, 1947. Awards: Oscar for Best Director, and Directors Guild of America Award, for My Fair Lady, 1964; Honorary doctorates, University of Southern California, 1968, and Loyola University, Chicago, 1976; D.W. Griffith Award, Directors Guild of America, 1981; Golden Lion, Venice Festival, 1982. Died: 24 January 1983.

Films as Director:

1930 Grumpy (co-d); The Virtuous Sin (co-d); The Royal Family of Broadway (co-d)
1931 Tarnished Lady; Girls about Town
1932 What Price Hollywood?; A Bill of Divorcement, Rockabye; One Hour with You (co-d with Lubitsch, uncredited, + dialogue director); The Animal Kingdom (co-d, uncredited)
1933 Our Betters; Dinner at Eight; Little Women; David Copperfield (The Personal History, Adventures, Experience, and Observations of David Copperfield, the Younger); No More Ladies (co-d, uncredited)
1936 Sylvia Scarlett; Romeo and Juliet
1937 Camille
1938 Holiday
1939 Zaza, The Women; Gone with the Wind (co-d, uncredited)
1940 Susan and God; The Philadelphia Story
1941 A Woman’s Face; Two-Faced Woman
1942 Her Cardboard Lover
1943 Keeper of the Flame
1944 Gaslight; Winged Victory
1945 I’ll Be Seeing You (co-d, uncredited)
1947 A Double Life; Desire Me (co-d, uncredited)
1949 Edward My Son; Adam’s Rib
1950 A Life of Her Own; Born Yesterday
1951 The Model and the Marriage Broker
1952 The Marrying Kind; Pat and Mike
1953 The Actress
1954 It Should Happen to You; A Star Is Born
1956 Bhowani Junction
1957 Les Girls; Wild Is the Wind
1958 Hot Spell (co-d, uncredited)
1960 Heller in Pink Tights; Let’s Make Love; Song without End (co-d, uncredited)
1962 The Chapman Report
1964 My Fair Lady
1969 Justine
1972 Travels with My Aunt
1975 Love among the Ruins (for TV)
1976 The Bluebird
1979  The Corn Is Green (for TV)
1981  Rich and Famous

Other Films:

1929  River of Romance (Wallace) (dialogue d)
1930  All Quiet on the Western Front (Milestone) (dialogue d)

Publications

By CUKOR: articles—
Interview with Richard Overstreet, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1969.
Interview with Gene Phillips, in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1972.
“Carry on, Cukor,” with J. McBride and T. McCarthy, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1981.
Interview with J.P. Le Pavec and D. Rabourdin, in Cinéma (Paris), March 1982.

On CUKOR: books—

On CUKOR: articles—
Houston, Penelope, “Cukor and the Kanins,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1955.
Sarris, Andrew, “Cukor,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1978.
“Cukor Section” of Casablanca (Madrid), March 1983.

* * *
George Cukor’s films range from classics like Greta Garbo’s Camille, to Adam’s Rib with Spencer Tracy and Katharine Hepburn, to the Judy Garland musical A Star Is Born. Throughout the years he managed to “weather the changes in public taste and the pressures of the Hollywood studio system without compromising his style, his taste, or his ethical standards,” as his honorary degree from Loyola University of Chicago is inscribed. Indeed, Cukor informed each of the stories he brought to the screen with his affectionately critical view of humanity. In film after film he sought to prod the mass audience to reconsider their cherished illusions in order to gain fresh insights into the problems that confront everyone. “When a director has provided tasteful entertainment of a high order consistently,” noted Andrew Sarris, “it is clear that he is much more than a mere entertainer, he is a genuine artist.”

Although most of Cukor’s films are adaptations of preexisting novels and plays, he has always chosen material that has been consistent with his view of reality. Most often he has explored the conflict between illusion and reality in peoples’ lives. The chief characters in his films are frequently actors and actresses, for they, more than anyone, run the risk of allowing the world of illusion with which they are constantly involved to become their reality. This theme is obvious in many of Cukor’s best films and appears in some of his earliest work, including The Royal Family of Broadway, which he co-directed. In it he portrays a family of troupers, based on the Barrymores, who are wedded to their world of fantasy in a way that makes a shambles of their private lives.

The attempt of individuals to reconcile their cherished dreams with the sober realities of life continues in films as superficially different as Dinner at Eight, The Philadelphia Story, and A Double Life. Ronald Colman earned an Academy Award in the last as an actor who becomes so identified with the parts he plays that, while enacting Othello, he develops a murderous streak of jealousy which eventually destroys him.

While it is true that Cukor was often drawn to stories about show people, his films also suggest that everyone leads a double life that moves between illusion and reality, and that everyone must seek to sort out fantasy from fact if they are to cope realistically with their problems—something Cukor’s characters frequently fail to do. Les Girls is the most explicit of all Cukor’s films in treating this theme. Here the same events are told from four different points of view at a libel trial, each version differing markedly from the others. Because Cukor allows each narrator “equal time,” he is sympathetic to the way each of them has subconsciously revised their common experiences in a manner that enables him or her to live with the past in the present. As Sarris remarks, Cukor does not imply that people necessarily are liars, but rather that they tell the truth in their own fashion.

Though Cukor must have harbored some degree of affection and sympathy for the world of romantic illusion—for there is always a hint of regret in his films when actuality inevitably asserts itself in the life of one of his dreamers—his movies nonetheless remain firmly rooted in, and committed to, the workaday world of reality.

Directing his last film, Rich and Famous, merited Cukor the distinction of being one of the oldest filmmakers ever to direct a major motion picture. His work on that film likewise marked him as a man who had enjoyed the longest continuous career of any director in film or television. Some of the satisfaction which he derived from his long career was grounded in the fact that few directors have commanded such a large portion of the mass audience. “His movies,” Richard Schickel has noted, “can be appreciated—no, liked—at one level or another by just about everyone.”

For his part, Cukor once reflected that “I look upon every picture that I make as the first one I’ve ever done—and the last. I love each film I have directed, and I try to make each one as good as I possibly can. Mind you, making movies is no bed of roses. Every day isn’t Christmas. It’s been a hard life, but also a joyous one.”

—Gene D. Phillips

CURTIZ, Michael

Films as Director:

(as Mihály Kertész)

1912 Az utolsó bohém (The Last Bohemian); Ma es holnap (Today and Tomorrow) (+ role)
1913 Rablélek (Captive Soul); Hazasadok az uram (My Husband Lies)
1914 A hercegnő Pongyolaban (Princess Pongyola); Az éjszaka rajhái (Slaves of the Night) (+ role); A Kökösnépért cseszemök (Borrowed Babies); Bárány bá; A tolonc (The Vagrant); Aranyűsö (The Golden Shoe)
1915 Aki ketten szeretnek (Loved By Two) (+ role)
1916 Az ezüst keske (The Silver Goat) (+ co-sc); A medikus (The Apothecary); Doktor ur (The Doctor); Farkas (The Wolf); A fekete szívvarvany (The Black Rainbow); Makkhetes (Seven of Clubs); Karthauzi (The Carthusian); A Magyar föld ereje (The Strength of the Hungarian Soil)
1917 Arendás zsidó (John, the Tenant); Az ezredes (The Colonel); A föld embere (The Man of the Soil); Halálcsegé (The Death Bell); A kuruczlo (The Charlatan); A Szentjóbi erdő titka (The Secret of St. Job Forest); A senki fiú (Nobody’s Son); Tavasz: a télben (Spring in Wintertime); Zoárd Mester (Master Zoard); Tatájrárás (Invasion); A beke ut ja (The Road to Peace); A vörös Sámson (The Red Samson); Az utolsó hajnal (The Last Dawn); Egy krajacár története (The Story of a Penny)
1918 Kilencvékincle (99); Judás; Lulu; Az örög (The Devil); A napraforgós hőlgy (The Lady with Sunflowers); Alraune (co-d); Víg özvegy (The Merry Widow) (+ sc); Várgöslőről (Magic Waltz); Lu, a kokott (Lu, the Cocotte); A Wellingtoni rejtély (The Wellington Mystery); Szamárború (The Donkey Skin); A curlu fiú (The Ugly Boy); A skorpió (The Scorpion)
1919 Jón az öcsem (John the Younger Brother); Liliom (unfinished)

(in Austria, as Michael Curtiz)

1922 Sodom und Gomorrah (Die Legende von Sünde und Strafe) (+ co-sc)
1923 Sodom und Gomorrah; Part II. Die Strafe (Die Legende von Sünde und Strafe) (+ co-sc); Samson und Dalila (co-d); Der Lawine (Avalanche); Der junge Medardus; Namenlos (Der Scharlatan; Der falsche Arzt)
1924 Ein Spiel ums Leben; Harun al Raschid; Die Slavenkönigin (Moon of Israel)

1925 Celimene, Poupee de Montmartre (Das Spielzeug von Paris; Red Heels)
1926 Der goldene Schmetterling (The Road to Happiness); Fiaker Nr. 13 (Einspänner Nr. 13) (tm)

(1926 The Third Degree
1927 A Million Bid; Good Time Charley; A Desired Woman
1928 Tenderloin
1929 Noah’s Ark; The Glad Rag Doll; Madonna of Avenue A; Hearts in Exile; The Gamblers
1930 Mammy; Under a Texas Moon; The Matrimonial Bed (A Matrimonial Problem); Bright Lights; A Soldier’s Plaything (A Soldier’s Pay); River’s End
1931 Dünó des Meeres (German language version of Lloyd Bacon’s Moby Dick); God’s Gift to Women (Too Many Women); The Mad Genius
1932 The Woman from Monte Carlo; Alias the Doctor; The Strange Love of Molly Louvain; Doctor X; Cabin in the Cotton
1933 Twenty Thousand Years in Sing Sing; The Mystery of the Wax Museum; The Keyhole; Private Detective 62; Goodbye Again; The Kennel Murder Case; Female
1934 Mandalay; British Agent; Jimmy the Gent; The Key
1935 Black Fury; The Case of the Curious Bride; Front Page Woman; Little Big Shot; Captain Blood
1936 The Walking Dead; Stolen Holiday; Charge of the Light Brigade
1937 Kid Galahad; Mountain Justice; The Perfect Specimen
1938 Gold is Where You Find It; The Adventures of Robin Hood (co-d); Four Daughters; Four’s a Crowd; Angels with Dirty Faces
1939 Dodge City; Sons of Liberty; The Private Lives of Elizabeth and Essex; Four Wives; Daughters Courageous
1940 Virginia City; The Sea Hawk; Santa Fe Trail
1941 The Sea Wolf; Dive Bomber
1942 Captains of the Clouds; Yankee Doodle Dandy; Casablanca
1943 Mission to Moscow; This Is the Army
1944 Passage to Marseille; Janie
1945 Roughly Speaking; Mildred Pierce
1946 Night and Day
1947 Life with Father; The Unsuspected
1948 Romance on the High Seas (It’s Magic)
1949 My Dream Is Yours (+ pr); Flamingo Road (+ exec pr); The Lady Takes a Sailor
1950 Young Man with a Horn (Young Man of Music); Bright Leaf; Breaking Point
1951 Jim Thorpe—All American (Man of Bronze); Force of Arms
1952 I’ll See You in My Dreams; The Story of Will Rogers
1953 The Jazz Singer; Trouble along the Way
1954 The Boy from Oklahoma; The Egyptian; White Christmas
1955 We’re No Angels
1956 The Scarlet Hour (+ pr); The Vagabond King; The Best Things in Life Are Free
1957 The Helen Morgan Story (Both Ends of the Candle)
1958 The Proud Rebel; King Creole
1959 The Hangman; The Man in the Net
1960  The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn; A Breath of Scandal
(Olympia)
1961  Francis of Assisi
1962  The Comancheros

Other Films:

1913  Atlantis (Blom) (asst d, role)

Publications

By CURTIZ: article—

‘‘Talent Shortage Is Causing Two-Year Production Delay,’’ in Films and Filming (London), June 1956.

On CURTIZ: books—

Anobile, Richard, editor, Michael Curtiz’s ‘‘Casablanca,’’ New York, 1975.
Rosenzweig, Sidney, ‘‘Casablanca’’ and Other Major Films of Kinnard, Roy, and R.J. Vitone, The American Films of Michael Curtiz, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1986.
Robertson, James C., The Casablanca Man: The Cinema of Michael

On CURTIZ: articles—

Martin, Pete, ‘‘Hollywood’s Champion Language Assassin,’’ in Saturday Evening Post (New York), 2 August 1947.
Sarris, Andrew, ‘‘Likable but Elusive,’’ in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.
Dienstfrey, Harris, ‘‘Hitch Your Genre to a Star,’’ in Film Culture
(New York), Fall 1964.
Callenbach, Ernest, ‘‘Comparative Anatomy of Folk-Myth Films: Robin Hood and Antonio das Mortes,’’ in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1969/70.
Nolan, Jack Edmund, ‘‘Michael Curtiz,’’ in Films in Review (New York), no. 9, 1970.
Behlmer, R., and A. Pinto, ‘‘Letters,’’ in Films in Review (New York), February 1971.
Davis, John, ‘‘Captain Blood,’’ in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), June 1971.
Davis, John, ‘‘The Unsuspected,’’ in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Summer 1972.
Davis, John, ‘‘The Tragedy of Mildred Pierce,’’ in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Fall 1972.
Canham, Kingsley, ‘‘Michael Curtiz,’’ in The Hollywood Profession-
Shadoian, J., ‘‘Michael Curtiz’ Twenty Thousand Years in Sing
Sing,’’ in Journal of Popular Film (Bowling Green, Ohio), Davis, John, ‘‘When Will They Ever Learn?,” in Velvet Light Trap (Madison, Wisconsin), Autumn 1975.

Berard, V.R., and P. Canniere, ‘‘Michael Curtiz: Maître du baroque,’’ in Image et Son (Paris), February 1982.
Werner, G., ‘‘Fran Lidingon till Casablanca?’’ in Chaplin (Stock-
Viviani, C., ‘‘Les emigres allemands dans le film noir americain entre
1944 et 1954,’’ in Cinémaction (Conde-sur-Noireau), no. 56,
July 1990.
Minutolo, S., ‘‘Casablanca,’’ in Quaderni di Cinema (Firenze),
October-December 1990.
Vernet, M., ‘‘Michael Curtiz,’’ in Ekran (Ljubljana, Slovenia), vol.
Sayre, N., ‘‘Curtiz: A Man for All Genres . . .’’ in New York Times,
Schnelle, J., ‘‘All Right My Hearties, Follow Me,’’ in Film-Dienst
Bruyn, O. de, and F. Richard, ‘‘Michael Curtiz au festival de La Rochelle: L’homme pressé,’’ in Positif (Paris), no. 384, February 1993.
Lyons, Donald, ‘‘Iron Mike,’’ Film Comment (Denville, New Jer-sy), vol. 32, no. 2, March–April 1996.

* * *

The films of Michael Curtiz have come to symbolize Warner Brothers Studios of the 1930s and 1940s. Curtiz directed many favorites from that era, including Captain Blood, The Charge of the Light Brigade, The Sea Hawk, Yankee Doodle Dandy, Twenty Thousand Years in Sing Sing, and Mildred Pierce. He helped guide Bette
Davis as her popularity rose in the 1930s, and helped establish Errol
Flynn as the symbol of the swashbuckling hero. James Cagney (Yankee Doodle Dandy) and Joan Crawford (Mildred Pierce) both won Oscars under Curtiz’s direction. His long career and directorial strengths benefitted from the constant work available in the studios of the 1930s and 1940s. Most observers, however, note a precipitous decline in the quality of Curtiz’s films after World War II.

Surely Curtiz’s most famous creation for today’s audience is Casablanca, the only film for which he received an Oscar for Best Director. This cult favorite now has achieved a life of its own and established Bogart and Bergman as modern folk heroes. Conversely, director Curtiz has been lost in the shuffle with the passage of time.
The anti-auteurist argument seems to be that this particular film represents a happy “accident” of the studio system, and that its enduring popularity should not be credited to its director. What is lost in this analysis is the fact that Casablanca was a major hit of 1943 (finishing among the top grossing films of the year), won three Academy Awards (Best Picture, Director, and Screenplay), and earned Curtiz several awards as the year’s best director. Critics of the day recognized Curtiz’s input. Certainly today we should give proper credit to the director of a film that was popular upon release, continues to be popular today, and has influenced countless other works.

Curtiz has been difficult for film historians to deal with because of the length and breadth of his career. Usually overlooked is the time he spent in Europe; Curtiz did not begin with Warner Brothers until he came to the United States at the age of thirty-eight. His career began in Hungary, where he participated in the beginning of the Hungarian film industry, usually receiving credit for directing that country’s first feature film.

Curtiz remained active until the outbreak of the First World War.
After the war he moved to Vienna where he directed several important films, including the epic Sodom and Gomorrah. Scholars know little else about this part of Curtiz’s career, however. Accounts of other activities lead only to contradictions; no wholly reliable list of credits exists. Sadly, historians have written off the first two decades of Curtiz’s career. We know a great deal of the work of other emigrés, such as Fritz Lang and F.W. Murnau, but virtually nothing of Curtiz.

Not unexpectedly there exist several versions of why and how Warner Brothers contacted Curtiz and brought him to the United States. Regardless, from 1926 Curtiz became intertwined with all the innovations of the Warner Brothers studio. In the mid-1920s he was thrust into Warner attempts to innovate sound. His Tenderloin and Noah’s Ark were two-part talkies that achieved considerable popularity and garnered millions in box-office revenues. In a key transitional year, 1930, Curtiz directed no less than six Warner Brothers talkies. In that same year Warner Brothers tried to introduce color, but with none of the success associated with the studio’s efforts with sound. Curtiz’s Mammy, one of Jolson’s follow-ups to The Jazz Singer and The Singing Fool, had color sequences. In 1933 he directed the well-regarded, all-color horror film, The Mystery of the Wax Museum. Curtiz’s record during the transition to sound elevated him to the top echelon of contract directors at Warner Brothers. Unlike others, Curtiz seemed not to utilize this success to push for greater freedom and independence. Instead, he seemed content to take what was assigned, executing his work in a classic style. He produced crisp flowing narratives, seeking efficiency of method. He was a conservative director, adapting, borrowing, and ultimately utilizing all the dominant codes of the Hollywood system. Stylistic innovations were left to others. Today critics praise the film noir look of Mildred Pierce, but this film was never thought of as one of the forerunners of that style when it was initially released. After Mildred Pierce, Curtiz moved on to Night and Day, the fictionalized life of Cole Porter starring Cary Grant, and Life with Father, a nostalgic, light family romance starring William Powell and Irene Dunne. Both of these latter features took in a great deal of money and earned considerable critical praise, once again demonstrating how well Curtiz could operate when called upon by his employer.

If there is a way to get a handle on the enormous output of Curtiz’s career, it is through genre analysis. In the early 1930s Curtiz stuck to formula melodramas. His limited participation in Warner Brothers’s social realism cycles came with films like Black Fury, which looked at strikebreaking. Curtiz seemed to hit his stride with Warner Brothers’ Errol Flynn pirate cycle of the late 1930s. Captain Blood and The Sea Hawk stand as lasting symbols of Hollywood’s ability to capture the sweep of romantic adventure. Warner Brothers also sent director Curtiz and star Flynn to the Old West in Dodge City and Virginia City. In the early 1940s the Warner studio returned to the musical, establishing its niche with the biographical film. Curtiz participated, directing Yankee Doodle Dandy (which depicted George M. Cohan’s life), This Is the Army (Irving Berlin), and the aforementioned Night and Day (Cole Porter). Yankee Doodle Dandy demonstrated how well this European émigré had taken to the United States. Curtiz would continue to deal with Americana in his films during the 1940s. For example, he touched deep American ideological strains with Casablanca, while Mildred Pierce examined the dark side of the American family. Feminist critics have noted how the portrait of a strong woman in the latter film mirrors the freedom women achieved during World War II—a freedom withdrawn after the war when the men returned home. The family in Mildred Pierce is constructed in an odd, bitter way, contrasting with Curtiz’s affectionate portrait in Life with Father. Genre analysis is helpful, but in the end it still tells us too little of what we want to know about this important director. As critics and historians continue to go through his films and utilize the records now available at the University of Wisconsin, University of Southern California, and Princeton, more insights will come to light about Curtiz’s participation in the Hollywood studio system. In the meantime, Curtiz’s films will live on for the fans with continual re-screenings of Casablanca, Mildred Pierce, and The Adventures of Robin Hood.

—Douglas Gomery
DANTE, Joe

Films as Director:

1976 Hollywood Boulevard (+ ed)
1978 Piranha (+ ed)
1979 Rock’n’Roll High School (uncredited)
1980 The Howling (+ ed)
1983 Third segment of The Twilight Zone: The Movie
1984 Gremlins
1985 “The Shadow Man” episode of The Twilight Zone TV series; “Boo” and “The Greibble” episodes of Amazing Stories TV series; Explorers
1987 Innerspace: Amazon Women on the Moon (co-d; segments: “Hairlooming,” “Bullshit or Not,” “Critics’ Corner,” “Roast Your Loved One,” “Reckless Youth”)
1989 The ‘Burbs
1990 Gremlins II: The New Batch (+ ro as Grandpa Fred)
1993 Matinee
1994 Runaway Daughters (for TV)
1995 “Lightening” episode (“Picture Windows: Language of the Heart”) of Picture Windows (TV mini series)
1997 The Second Civil War (for TV)
1998 Small Soldiers

Films as Actor:

1976 Cannonball
1985 The Fantasy Film Worlds of George Pal
1991 Oscar (as face on the cutting room floor)
1992 The Magical World of Chuck Jones (as interviewee); Flying Saucers over Hollywood: The Plan 9 Companion (The Ed Wood Story: The Plan 9 Companion); Sleepwalkers (as lab assistant)
1994 A Century of Cinema (as himself); Il Silenzio dei prosciutti (Silence of the Hams) (as dying man); Beverly Hills Cop III (as jailer)
1997 Flesh and Blood (as himself)

Other Films:

1972 Fly Me (dialogue director)
1973 The Arena (Naked Warriors and La Rivolta delle Gladiatrici) (ed)
1977 Grand Theft Auto (ed)
1995 Mr. Stitch TV (special thanks)
1996 The Phantom (exec pr)

Joe Dante on the set of Small Soldiers
Publications

By DANTE: articles—

On DANTE: articles—

Cardon, André, “Joe Dante a la dent longue!” in Séquences (Québec), no. 126, October 1986.

* * *

Multi-talented director Joe Dante is a bit like one of the juvenile heroes of one of his best films, Explorers, tinkering about with various cinematic bits and pieces and the found parts of miscellaneous cultural artifacts to assemble unique vehicles which sometimes take flight to new and astounding fantasy worlds. It’s no wonder personalities similarly steeped in America’s cinematic and pop cultural past (such as Roger Corman and Steven Spielberg) were among the first to recognize Dante’s unique attributes.

Like certain other writers on film who eventually became filmmakers themselves (Truffaut, Goddard, Peter Bogdanovich) Dante also began his career as a periodical editor and critic of the genre films he loved. But in 1974 Dante began editing films as well, and his active career in filmmaking commenced with a job developing trailers for Roger Corman’s New World Pictures (with Jon Davison and Allan Arkush). At New World the trio was given the daunting challenge of generating audience anticipation for an assortment of Corman releases, among them a steady stream of no-budget Filipino imports.

Dante’s first effort (done with Davison, who would later produce Dante’s first two legitimate features) was The Movie Orgy, a seven-hour pastiche of 1950s B movies. This was followed in 1976 by his first commercial feature, Hollywood Boulevard, a collaboration with Allan Arkush in which Corman let the two aspiring filmmakers toss together a satire of low-budget filmmaking on . . . an extremely low budget. Dante would further pursue his love of B movies in 1987 with Amazon Women on the Moon, and in 1993 with Matinee. Dante’s two feature films that followed Hollywood Boulevard launched his career as a legitimate master of genre film in his own right. Piranha, co-written by novelist/director John Sayles, was originally conceived as a Jaws parody. However, the screenplay’s inherent humanity elevates it above the typical slasher films popular in the post-Halloween 1980s. Aside from its imaginative technique, Piranha is effective because Dante and Sayles develop characters about which the audiences cares. The same held true for The Howling, a film which also manifested Dante’s fondness for self-reflexive, life/media blurring situations in a tale of a television reporter who eventually becomes involved in a werewolf cult in an Esalen-like California retreat. The involving screenplay was also rife with references to Little Red Riding Hood, Big Bad Wolf cartoons, famous directors of werewolf films, and Allan Ginsberg’s “Howl”.

The Howling ushered in a peak decade for Dante and the 1980s saw the release of his most distinctive feature films. Gremlins, produced by Steven Spielberg, proved a box-office blockbuster, and the apex of Dante’s commercial clout. The tale centered on Mogwai, an adorably cuddly creature who morphs into a tribe of grotesque and gleefully malicious reptilian creatures that wage an assault on an idyllic Frank Capra-esque small town. Gremlins introduced a level of graphic violence that was new to Dante’s work, and for which the film received some severe critical reviews. In two of the film’s most celebrated technical sequences one of the creatures is pureed in a blender, another self-destructs in a microwave oven. One review dubbed the film “Dante’s Inferno.” Dante had first worked for Spielberg on the third segment of 1983’s Twilight Zone: The Movie, and comments that Spielberg chose him for Gremlins because Piranha was Spielberg’s “favorite rip-off of Jaws.”

Dante followed Gremlins with some of his most unique and appealing work. Explorers in 1985 was a kind of “Boy’s Own Story” of three preteen buddies who construct a working space craft from the carriages of a 1950s amusement park ride, the Tilt-a-Whirl. Transported into outer space the trio encounter a race of grotesque yet appealing Muppet-like aliens whose knowledge (and paranoiaic apprehension) of the human race stems from their having tuned in to a steady stream of old movies, television, and media beamed up from earth. A charming amalgam of Peter Pan and Tom Swift, of childhood wonder and disillusionment, the sentiment is kept in check by a sharp gloss of media satire.

Dante’s enduring love of B movies peaked most overtly in a collaborative funny valentine to low-budget science-fiction films and mass media foibles, 1987’s Amazon Women on the Moon. This most unique and self-reflexive of American movie satires is a hodge-podge of comic skits held together by on-going episodes from a mangled print of a 1950s sci-fi film being screened on late-night television. (When viewed on TV the effect is truly disorienting!) Co-directed by Carl Gottlieb, Peter Horton, John Landis, and Robert K. Weiss, Dante helmed several of the film’s best sequences. These include the substantial “Critic’s Corner/ Roast Your Loved One” episode in which a non-descriptive middle-class male expires of a heart attack while watching a mysterious television critique of his mundane life (which is given an emphatic “two thumbs down” by two merciless critics). His demise is followed by a funeral in the guise of a celebrity roast MC’ed by his wife, and featuring real-life comedians such as Steve Allan and Rip Taylor. The film is capped by Dante’s brilliant post-credit parody of old sex/VD education films, “Reckless Youth,” with Carrie Fisher and Paul Bartel.

Two rather disappointing films—a comedy, The ‘Burbs, and the technically interesting Fantastic Voyage parody, Innerspace—spawned a sequel to Dante’s major commercial success, Gremlins II: The New Batch, in 1990. But the director was back in peak form in 1993 with Matinee, an affectionate homage to B-movie mogul William Castle. Like Explorers, Matinee tempers its unexpectedly poignant evocation of a young boy’s experience of the Cuban missile crisis of 1962 with an affectionately satirical portrait of a low-budget film producer come to town to promote his cheap creature feature, Mant! (“Half-Man, Half-Ant!”)

Dante focused on television work for the rest of the 1990s, but did direct one other feature, Small Soldiers, in 1998. Soldiers is a well-meaning but rather mean-spirited allegory that deals with children’s action toys which turn violently aggressive when implanted with faulty military microchips by a greedy defense industry conglomerate. Somewhat obscured by the violent techno wizardry is a plea for pacifism and tolerance, and a critique of profiteering big business. But, as Variety pointed out, “Despite good intentions, Small Soldiers is a muddle of violence and sermonizing that doesn’t achieve its intended comic edge. When the lethal toys go into action any ‘message’ evaporates, and all one can do is marvel at the technology—and be dumbstruck by the onscreen carnage.’’

Still, in his finest work Dante was genuinely (and knowledgeably) retro long before everything from music to Volkswagens seemed to become trendy so in the 1990s. He innately possesses a mindset which has translated into a body of films which draw on a plethora of influences from America’s cinematic and cultural past with a unique blend of poignancy and satire. At his best there’s no one like him, and even misfired Dante is more interesting than most other genre work done in the Hollywood mainstream in the last decades of history’s most complex, commercial, and culturally bewildering century.

—Ross Care

DASSIN, Jules

Films as Director:

1941 The Tell-Tale Heart (short)
1942 Nazi Agent; The Affairs of Martha (Once upon a Thursday); Reunion (Reunion in France; Madame France)
1943 Young Ideas
1944 The Canterville Ghost
1946 A Letter for Evie; Two Smart People
1947 Brute Force
1948 The Naked City
1949 Thieves’ Highway
1950 Night and the City
1955 Du Rififi chez les hommes (Rififi) (+ co-sc, role as jewel thief under pseudonym Perlo Vita)
1958 Celui qui doit mourir (He Who Must Die) (+ co-sc)
1959 La legge (La Loi) (released in U.S. 1960 as Where the Hot Winds Blow) (+ sc)
1960 Pote tin kryiaki (Never on Sunday) (+ pr, sc, role)
1962 Phaedra (+ pr, co-sc)
1964 Topkapi (+ pr)
1966 10:30 p.m. Summer (+ co-pr, role)
1967 Survival 67 (+ co-pr, appearance) (documentary)
1968 Uptight! (+ pr, co-sc)
1971 La Promesse de l’aube (Promise at Dawn) (+ pr, sc, role as Ivan Mozhukhin under pseudonym Perlo Vita)
1974 The Rehearsal (+ co-sc)
1978 A Dream of Passion (+ pr, sc)
1980 Circle of Two (released in USA 1982)

Publications

By DASSIN: articles—

Interview with Claude Chabrol and François Truffaut, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April and May 1955.
Interview with Cynthia Grenier, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1957/58.
Interview with George Bluestone, in Film Culture (New York), February 1958.
“‘I See Dassin Make the Law,’” interview with John Lane, in Films and Filming (London), September 1958.
“‘Style and Instinct,’” interview with Gordon Gow, in Films and Filming (London), February and March 1970.

On DASSIN: books—

On DASSIN: articles—

“‘Jules Dassin,’” in Film Dope (London), April 1976.
Film a Doba (Prague), February 1987.
Sight and Sound (London), October 1993.

* * *
Between the mid-1940s and the late 1950s, Jules Dassin directed some of the better realistic, hard-bitten, fast-paced crime dramas produced in America, before his blacklist and subsequent move to Europe. However, while he has made some very impressive films, his career as a whole is lacking in artistic cohesion.

Dassin’s films are occasionally innovative: The Naked City is one of the first police dramas shot on location, on the streets of New York; Rififi is a forerunner of detailed jewelry heist dramas, highlighted by a thirty-five-minute sequence chronicling the break-in, shot without a word of dialogue or note of music; Never on Sunday, starring his wife Melina Mercouri as a happy hooker, made the actress an international star, won her an Academy Award nomination, and popularized in America the Greek bouzouki music. The Naked City and Rififi are particularly exciting, as well as trend-setting, while Brute Force remains a striking, naturalistic prison drama, with Burt Lancaster in one of his most memorable early performances and Hume Cronyn wonderfully despicable as a Hitlerish guard captain. Thieves’ Highway, also shot on location, is a vivid drama of truck driver Richard Conte taking on racketeer Lee J. Cobb.

Topkapi is a Rififi remake, with a delightful touch of comedy. Many of Dassin’s later films, such as Brute Force and Thieves’ Highway, attempt to observe human nature: they focus on the individual fighting his own demons while trying to survive within a chaotic society. For example, in A Dream of Passion, an updating of Sophocles’ Medea, an American woman is jailed in Greece for the murder of her three children; Up Tight, the filmmaker’s first American-made release after the McCarthy hysteria, is a remake of The Informer set in a black ghetto. Unfortunately, they are all generally flawed: with the exception of Never on Sunday and Topkapi, his collaborations with Melina Mercouri (from He Who Must Die to A Dream of Passion) are disappointing, while Up Tight pales beside the original. Circle of Two, with teenager Tatum O’Neal baring her breasts for aging Richard Burton, had a limited release. Dassin’s early triumphs have been obscured by his more recent fiascos, and as a result his critical reputation is now irrevocably tarnished.

The villain in his career is the blacklist, which tragically clipped his wings just as he was starting to fly. Indeed, he could not find work in Europe for five years, as producers felt American distributors would automatically ban any film with his signature. When Rififi opened, critics wrote about Dassin as if he were European. The New York Herald Tribune reported in 1961, “At one ceremony, when the award to Rififi was announced, (Dassin) was called to the dais, and... a French flag was raised above him. ‘It should have been a moment of triumph but I feel awful. They were honoring my work and I’m an American. It should have been the American flag raised in honor.’”

The blacklist thus denied Jules Dassin his roots. In 1958, it was announced that he was planning to adapt James T. Farrell’s Studs Lonigan, a project that was eventually shelved. It is one more tragedy of the blacklist that Dassin was not allowed to follow up Brute Force, The Naked City, and Thieves’ Highway with *Studs Lonigan."

—Rob Edelman

DAVES, Delmer

Nationality: American. Born: San Francisco, 24 July 1904. Education: Studied civil engineering; received law degree from Stanford University. Family: Married actress Mary Lou Lender. Career: Lived for several months in Arizona desert among Hopi and Navajo, renounced law career, and joined Pasadena Playhouse, 1925; joined James Cruze production company as property boy, 1927; scriptwriter at Warner Bros., also actor, from 1929; directed first film, Destination Tokyo, 1944; formed Diamond-D productions, 1950s. Died: September 1977.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1944 Destination Tokyo; The Very Thought of You, Hollywood Canteen
1945 Pride of the Marines (Forever in Love, Body and Soul)
1947 The Red House; Dark Passage
1948 To the Victor (d only)
1949 A Kiss in the Dark; Task Force
1950 Broken Arrow (d only)
1951 Bird of Paradise
1952 Return of the Texan (d only)
1953 Treasure of the Golden Condor; Never Let Me Go (d only)
1954 Demetrius and the Gladiators (d only); Drum Beat
1956 Jubal; The Last Wagon
1957 3:10 to Yuma (d only)
1958 Cowboy (d only); Kings Go Forth (d only); The Badlanders (d only)
1959 The Hanging Tree (d only); A Summer Place (+ pr)
1961 Parrish (+ pr); Susan Slade (+ pr)
1962 Rome Adventure (Lovers Must Learn) (+ pr)
1963 Spencer’s Mountain (+ pr)
1964 Youngblood Hawke (+ pr)
1965 The Battle of the Villa Fiorita (+ pr)

Other Films:

1915 Christmas Memories (Leonard) (role)
1925 Zander the Great (Hill) (role)
1928 The Night Flyer (Lang) (role, prop man); Three Sinners (Lee) (role); The Red Mark (Cruze) (role, prop man); Excess Baggage (Cruze) (role, prop man)
1929 So This Is College (Wood) (co-sc, role); A Man’s Man (Cruze) (bit role, prop man); The Duke Steps Out (Cruze) (role, tech adv)
1930 The Bishop Murder Case (Grinde and Burton) (role); Good News (Grinde and McGregor)
1931 Shipmates (Pollard) (co-adapt, co-dialogue, role, sc)
1932 Divorce in the Family (Riesner) (sc, role)
1933 Clear All Wires (Hill) (continuity)
1934 No More Women (Rogell) (co-sc, co-story); Dames (Enright) (sc); Flirtation Walk (Borzage) (sc)
1935 Stranded (Borzage) (co-sc); Page Miss Glory (LeRoy) (co-sc); Shipmates Forever (Borzage) (sc)
1936 The Petrified Forest (Mayo) (co-sc)
1937 The Go Getter (Berkeley) (sc); Slim (Enright) (co-sc, uncredited); The Singing Marine (Enright) (sc); She Married an Artist (Gering) (co-sc)
1938 Professor Beware (Nugent) (sc)
1939 Love Affair (McCarey) (co-sc); Thousand Dollars a Touchdown (Hogan) (sc)
1940 The Farmer’s Daughter (Hogan) (story, sc); Safari (Edward Griffith) (sc); Young America Flies (Eason) (short) (sc)
1941 The Night of January 16th (Clemens) (co-sc); Unexpected Uncle (Godfrey) (co-sc)
1942 You Were Never Lovelier (Seiter) (co-sc)
1943 Stage Door Canteen (Borzage) (sc)
1955  White Feather (Webb) (co-sc)
1957  An Affair to Remember (McCarey) (co-sc) (remake of Love Affair 1939)
1972  Seventy-five Years of Cinema Museum (Hershon and Guerra) (appearance)

Publications

By DAVES: article—
Interview with Christopher Wicking, in Screen (London), July/October 1969.

On DAVES: book—

On DAVES: articles—

On DAVES: film—

* * *

Delmer Daves is perhaps best remembered for the highly successful youth-oriented movies that he made for Warner Brothers in the late 1950s and early 1960s. A Summer Place, the definitive teenage love film, was the most financially successful of these. Yet it is unfair to relegate Daves to the realm of glossy soap opera directors. When analyzed as a whole, the body of his work reveals some fine moments. Pride of the Marines, Broken Arrow, and 3:10 to Yuma are all very different films, yet each is regarded by film historians as a classic.

After an early career in films as an actor, Daves turned to screenwriting in the early 1930s and worked, often in collaboration with others, on a variety of films, the most prominent of which were The Petrified Forest and Love Affair. When he began directing he continued to write the screenplays for his own films. His directorial debut was Destination Tokyo. While it was not a great film, this first effort was at least a cut above the glut of wartime propaganda movies being made at the time. It was also noteworthy as the only film which Cary Grant ever made without a romantic element (or even any women in the plot).

Another war film, Pride of the Marines, was one of Hollywood’s first attempts to dramatize the plight of the returning servicemen. On a par with such other celebrated movies as Bright Victory and The Men, Pride of the Marines simply showed the anxieties and frustrations of war veterans who were wounded both physically and psychologically by their experiences. The film was powerful, yet did not resort to over-dramatization. It also dealt, albeit briefly, with the sociological issue of minority soldiers who would return home to a nation perhaps unaware of the value of their contributions to their country.

Some of Daves’s most significant movies were westerns that were sympathetic to Native Americans and did not glamorize traditional western themes. Broken Arrow is often cited as the first film to portray Indians without stereotyping them, even if most of the actors were white. 3:10 to Yuma was one of the earliest “anti-hero” westerns and is regarded as a classic both in the United States and Europe. Cowboy was another atypical western. Although ostensibly a comic western, Cowboy had an underlying anti-macho theme ahead of its time. In the beginning of the film the main characters, played by Glenn Ford and Jack Lemmon, are opposites: Ford a traditional “he-man” cowboy, and Lemmon a tenderfoot. By the end of the film both characters become aware of the opposite sides of their own natures. At least a decade before the theme became popular, Cowboy showed that men’s hard and soft sides could co-exist and could make entertaining subject matter for a motion picture.

Daves’s final film, The Battle of Villa Fiorita, is regarded by most critics as a run-of-the-mill soap opera, yet even this project shows his ability to build a film around an important social theme before it became popular. In this story, which, like Cowboy, begins as a comedy and gradually becomes a drama, Daves’s characters are faced by problems which are now visible issues of social concern: divorce, remarriage (or in this case cohabitation), and the rearing of stepchildren. In this film, like A Summer Place and his other well known “soap operas,” Daves’s writing and direction make the work much better than its subject matter would suggest. Like his contemporary Douglas Sirk, whose films have been criticized in terms similar to those directed at Daves, his films are actually richer than general critical opinion would seem to indicate.

—Patricia King Hanson

De ANTONIO, Emile

Films as Director:

1963 Point of Order (+ co-pr)
1965 That’s Where the Action Is (for television) (+ pr)
1966 Rush to Judgment (+ co-pr)
1968 In the Year of the Pig (+ pr)
1969 America Is Hard to See (+ co-pr)
1971 Millhouse: A White House Comedy (Millhouse: A White Comedy) (+ pr)
1972 Painters Painting (+ pr)
1976 Underground (co-d, pr)
1983 In the King of Prussia
1989 Mr. Hoover and I

Other Films:

1961 Sunday (Drasin) (pr)
1965 Drunk (Warhol) (role)

Publications

By de ANTONIO: articles—

“Radical Scavenging: An Interview with Emile de Antonio,” with Bernard Weiner, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1971.

“Filmer de que ne montre pas l’histoire ‘officielle’,” an interview with M. Euvrard, in Cinéma Quebec (Montreal), vol. 5, no. 19, 1977.

Interview with A. Rosenthal, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1978.

Interview in Cineaste (New York), vol. 12, no. 2, 1982.

“‘History Is the Theme of All My Films,’” an interview with Gary Crowdus and Dan Georgakas, in Cineaste (New York), vol. 12, no. 2, 1982.

Emile de Antonio Interviews Himself,’’ in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Fall 1982.

‘‘My Brush with Painting,’’ in American Film (Washington, D.C.), March 1984.

‘‘Quotations from Chairman ‘Dee’: Decodifying de Antonio,’’ in Cinema Canada (Montreal), July-August 1984.

On de ANTONIO: articles—

Bazelon, David, ‘‘Background of Point of Order,’’ in Film Comment (New York), Winter 1964.

Hess, J., ‘‘Political Filmmaking: Feds Harass Film Crew,’’ in Jump Cut (Berkeley), September 1975.

Tuchman, M., ‘‘Freedom of Information,’’ in Film Comment (New York), vol. 26, no. 4, July-August 1990.

* * *

A communist with impeccable Ivy League credentials, Emile de Antonio came to filmmaking relatively late in his career. Leaving Harvard in the 1930s, he first flexed his muscles as a longshoreman on Baltimore docks. After World War II, he returned to academia, attending graduate school at Columbia University, and then teaching for a time at William and Mary College, Virginia.

The late 1950s found him in New York, engaged in get-rich-quick schemes. (With a friend, he set up “Sailor’s Surplus,” a mail order business.) More significantly, he became acquainted with several notable personalities in the New York art world. He went drinking with Rauschenberg and Jasper Johns and organized “galas” for the minimalist composer John Cage and the dancer Merce Cunningham. As far as his future filmmaking was concerned, this period was crucial: he was encountering the wealthy liberal arts patrons whose backing would later be so important to him.

De Antonio was a member of “The Group,” a “free open organization of American cinema” set up in the summer of 1961 with the avowed aim of rejecting censorship and exploding the “myth of budget.” The organization was comprised of such luminaries of the New York avant garde film scene as Jonas Mekas and Shirley Clarke. However, it was as a film producer/distributor, not as a filmmaker, that de Antonio was associated with this organization. In 1958 he had formed G–String Productions to distribute the celebrated underground classic, Pull My Daisy.

In the early 1960s, de Antonio was given access to 188 hours worth of kinetoscopes of the McCarthy hearings. He managed to raise $75,000 from his friend Eliot Pratt, the Standard Oil heir, and set to work editing.

It took him more than two years, and he went broke in the process, but in 1964 de Antonio emerged with his first documentary, Point of Order. Paul Newman offered to do a narration. De Antonio turned him down. He had already evolved his film philosophy, and it held no place for narrators: “the narrator on TV becomes a super figure who has to explain to you what you’ve seen, or what you haven’t been allowed to see. It’s not the same as the jackboot of the Nazis, but it is a kind of fascism of the mind.”

In a sense, de Antonio was the great precursor of scratch video and sampling. He described his own method as “radical scavenging”: what it entailed was expropriating footage from the television networks and editing the footage together to make a scathing critique of some aspect of American society. De Antonio devoted his energy to looking for the paraprax, the out-takes, those never-broadcast moments that had been consigned to the deepest vaults of the network archives.

The 1960s proved to be a good period for him. Although Point of Order was slammed by the New York Times, it was successful with students, who were beginning to be politicized by the Vietnam War. Pressed as to why he did not shoot his own footage, de Antonio asked critics what chance an independent filmmaker had against the all-powerful television stations, “the ruling class of America.” As he described them, an independent filmmaker would not have been allowed to get near Kennedy on that fateful day in Dallas.

Kennedy’s assassination, indeed, was the subject of de Antonio’s second film, Rush to Judgment. Sponsored in the United Kingdom by Woodfall Films, Tony Richardson’s production company, this project did not endear him to the establishment. Although officially shunned, he was privately helped by “insiders” who gave him access to sensitive material. Nonetheless, the networks had an annoying tendency of destroying the most valuable, and most incriminating, footage.

His Vietnam film, In the Year of the Pig, was again eccentrically financed. Mrs. Orville Schell, a wealthy New York socialite, gave dinner parties at which the production money was raised, and she is credited as the film’s executive producer. De Antonio managed to find an interview with U.S. General George Patton in which Patton described the young Americans in Vietnam as “a bloody good bunch of killers.”

De Antonio’s 1976 effort was Underground. He managed to track down and interview the infamous Weather Underground for this project, a fact that exasperated the authorities, who hadn’t been able to get near the group. The FBI therefore tried to subpoena the film and crew.

Not long before his death, Emile de Antonio discovered that J. Edgar Hoover and the FBI had been keeping files on him for nearly thirty years. Appalled by American “secret society,” he could not help but be amused at the same time. There was something pathetic and comic about this sinister man, Hoover, and his pet organization. De Antonio, in Mr. Hoover and I, took great pleasure in reporting FBI minutiae: the way that Hoover made all his employees wear felt hats; his admiration for the Jewish star of the television series about the FBI despite his own notorious anti-Semitism; Hoover’s insistence that his driver never take a left turn because of a previous car accident suffered by the FBI chief after such a turn. All of these tales appealed to de Antonio’s sense of irony. “I am as much Dada as I am a Marxist,” he said in an interview he conducted with himself for Film Quarterly. A strange mixture of Thomas Paine and Huckleberry Finn, Emile de Antonio was a devout patriot, who defined his role as “artist” in constructively negative terms. As far as he was concerned, art was necessarily adversarial, and he was determinedly critical and anarchistic. He saw such a stance as his duty.

—G.C. Macnab
DEARDEN, Basil

Films as Director:

1941 The Black Sheep of Whitehall (co-d)
1942 The Goose Steps Out (co-d)
1943 The Bells Go Down; My Learned Friend (co-d)
1944 The Halfway House; They Came to a City
1945 ‘The Hearse Driver’ episode and linking story of Dead of Night
1946 The Captive Heart
1947 Frieda
1948 Saraband for Dead Lovers (Saraband)
1949 ‘The Actor’ and ‘The Prisoner of War’ episodes of Train of Events (+ co-sc, Michael Relph producer); The Blue Lamp
1950 Cage of Gold; Pool of London
1951 I Believe in You (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph, co-sc)
1952 The Gentle Gunman (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph)
1953 The Square Ring (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph)
1954 The Rainbow Jacket (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph); Out of the Clouds (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph)
1955 The Ship That Died of Shame (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph, co-sc); Who Done It? (co-d + co-pr with Michael Relph)
1957 The Smallest Show on Earth
1958 Violent Playground
1959 Sapphire; The League of Gentlemen
1960 Man in the Moon; The Secret Partner
1961 Victim; All Night Long (co-d, co-pr with Relph)
1962 Life for Ruth (Walk in the Shadow)
1963 The Mind Benders; A Place to Go
1964 Woman of Straw; Masquerade
1966 Khartoum
1968 Only When I Larf; The Assassination Bureau
1970 The Man Who Haunted Himself (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1938 It’s in the Air (Kimmins) (asst d); Penny Paradise (Reed) (asst d); This Man Is News (MacDonald) (co-sc)
1939 Come on, George! (Kimmins) (asst d)
1940 Let George Do It (Varnel) (co-sc); Spare a Copper (Carstairs) (assoc pr)
1941 Young Veteran (Cavalcanti) (asst d)
1941 Turned out Nice Again (Varnel) (assoc pr)
1956 The Green Man (Day) (supervisor, uncredited)
1957 Davy (Relph) (pr)
1958 Rockets Galore (Mad Little Island) (Relph) (pr)
1959 Desert Mice (Relph) (pr)

Publications

On DEARDEN: books—

On DEARDEN: articles—

‘‘Dearden and Relph: Two on a Tandem,’’ in Films and Filming (London), July 1966.
Ellis, John, ‘‘Made in Ealing,’’ in Screen (London), Spring 1975.

Basil Dearden is, par excellence, the journeyman-director of British cinema, standing in much the same relation to Ealing (the studio for which he directed the greater part of his output) as, say, Michael Curtiz did to Warner Brothers. More than any other director, Dearden personified the spirit of Ealing films: concerned, conscientious, socially aware, but hampered by a certain innately British caution. Dearden was the complete professional, unfailingly competent and meticulous; his films were never less than thoroughly well-constructed, and he enjoyed a reputation in the industry for total reliability, invariably bringing in assignments on schedule and under budget.

Such careful craftsmanship, though, should not be equated with dullness. Dearden’s films may often have been safe, but they were rarely dull (despite the allegations of some critics). His work shows a natural flair for pace and effective action: narrative lines are clear and uncluttered, and although in many ways they have dated, his films remain eminently watchable and entertaining. In the moral climate of the time, too, Dearden’s choice of subjects showed considerable boldness. Dearden tackled such edgy topics as race (Sapphire), homosexuality (Victim), sectarian bigotry (Life for Ruth), and post-war anti-German prejudice (Frieda), always arguing for tolerance and understanding. It was perhaps inevitable, given his background and the ethos of the studio, that these ‘‘social problem’’ movies tended towards overly reasonable solutions. ‘‘Dearden’s films,’’ Charles Barr has pointed out in his definitive study Ealing Studios, ‘‘insistently generalize their moral lessons.’’

For most of his directing career Dearden worked closely with Michael Relph, who produced nearly all his films, collaborated with him on the scripts, and occasionally co-directed; after the demise of Ealing, the two men formed their own production company. Their joint output covered a wide variety of genres, including costume drama (Saraband for Dead Lovers) and comedy (The Smallest Show on Earth), as well as large-scale epic (Khartoum). Dearden’s flair for action was effectively exploited in the classic “heist” movie, The League of Gentlemen, and in The Blue Lamp, a seminal police drama and one of the first Ealing films shot almost entirely on location. Early in his career, Dearden also evinced a weakness for slightly stagey allegories in films such as Halfway House and They Came to a City, in which groups of disparate individuals are brought to a change of heart through supernatural intervention.

There can also be detected in Dearden’s films, perhaps slightly unexpectedly, a muted but poetic vision of an idealized community—seen most clearly in his first film with Relph, The Captive Heart, a sympathetic study of prisoners-of-war. “The community,” Charles Barr has noted, “is presented as part of a wider society involving all of us—and encompassing England.” In his strengths and in his weaknesses—the restraint verging on inhibition, the competent versatility tending towards lack of directorial character—Dearden was in many ways an archetypally “British” director. Anyone wishing to understand the success and limitations of post-war British cinema, and indeed of post-war British society, could do far worse than study the films of Basil Dearden.

—Theresa FitzGerald

de BROCA, Philippe

Nationality: French. Born: Paris, 15 March 1933. Family: Married 1) Michele Heurtaux, 1961 (divorced); 2) Valerie Rojan, 1987; has adopted Nepal-born son. Education: Studied at Ecole Nationale de Photographie et de Cinematographie, Paris. Career: Worked as a newsreel cameraman in Algeria, while completing military service, early 1950s; began making documentary shorts, 1954; worked as an assistant director to Claude Chabrol on Le beau serge and Les cousins (The Cousins), and on Francois Truffaut’s Les Quatre Cents Coups (The 400 Blows), 1958–59; made feature debut with Les Jeux de l’amour (The Love Game), 1960; formed Fildebroc, his production company, 1965. Awards: Silver Bear (Special Prize), Best Comedy, for Les Jeux de l’amour, 1960. Address: Artmedia, 10 Avenue Georges V, 75008 Paris, France.

Films as Director and Co-Screenwriter/Screenwriter:

- 1954 Salon nautique (doc) (short) (d only, + ph)
- 1955 Operation Gas-Oil (doc) (short) (d only, + ph); Sous un autre soleil (doc) (short) (d only, + ph)
- 1960 Les Jeux de l’amour (The Love Game); Le Farceur (The Joker)
- 1961 L’Amant de cinq jours (The 5 Day Lovers)
- 1962 ‘‘La Gourmandise’’ (‘‘Gluttony’’), episode in Les Sept Peches capitaux (The 7 Deadly Sins) (d only); Cartouche (+ ro); ‘‘La Vedette’’ episode in Les Veinards
- 1963 L’Homme de Rio (That Man from Rio)
- 1964 Un Monsieur de compagnie (Male Companion) (+ co-adapt)
- 1965 Les Tribulations d’un chinois en Chine (Up to His Ears)
- 1966 Le Roi de coeur (King of Hearts) (d only, + pr)
- 1967 ‘‘Mademoiselle Mimi’’ episode in Le Plus Vieux Metier du Monde (The Oldest Profession) (d only);
- 1968 Le Diable par la queue (The Devil by the Tail)
- 1969 Les Caprices de Marie (Give Her the Moon)
- 1971 La Poudre d’escampette (Touch and Go)
- 1972 Chere Louise
- 1973 Le Magnifique (Comment detruire la reputation du plus celebre agent secret du monde, How to Destroy the Reputation of the Greatest Secret Agent) (d only, + ro)
- 1975 L’Incorrigible
- 1977 Julie Pot de Colle (d only); Tendre Poulet (Dear Inspector, Dear Detective)
- 1978 Le Cavaleur (Practice Makes Perfect)
- 1980 On a voile la cuisse de Jupiter (Jupiter’s Thigh); Psy (d only)
- 1983 L’African (The African)
- 1984 Louisiana (Louisiane) (for TV) (d only)
- 1986 La Gitane (The Gypsy)
- 1988 Chouans!
- 1990 Les 1001 nuit (Schéhérazade)
- 1991 Les Cles du paradis (The Keys to Paradise)
- 1993 Regarde-moi quand je te quitte (for TV)
- 1995 Le Jardin des plantes (The Greenhouse) (for TV)
- 1996 Le Veilleur de nuit (for TV) (d only)
Philippe de Broca has worked consistently since the 1960s, directing films for theatrical release and television. Yet when one thinks of de Broca, one thinks not of his recent titles but of his earliest and most successful films: sincere, playfully impudent comic spoofs made with dexterity and vigor, which stress illusion over reality.

In these early films, which he also co-scripted, de Broca’s characters are nonconformists who celebrate life and the joy of personal liberation. Structurally the films are highly visual, more concerned with communicating by images than by any specifics in the scenario. And these images often are picturesque. De Broca acknowledges his desire to give pleasure to the esthetic sense and, as such, he is a popular artist. While these early films are neither as evocative as those of François Truffaut (with whom de Broca worked as an assistant director on The 400 Blows) nor as cinematic as those of Claude Chabrol (with whom de Broca worked as an assistant director on Le beau serge and Les cousins), they exude style and wit. While they might be fanciful in content, their essence is emotionally genuine.

De Broca’s films are non-tragic, and feature humorous treatments of characters and their situations. One of his favorite themes is the relationship between the sexes, explored in his earliest films—Les Jeux de l’amour, Le Farceur, and L’Amant de cinq jours—each with Jean-Pierre Cassel playing a lighthearted lover. This character appears 20 years older in Le Cavaleur, featuring Jean Rochefort as a bored, self-centered womanizer. De Broca’s most popular early-career films, however, star Jean-Paul Belmondo: Cartouche, a flavorful comedy-swashbuckler chronicling the exploits of kind-hearted criminals in 18th-century Paris; and L’Homme de Rio, a charming James Bond spoof about a soldier on leave who is led to a stunningly photographed Brazil on a chase for treasure. His most renowned effort is Le Roi de coeur, set during the final days of World War I in a town that has been abandoned by all except the residents of an insane asylum.

Thematically speaking, Le Roi de coeur is a perfect film for its time. Released just as the anti-Vietnam war movement was gaining momentum, it is a pungent satire that lampoons the very nature of war and conflict. Not surprisingly, Le Roi de coeur fast became a cult favorite among college students. It ran for six-and-a-half years alone at a Cambridge, Massachusetts, moviehouse. Le Roi de coeur is de Broca’s idea of an anti-war film. Typically, he does not focus on the calamity of a youthful hero who is robbed of his life (as in All Quiet on the Western Front), or soldiers needlessly and maddeningly put to death by a military bureaucracy (as in Paths of Glory and Breaker Morant), or the bloody slaughter of his protagonists. Deaths and tragedies in a de Broca film usually are obscured by humorous, feel-good situations. In Le Roi de coeur he gently, satirically celebrates individual freedom. His inmates appear saner than the warring society that has labeled them mad.

De Broca is more concerned with good than evil. He began his career as a newsreel cameraman in Algeria and made several documentary shorts, but switched to narrative filmmaking because he “decided the real world was just too ugly.” At his best, de Broca deals with possibilities—for peace, beauty, hope, love.

Nevertheless, the work in his first half-decade as a feature filmmaker generally is more satisfying than his efforts of the past three decades. Among de Broca’s higher-profile post-1960s films are Le Cavaleur and Tendre Poulet (Dear Inspector and Dear Detective), a romantic comedy about a female cop who rekindles a romance with an old lover while sniffing out a killer. The latter was so popular that it spawned an

Publications

By de BROCA: articles—

“‘What Directors Are Saying,’” in Action (Los Angeles), March/April 1975.

On de BROCA: articles—

* * *
American made-for-TV movie and an inferior de Broca-directed sequel, On a vole la cuisse de Jupiter (Jupiter’s Thigh). By the 1990s, de Broca mostly was directing for French television. A typical credit was Le Jardin des plantes (The Greenhouse), a chronicle of the warm and protective relationship between a little girl and her grandfather in the waning days of World War II. Le Jardin des plantes is a thematic throwback to Le Roi de coeur in that it may be interpreted as a statement about the folly of war. It also reflects on the less-than-honorable behavior of some Frenchmen and women under the German occupation. Yet despite its somber setting, Le Jardin des plantes is consistent with de Broca’s cinematic view in that it primarily is a candy-coated entertainment that exudes a sentimentality for a time and place that in reality was brutal and dangerous.

By far de Broca’s highest-profile late-career theatrical feature is Le Bossu (On Guard), which may be linked to Cartouche as a swashbuckler/ripped-bodice period piece. Le Bossu is set in the France of Louis XIV and charts the derring-do resulting from a faithful swordsman’s rescue of an infant princess from the grasp of her sinister relations. While entertaining and acclaimed—it won nine César Award nominations—Le Bossu is nothing more than a slick, by-the-numbers commercial vehicle. In the end, de Broca’s best films were those made in the 1960s.

—Rob Edelman

DE FUENTES, Fernando

Nationality: Mexican. Born: Veracruz, 13 December 1894. Career: Film editor and assistant director, 1920s; first Mexican offered opportunity to direct by Compañía Nacional Productora de Películas, 1932; producer and director for newly formed Grovas production company, 1942; co-founder, Diana Films, 1945. Died: 4 July 1958.

Films as Director:

1932 El anonimo
1933 El prisionero trece; La calandria; El tigre de Yautpec; El compadre Mendoza
1934 El fantasma del convento; Cruz diablo
1935 Vámonos con Pancho Villa; La familia Dressel
1936 Las mujeres mandan; Allá en el rancho grande
1937 Bajo el cielo de Mexico; La Zandunga
1938 La casa del ogro
1939 Papacito lindo
1940 Allá en el tropico; El jefe maximo; Creo en Dios
1941 La gallina cluca
1942 Así se quiere en Jalisco
1943 Doña Barbara; La mujer sin alma
1944 El rey se divierte
1945 Hasta que perdio Jalisco; La selva de fuego
1946 La devoradora
1948 Jalisco canta en Sevilla
1949 Hipolito el de Santa
1950 Por la puerta falsa; Crimen y castigo
1952 Los hijos de Maria Morales; Cancion de cuna
1953 Tres citas con el destino

Publications

On DE FUENTES: books—

On DE FUENTES: articles—

* * *

The first Mexican cineaste of note, Fernando De Fuentes is still considered the director whose interpretations of the Mexican revolution and whose contributions to typical Mexican genres have not been surpassed. Early sound film production in Mexico was dominated by foreigners: Russians who accompanied Eisenstein in the making of Que Viva México, Spaniards who passed through Hollywood, Cubans, and U.S. citizens who somehow ended up there. De Fuentes was one of the first Mexicans to be given a chance to direct sound films in his country. After several false starts with “grey and theatrical melodramas,” De Fuentes indicated first in Prisionero trece that his métier was the “revolutionary tragedy.” During 1910–17, Mexico passed through a cataclysmic social revolution the cultural expression of which resounded principally in the extraordinary murals of Diego Rivera, David Siquieros, and José Orozco. Fiction films did not examine this watershed event seriously until 1933 when De Fuentes made El compadre Mendoza. Far from the epic monumentality of revolutionary transformation painted on the walls by Rivera or Siquieros, El compadre Mendoza recreates the revolution from a perspective similar to Orozco’s vision of individual tragedies and private pain.

Rosalio Mendoza is the owner of a large hacienda which is constantly threatened by the conflict’s warring factions. In order to appease them, Mendoza pretends to support whichever group is currently visiting him—something he accomplishes by winning and dining his guests in a room conspicuously decorated with a portrait of the appropriate leader. Eventually, Mendoza and General Nieto (a follower of Emiliano Zapata’s agrarian revolt) become close friends. Mendoza names his son after Nieto and asks him to be the compadre (godfather). But after Mendoza is ruined economically, he betrays Nieto in order to flee to Mexico City. The emphasis on fraternal bloodletting, the corruption of ideals, and disillusion in the aftermath of the revolution is powerfully conveyed in both El compadre Mendoza and Vámonos con Pancho Villa. They remain even today the best cinematic treatments of the Mexican revolution.

De Fuentes’s work in traditional Mexican genres is also important. Allá en el Rancho Grande is the progenitor of the charro genre. The Mexican singing cowboy received his cinematic introduction to Mexico and the rest of Latin America in this immensely popular film. The attraction of such nostalgia for a never-existent Arcadia can be seen in the fact that in the year following the release of Rancho Grande, more than half of the Mexican films produced were similar pastoral fantasies, and these have continued to be a staple of Mexican cinema.

The charro genre’s domination of Mexican cinema is almost matched by films about the Mexican mother. De Fuentes directed perhaps the most palatable of such works, La gallina cluca. This film starred Sara García, the character actress who is the national paradigm of the sainted, long-suffering, self-sacrificing mother. In De Fuentes’s hands the overworked Oedipal melodrama is denied its usual histrionics and becomes an interesting work as well as the definitive film of this sub-genre.

His better films demonstrate De Fuentes’s strong narrative style, noted for its consistency and humor. They do not seem particularly dated, and De Fuentes utilizes visual techniques such as the rack focus or the dissolve particularly effectively and unobtrusively. He also makes telling use of overlay montages, à la Eisenstein or Vertov, to convey moods or concepts. In regard to singing—one of the banes of Mexican cinema—De Fuentes has been uneven. For example, in his two films on the revolution, restraint is shown and songs function well in relation to the story line. Unfortunately, Allá en el Rancho Grande and its various sequels are characteristically glutted with songs.

De Fuentes’s career as a director went from the sublime to the ridiculous. In one year he plummeted from the heights of Vámonos con Pancho Villa to the depths of Allá en el Rancho Grande. The enormous commercial success of the latter film throughout Latin America sealed De Fuentes’s fate. It was popular because De Fuentes is a talented director; but the commercial rewards for those talents came at a high price. After Vámonos con Pancho Villa, De Fuentes settled into the repetition of mediocre and conventional formula films.

—John Mraz

DELANNOY, Jean

Nationality: French. Born: Noisy-le-Sec, 8 August 1908. Education: Lille University; Paris University. Career: Began as film actor while at University (sister is actress Henriette Delannoy), late 1920s; in Service Cinématographique des Armées, then chief editor, Paramount Studios, Joinville, 1930–32; feature director, from 1935; became President of Institut des Hautes Etudes Cinématographiques (IDHEC), Paris, 1975. Awards: Best Film, Cannes festival, for La Symphonie pastorale, 1946; International Prize, Venice Festival, for Dieu a besoin des hommes, 1950.

Films as Director and Co-Scriptwriter or Co-Adaptor:

1933 Franches lippées (short)
1934 Une Vocation irrésistible (short); L’École des détectives (short)
1935 Paris-Deauville
1936 La Moule (medium-length)
1937 Ne tuez pas Dolly! (medium-length)
1938 La Vénus de l’or; L’Assassin a peur la nuit; Fièvres; Macao, l’enfer du jeu; Le Diamant noir
1939 Macao, l’énuf du jeu; Le Diamant noir
1941 Fièvres
1942 L’Assassin a peur la nuit; Ponticarral, Colonel d’Empire
1943 Macao, l’énuf du jeu (partially re-shot version with Pierre Renoir in role played by Erich von Stroheim, who was forbidden by German authorities; original version of Macao re-released after war); L’Éternel Retour (The Eternal Return)
1944 Le Bossu
1945 La Part de l’ombre (Blind Desire)
1946 La Symphonie pastorale
1947 Les Jeux sont faits (The Chips Are Down)
1948 Aux yeux du souvenir (Souvenir)
1949 Le Secret de Mayerling
1950 Dieu a besoin des hommes (God Needs Men)
1951 Le Garçon sauvage (Savage Triangle)
1952 La Minute de vérité (L’ora della verità; The Moment of Truth) (+ co-sc; “Jeanne (Joan of Arc)” episode of Destinées (Daughters of Destiny)
1953 La Route Napoléon; “Le Lit de la Pompadour” episode of Secrets d’alcoce
1954 Obsession
1955 Chiens perdus sans collier; Marie-Antoinette
1956 Notre-Dame de Paris (The Hunchback of Notre Dame)
1957 Maigret tend un piège (Inspector Maigret)
1958 Guinguette; Maigret et l’affaire Saint-Fiacre

1959 Le Baron de l’Ecluse
1960 “L’Adolescence” episode of La Française et l’amour (Love and the Frenchwoman); La Princesse de Clèves
1962 Le Rendez-vous; Venere imperiale (Vénus impériale)
1964 Les Amitis particulières (This Special Friendship); Le Majordome
1965 “Le Berceau” and “La Répétition” episodes of Le Lit à deux places (The Double Bed); Les Sultans
1967 Le Soleil des voyous (Action Man)
1969 La Peau de Torpedo
1972 Pas folle la guêpe (Action Man; “Le Lit de la Pompadour” episode of The Chips Are Down)
1986 Macao (*partially re-shot version with Pierre Renoir in role played by Erich von Stroheim, who was forbidden by German authorities; original version of Macao re-released after war));
1972 Secrets d’alcove (Daughters of Destiny)
1973 Dieu a besoin des hommes (God Needs Men); Marie de Nazareth (+ sc)

Other Films (partial list):

1926 Miss Helyett (Monca and Keroul) (role)
1927 Casanova (Volkoff) (role)
1929 La Grande Passion (Hugon) (role)
1932 La Belle Marinière (Lachman) (ed); Une Étoile disparaît (Villers) (ed); Le Fils improvisé (Guissart) (ed)
1933 Le Père prématuré (Guissart) (ed); Les Aventures du roi Pausole (Granowsky) (ed)
1934 Le Roi des Champs-Élysées (Nosseck) (ed)
1935 Michel Strogoff (de Baroncelli and Eichberg) (ed); Tovaritch (Deval) (co-ed)
1936 Club de femmes (Deval) (tech adv, co-ed); Nitchevo (de Baroncelli) (ed)
1937 Tamara la complaisante (Gandera) (tech adv, co-sc uncredited); Feu! (de Baroncelli) (ed)
1938 Le Paradis de Satan (Gandera) (tech adv)

Publications

By DELANNOY: book—

By DELANNOY: article—

On DELANNOY: book—

On DELANNOY: articles—

“Jean Delannoy,” in Film Dope (London), September 1976.

Tribute to Delannoy in Film Français (Paris), 21 February 1986.

On DELANNOY: film—

Knapp, Hubert, and Igor Barrère, Echos de plateau (on making of La Minute de vérité), 1952.

* * *

Critics have not been kind to Jean Delannoy, but the public certainly has, for nearly all his films were solid box-office hits. But Delannoy, both by personal pretension and by the subject matter of his major films, demanded more serious attention. Just as André Cayatte is France’s director of social problem films, so Delannoy may be considered its moral philosopher. La Symphonie pastorale and God Needs Man, made just after the war, brought him this reputation and remain his best-known work, along with Les Jeux sont faits made in collaboration with Sartre. But more than a score of films surround this core, few of which measure up to the ambition and values for which they stand.

Delannoy flirted with the cinema in the 1920s while working at a bank. Godard would later recall these beginnings in his caricature of Delannoy “going into the Billancourt studios briefcase in hand; you would have sworn he was going into an insurance office.” His initial training as an editor provided him with a sense of dramatic economy that may be the reason for his popular success and critical failure. His calculated distance, even coolness, alienated many critics, most notably the passionate New Wave cinephiles at Cahiers du Cinéma. No one would have paid Delannoy any attention had he not turned away from competent studio dramas to stronger material. Pontcarral was his first remarkable effort, bringing him fame as a man of conviction when this Napoleonic adventure tale was interpreted as a direct call to resistance against the Nazi occupation forces.

He was then chosen to help Jean Cocteau bring to the screen L’Éternel Retour. Whether, as some suspect, Cocteau pushed Delannoy far beyond his usually cautious methods, or because the legendary tragedy of this Tristan and Isolde update was perfect material for the frigidity of his style, the film was a striking success, haunting in its bizarre imagery and in the mysterious implications of its plot and dialogue.

Just after the war came the films La Symphonie pastorale and Dieu a besoin des hommes, already mentioned as central to Delannoy as an auteur. Evidently, Gide, Sartre, and Queffelec inspired him to render great moral and philosophical issues in a dramatically rigorous way. Today these films seem overly cautious and pretty, even prettified. But in their day they garnered worldwide respect, the first winning the Grand Prize at Cannes in 1946 and the last the Grand Prize at Venice in 1950. The cinematic ingenuity they display, particularly in the use of geography as a moral arena (a snowy alpine village, a destitute seacoast village), and in the taut editing, gives some, though not sufficient, justification for the staginess of the weighty dialogue.

Delannoy became, perhaps, the director most maligned by Cahiers du Cinéma because of the battle he fought with Bresson over rights to Diary of a Country Priest (which Bresson won) and La Princesse de Clèves (which Delannoy won). Accusations of his non-authenticity were borne out in the many hack productions he directed in the 1950s, including a super-production of Notre-Dame de Paris. While none of these films is without some merit, the 1960 Princesse de Clèves being full of tasteful production values, his style more and more represented the most deprecated face of the “cinema of quality.”

——Dudley Andrew

DE MILLE, Cecil B.

Nationality: American. Born: Cecil Blount De Mille in Ashfield, Massachusetts, 12 August 1881. Education: Pennsylvania Military Academy, Chester, 1896–98; American Academy of Dramatic Arts, New York, 1898–1900. Family: Married Constance Adams, 16 August 1902, two sons, two daughters. Career: Actor, playwright, stage producer, and associate with mother in De Mille Play Co. (theatrical agency), to 1913; co-founder, then director-general, of Jesse L. Lasky Feature Play Co., 1913 (which became Paramount Pictures Corp. after merger, 1918); directed first film, The Squaw Man, 1914; founder, Mercury Aviation Co., 1919; established De Mille Pictures Corp., 1924; joined MGM as producer-director, 1928; co-founder, Screen Directors Guild, 1931; independent producer for Paramount, 1932; producer, Lux Radio Theater of the Air, 1936–45. Awards: Outstanding Service Award, War Agencies of the Government of the U.S.; Special Oscar “for 37 years of brilliant showmanship,” 1949; Irving Thalberg Award, Academy, 1952; Milestone Award, Screen Producers’ Guild, 1956; Chevalier de Légion d’honneur,

!

Cecil B. De Mille
France; Honorary doctorate, University of Southern California. Died: 21 January 1959.

Films as Director:

1914  The Squaw Man (The White Man) (co-d, sc, bit role); The Call of the North (+ sc, introductory appearance); The Virginian (+ sc, co-ed); What’s His Name (+ sc, ed); The Man from Home (+ sc, ed); Rose of the Rancho (+ sc, ed); Brewster’s Millions (co-d, uncredited, sc); The Master Mind (co-d, uncredited, sc); The Man on the Box (co-d, uncredited, sc); The Only Son (co-d, uncredited, sc); The Ghost Breaker (co-d, uncredited, co-sc)
1915  The Girl of the Golden West (+ sc, ed); The Warrens of Virginia (+ sc, ed); The Unafraid (+ sc, ed); The Captive (+ co-sc, ed); The Wild Goose Chase (+ co-sc, ed); The Arab (+ co-sc, ed); Chimmie Fadden (+ co-sc, ed); Kindling (+ sc, ed); Carmen (+ sc, ed); Chimmie Fadden out West (+ co-sc, ed); The Cheat (+ co-sc, ed); The Golden Chance (+ co-sc, ed); The Goose Girl (co-d with Thompson, uncredited, co-sc)
1916  Temptation (+ co-story, ed); The Trail of the Lonesome Pine (+ sc, ed); The Heart of Nora Flynn (+ ed); Maria Rosa (+ ed); The Dream Girl (+ ed)
1917  Joan the Woman (+ ed); A Romance of the Redwoods (+ co-sc, ed); The Little American (+ co-sc, ed; The Woman God Forgot (+ ed); The Devil Stone (+ ed); Nan of Music Mountain (co-d with Melford, uncredited); Lost and Won
1918  The Whispering Chorus (+ ed); Old Wives for New (+ ed); We Can’t Have Everything (+ co-ed); Till I Come Back to You; The Squaw Man
1919  Don’t Change Your Husband; For Better, for Worse; Male and Female (The Admirable Crichton)
1920  Why Change Your Wife?; Something to Think About 1921  Forbidden Fruit (+ pr; The Affairs of Anatol (A Prodigal Knight); Fool’s Paradise
1922  Saturday Night; Manslaughter; Don’t Tell Everything (co-d with Wood, uncredited) (incorporates two reel unused The Affairs of Anatol footage)
1923  Adam’s Rib; The Ten Commandments
1924  Triumph (+ pr); Feet of Clay
1925  The Golden Bed; The Road to Yesterday
1926  The Volga Boatman
1927  The King of Kings
1929  The Godless Girl; Dynamite (+ pr)
1930  Madame Satan (+ pr)
1931  The Squaw Man (+ pr)
1932  The Sign of the Cross (+ pr) (re-released 1944 with add’l footage)
1933  This Day and Age (+ pr)
1934  Four Frightened People (+ pr); Cleopatra (+ pr)
1935  The Crusades (+ pr)
1937  The Plainsman (+ pr)
1938  The Buccaneer (+ pr)
1939  Union Pacific (+ pr)
1940  North West Mounted Police (+ pr, prologue narration)
1942  Reap the Wild Wind (+ pr, prologue narration)
1944  The Story of Dr. Wassell (+ pr)
1947  Unconquered (+ pr)
1949  Samson and Delilah (+ pr, prologue narration)
1952  The Greatest Show on Earth (+ pr, narration, introductory appearance)
1956  The Ten Commandments (+ pr, prologue narration)

Other Films:

1914  Ready Money (Apfel) (co-sc); The Circus Man (Apfel) (co-sc); Cameo Kirby (Apfel) (co-sc)
1915  The Country Boy (Thompson) (co-sc); A Gentleman of Leisure (Melford) (sc); The Governor’s Lady (Melford) (co-sc); Snobs (Apfel) (co-sc)
1916  The Love Mask (Reicher) (co-sc)
1917  Betty to the Rescue (Reicher) (co-sc, supervisor)
1923  Hollywood (Cruze) (guest appearance)
1930  Free and Easy (Sedgwick) (guest appearance)
1935  The Hollywood You Never See (short) (seen directing Cleopatra); Hollywood Extra Girl (Moulton) (seen directing The Crusades)
1942  Star Spangled Rhythm (Marshall) (guest appearance)
1947  Variety Girl (Marshall) (guest appearance); Jens Mansson i Amerika (Jens Mansson in America) (Janzon) (guest appearance); Aid to the Nation (short) (appearance)
1950  Sunset Boulevard (Wilders) (role as himself)
1952  Son of Paleface (Tashlin) (guest appearance)
1956  The Buster Keaton Story (Sheldon) (guest appearance)
1957  The Heart of Show Business (Staub) (narrator)
1958  The Buccaneer (pr, supervisor, introductory appearance)

Publications

By DE MILLE: book—

By DE MILLE: articles—

“‘After Seventy Pictures,’” in Films in Review (New York), March 1956.
“‘De Mille Answers His Critics,’” in Films and Filming (London), March 1958.

By DE MILLE: plays—

The Royal Mounted (1899)
The Return of Peter Grimm, with David Belasco

On DE MILLE: books—

De Mille, Agnes, Dance to the Piper, New York, 1951.
Crowther, Bosley, The Lion’s Share, New York, 1957.
Koury, Phil, Yes, Mr. De Mille, New York, 1959.

On DE MILLE: articles—

Mandel, P.R., “Parting the Red Sea (and Other Miracles),” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), April 1983.

For much of his forty-year career, the public and the critics associated Cecil B. De Mille with a single kind of film, the epic. He certainly made a great many of them: The Sign of the Cross, The Crusades, King of Kings, two versions of The Ten Commandments, The Greatest Show on Earth, and others. As a result, De Mille became a symbol of Hollywood during its “Golden Age.” He represented that which was larger than life, often too elaborate, but always entertaining. By having such a strong public personality, however, De Mille came to be neglected as a director, even though many of his films—not just the epics—stand out as extraordinary.

Although he made films until 1956, De Mille’s masterpiece may well have come in 1915 with The Cheat. Even this early in his career, we can locate some of the motifs that turn up again and again in De Mille’s work: a talering upper-class marriage, the allure and exoticism of the Far East, and sexual attraction equated with hypnotic control. He also made a major aesthetic advancement in the use of editing in The Cheat that soon became a part of the repertoire of most filmmakers.

For the cinema’s first twenty years, editing was based primarily on following action. During a chase, when actors exited screen right, the next shot had them entering screen left; or, a director might cut from a person being chased to those characters doing the chasing. In either case, the logic of the action controls the editing, which in turn gives us a sense of the physical space of a scene. But in The Cheat, De Mille used his editing to create a sense of psychological space. Richard Hardy, a wealthy businessman, confronts his wife with her extravagant bills, but Mrs. Hardy can think only of her lover, Haka, who is equally obsessed with her. De Mille provides a shot-counter-shot here, but the scene does not cut from Mr. Hardy to his wife, even though the logic of the action and the dialogue seems to indicate that it should. Instead, the shots alternate between Mrs. Hardy and Haka, even though the two lovers are miles apart. This sort of editing, which follows thoughts rather than actions, may seem routine today, but in 1915 it was a major development in the method of constructing a sequence.

As a visual stylist, however, De Mille became known more for his wit than for his editing innovations. At the beginning of The Affairs of Anatol, for instance, our first view of the title character, Anatol DeWitt Spencer, is of his feet. He taps them nervously while he waits for his wife to make breakfast. Our first view of Mrs. Spencer is also of her feet—a maid gives them a pedicure. In just seconds, and with only two shots, De Mille lets us know that this couple is in trouble. Mrs. Spencer’s toenails must dry before Anatol can eat. Also from these opening shots, the viewers realize that they have been placed firmly within the realm of romantic comedy. Such closeups have no place within a melodrama.

One normally does not think of De Mille in terms of pairs of shots. Instead, one thinks on a large scale, and remembers the crowd scenes (the lions-versus-Christians extravaganza in The Sign of the Cross), the huge upper-crust social functions (the charity gala in The Cheat), the orgiastic parties (one of which takes place in a dirigible in Dynamite), and the bathrooms that De Mille turns into colossal marble shrines.

De Mille began directing in the grand style quite early in his career. In 1915, with opera star Geraldine Farrar in the lead role, he made one of the best film versions of Carmen, and two years later, again with Farrar, he directed Joan the Woman. Again and again, De Mille would refer to history as a foundation to support the believability of his stories, as if his most obvious excesses could be justified if they were at least remotely based on real-life incidents. A quick look at his filmography shows many films based on historical events (often so far back in the past that accuracy hardly becomes an issue): The Sign of the Cross, The Crusades, Union Pacific, Northwest Mounted Police, and others. When history was inconvenient, De Mille made use of a literary text to give his films a high gloss of acceptability and veracity. In the opening credits of The Affairs of Anatol, for instance, De Mille stresses that the story derives from the play by Schnitzler.

In both his silent and sound films, De Mille mixes Victorian morality with sizable doses of sex and violence. The intertitles of Why Change Your Wife?, for example, rail against divorce as strongly as any nineteenth-century marital tract, but the rest of the film deals openly with sexual obsession, and shows two women in actual physical combat over one man. Similarly, all of De Mille’s religious epics extol the Christian virtues while at the same time reveling in scenes depicting all of the deadly sins. Though it is tension between extremes that makes De Mille’s films so intriguing, critics have often made this aspect of his work seem laughable. Even today De Mille rarely receives the serious recognition and study that he deserves.

—Eric Smoodin

DEMME, Jonathan

Films as Director:

1974 Caged Heat (+ sc)
1976 Crazy Mama
1977 Citizen’s Band (Handle with Care)
1979 Last Embrace
1980 Melvin and Howard
1983 Swing Shift (co-d)
1984 Stop Making Sense (doc)
1986 Something Wild (+ co-pr)
1987 Swimming to Cambodia
1988 Married to the Mob; Famous All over Town
1991 The Silence of the Lambs; Cousin Bobby (doc)
1993 Philadelphia (+ co-pr)
1994 The Complex Sessions
1997 Subway Stories: Tales from the Underground (exec pr)
1998 Storefront Hitchcock; Beloved (pr)

Other Films:

1970 Sudden Terror (Eyewitness) (Irwin Allen) (music coordinator)
1972 Angels Hard as They Come (Viola) (pr, co-sc); The Hot Box (Viola) (pr, co-sc)
1973 Black Mama, White Mama (Romero) (co-story)
1985 Into the Night (Landis) (role)
1990 Miami Blues (pr)

1993 Household Saints (Savoca) (exec pr); Amos and Andrew (exec pr)
1995 Devil in a Blue Dress (exec pr)
1996 Mandela (pr)
1998 Shadrach (exec pr)
1999 Janis (exec pr)
2000 Maangamizi: The Ancient One (exec pr)

Publications

By DEMME: articles—

‘‘Demme Monde,’’ an interview with Carlos Clarens, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1980.
‘‘Identity Check,’’ an interview with Gavin Smith in Film Comment (New York), January/February 1991.

On DEMME: book—

On DEMME: articles—

Kehr, Dave, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1977.

251
Jonathan Demme has proven himself to be one of the more acute observers of the inner life of America during the course of a directorial career that began in the early 1970s, though he began as just another protégé of the Roger Corman apprentice school of filmmaking. Demme’s concern with character—focused particularly through the observation of telling eccentricities—is perhaps his trademark, combined with a vitality and willingness to use the frameworks of various genres to their fullest extent. A film such as Something Wild, for example, combines a tale of character and relationship development in an exhilarating movie which successfully mixes classic screwball comedy (you could imagine Hepburn and Tracy in the leads) with a very real menace in the closing stages that extends earlier comic confusion into the deadlier paranoia of the thriller.
Perhaps inspired by the “anything goes” aura of his Corman days, Demme has never been afraid to experiment with mood and subject matter in his films: Hitchcockian suspense in The Last Embrace, the possibilities of monologue in Swimming to Cambodia, romantic comedy in Swing Shift, horror in The Silence of the Lambs, and gangster conventions in Married to the Mob. Even his earliest films—Caged Heat and Fighting Mad (which he also wrote)—showed Demme exploiting the possibilities offered by the sex-and-violence format (rampaging girl-gangs in the first, rampaging rednecks in the second) for original and highly distinctive exploration of subjects and style.

Caged Heat also gave early signs of Demme’s concern with those struggling to take control of their lives—particularly, but not exclusively, women. This examination of self-determination has remained a theme throughout his work, from the women prisoners of Caged Heat and the munitions worker (Goldie Hawn) in Swing Shift to the central characters in Something Wild (Melanie Griffith) and Married to the Mob (Michelle Pfeiffer), and contributed to his reputation as a feminist filmmaker. Their struggle to establish themselves against patriarchal attitudes epitomizes, for Demme, the struggles of the underdog, which he has called “heroic.” This real concern for his characters is clear in the (usually affectionate) intensity with which they—and their lives—are portrayed, and Demme recently described his films as “a little old-fashioned, at the same time as we try to make them modern.”

Demme is concerned with entertaining a mass audience, and it is probably unwise to consider the low-key mood of the earlier critically-adored films Citizen’s Band (a black comedy that explores lack of communication through a small town’s obsession with CB-radio) and Melvin and Howard (an offbeat comedy based on a true story of a working-class man who gave a lift to a hobo Howard Hughes in the Nevada desert) as being necessarily closest to his own heart. Both films, however good they may be, were also conscious reactions to the over-the-top nature of earlier Corman-inspired work.

Misjudgment of Demme’s concerns is nothing new for the filmmaker. His much-noted focus on the everyday kitch of America, for example, is driven more by an understanding of its importance than a yardstick by which America consumer society measures itself (“it’s our kind of fetishism”) than with being a desire to be “hip.” For Demme, observing kitsch is simply a form of realism in a country where the bizarre is often real.

Though much concerned with achieving an honest view of character, Demme is not uncaring about stylistic direction. A sequence such as the series of out-takes used for the final credits of Married to the Mob is one mark of a freeliving approach to filmmaking that has roots in the knowing wit of the French New Wave (Demme cites Truffaut as an early influence), while his pared-down vision of a Talking Heads concert in Stop Making Sense is a distinctive, classy example of the rock film which pointedly eschews the tacky visual trappings too often associated with the genre.

Ultimately, though, his concern is with character rather than style—content over form. Demme is concerned more with exploring humanity than with proving himself an auteur for film critics. His own description of Married to the Mob offers an excellent insight into what he has sought in his work. “It was intelligent fun, it didn’t patronise the characters or the audience, it was good-hearted. Those are tough commodities to come by.” Since his late 1980s work, Demme has gone on to make two of the higher-profile films of the 1990s. The Silence of the Lambs, based on the Thomas Harris bestseller, was a film about a young FBI trainee (Jodie Foster) who locks horns with Hannibal Lecter (Anthony Hopkins), a psychopathic, cannibalistic murderer. The film, which featured fine performances and excellent direction, earned Oscars for Best Picture, Director, Actor, Actress and Adapted Screenplay—quite a haul for what is essentially a big-budget splatter film. In quite a change of pace, Demme next directed Philadelphia, a film that stars Tom Hanks as Andrew Beckett, an AIDS-afflicted lawyer who fights the system after being fired from a prestigious Philadelphia law firm. Upon the film’s release, gay activists complained—sometimes bitterly—that the film soft-pedals its subject. However, Philadelphia was not produced for those who already are highly politicized and need no introduction to the reality of AIDS. The film was made for the masses who do not live in urban gay enclaves, and who have never met—or think they have never met—a homosexual, let alone a person with AIDS. As a drama, Philadelphia is not without flaws. The members of Beckett’s family are unfeelingly supportive and understanding, a much-too-simplistic ideal in a world in which many gays and lesbians are shunned by their relatives. It is also difficult to accept the subtle changes that occur within Joe Miller (Denzel Washington), the homophobic lawyer who takes Beckett’s case. But Philadelphia does succeed in showing that homosexuals are human beings, people who deserve to be treated fairly and civilly. It enjoyed a mainstream success with audiences who normally might be turned off by a more radical, politically loaded (let alone sexually frank) film about gays or AIDS.

—Norman Miller, updated by Rob Edelman

DEMY, Jacques

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1956 Le Sabotier du Val de Loire
1957 Le Bel Indifférent
1958 Le Musée Grévin
1959 La Mère et l’infant (co-d); Ars
1961 Lola
1962 “La Luxure” (Lust) episode of Les Sept Pêchés capitaux (Seven Deadly Sins)
1963 La Baie des Anges (Bay of the Angels)
1964 Les Paraphlues de Cherbourg (The Umbrellas of Cherbourg)
1965 Les Demoiselles de Rochefort (The Young Girls of Rochefort)
1969 The Model Shop (+ pr)
1971 Peau d’âne (Donkey Skin)
1972 The Pied Piper of Hamelin (The Pied Piper)
1973 L’Événement le plus important depuis que l’homme a marché sur la lune (A Slightly Pregnant Man)
Jacques Demy

1978  Lady Oscar
1982  Une Chambre en ville (A Room in Town)
1985  Parking
1988  Trois Places pour le 26 (Three Places for the 26th)

Other Films:

1954  Lourdes et ses miracles (Rouquier) (asst d)
1955  Arthur Honegger (Rouquier) (asst d)
1956  S.O.S. Noronha (Rouquier) (asst d)
1959  Les Quatre Cents Coups (Truffaut) (role as policeman)
1960  Paris nous appartient (Rivette) (role as guest at party)
1991  Jacquot de Nantes (role as himself)

Publications

By DEMY: articles—

“I Prefer the Sun to the Rain,” in Film Comment (New York), Spring 1965.
Interview with Marsha Kinder, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1967.

Interview and biofilmography, in Film Dope (London), September 1976.
Interview with G. Hastrate, in Cinéma (Paris), July/August 1981.

On DEMY: book—

On DEMY: articles—

Roud, Richard, “‘Rondo Galant,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1964.
Billard, Ginette, “Jacques Demy and His Other World,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1964.
“Journals: Gilbert Adair from Paris,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1979.
“Demy Issue” of Cinéma (Paris), July/August 1981.

On DEMY: films—

* * *

Jacques Demy’s first feature film, Lola, is among the early distinguished products of the New Wave and is dedicated to Max Ophüls. These two facts in conjunction define its particular character. It proved to be the first in a series of loosely interlinked films (the intertextuality is rather more than a charming gimmick, relating as it does to certain thematic preoccupations already established in Lola itself); arguably, it remains the richest and most satisfying work so far in Demy’s erratic, frustrating, but also somewhat underrated career.
The name and character of Lola (Anouk Aimée) herself can be traced to two previous celebrated female protagonists: the Lola Montès of Max Ophüls’s film of that name, and the Lola-Lola (Marlene Dietrich) of von Sternberg’s The Blue Angel, to which Demy pays homage in a number performed by Aimée in a top hat. The explicit philosophy of Lola Montès (“For me, life is movement”) is enacted in Demy’s film by the constant comings and goings, arrivals and departures, and intricate intercrossings of the characters. Ophüls’s work has often been linked to concepts of fate; at the same time the auteurs of the early New Wave were preoccupied with establishing Freedom—as a metaphysical principle, to be enacted in their professional methodology. The tension between fate and freedom is there throughout Demy’s work. Lola’s credit sequence alternates the improvisatory freedom of jazz with the slow movement of Beethoven’s 7th Symphony. The latter musical work is explicitly associated with destiny in the form of the huge white American car that brings back Michel, Lola’s lover and father of her child, who, like his predecessors in innumerable folk songs, has left her for seven years to make his fortune. No film is more intricately and obsessively patterned, with all the characters intertwined: the middle-aged woman used to be Lola (or someone like her), her teenage daughter may become Lola (or someone like her). Yet neither resembles Lola as she is in the film: everyone is different, yet everyone is interchangeable.

Two subsequent Demy films relate closely to Lola. In Les Parapluies de Cherbourg, Roland, Lola’s rejected lover, recounts his brief liaison with Lola in the visual accompaniment of a flashback to the arcade that was one of their meeting-places. In addition, Lola herself reappears in The Model Shop. Two other films are bound in to the series as well. Les Demoiselles de Rochefort is linked by means of a certain cheating on the part of Demy—Lola has been found murdered and dismembered in a laundry basket, but the corpse is a different Lola. Especially poignant, as the series continues, is the treatment of the abrupt, unpredictable, seemingly fortuitous happy ending. At the end of Lola, Lola drives off with Michel and their child (as Roland of Parapluies, discarded and embittered, departs on his diamond-smuggling trip to South Africa). At the conclusion of Le Baie des Anges—a film that, at the time, revealed no connection with Lola—Jackie (Jeanne Moreau), a compulsive gambler, manages to leave the casino to follow her lover before she knows the result of her bet: two happy endings which are exhilarating precisely because they are so arbitrary. Then, several films later, in Model Shop, Lola recounts how her great love Michel abandoned her to run off with a compulsive gambler called Jackie. Thus both happy endings are reversed in a single blow. It is not so much that Demy doesn’t believe in happy endings: he simply doesn’t believe in permanent ones (as ‘‘life is movement’’). The ambivalent, bittersweet ‘‘feel’’ of Demy is perhaps best summed up in the end of Les Parapluies de Cherbourg, where the lovers, now both married to others, accidentally meet, implicitly acknowledge their love, and return with acceptance to the relationships to which they are committed. Outside the Lola series, Demy’s touch has been uncertain. His two fairy-tale films, Peau d’ane and The Pied Piper, unfortunately tend to confirm the common judgment that he is more a decorator than a creator. But he should not be discounted. A Room in Town, a return to the Lola mode if not to the Lola characters, was favorably received. Demy’s final two credits, Parking and Three Places for the 26th, are musicals which disappointed in that they were unable to capture the spark of his earlier work. Agnes Varda, his wife of almost three decades, then directed a film about Demy titled Jacquot de Nantes, which was released a year after his death. The film is a poignant, straight-from-the-heart record of the measure of a man’s life, with Varda shifting between interviews with Demy (tenderly shot in extreme close-up), sequences from his films, and a narrative which details the youth of Demy in Nantes during the 1940s and relates how he cultivated a love of the movies. The film works best, however, as a beautiful and poignantly composed love letter. Its essence is summed up in one of its opening shots: the camera pans the content of a watercolor, focusing first on a nude woman, then on a nude man, and finally on their interlocking hands.

Jacquot de Nantes is obviously a very personal film. But it was not meant to be a tribute; rather, it was conceived and filmed when Demy was still alive. ‘‘Jacques would speak about his childhood, which he loved,’’ Varda explained at a New York Film Festival press conference. ‘‘His memories were very vivid. I told him, ‘Why don’t you write about them?’ So he did, and he let me read the pages. The more he wrote the more he remembered—even the names of the children who sat next to him in school. Most children do not know what they want to do when they grow up. But Jacques did, from the time he was 12. He had an incredible will. So I said, ‘This [material] would make a good film.’ I wrote the script, and I tried to capture the spirit of Jacques and his family, and the way people spoke and acted in [the 1940s]. We shot the film in the exact [locations] in which he grew up. I also filmed an interview with him. It’s just Jacques speaking about his childhood. It’s not a documentary about Jacques Demy. It’s just him saying, ‘Yes, this is true. This is my life.’ ‘‘He saw most of the final [version]. When Jacques ‘‘went away,’’ I had to finish the film. It was difficult, but that’s the only thing I know. I think the film makes Jacques very alive.’’

Demy was the subject of two follow-ups to Jacquot de Nantes, also directed by Varda: The Young Girls Turn 25, a sentimental reminiscence of the filming of The Young Girls of Rochefort and The World of Jacques Demy, an intensely intimate documentary-biography which includes clips from his films and interviews with those who worked with and respected him.

—Robin Wood, updated by Rob Edelman

---

DE PALMA, Brian

Nationality: American. Born: Newark, New Jersey, 11 September 1940. Education: Attended Columbia University, New York, and Sarah Lawrence College (writing fellowship), 1963–64. Family: Married 1) actress Nancy Allen, 1979 (divorced, 1984); 2) producer Gale Anne Hurd (divorced); 3) Darnell De Palma, 1995 (divorced, 1997); one child. Career: Directed first feature, Murder a la Mod, 1967; also film teacher and instructor. Awards: Rosenthal Foundation award for Woton’s Wake, 1963; Silver Bear Award, Berlin Festival, for Greetings, 1969.

Films as Director:

- 1961 Icarus (short); 660214, the Story of an IBM Card (short)
- 1963 Woton’s Wake (short)
- 1964 Jennifer (short)
- 1965 Bridge That Gap (short)
- 1966 Show Me a Strong Town and I’ll Show You a Strong Bank (short); The Responsive Eye (doc)
1967 Murder a la Mod (+ sc, ed)
1968 Greetings (+ co-sc, ed)
1969 The Wedding Party (+ pr, ed, co-sc; release delayed from 1966)
1970 Dionysus in ‘69 (co-d, co-ph, co-ed; completed 1968); Hi, Mom! (+ co-sc)
1972 Get to Know Your Rabbit
1973 Sisters (Blood Sisters) (+ co-sc)
1974 Phantom of the Paradise (+ sc)
1976 Obsession (+ co-sc); Carrie
1978 The Fury
1979 Home Movies
1980 Dressed to Kill (+ sc)
1981 Blow Out (+ sc)
1983 Scarface
1984 Body Double (+ pr, sc)
1986 Wise Guys
1987 The Untouchables
1989 Casualties of War
1990 The Bonfire of the Vanities (+ pr, role as Prison Guard)
1992 Raising Cain (+ sc)
1993 Carlito’s Way
1996 Mission: Impossible
1998 Snake Eyes (+ co-sc, pr)
2000 Mission to Mars; Mr. Hughes

Publications

By DE PALMA: articles—

Interview in The Film Director as Superstar, by Joseph Gelmis, Garden City, New York, 1970.
Interview with E. Margulies, in Action (Los Angeles), September/October 1974.
“Double Trouble,” an interview with Marcia Pally, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1984.

On DE PALMA: books—

Nepoti, Roberto, Brian De Palma, Florence, 1982.

Bliss, Michael, Brian De Palma, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1983.

On DE PALMA: articles—

Matusa, P., “Corruption and Catastrophe: De Palma’s Carrie,” in Film Quarterly (Berkley), Fall 1977.

Jameson, R.T., “Style vs. ‘Style’,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1980.

Denby, David, and others, “Pornography: Love or Death?” in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1984.

Braudy, Leo, “The Sacraments of Genre: Coppola, De Palma, Scorsese,” in Film Quarterly (Los Angeles), Spring 1986.

Hampton, Howard, “‘Rerun for Your Life: TV’s Search and Destroy Mission,’” in Film Comment (New York), July-August 1996.

Vaz, Mark Cotta, “Crusing the Digital Backlot,” in Cinefex (Riverside), September 1996.

* * *

The conventional dismissal of Brian De Palma—that he is a mere “Hitchcock imitator”—though certainly unjust, provides a useful starting point, the relation being far more complex than such a description suggests. It seems more appropriate to talk of symbiosis than of imitation: if De Palma borrows Hitchcock’s plot-structures, the impulse is rooted in an authentic identification with the Hitchcock thematic that results in (at De Palma’s admittedly infrequent best) valid variations that have their own indisputable originality. Sisters and Dressed to Kill are modeled on Psycho; Obsession and Body Double on Vertigo; Body Double also borrows from Rear Window, as does Blow Out. The debt is of course enormous, but—at least in the cases of Sisters, Obsession, and Blow Out, De Palma’s three most satisfying films to date—the power and coherence of the films testifies to the genuineness of the creativity.

Central to the work of both directors are the tensions and contradictions arising out of the way in which gender has been traditionally constructed in a male-dominated culture. According to Freud, the human infant, while biologically male or female, is not innately “masculine” or “feminine”—in order to construct the socially correct man and woman of patriarchy, the little girl’s masculinity and the little boy’s femininity must be repressed. This repression tends to be particularly rigorous and particularly damaging in the male, where it is compounded by the pervasive association of “femininity” with castration (on both the literal and symbolic levels). The significance of De Palma’s best work (and, more powerfully and consistently, that of Hitchcock before him) lies in its eloquent evidence of what happens when the repression is partially unsuccessful. The misogyny of which both directors have been accused, expressing itself in the films’ often extreme outbursts of violence against women (both physical and psychological), must be read as the result of their equally extreme identification with the “feminine” and the inevitable dread that such an identification brings with it.

_Sisters_ is concerned single-mindedly with castration: the symbolic castration of the woman within patriarchy, the answering literal castration that is the form of her revenge. The basis concept of female Siamese twins, one active and aggressive, one passive and submissive, is a brilliant inspiration, the action of the entire film arising out of the attempts by men to destroy the active aspect in order to construct the “feminine” woman who will accept her subordination. The aggressive sister Dominique (dead, but still alive as Danielle’s subconscious) is paralleled by Grace Collier (Jennifer Salt), the assertive young reporter who usurps the accoutrements of “masculinity” and eventually assumes Dominique’s place in the extravagant climactic hallucination sequence in which the woman’s castration is horrifyingly reasserted. _Sisters_, although weakened by De Palma’s inability to take Grace seriously enough or give the character the substance the allegory demands, remains his closest to a completely satisfying film: the monstrousness of woman’s oppression under patriarchy and its appalling consequences for both sexes have never been rendered more vividly. _Blow Out_ rivals it in coherence and surpasses it in sensitivity: one would describe it as De Palma’s masterpiece were it not for one un pardonable and unfortunately extended lapse—the entirely gratuitous sequence depicting the murder of the prostitute in the railway station, which one can account for only in terms of a fear that the film was not “spicy” enough for the box office (it failed anyway). It can stand as a fitting counterpart to _Sisters_, a rigorous dissection of the egoism fostered in the male by the culture’s obsession with “masculinity.” It is clear that Travolta’s obsession with establishing the reality of his perceptions has little to do with an impersonal concern for truth and everything to do with his need to establish and assert the symbolic phallus at whatever cost—the cost involving, crucially, the manipulation and exploitation of a woman, eventually precipitating her death. Since _Body Double_—a tawdry ragbag of a film that might be seen as De Palma’s gift to his detractors—De Palma seems to have abandoned the Hitchcock connection, and it is not yet clear that he has found a strong thematic with which to replace it. _The Untouchables_ seems a work of empty efficiency; it is perhaps significant that one remains uncertain whether to take the patriarchal idyll of Elliott Ness’s domestic life straight or as parody. _Casualties of War_ is more interesting, though severely undermined by the casting of the two leads: one grasps the kind of contrast De Palma had in mind, but it is not successfully realized in that between Sean Penn’s shameless mugging and Michael J. Fox’s intractable blandness. Like most Hollywood movies on Vietnam, the film suffers from the inability to see Asians in terms other than an undifferentiated “otherness”: it is symptomatic that the two Vietnamese girls, past and present, are played by the same actress. His return to the film of political protest (and specifically to the Vietnam War) brings De Palma’s career to date full circle: his early work in an independent avant-garde (Greetings, _Hi, Mom!_ ) is too often overlooked. But nothing in _Casualties of War_, for all the strenuousness of its desire to disturb, achieves the genuinely disorienting force of the remarkable “Be Black, Baby” sections of _Hi, Mom!_. Following _Casualties of War_—a film to which he had a deep personal commitment, whatever its success or failure as a comment upon the Vietnam War, violence against women, or the power of traumatic memory—De Palma seemed intent upon remaking his own public image by choosing an unusual property for him, the social satire _The Bonfire of the Vanities_. He did put a personal stamp upon the material, most notably (and paradoxically) by paying tribute to the Orson Welles of _Touch of Evil_, opening the film with an extremely long and intricate tracking shot and using distorting wide-angle lenses almost constantly (though less imaginatively than Welles). Unfortunately the visual flair did nothing to compensate for some disastrous miscastings and craven attempts to soften the book’s scathing cynicism, or for the unfocused script in general and De Palma’s own inability to do satiric comedy without obnoxious overemphasis. _Raising Cain_, a return to more comfortable territory—the lurid pop-Freudian thriller, the genre through which De Palma had achieved greatest fame and critical admiration—puzzled those who claimed he was merely repeating himself. But for connoisseurs it was intentionally a delicious self-parody—or at least a virtuoso filmmaker’s display of his special talents—most flagrantly in a spectacularly choreographed steadicam shot in which a psychiatrist spouting endless exposition is always on the verge of walking out of the frame, and in the delicious slow-motion climax.

_Carlito’s Way_ again harked back to earlier De Palma successes, this time to crime drama, with an emotional intensity somewhere between the hallucinatory _Scarface_ and the more coolly impersonal _The Untouchables_. If the film ultimately could not rise beyond the conventional trajectory of its plot—ex- _hood_ trying to go straight is drawn back into crime by his old buddy, despite the outreach of a saintly woman—it at least boasted a brilliant impersonation of a crooked lawyer by Sean Penn and some splendid De Palma set pieces, like the chase through Grand Central Terminal. The film reminds us that De Palma is unsurpassed among film directors in portraying furies: not the collective surges of violence rendered by a Sam Peckinpah, but the private demons unleashed within or witnessed by (the same thing on dream level) “ordinary” people as well as crime kings and raving lunatics. De Palma’s cinematic flourishes have often been called “operatic,” but perhaps the better analogy is with the Lisztian keyboard virtuoso, someone who can tap profound emotional depths one moment but skitters over the surface at other times; who frequently improvises upon others’ themes but is always unmistakably himself, for better or worse.

—Robin Wood, updated by Joseph Milicia

DEREN, Maya

Nationality: Russian/American. Born: Kiev, 1917, became U.S. citizen. Education: League of Nations School, Geneva, Switzerland; studied journalism at University of Syracuse, New York; New York University, B.A.; Smith College, M.A. Family: Married (second time) Alexander Hackenschmied (Hammid), 1942 (divorced); later married Teijo Ito. Career: Family immigrated to America, 1922; made first film _Meshes of the Afternoon_, 1943; travelled to Haiti, 1946; secretary for Creative Film Foundation, 1960. Awards: Guggenheim fellowship for work in creative film, 1946. Died: Of a cerebral hemorrhage in Queens, New York, 13 October 1961.

Films as Director:

1943 _Meshes of the Afternoon_ (with Alexander Hammid) (+ role); _The Witches’ Cradle_ (unfinished)

1944 _At Land_ (+ role)
1945  A Study in Choreography for Camera; The Private Life of a Cat (home movie, with Hammid)
1946  Ritual in Transfigured Time (+ role)
1948  Meditation on Violence
1959  The Very Eye of Night

Publications

By DEREN: books—

An Anagram of Ideas on Art, Form, and the Film, New York, 1946.

By DEREN: articles—

“Choreography of Camera,” in Dance (New York), October 1943.
“A Statement of Principles,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1961.
“A Lecture . . . ,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1963.
“Notes, Essays, Letters,” in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1965.
“A Statement on Dance and Film,” in Dance Perspectives, no. 30, 1967.

On DEREN: books—

On DEREN: articles—

Camera Obscura Collective, The, “Excerpts from an Interview with ‘The Legend of Maya Deren’ Project,” in Camera Obscura (Berkeley, California), Summer 1979.
“Kamera Arbeit: Der schopferische umgang mit der realitat,” in Frauen und Film (Berlin), October 1984.
Millsaps, J. L., “Maya Deren, Imagist,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1986.

Maya Deren was the best-known independent, experimental filmmaker in the United States during and after World War II. She developed two types of short, subjective films: the psychodrama and the ciné-dance film. She initiated a national non-theatrical network to show her six independently made works, which have been referred to as visual lyric poems, or dream-like trance films. She also lectured and wrote extensively on film as an art form. Her films remain as provocative as ever, her contributions to cinematic art indisputable.

Intending to write a book on dance, Deren toured with Katherine Dunham’s dance group as a secretary. Dunham introduced Deren to Alexander Hammid, and the following year the couple made Meshes of the Afternoon. Considered a milestone in the chronology of independent film in the United States, it is famous for its four-stride sequence (from beach to grass to mud to pavement to rug). Deren acted the role of a girl driven to suicide. Continuous action is maintained while time-space unities are severed, establishing a trance-like mood by the use of slow motion, swish-pan camera movements, and well executed point-of-view shots.

In her next film, At Land, a woman (Deren) runs along a beach and becomes involved in a chess game. P. Adams Sitney refers to this work as a “pure American trance film.” The telescoping of time occurs as each scene blends with the next in unbroken sequence, a result of pre-planned editing. At Land is also studded with camera shots of astounding virtuosity.
Other films include Deren’s first ciné-dance film, the three-minute A Study in Choreography for Camera. Filmed in slow motion, a male ballet dancer, partnered by the camera, moves through a variety of locales. Continuity of camera movement is maintained as the dancer’s foot changes location. Space is compressed while time is expanded. According to Sitney, the film’s importance resides in two fresh observations: space and time in film are created space and time, and the camera’s optimal use is as a dancer itself. Ritual in Transfigured Time, another dance-on-film, portrays psycho-dramatic ritual by use of freeze frames, repeated shots, shifting character identities, body movements, and locales. Meditation on Violence explores Woo (or Wu) Tang boxing with the camera as sparring partner, panning and zooming to simulate human response. The Very Eye of Night employed Metropolitan Ballet School members to create a celestial ciné-ballet of night. Shown in its negative state, Deren’s handheld camera captured white figures on a total black background. Over the course of her four dance-films Deren evolved a viable form of ciné-choreography that was adapted and adjusted to later commercial feature films. In cases such as West Side Story, this was done with great skill and merit.

Deren traced the evolution of her six films in “A letter to James Card,” dated April 19, 1955. Meshes was her “point of departure” and “almost expressionist”; At Land depicted dormant energies in mutable nature; and Choreography distilled the essence of this natural changing. In Ritual she defined the processes of changing, while Meditation extends the study of metamorphosis. In The Very Eye she expressed her love of life and its living. “Each film was built as a chamber and became a corridor, like a chain reaction.”

In 1946 Deren published An Anagram of Ideas on Art, Form, and the Film, a monograph declaring two major statements: the rejection of symbolism in film, and strong support for independent film after an analysis of industrial and independent filmmaking activities in the United States.

Although Meshes remains the most widely seen film of its type, with several of its effects unsurpassed by filmmakers, Deren had been forgotten until recently. Her reputation now enjoys a well-deserved renaissance, for as Rudolf Arnheim eulogized, Deren was one of the “most delicate magicians.”

—Louise Heck-Rabi

DE SICA, Vittorio

Nationality: Italian/French (became French citizen in order to marry second wife, 1968. Born: Sora (near Rome), 7 July 1902. Education: Institut Superieur de Commerce, Rome, and University of Rome. Family: Married 1) Giuditta Rissone (divorced 1968); 2) Maria Mercader, 1968, two sons. Career: Actor in Tatiana Pavlova’s Stage Company, 1923; formed own stage company with actress-wife, late 1920s; leading film actor, from 1931; directed first film, Rose scarlette, 1940. Died: In Paris, 13 November 1974.

Films as Director:

1940 Rose scarlette (co-d, role as The Engineer)
1941 Maddalena zero in condotta (+ dialogue, role as Carlo Hartman); Teresa Venerdi (+ co-sc, role)
1942 Un garibaldino al convento (+ co-sc, role as Nino Bixio)
1943 I bambini ci guardano (+ co-sc)
1946 La porta del cielo (+ co-sc, completed 1944); Sciuscia (Shoe-shine) (+ co-sc)
1948 Ladri di biciclette (The Bicycle Thief) (+ pr, co-sc)
1950 Miracolo a Milano (Miracle in Milan) (+ co-sc)
1952 Umberto D (+ pr, co-sc)
1953 Stazione Termini (Indiscretion of an American Wife; Indiscretion) (+ co-pr)
1954 L’oro di Napoli (Gold of Naples) (+ co-sc, role)
1956 Il tetto (The Roof) (+ pr)
1960 La ciociara (Two Women)
1961 Il giudizio universale (+ role)
1962 “La Riffa” (The Raffle) episode of Boccacio 70; I sequestrati di Altona (The Condemned of Altona)
1963 Il boom; Ieri, oggi, domani (Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow)
1964 Matrimonio all’italiana (Marriage, Italian Style)
1965 Un mondo nuovo (Un Monde jeune; Un mondo nuovo; A Young World)
1966 Caccia alla volpe (After the Fox) (+ guest role); “Un sera come le altre (A Night like Any Other)” episode of Le streghe (The Witches)
1967 Woman Times Seven (Sept fois femmes)
1968 Amanti (A Place for Lovers) (+ co-sc)
1970  I girasoli (Sunflower); Il giardino dei Finzi Contini (The Garden of the Finzi-Continis); “Il leone” episode of Le coccie (Les Couples)
1972  Lo chiameremo Andrea
1973  Una breve vacanza (A Brief Vacation)
1974  Il viaggio (The Journey; The Voyage)

Other Films:

1918  Il processo Clémenceau (L’Affaire Clémenceau) (Bencivenga) (role)
1926  La bellezza del mondo (Almirante) (role)
1928  La compagnia dei muri (La compagnie des fours) (Almirante) (role)
1930  La vecchia signora (Palermi) (role); La segretaria per tutti (Palermi) (role); Due cuori felici (Negroni) (role); Gli uomini che mascalzoni! (Bianchi) (role as Marquis Nicolas Peccoli); Ferdinando I, re di Napoli (Franciolini) (role as Boese) (role)
1932  Un cattivo soggetto (Bragaglia) (role); Il signore desidera? (Righelli) (role); La canzone del sole (German version: Das Lied der Sonne) (Neufeld) (role as The Secretary); Lisetta (Bianchi) (role)
1933  Tempo massimo (Mattoli) (role)
1935  Darò un millione (Camerini) (role as The Millionaire); Amo te sola (Mattoli) (role)
1936  Lohengrin (Malasomma) (role); Ma non è una cosa seria! (Camerini) (role); Non ti conosco più (Malasomma) (role); L’uomo che sorride (Mattoli) (role)
1937  Hanno rapito un uomo (Righelli) (role); Il signor Max (Camerini) (role); Questi ragazzi (Mattoli) (role)
1938  Napoli d’altri tempi (Palermi) (role); L’orologio a cucù (Mastrocinque) (role); Partire (Palermi) (role); Ai vostri ordini, signora! (Mattoli) (role); La mazurka di papà (Biancoli) (role); Le due madri (Palermi) (role); Castelli in aria (German version: Ins blau Leben, 1939) (Genina) (role)
1939  Grandi magazzini (Camerini) (role); Finisce sempre così (Susini) (role); Napoli che non muore (Palermi) (role)
1940  La peccatrice (Palermi) (role); Pazzia di giola (Bragaglia) (role); Manon Lescaut (German version: Ins blaue Leben, 1939) (Genina) (role)
1941  L’avventuriera del piano di sopra (Matarazzo) (role)
1942  Se io fossi onesto! (Bragaglia) (role, co-sc); La guardia del corpo (Bragaglia) (role, co-sc)
1943  I nostri sogni (Cottafavi) (role, co-sc); Non sono superstizioso, ma...! (Bragaglia) (role, co-sc); L’ippocampo (Rosmino) (role, co-sc); Dico minuti di vita (Longanesi) (unfinished; another version made 1944 with different cast) (role); Nessuno torna indietro (Blasetti) (role)
1945  Lo sbaglio di essere vivo (Bragaglia) (role); Il mondo vuole così (Bianchi) (role)
1946  Roma città libera (co-sc); Il marito povero (Amara) (co-sc); Abbasso la ricchezza! (Righelli) (role)
1947  Sperduti nel buio (Mastrocinque) (role as Nanzio, co-sc); Natale al campo 119 (Francisci) (supervisor, role as The Noble Neopolitan)
1948  Lo sconosciuto di San Marino (Waszinsky) (role as The Proprietor); Cuore (Coletti) (co-sc, role as The Landlord)
1949  Domani è troppo tardi (Moguy) (role as Professor Landi)
1950  Cameriera bella presenza offesa (Pastina) (role as The Actor); “Il processo di Frine” episode of Altri tempi (Blasetti) (role as the Barrister); Gli uomini non guardano il cielo (Scarpelli) (role)
1951  Buongiorno elefante! (Sabò principle ladro) (Franciolini) (co-sc, role as Garetti); “Scena all’aperto” (role as Count) and “Don Corradino” (role as Don Corradino) (Blasetti) (role)
1952  Madame De . . . (Ophuls) (role as Fabrizio Donati); Pane, amore e fantasia (Comencini) (role as Marshal Carotenuto); “Pendolino” episode of Cento anni d’amore (De Felice) (role); “Incidente a Villa Borghese” episode of Villa Borghese (Franciolini) (role); Il matrimonio (Petrocchi) (role); “Il fine dicitore” episode of Gran varietà (Paolella) (role); “Le Divorce (Il divorzio)” episode of Secrets d’alcôve (Il letto) (Franciolini) (role)
1953  Vergine moderna (Pagliero) (role as The Banker); L’Allegro Squadrone (Moffa) (role as The General); Pane, amore e gelosia (Comencini) (role); Peccato che sia una canaglia (Blasetti) (role as Mr. Stroppiani)
1954  Il segno di Venere (Risi) (role as Alessio Spano, the Poet); Gli ultimi cinque minuti (The Last Five Minutes) (Amato) (role as Carlo); La bella mugnaia (Camerini) (role as The Governor); Pane, amore e . . . (Risi) (role as Carotenuto); Racconti romani (Franciolini) (role); Il bigamo (Emmer) (role as The Barrister)
1955  Mio figlio Nerone (Nero’s Weekend) (Sieno) (role as Sénèqué); Tempo di villeggiatura (Racipposi) (role as The Celebrity); The Monte Carlo Story (Montecarlo) (Taylor) (role as Count Dino Giocado Della Fiaba); I giorni più belli (I nostri anni più belli, Gli anni più belli) (Mattoli) (role as The Banker); Noi siamo le colonne (D’Amico) (role as Celimontani)
1956  Padri e figli (Monicelli) (role as the tailor Corallo); I copevcoli (Vasile) (role as the barrister Vasari); Souvenir d’Italie (It Happened in Rome) (Pietrangeli) (role as The Count); La donna che venne del mare (De Robertis) (role as Bordigian); Vacanze a Ischia (Camerini) (role as Occhipinti); Il cielo (Blasetti) (role as the sick nobleman); Pane, amore e chiacchiere (Blasetti) (role as Bonelli); Il medico e lo stregonette (Monicelli) (role as Locorotolo); Totò, Vittorio e la dottoressa (Mastrocinque) (role as the sick nobleman)
1957  A Farewell to Arms (Vidor) (role as Count Alessandro Rinaldi); Domenica è sempre domenica (Mastrocinque) (role as Mr. Guastaldi); Ballerina e buon Dio (Leonviola) (roles as the policeman, the taxi driver, and the costume porter); Il genoveserendade (Pezzo, capoppezzo e capitanino) (Staudte) (role as Count Ernesto De Rossi); Anna di Brooklyn (Denham and Lastricati) (supervisor, co-music, role as Don Luigino); La ragazza di Piazza S. Pietro (Camerini) (role as Bordigin); Gli zitelloni (Bianchi) (role as Professor Landi); Pane, amore e Andalusia (Setó) (role as Carotenuto); La prima notte (Cavallotti) (role as Alfredo)
1958  Nel blu dipinto di blu (Volare) (Tellini) (role as Spartaco); Il nemico di mia moglie (Puccini) (role as The Husband); Vacanze d’inverno (Mastrocinque) (role as Manrízie); Il moralista (Bianchi) (role as The President); Della Rovere (Rossellini) (role as Giovanni Bertone); The Monte Carlo Story (Montecarlo) (Taylor) (role as Count Dino Giocado Della Fiaba); I giorni più belli (I nostri anni più belli, Gli anni più belli) (Mattoli) (role as The Banker); Noi siamo le colonne (D’Amico) (role as Celimontani) Ceccano); Gastone (Bonnard) (role as The Prince); Les trois etc . . . du colonel (Le tre eccetera del colonello) (Boissol) (role as Colonel Belalcazar).

1960 Il vigile (Zampa) (role as The Trustee); Le pillole di Ercole (Salce) (role as Colonel Pietro Cuocolo); Austerlitz (Gance) (role as Pope Pius VII); The Angel Wore Red (La sposa bella) (Johnson) (role as General Clave); The Millionaress (Asquith) (role as Joe); It Started in Naples (Shavelson) (role as Mario Vitale); Gli incensurati (Giaculli) (role as comic actor); Un amore a Roma (Risi) (role).

1961 Gli attendenti (Bianchi) (role as Colonel Bitossi); I due marescialli (Corbucci) (role as Antonio Cotone); Le meraviglie di Aladino (The Wonders of Aladdin) (Bava and Levin) (role as The Genie); L'onorata società (Pazzaglia) (role as The Chef); La Fayette (La Fayette, una spada per due bandiere) (Dréville) (role as Bancroft).

1962 Vive Henry IV, vive l'amour (Autant-Lara) (role as Don Pedro) (role as Mary).

1965 The Amorous Adventures of Moll Flanders (T. Young) (role as The Marquis di Fiori); Il delitto Matteotti (Vancini) (role as Mauro del Casino).

1966 Io, io, io . . . e gli altri (Blasetti) (role as Count Trepossi) (role as The Trustee).

1967 Gli altri, gli altri e noi (Arena) (role as man on pension); Un italiano in America (Sordi) (role as Giuseppe's Father); The Biggest Bundle of Them All (Ammakin) (role as Cesare Celli); Caroline Cherie (de la Patelliere) (role as Count de Biévres) (role as Count de Biévres).

1969 If It's Tuesday, This Must Be Belgium (M. Stuart) (role as The Shoemaker); Una su tredici (12 + 1) (Gessner and Lucignani) (role as Di Seta).

1970 Case di Cosa Nostra (Steno) (role as The Lawyer); L'Odeur des fauves (Balducci) (role as Milord).

1971 Trustevere (Tozzi) (role as Enrico Formichi); Io non vedo, tu non parli, lui non sente (Camerini) (role as Count at the Casino).

1972 Pinocchio (Comencini) (for TV) (role as The Judge); Snow Job (The Ski Raiders) (Englund) (role as Dolphi); Ettore il fusto (Castellari) (role as Giove); Siamo tutti in libertà provvisoria (Scarpelli) (role).

1973 Storia de fratelli e de cortelli (Amendola) (role as The Marshal); Il delitto Matteotti (Vancini) (role as Mauro del Giudice).

1974 Andy Warhol's Dracula (Dracula cerca sangue di vergine e . . . mori di sete!!; Blood for Dracula) (Morrissey) (role as Marquis di Fiori); C'eravano tanto amati (Scola) (role as himself); Vittorio De Sica, il Regista, l'attore, l'uomo (Gragadze) (role).

By DE SICA: articles—

Interview with F. Koval, in Sight and Sound (London), April 1950.

“Money, the Public, and Umberto D.,” in Films and Filming (London), January 1956.

“Illiberal Censorship,” in Film (London), January/February 1956.

“British Humor? It’s the Same in Italy,” in Films and Filming (London), April 1959.

Interview with D. Lyons, in Interview (New York), February 1972.

On DE SICA: books—

Bazin, André, Qu'est-ce que le cinéma, second edition, Paris, 1975.

On DE SICA: articles—

“De Sica Issue” of Bianco e Nero (Rome), Fall 1975.

"‘Vittorio De Sica,’" in Cinema Nuovo (Bari), February 1985.

On DE SICA: films—

De Reisner, Bika, Meet De Sica.

* * *

The films of Vittorio De Sica are among the most enduring of the Italian post-war period. His career suggests an openness to form and a versatility uncommon among Italian directors. De Sica began acting on stage as a teenager and played his first film role in 1918. In the 1920s his handsome features and talent made him something of a matinee idol, and from the mid-1930s he appeared in a number of films by Mario Camerini, including Gliuomini che mascalzoni!, Darò un milione, and Grandi magazine.

During his lifetime, De Sica acted in over one hundred films in Italy and abroad, using this means to finance his own directorial efforts. He specialized in breezy comic heroes, men of great self-assurance or confidence men (as in Rossellini’s Generale della Rovere). The influence of his tenure as actor cannot be overestimated with adults. At the end of the film one boy inadvertently causes the other’s death. Although Zavattini insists that his creative role was without the traditional compromises of entertaining narratives. The story of Toto the Good in Miracolo a Milano remains one of the outstanding stylistic contradictions of the neorealist period (there are many), yet one which sheds an enormous amount of light on the intentions and future of the De Sica-Zavattini team. The cinematography and setting, markedly neorealist in this fable about the struggle to find a shanty town for the homeless, is undercut at every moment with unabashed clowning both in performance and in cinematic technique. Moreover, the film moves toward a problematic fairy tale ending in which the poor, no longer able to defend their happy, make-shift village from the voracious appetite of capitalist entrepreneurs, take to the skies on magic broomsticks. (The film has more special effects than anyone would ever associate with neorealism; could De Sica have left his mark on Steven Spielberg?) Still, Zavattini, who had wanted to make the film for a number of years, and De Sica defend it as the natural burlesque transformation of themes evident in their earlier work together.

By this time De Sica’s films were the subject of a good deal of controversy in Italy, and generally the lines were drawn between Catholic and Communist critics. The latter had an especially acute fear (one which surfaced again with Fellini’s La Strada) that the hard-won traits of neorealism had begun to backslide into those of the so-called “calligraphic” films of the Fascist era. These were based on an ahistorical, formal concern for aesthetic, compositional qualities and the nuances of clever storytelling. However, it was their next film, Umberto D, that comes closest to realizing Zavattini’s ideas on the absolute responsibility of the camera eye to observe life as it is lived without the traditional compromises of entertaining narratives. The sequence of the film in which the maid wakes up and makes the morning coffee has been praised many times for its day-in-the-life directness and simplicity. Il Tetto, about a curious attempt to erect a small house on municipal property, is generally recognized as the last neorealist film of this original period.

Continually wooed by Hollywood, De Sica finally acquiesced to make Stazione termini in 1953, produced by Selznick and filmed in Rome with Jennifer Jones and Montgomery Clift. Unfortunately, neorealist representation formed only an insignificant background to this typically American star vehicle. A similar style is employed in La ciociara, which was created from a Moravia story about the relationship of a mother and daughter uprooted by the war. De Sica attempted to reconstruct reality in the studio during the making of this work, making use of a somewhat unsuccessful stylized lighting technique. But as usual, he obtains excellent performances in an engaging dramatic vehicle (Sophia Loren won an Oscar).

The filmmakers returned to comedic vehicles in 1954 in L’oro di Napoli. Human comedy emerges from the rich diversity and liveliness of Neapolitan life. Though still within the confines of realism, the film foreshadows the director’s entrance into the popular Italian market for sexual satire and farce. The exactitude with which he sculpts his characters and his reluctance to reduce the scenario to a mere bunch of gags demonstrates his intention to fuse comedy and drama, putting De Sica at the top of his class in this respect—among Risi, Comencini, and Monicelli. Often with Zavattini but also with Eduardo De Filippo, Tonino Guerra, and even Neil Simon (After the Fox), De Sica turned out about eight such films for the lucrative international market between 1961 and 1968, the best of which are: Il giudizio universale, which featured an all-star cast of international comedians; Ieri, oggi, domani and Matrimonio all’Italiana, both with Loren and Mastroianni; and Sette volte donna. Il giardino dei Finzi Contini, based on a Bassani novel about the incarceration of Italian Jews during the war, shows a strong Viscontian influence in its lavish setting and themes (the film deals with the dissolution of the bourgeois family). Una breve vacanza, an examination of a woman who has managed to break out of the confines of an oppressive marriage during a sanitorium stay, reinstates the tensive relationship between comedy and tragedy of the earlier films. De Sica’s last film, Il viaggio, is from a Pirandello novel.

—Joel Kanoff

DIEGUES, Carlos

Nationality: Brazilian. Born: Maceio, state of Alagoas, 19 May 1940. Education: Studied law, Catholic University of Rio de Janeiro. Family: Married entertainer Nara Leão. Career: Organizer of Metropolitan Union of students, also film critic and poet, early 1960s; directed first feature, Ganga Zumba, 1964; immigrated to France following Brazilian military takeover, late 1960s; directed occasionally; turning to discontent with De Sica and Zavattini, Zavattini, and Espinosa, 1970s; returned to Brazil, mid-1970s.

Films as Director:

- 1960 Fuga (short) (co-d)
- 1961 Domingo (short)
- 1962 “Escola de samba, alegria de viver” episode of Cinco vêzes Favela
- 1964 Ganga Zumba (+ co-adapt)
- 1965 A 8a. Bienal de São Paulo (short)
- 1966 A grande cidade (The Big City) (+ co-sc)
- 1967 Oito universitários (short)
- 1969 Os herdeiros (The Inheritors; The Heirs)
- 1972 Quando a Carnaval chegar (When Carnival Comes)
- 1973 Joanna Francesca (Jeanne la française) (+ sc)
- 1976 Xica da Silva (Xica)
- 1977 Chuvas de verao (Summer Showers; A Summer Rain) (+ sc)
- 1978 Os filhos do medo (Les Enfants de la peur) (TV doc)
- 1980 Bye Bye Brasil (+ sc)
- 1984 Quilombo

- 1987 Un tren para las estrellas
- 1990 Dias melhores virao (+ sc, pr)
- 1994 Rio’s Love Songs (+ sc)
- 1996 Tieta do Agreste (Tieta of Agreste) (+ co-sc, co-pr)
- 1999 Orfeu (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

- 1965 O Circo (Jabor) (ed)
- 1967 Terra em transe (Land in Trance) (Rocha) (assoc pr)
- 1968 Capitu (Saraceni) (assoc pr)
- 1980 Prova de Fogo (Altberg) (assoc pr)
- 1988 Dede Mamata (pr)

Publications

By DIEGUES: book—

By DIEGUES: articles—

Interview with Federico De Cardenas, in Los años de la conmoción, by Isaac León Frías, Mexico City, 1979.

Interview with André Tournès, in Jeune Cinéma (Paris), July/August 1984.

On DIEGUES: books—

On DIEGUES: articles—

Yakir, Dan, “Braziliant,” in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1984.

* * *

One of the founders of Cinema Novo—the movement that transformed film in Brazil and was a pivotal influence in the New Latin American Cinema—Carlos Diegues is probably the most historically minded of its adherents. Like the other directors of Cinema Novo, Diegues is concerned with making films which are “culturally Brazilian, and impregnated with national and Latin American problems”; and his entrance into the national reality was, as with many other members of this group, through documentary films that put him in direct contact with social problems. Diegues also shares the interest in popular culture that is characteristic of Cinema Novo, although he tends to emphasize the contribution of black culture, which “gave us originality. It’s the element that has completely modified Brazil, which otherwise would be a mere cultural colony of Portugal and Spain.”

Perhaps that which most differentiates Diegues from his Cinema Novo colleagues is his historical orientation. On the one hand, this can be seen in his insistent return to historical themes. But on the other hand, Diegues’s conception of history is complex: he feels that the most important element in cinema is its adecuación (fitness) to the time in which it is made. To the degree that a film speaks to the problems and possibilities of the epoch in which it appears, it allows for the sort of “political cinema” Diegues prefers, a cinema with which the audience can interact. It is this perspective that Diegues brings to his perception of his films as corresponding to particular historical contexts.

His first works, Samba School and Ganga Zumba, are products of what Diegues describes as a “fantastic, euphoric period” in which emerged new Brazilian cinema, music, and theater. Samba School was typical of the early works of Cinema Novo, focusing on the popular culture of the slums through an analysis of the alienation represented by the schools of samba. Diegues made the film on a barebones budget and worked at practically all the production tasks, including appearing as an actor. Ganga Zumba was Diegues’s first feature. A reconstruction of the Palmares Republic of runaway slaves in Brazil during the seventeenth century, it corresponded to the search for identity in which many Brazilian artists were then engaged. It also represented the first Cinema Novo film to value Afro-Brazilian culture, as well as the beginning of Diegues’s interest in bringing black history to the screen: “I tried to make a black film, not a film about blacks,” he stated.

The military coup of 1964, and its increasingly repressive legislation during the 1960s, changed the cultural scene profoundly. In film, an “aesthetic of silence” reigned, and Diegues perceives this as his “sick period,” during which he made The Heirs and Joanna Francesa as expressions of the depressing tableau presented by the “Dantesque levels” military terrorism reached. The Heirs is a historical work on the period 1930–1964, which allegorically evokes the role of Getulio Vargas (a populist president-dictator who oscillated between fascism and socialism) by following the trajectory of a bourgeois family. Diegues says that his main intention was to “project a precise image of this strange, violent and sentimental, baroque and surrealist, sincere and subtle country called Brazil, whose passion torments me more than anything else in life.” In Joanna Francesa, Diegues returned again to analyze the Revolution of 1930, this time in a film he considers a “lament” on the death of a culture and a civilization, which reflected the dolorous days through which Brazil was passing.

The liberalization of military rule led to what Diegues has described as the third phase of Cinema Novo, which he characterizes as “the aesthetic of life.” Within this category, he places the two reconstructions, Xica da Silva and Quilombo, which continue the black history of colonial Brazil he began with Ganga Zumba, as well as the popular Bye Bye Brazil. Both Xica da Silva and Quilombo are more mythic than historic, for Diegues believes that “history is always written by the winners,” and therefore a real history of blacks is either impossible or depressing. Thus, he focuses on the character of Francisca (Xica), a black slave whom a wealthy Portuguese freed and took as his lover. Little real information exists on this eighteenth-century woman because all mention of her was exercised by the townspeople, but her love of freedom is an important myth of Brazilian popular culture.

Quilombo was made just two or three years before Brazil was liberated from military rule, and that context allowed Diegues to utilize the story of the runaway slave republic as a metaphor for the building of a utopia. With even less information available about quilombos than existed on Xica, Diegues allowed himself free rein; the result, as he intended, says more about the future than about the past. Xica da Silva was immensely popular in Brazil, but the film which has achieved the most international recognition is Bye Bye Brazil. In this exuberant film “dedicated to Brazilians in the twenty-first century,” Diegues returns to Cinema Novo’s insistent concern with popular culture and concludes that the way in which culture is assimilated and re-elaborated is more important than its origin or alleged “purity.” This is perhaps one of the more useful lessons Diegues has to teach his fellow filmmakers of Cinema Novo.

—John Mraz
DMYTRYK, Edward

Films as Director:

1935 The Hawk
1939 Television Spy; Emergency Squad; Million-Dollar Legs (co-d with Grinde, uncredited)
1940 Golden Gloves; Mystery Sea Raider; Her First Romance
1941 The Devil Commands; Under Age; Sweetheart of the Campus (Broadway Ahead); The Blonde from Singapore (Hot Pearls);

Edward Dmytryk (right) and Montgomery Clift on the set of Raintree County

Secrets of the Lone Wolf (Secrets); Confessions of Boston Blackie (Confessions)
1942 Counter-Espionage; Seven Miles from Alcatraz
1943 Hitler’s Children; The Falcon Strikes Back; Captive Wild Woman; Behind the Rising Sun; Tender Comrade
1944 Farewell, My Lovely (Murder My Sweet)
1945 Back to Bataan; Cornered
1946 Till the End of Time
1947 Crossfire; So Well Remembered
1949 Obsession (The Hidden Room); Gives Us This Day (Sail to the Devil)
1952 Mutiny; The Sniper; Eight Iron Men
1953 The Juggler; Three Lives (short)
1954 The Caine Mutiny; Broken Lance; The End of the Affair
1955 Soldier of Fortune; The Left Hand of God; Bing Presents Oreste (short)
1956 The Mountain (+ pr)
1957 Raintree County
1958 The Young Lions
1959 Warlock (+ pr); The Blue Angel
1962 The Reluctant Saint (+ pr); Walk on the Wild Side
1963 The Carpetbaggers
1964 Where Love Has Gone; Mirage
1966 Alvarez Kelly
1968 Lo sbarco di Anzio (Anzio; The Battle for Anzio); Shalako
1972 Barbe-Bleue (Bluebeard) (+ co-sc)
1975 The ’’Human’’ Factor
1976 He Is My Brother

Other Films:

1930 Only Saps Work (Gardner and Knopf) (ed); The Royal Family of Broadway (Cukor and Gardner) (ed)
1932 Million-Dollar Legs (Cline) (ed)
1934 Belle of the Nineties (McCarey) (co-ed, uncredited); College Rhythm (Tauraog) (co-ed)
1935 Ruggles of Red Gap (McCarey) (ed)
1936 Too Many Parents (McGowan) (ed); Three Cheers for Love (Ray McCarey) (ed); Three Married Men (Buzzell) (ed); Easy to Take (Tryon) (ed)
1937 Murder Goes to College (Riesner) (ed); Turn off the Moon (Seiler) (ed); Double or Nothing (Reed) (ed); Hold ’em Navy (That Navy Spirit) (Neumann) (ed)
1938 Bulldog Drummond’s Peril (Hogan) (ed); Prison Farm (Louis King) (ed)
1939 Zaza (Cukor) (ed); Love Affair (McCarey) (co-ed); Some Like It Hot (Archainbaud) (ed)
1950 The Hollywood Ten (Berry) (co-sc, appearance)
1968 Hamlet (Wirth) (dubbing d)
1976 Hollywood on Trial (Helpem) (role as interviewee)

Publications

By DMYTRYK: books—

By DMYTRYK: articles—

“The Director-Cameraman Relationship,” interview with Herb Lightman, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), May 1968.

“The Director and the Editor,” in Action (Los Angeles), March/April 1969.

“Dmytryk on Film,” in Journal of University Film Association (Carbondale, Illinois), Spring 1982.

On DMYTRYK: articles—

Norman, Barry, in Radio Times (London), 14 October 1995.

* * *

Edward Dmytryk rose through the Hollywood ranks, beginning as a projectionist in the 1920s, working as an editor through most of the 1930s, and directing low-budget films during the first half of the 1940s before making his first A-budget film, Tender Comrade, in 1943. He continued to make notable films like Crossfire and Farewell, My Lovely before being subpoenaed to testify before the House Un-American Activities Committee. Dmytryk subsequently became one of the Hollywood Ten and, after completing his jail sentence, the only member of the Ten to become a friendly witness and name names. After doing one film for the King brothers, Mutiny, in 1952, Stanley Kramer hired him to direct four features culminating with The Caine Mutiny. He continued to direct films regularly through the 1950s and 1960s and later taught at U.S.C. in Los Angeles.

In many of his films Dmytryk displays much the same sensibility informing the work of Frank Capra: a faith in ordinary people, a belief in the virtues of working together, a deep reverence for traditional American ideals and heroes, and a strongly utopian bent that tends to see evil as a localized aberration capable of correction. Characters often see the light (Hitler’s Children, or Salt to the Devil), find themselves transformed by the example or expectations of others (The Left Hand of God or The Juggler), or reveal a tender, committed side that is not immediately apparent (Soldier of Fortune or Broken Lance). Utopianism, then, instead of becoming a positive affirmation of values, becomes more an implicit trust in goodness that sometimes defuses dramatic conflict by rendering evil ineffective or by side-stepping intense confrontations or issues. By affirming the nobility of true love despite adversity, Walk on the Wild Side, for example, presents a more Pollyannaish view of down-and-out Depression life in New Orleans than the Nelson Algren novel on which it is based.

Dmytryk directs with an essentially serious tone that minimizes comedy and seldom romanticizes the agrarian or non-urban ethos so dear to Capra. He also tends to work with more interiorized states of personal feeling that run counter to Capra’s tendency to play conflicts out in public among a diverse, somewhat stereotyped range of characters. But, like Capra, Dmytryk dwells on the issue of faith—the need for it and the tests to which it is subjected. Salt to the Devil, Tender Comrade, Soldier of Fortune, Raintree County, The Juggler, Broken Lance, The Left Hand of God, The Caine Mutiny, Hitler’s Children—these and other films involve tests of faith and commitment for their central characters. The characters strive to find and affirm a sense of personal dignity, whatever the odds, and usually do so within a private setting that uses the broader social context as a dramatic backdrop, even in Hitler’s Children or The Young Lions, two films dealing with Nazism. Some have argued that Dmytryk’s work simply deteriorated after his testimony before HUAC; it may also be that recurring themes bridge this period and offer intriguing parallels between the political climate, Dmytryk’s personal view of life, and his overall film accomplishments.

—Bill Nichols

DONEN, Stanley

Stanley Donen with Ingrid Bergman on the set of Indiscreet

Films as Director:

1949  On the Town (co-d, co-chor)
1951  Royal Wedding (Wedding Bells)
1952  Singin’ in the Rain (co-d, co-chor); Love Is Better than Ever (The Light Fantastic); Fearless Fagan
1953  Give a Girl a Break (+ co-chor)
1954  Seven Brides for Seven Brothers; Deep in My Heart (+ co-chor)
1955  It’s Always Fair Weather (co-d, co-chor)
1957  Funny Face; The Pajama Game (co-d, co-pr); Kiss Them For Me
1958  Indiscreet (+ pr); Damn Yankees (What Lola Wants) (co-d, co-pr)
1960  Once More with Feeling (+ pr); Surprise Package (+ pr); The Grass Is Greener (+ pr)
1963  Charade (+ pr)
1966  Arabesque (+ pr)
1967  Two for the Road (+ pr); Bedazzled (+ pr)
1969  Staircase (+ pr)
1974  The Little Prince (+ pr)
1975  Lucky Lady (+ pr)
1978  Movie Movie (+ pr)
1980  Saturn 3 (+ pr)
1984  Blame It on Rio
1985  Moonlighting (series for TV)
1999  Love Letters (for TV)

Films as Choreographer or Co-Choreographer:

1943  Best Foot Forward (Buzzell)
1944  Hey Rookie (Barton); Jam Session (Barton); Kansas City Kitty (Lord); Cover Girl (Vidor)
1945  Anchors Aweigh (Sidney)
1946  Holiday in Mexico (Sidney); No Leave, No Love (Martin)
1947  This Time for Keeps (Thorpe); Living in a Big Way (La Cava); Killer McCoy (Rowland)
1948  A Date with Judy (Thorpe); The Big City (Taurog); The Kissing Bandit (Benedek)
1949  Take Me out to the Ball Game (Berkeley) (+ co-sc)

Publications

By DONEN: articles—

“‘What to Do with Star Quality,’” in Films and Filming (London), August 1960.
Interview with Bertrand Tavernier and Gilbert Palas, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1963.
“‘Talking in the Sun,’” an interview with Colo and Bertrand Tavernier, in Positif (Paris), December 1969.
Interview with S. Harvey, in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1973.
Interview with Peter von Bagh, in Filmihullu (Helsinki), no. 4, 1994.
’’La mise en scène, c’est intangible!’’ in Positif (Paris), July-August 1997.

On DONEN: books—

Casper, Joseph Andrew, Stanley Donen (Filmakers, No 5), Lanham, 1983.

On DONEN: articles—

Knight, Arthur, “‘From Dance to Film Director,’” in Dance (New York), August 1954.
“‘Musical Comedy Issue’” of Cinéma (Paris), August/September 1959.
“‘Stanley Donen,’” in Film Dope (London), June 1977.
Telotte, J.P., “‘Ideology and the Kelly-Donen Musicals,’” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1984.
Kurban, Thomas, “‘Linien, die die Bewegung verschieben,’” in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 4 August 1992.

* * *

Stanley Donen is most frequently remembered for his work as a musical director/choreographer at MGM under the Arthur Freed Unit, a production team that Donen claims existed only in Arthur Freed’s head (Movie, Spring 1977). With Gene Kelly, he co-directed three of the musical genre’s best films: On the Town, Singin’ in the Rain, and It’s Always Fair Weather. Kelly was, in a sense, responsible for giving Donen his start in Hollywood; their first collaboration being the doppelganger dance in Cover Girl. Donen followed a path typical of that time, from Broadway dancer to Hollywood dancer and choreographer to director. As solo director, he won recognition for Royal Wedding (his first effort), Seven Brides for Seven Brothers, Funny Face, The Pajama Game and Damn Yankees. Andrew Sarris believes that Donen always seems to function best as a hyphenated director or a genial catalyst; that any personal style he may possess is usually submerged under that of the performer (Kelly, Astaire, Fosse) or choreographer (Michael Kidd, Eugene Loring, Bob Fosse) and hence is difficult to assess. This view may simply reflect that period of studio production (mid-1940s to late 1950s), when there was a constant melding of creative personnel. As Jerome Delamater explains: “‘Performers, choreographers, and directors worked together and in many instances one cannot discern the auteur, as it were, or—more accurately—there seem to be several auteurs.’” Donen credits Astaire for his inspiration and it comes as no surprise that he feels his musical work is an extension of the Astaire/Rogers format (which itself is derived from the films of Clair and Lubitsch). This format is not logically grounded in reality, but functions more or less in the realm of pure emotion. Such a world of spontaneous singing and dancing can most accurately be presented in visual terms through forms of surrealism.

Donen’s oeuvre demonstrates a reaction against the presentation of musical numbers on the stage, choreographing them instead on the streets of everyday life. It is this combination of a visual reality and a performing unreality (a performing reality is some type of stage that is clearly delineated from normal, day-to-day activity) that creates the tension inherent in surrealism. Donen geared the integrated musical towards the unreal; our functional perception of the real world does not include singing and dancing as a means of normal interpersonal communication. As he said in an interview with Jim Hillier, “‘A musical . . . is anything but real.’”

Musicals possess their own peculiar internal reality, not directly connected to everyday life. Leo Braudy points out that Donen’s musical films explore communities and the reaction/interaction of the people that dwell within. Even though Donen left the musical genre after Damn Yankees (returning to it in 1973), he continued to explore the situation of the individual in a social community, and the absurd, occasionally surrealistic experiences that we all face, in such deft comedies as Bedazzled, Two for the Road, and Charade (the last in homage to Hitchcock).

—Greg Faller
DONSKOI, Mark

Films as Director:

1927 Zhizn (Life) (co-d, co-sc); V bolshom gorode (In the Big City) (co-d, co-sc)
1928 Tsena cheloveka (The Price of Man; Man’s Value; The Lesson) (co-d)
1929 Pizhon (The Fop)
1930 Chuzoi bereg (The Other Shore); Ogon (Fire)
1934 Pizhon o shchastye (Song about Happiness) (co-d)
1938 Detstvo Gorkovo (Childhood of Gorky; The Childhood of Maxim Gorki) (+ co-sc)
1939 Vlyudyakh (Among People; My Apprenticeship; Out in the World) (+ co-sc)
1940 Moi universiteti (My Universities) (+ co-sc)
1941 Romanitiki (Children of the Soviet Arctic) (+ co-sc)
1942 Kak zakalyalsal stal (How the Steel Was Tempered; Heroes Are Made) (+ sc); “Mayak (Beacon, The Signal Tower)” (d only), “Kvartal (Block 14)” (+ spvr), “Simie skali (Blue Crags)” (+ spvr) segments of Boevi kinosbornik ( Fighting Film Album) no. 9
1944 Raduga (The Rainbow) (+ co-sc)
1945 Nepokorennie (Semya tarassa; Unvanquished; Unconquered) (+ co-sc)
1947 Selskaya uchitelnitsa (Varvara; An Emotional Education; Rural Institute; A Village School-Teacher)
1949 Akitet akhodti v gory (Zakoni Bolshoi zemli; Akitet Leaves for the Hills) (+ co-sc) (film banned, partially destroyed)
1950 Sportivnaya slava (Nachi championi; Sporting Fame; Our Champions) (short)
1956 Mat (Mother) (+ co-sc)
1957 Dorogoi tsonoi (At Great Cost; The Horse That Cried)
1959 Foma Gordeyev (+ co-sc)
1962 Zdravstvuyte deti (Hello Children) (+ co-sc)
1966 Serdse materi (A Mother’s Heart)
1967 Vernost materi (A Mother’s Loyalty)
1972 Chaliapin
1973 Nadezhda

Other Films:

1926 Prostitutka (The Prostitute) (Frelikh) (role as passerby)
1927 Yevo prevosoditelstvo (His Excellency) (Roshal) (ed)
1935 Nevidimi chelovek (The Invisible Man) (Whale) (spvr of dubbing and reediting)
1940 Brat geroya (Brother of a Hero) (Vasilchikov) (art d)

Publications

By DONSKOI: articles—

“Ceux qui savent parler aux dieux . . . .,” in Cinéma (Paris), November 1959.

“My—propagandisty partii,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), November 1972.

“Tret’e izmerenie,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1974.

On DONSKOI: books—

On DONSKOI: articles—

Gillett, John, “Mark Donskoi,” in Focus on Film (London), March/April 1970.

“Mark Donskoi,” in Film Dope (London), June 1977.

Zak, M., and others, “V kontekste istorii,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), March 1981.

* * *

Mark Donskoi may not be as familiar to Western audiences as Eisenstein, Pudovkin, or Dovzhenko; his films are in no way as readily recalled as Battleship Potemkin, Mother, or Earth. Like other Soviet filmmakers, he propagandizes about the glories of the Bolshevnik Revolution and highlights the life of Lenin. But Donskoi’s great and unique contribution to Russian cinema is his adaption to the screen of Maxim Gorki’s autobiographical trilogy: The Childhood of Gorki, My Apprenticeship, and My Universities, all based on the early life of the famed writer and shot during the late 1930s. (Years later, Donskoi adapted two other Gorki works, Mother—the same story filmed by Pudovkin in 1926—and Foma Gordeyev.)

In the trilogy, Donskoi chronicles the life of Gorki from childhood on, focusing on the experiences which alter his view of the world. At their best, these films are original and pleasing: the first presents a comprehensive and richly detailed view of rural life in Russia during the 1870s. While delineating the dreams of nineteenth-century Russian youth, Donskoi lovingly recreates the era. The characters are presented in terms of their conventional ambitions and relationships within the family structure. They are not revolutionaries, but rather farmers and other provincials with plump bodies and commonplace faces. The result is a very special sense of familiarity, of fidelity to a time and place. Of course, villains in Gorki’s childhood are not innately evil, but products of a repressive czarist society. They are thus compassionately viewed. Donskoi pictures the Russian countryside with imagination, and sometimes even with grandeur.

Donskoi’s later noteworthy works include How the Steel Was Tempered, one of the first Russian films to deal with World War II. While based on a Civil War story, the filmmaker includes only the sequences pertaining to Ukrainian resistance to German invaders in 1918, parallelng that situation to the Nazi invasion. The story also recalls the Gorki trilogy in its presentation of a boy who is changed by his encounter with life’s challenges.

The Rainbow, an appropriately angry drama shot at the height of World War II, details the struggles of life in a German-occupied village. Donskoi’s message in this film is that despite Nazi brutality, including the shooting of small boys, the spirit of the Soviet people will endure. This film is particularly inspirational; its approach may even have influenced Italian neorealism. The Unvanquished, about occupied Kiev, is a kind of sequel to The Rainbow. It graphically depicts the slaughter of Jews at Babi Yar.

The careers of few Russian filmmakers have outlasted that of Donskoi, who in his youth had fought in the Civil War and been imprisoned by the White Russians. His films span fifty years, though his Gorki trilogy alone would have assured him of a niche in cinema history.

—Rob Edelman

DÖRRIE, Doris

Nationality: German. Born: Hanover, West Germany, 26 May 1955. Family: Married to cinematographer Helge Weindler. Education: Studied theater at the University of the Pacific in Stockton, California; philosophy, psychology, and semantics at the New School for Social Research in New York; and film and television at the Hochschule für Film und Fernsehen in Munich, where she received a diploma in directing. Career: Wrote film criticism for Süddeutsche Zeitung, 1976–86; directed documentaries for German television, 1979–86; directed her first feature, Straight through the Heart, 1983. Awards: Max Ophuls Award nomination and Max Ophuls Audience Award, for Mitten ins Herz (Straight through the Heart), 1983; Bavarian Film Award, Best Screenplay, for Bin ich schön? (Am I Beautiful?), 1998. Address: Tengstrasse 16, 8000 Munich 40, Germany. Agent: ICM, 40 West 57th Street, New York, NY 10019.

Films as Director and Screenwriter/Co-Screenwriter:

1976 Ob’s stürmt oder schneit (Come Rain or Shine) (co-d)
1977 Ene, mene, mink (short)
1978 Der erste walzer (The First Waltz) (short); Hästest was gescheites gelernt (for TV); Alt werden in der Fremde
1979 Paula aus Portugal
1980 Von romantik keine spar (No Trace of Romanticism) (for TV); Katharina Eiselt
1981 Dazwischen (In Between) (co-d)
1983 Mitten ins herz (Straight through the Heart)
1985 Im innern des wals (In the Belly of the Whale)
1986 Männer . . . (Men . . .); Paradies (Paradise)
1987 Ich und er (Me and Him)
1989 Geld (Money); Love in Germany
1991 Happy Birthday Tüürke! (Happy Birthday!)
1993 What Can It Be
1994 Keiner Liebt Mich (Nobody Loves Me)
1998 Bin ich schön? (Am I Beautiful?)
2000 Erleuchtung garantiert (Enlightenment Guaranteed)

Other:

1977 Der hauptdarsteller (Hauff) (ro)
1984 King Kongs Faust (Stadler) (ro)
1987 Wann—wenn nicht jetzt? (Junker—for TV) (sc)

Publications

By DÖRRIE: books—

Samsara: Erzählungen, Zurich, 1996.

Look at Me (text accompanying photographs by Philip Keel), Zurich and New York, 1999.
Doris Dörrie with Jack Sholder

By DÖRRIE: articles—

Interview in Short Story (Cedar Falls, Iowa/Brownsville, Texas), Fall 1994.

On DÖRRIE: articles—

* * *

Doris Dörrie’s most consistent cinematic themes are sexual politics and the chasms existing between men and women. In her films, it almost is as if the opposite sexes have evolved from different species. Women are looking for emotional honesty and sexual pleasure in relationships, and attempt to connect with men in what are fated to be hapless, luckless searches for everlasting love. Men, on the other hand, are emotionally unavailable. They are obsessed with the power of their sex organs, yet become sexually unresponsive once they are married (or, for that matter, regularly sharing the same bed with the woman they have so ardently pursued). Dörrie’s heroines may be unable to break through to the men in their midst, but they are not perfect either. They might be flaky or self-absorbed, and this adds resonance to her work. Furthermore, Dörrie’s films are consistently offbeat. Her characters in the best of them, while existing in real worlds and facing genuine emotional dilemmas, respond to situations in altogether humorous, original, and unusual ways.

Men . . . . Dörrie’s biggest hit to date, is a razor-sharp feminist satire. It is a farcical portrait of the manner in which a pompous middle-class married man responds upon learning that he is being cheated on by his sexually ignored wife. By having this affair, she has struck a blow for independence after years of devotion to a womanizing husband. An outlandish scenario unfolds, involving the cuckold befriending his wife’s lover and transforming him into a clone of himself, knowing full well that his wife summarily will become bored. Men . . . is an astute portrayal of the casual attitudes many men have toward women and the manner in which men view each other, all filtered through the sensibilities of a woman writer/director.

Unfortunately, Dörrie has been unable to repeat the international box office success and win the critical raves achieved by Men . . . . Me and Him, her follow-up to Men . . . was a major let-down: a stupefyingly unfunny parody—based, no less, on a novel by Alberto Moravia—about an architect whose penis begins offering him guidance on how to live his life. In In the Belly of the Whale and Paradise, Dörrie repeats the plot structure of Men . . . : a third party comes to play a key role in a less-than-sound two-person, opposite-sex familial relationship. The cornerstone of In the Belly of the Whale is the sadomasochistic connection between a fifteen-year-old girl and her policeman father. The girl runs away in search of her mother (who also was physically abused by her father), and becomes involved with a young man who previously had conflicted with the father. Paradise is the story of a married couple who are more concerned with their hobbies and professions than with each other; furthermore, the husband is disinterested in satisfying the wife sexually. The third party here is the wife’s former schoolmate.

Men . . . , however, is far from Dörrie’s lone artistic success. Straight through the Heart, her debut feature (completed after working for German television and making shorts and documentaries), is a sharply observed exploration of the relationship between a pair of lonely neurotics: a 20-year-old woman seeking her identity and a reclusive middle-aged dentist. While the latter is willing to pay the former to move in with him, he offers her no companionship; he is interested solely in a lively female presence in his life. She becomes psychologically connected to him, but is unsuccessful in her attempt to make him love her.

In Happy Birthday, Turke!, an entertaining noirish detective film (as well as Dörrie’s one major thematic departure), the filmmaker touches on the issue of ethnic identity. It is the story of a Turkish-born private eye who was raised by German parents and speaks only German; as a result, he is mistrusted by the Turkish community and subjected to ethnic slurs by Germans. He is hired by a Turkish woman to locate her missing husband, and becomes immersed in a scenario involving murder, prostitution, and police corruption.

Nobody Loves Me is a quirky chronicle of the trials of a lonely, death-obsessed airport security officer who is about to turn 30 and senses that life is passing her by. She declares she does not need a man, but still is desperate to find one. Her gay next-door neighbor (who is a psychic, as well as her kindred spirit) declares that she momentarily will meet the love of her life. Could he be the new manager of their apartment building, whose primary interests are seducing attractive young blondes and the compensation to be gained by redoing the building into an extravagant living space?

In the end, Dörrie’s heroine is left only with the companionship of her neighbor. One of the points of Nobody Loves Me is that, within the framework of heterosexual relations, it nearly is impossible for a man and a woman to be friends. In fact, the only male who can express compassion and remain loyal to a woman is a gay male; the emotional honesty that exists between the heroine and her neighbor is able to flourish because of the absence of sexual expectation.

In the films from the first decade of Dörrie’s career, the heterosexual men do not change. But the women evolve. The heroines in Straight through the Heart and Nobody Loves Me each may be unsuccessful in their quests for love. In the former, the result is tragedy, while in the latter the heroine undergoes a transformation, becoming less self-indulgent and more independent. This is her triumph, and it is one that reflects the evolution of Dörrie’s view of the plight and fate of women.

Dörrie’s most recent film, Am I Beautiful?, is as incisive as Nobody Loves Me, while offering a more expansive view of humanity. Its story is reminiscent of Robert Altman’s Short Cuts in that it spotlights encounters between strangers who collectively are kind, or cruel, or manipulative, and who come together, clash, and drift apart. They include a young woman who is hitchhiking and playing at being deaf because she wishes to change her destiny; an elderly man who was married for 40 years and whose wife died three days earlier; a woman who obsessively tries on wedding dresses, in preparation for her own nuptials (which may or may not ever happen); and a woman who meets the man with whom she was in love three decades before. He, in turn, does not remember her, because he has just had a stroke.

All the characters seemingly are unrelated, but the film takes on a surreal quality as their connections, however tenuous, eventually emerge: they are in the same family, or share the same profession, or have the same life experience. More to the point, however, they are lonely, and have unfulfilled needs and desires. They are depicted as wanting to be married, or getting married, or at mid-marriage (where they often are bored and unhappy, and involved in affairs), or recently widowed.

Am I Beautiful? is a mature film, a philosophical film. As she herself ages, Dörrie seems to be increasingly aware of the passage of time, and the fleetingness of life. One of her points in Am I Beautiful? is that you may not know what your future will be, and for this reason it takes courage to live—and to love.

—Rob Edelman

DOVZHENKO, Alexander

Nationality: Ukrainian. Born: Sosnytsia, Chernigov province of Ukraine, 12 September 1894. Education: Hlukhiv Teachers’ Institute, 1911–14; Kiev University, 1917–18; Academy of Fine Arts, Kiev, 1919. Military Service: 1919–20. Family: Married 1) Barbara Krylova, 1920 (divorced 1926); 2) Julia Soltseva, 1927. Career: Teacher, 1914–19; chargé d’affaires, Ukrainian embassy, Warsaw, 1921; attached to Ukrainian embassy, Berlin; studied painting with Erich Heckel, 1922; returned to Kiev, expelled from Communist Party, became cartoonist, 1923; co-founder, VAPLITE (Free Academy of Proletarian Literature), 1925; joined Odessa Film Studios, directed first film, Vasya-reformator, 1926; moved to Kiev Film Studios, 1928; Soltseva began as his assistant, 1929; lectured at State Cinema Institute (VGIK), Moscow, 1932; assigned to Mosfilm by

Awards:
Lenin Prize, 1935; Honored Art Worker of the Ukrainian SSR, 1939; 1st Degree Stalin Prize for Shchors, 1941; Order of the Red Flag, 1943; Order of the Red Labor Flag, 1955.

Died: In Moscow, 26 November 1956.

Films as Director:

1926 Vasya-reformator (Vasya the Reformer) (co-d, sc); Yahidka kokhannya (Love’s Berry; Yağodko lyubvi) (+ sc)
1927 Teka dipkuryera (The Diplomatic Pouch; Sumka dipkuryera) (+ revised sc, role)
1928 Zvenyhora (Zvenigora) (+ revised sc)
1929 Arsenal (+ sc)
1930 Zemlya (Earth) (+ sc)
1932 Ivan (+ sc)
1935 Aerograd (Air City; Frontier) (+ sc)
1939 Shchors (co-d, co-sc)
1940 Osvobozhdenie (Liberation) (co-d, ed, sc)
1945 Pobeda na pravoberezhnoi Ukraini i izgnanie Nemetskikh zakhvatnikov za predeli Ukrainskikh Sovetskikh zemel (Victory in Right-Bank Ukraine and the Expulsion of the Germans from the Boundaries of the Ukrainian Soviet Earth) (co-d, commentary)
1948 Michurin (co-d, pr, sc)

Other Films:

1940 Bakovyna-Zemlya Ukrayinska (Bucovina-Ukrainian Land) (Solntseva) (artistic spvr)
1941 Bohdan Khmelnytsky (Savchenko) (artistic spvr)
1942 Alexander Parkhomenko (Lukov) (artistic spvr)
1943 Bytva za nashu Radyansku Ukrainu (The Battle for Our Soviet Ukraine) (Solntseva and Avdiyenko) (artistic spvr, narration)
1946 Strana rodnaya (Native Land; Our Country) (co-ed uncredited, narration)

(films directed by Julia Solntseva, prepared or written by Dovzhenko or based on his writings):

1958 Poema o more (Poem of an Inland Sea)
1961 Povest plamennykh let (Story of the Turbulent Years; The Flaming Years; Chronicle of Flaming Years)
1965 Zacharovannaya Desna (The Enchanted Desna)
1968 Nezabivaemoe (The Unforgettable; Ukraine in Flames)
1969 Zolotye vorota (The Golden Gates)

Publications

By DOVZHENKO: books—

Izbrannoe, Moscow, 1957.
Sobranie sochinenyi (4 toma), izdatelstvo, Moscow, 1969.

By DOVZHENKO: articles—

Interview with Georges Sadoul, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 1956.
“Iz zapisykh knijek,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), nos. 1, 2, 4, 5, 1963.
Dovzhenko, Alexander, “Pis’ma raznyh let,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), April 1984.

On DOVZHENKO: books—

Yourenev, R., Alexander Dovzhenko, Moscow, 1958.
Mariamov, Alexandr, Dovjenko, Moscow, 1968.
Oms, Marcel, Alexandre Dovjenko, Lyons, 1968.

Nebesio, Bohdan Y., Alexander Dovzhenko: A Guide to Published Sources, Edmonton, 1995

On DOVZHENKO: articles—

“‘Dovzhenko at Sixty,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1955.

Montagu, Ivor, “‘Dovzhenko—Poet of Life Eternal,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.

“‘Dovzhenko Issue’” of Film (Venice), August 1957.

Carynnyk, Marco, “‘The Dovzhenko Papers,’” in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1971.

“‘Dovzhenko Issue’” of Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), September 1974.

Biofilmography in Film Dope (London), January 1978.

“‘Dovzhenko Sections,’” of Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), September and October 1984.

Bernard, J., “‘Odzak dia a mysleni Alexandra Petrovice Dovzenka,’” in Film a Doba (Prague), September and October 1984.

Pisarevsky, D., “‘Radiant Talent,’” in Soviet Film (Moscow), September 1984.

Filmcritica (Italy), vol. 41, no. 407, July 1990.

“‘Nikolaj Schors’Legenda I real’nost,’” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 9, September 1990.

On DOVZHENKO: film—

* * *

Unlike many other Soviet filmmakers, whose works are boldly and aggressively didactic, Alexander Dovzhenko’s cinematic output is personal and fervently private. His films are clearly political, yet at the same time he was the first Russian director whose art is so emotional, so vividly his own. His best films, Arsenal, Earth, and Ivan, are all no less than poetry on celluloid. Their emotional and poetic expression, almost melancholy simplicity, and celebration of life ultimately obliterate any external event in their scenarios. His images—most specifically, farmers, animals, and crops drenched in sunlight—are penetratingly, delicately real. With Eisenstein and Pudovkin, Dovzhenko is one of the great inventors and masters of the Russian cinema.

As evidenced by his very early credits, Dovzhenko might have become a journeyman director and scenarist, an adequate technician at best: Vasya the Reformer, his first script, is a forgettable comedy about an overly curious boy; The Diplomatic Pouch is a silly tale of secret agents and murder. But in Zvenigora, his fourth film, he includes scenes of life in rural Russia for the first time. This complex and confusing film proved to be the forerunner of Arsenal, Earth, and Ivan, a trio of classics released within four years of each other, all of which honor the lives and struggles of peasants.

In Arsenal, set in the Ukraine in a period between the final year of World War I and the repression of a workers’ rebellion in Kiev, Dovzhenko does not bombard the viewer with harsh, unrealistically visionary images. Despite the subject matter, the film is as lyrical as it is piercing and pointed; the filmmaker manages to transcend the time and place of his story. While he was not the first Soviet director to unite pieces of film with unrelated content to communicate a feeling, his Arsenal is the first feature in which the totality of its content rises to the height of pure poetry. In fact, according to John Howard Lawson, “no film artist has ever surpassed Dovzhenko in establishing an intimate human connection between images that have no plot relationship.”

The storyline of Earth, Dovzhenko’s next—and greatest—film, is deceptively simple: a peasant leader is killed by a landowner after the farmers in a small Ukrainian village band together and obtain a tractor. But these events serve as the framework for what is a tremendously moving panorama of rustic life and the almost tranquil admission of life’s greatest inevitability: death. Without doubt, Earth is one of the cinema’s few authentic masterpieces.

Finally, Ivan is an abundantly eloquent examination of man’s connection to nature. Also set in the Ukraine, the film chronicles the story of an illiterate peasant boy whose political consciousness is raised during the building of the Dnieper River dam. This is Dovzhenko’s initial sound film: he effectively utilizes his soundtrack to help convey a fascinating combination of contrasting states of mind.

None of Dovzhenko’s subsequent films approach the greatness of Arsenal, Earth, and Ivan. Stalin suggested that he direct Shchors, which he shot with his wife, Julia Solntseva. Filmed over a three-year period under the ever-watchful eye of Stalin and his deputies, the scenario details the revolutionary activity of a Ukrainian intellectual, Nikolai Shchors. The result, while unmistakably a Dovzhenko film, still suffers from rhetorical excess when compared to his earlier work.

Eventually, Dovzhenko headed the film studio at Kiev, wrote stories, and made documentaries. His final credit, Michurin, about the life of a famed horticulturist, was based on a play he wrote during World War II. After Michurin, the filmmaker spent several years putting together a trilogy set in the Ukraine, chronicling the development of a village from 1930 on. He was sent to commence shooting when he died, and Solntseva completed the projects.

It is unfortunate that Dovzhenko never got to direct these last features. He was back on familiar ground: perhaps he might have been able to recapture the beauty and poetry of his earlier work. Still, Arsenal, Ivan, and especially Earth are more than ample accomplishments for any filmmaker’s lifetime.

—Rob Edelman

DREYER, Carl Theodor

Nationality: Danish. Born: Copenhagen, 3 February 1889. Family: Married Ebba Larsen, 1911, two sons. Career: Journalist in Copenhagen, 1909–13; after writing scripts for Scandinavisk-Russiske Handelshus, joined Nordisk Films Kompagni, 1913; directed first film, Præsidenten, 1919; moved to Berlin, worked for Primusfilm, 1921; joined Ufa, 1924; returned to Copenhagen, 1925; hired by Société Generale de Films, Paris, 1926; left film industry, returned to journalism in Denmark, 1932; returned to filmmaking with documentary Good Mothers, 1942; awarded managership of a film theatre by the Danish government, 1952; worked on film project on the life of Jesus, 1964–68. Awards: Golden Lion Award, Venice Festival, for Ordet, 1955. Died: In Copenhagen, 20 March 1968.

Films as Director:

1919  Præsidenten (The President) (+ sc, co-art d)
1920  Prästänkan (The Parson’s Widow; The Witch Woman; The Fourth Marriage of Dame Margaret) (+ sc)

1921  Blade of Satans Bog (Leaves from Satan’s Book) (+ co-sc, co-art d) (shot in 1919)
1922  Die Gezeichneten (The Stigmatized One; Love One Another) (+ sc); Der Var Engang (Once upon a Time) (+ co-sc, ed)
1924  Michael (+ co-sc)
1925  Du Skal Aere Din Hustru (Thou Shalt Honor Thy Wife; The Master of the House) (+ co-sc, art d)
1926  Glomdalsbruden (The Bride of Glomdal) (+ sc, art d)
1928  La Passion de Jeanne d’Arc (+ co-sc, pr)
1932  Vampyr (The Dream of David Gray) (+ co-sc, pr)
1942  3Drehjaelpen; (Good Mothers)
1943  Vredens Dag (Day of Wrath) (+ co-sc)
1945  Två Manniskor (Two People) (+ co-sc, ed)
1947  Die Gezeichneten (The Stigmatized One; Love One Another) (+ sc, pr)
1948  Præsidenten (+ co-sc)
1950  Storstrømsbroen; (The Bridge of Storstrøm) (+ sc)
1954  Et Slot I Et Slot (Castle within a Castle) (+ sc)
1955  Ordet (The Word) (+ sc)
1964  Gertrud (+ sc)

Other Films:

1912  Bryggerens Datter (The Brewer’s Daughter) (Ottesen) (co-sc)
1913  Balloneksplosionen (The Balloon Explosion) (sc); Krigskorrespondenten (The War Correspondent) (Glückstadt) (sc); Hans og Grethe (Hans and Grethe) (sc); Elskovs Opfødsomhed (Inventive Love) (Wolder) (sc); Chatollets Hemmelighed, eller Det gamle chatol (The Secret of the Writing Desk) (The Old Writing Desk) (Davidsen) (sc)
1914  Ned Med Vabnene (Lay down Your Arms) (Holger-Madsen) (sc)
1915  Juwelerernes Skrekk, eller Skelethaanden, eller Skelethaandens sidste bedrift (The Jeweller’s Terror; The Skeleton’s Hand; The Last Adventure of the Skeleton’s Hand) (Christian) (sc)
1916  Penge (Money) (Mantzius) (sc); Den Hvide Djevel, eller Djevelens Protege (The White Devil; The Devil’s Protegé) (Holger-Madsen) (sc); Den Skonne Evelyn (Evelyn the Beautiful) (Sandberg) (sc); Rovedderkoppen, eller Den rde; Enke (The Robber Spider; The White Widow) (Blom) (sc); En Forbyrders Liv og Levned, eller En Forbyrders Memoirer (The Life and Times of a Criminal; The Memoirs of a Criminal) (Christian) (sc); Gulddets Gift, eller Lerhjerjetet (The Poison of Gold; The Clay Heart) (Holger-Madsen) (sc); Pavillonens Hemmelighed (The Secret of the Pavilion) (Mantzius) (sc)
1917  Den Mystiske Selskabsdame, eller Legationens Gidsel (The Mysterious Lady’s Companion; The Hostage of the Embassy) (Blom) (sc); Hans Rigtige Kone (His Real Wife) (Holger-Madsen) (sc); Fange N° 113 (Prisoner No. 113) (Holger-Madsen) (sc); Hotel Paradis (Hotel Paradise) (Dinesen) (sc)
1918  Lydia (Holger-Madsen) (sc); Glædens Dag, eller Miskendt (Day of Joy; Neglected) (Christian) (sc)
1919  Gillekop (Blom) (sc); Grevindens Aere (The Countess’ Honor) (Blom) (sc)
1947  De Gamle (The Seventh Age) (sc)
1949  Radioens Barndom (ed)

Carl Dreyer

276
1950  Shakespeare og Kronborg (Hamlet’s Castle) (Roos) (sc)
1954  Rønnes og Nexøs Genopbygning (The Rebuilding of Ronne and Nexø) (sc)

Publications

By DREYER: books—

Om filmen, Copenhagen, 1959.
Five Film af Carl Th. Dreyer, edited by Ole Storm, Copenhagen, 1964.

By DREYER: articles—

Interview with John Winge, in Sight and Sound (London), January 1950.
Interview with Herbert Luft, in Films and Filming (London), no. 9, 1961.
“Dreyer Mosaik,” in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1963.
Interview with Børge Trolle, in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1966.
“Carl Dreyer: Uter Bore or Total Genius?” with Denis Duperley, in Films and Filming (London), February 1968.
Interview with Michel Delahaye, in Interview with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1969.

On DREYER: books—

Dyssegaard, Soren, editor, Carl Th. Dreyer, Danish Film Director, Copenhagen, 1968.

Schrader, Paul, Transcendental Style in Film: Ozu, Bresson, Dreyer, Los Angeles, 1972.

On DREYER: articles—

Bond, Kirk, “The World of Carl Dreyer,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1965.
“Dreyer Issue” of Kosmorama (Copenhagen), June 1968.
Bordwell, David, “Passion, Death, and Testament: Carl Dreyer’s Jesus Film,” in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1972.
Schepeler, P., in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), December 1982.

Filmcritica (Italy), vol. 41, no. 107, July 1990.

* * *

Carl Theodor Dreyer is the greatest filmmaker in the Danish cinema, where he was always a solitary personality. But he is also among the few international directors who turned films into an art and made them a new means of expression for the artistic genius. Of Dreyer’s feature films, seven were produced in Denmark, three in Germany, two in France, two in Sweden, and one in Norway.

If one tries to understand the special nature of Dreyer’s art, one can delve into his early life to find the roots of his never-failing contempt for pretensions and his hatred of bourgeois respectability, as well as his preoccupation with suffering and martyrdom. In his biography of Dreyer, M. Drouzy revealed the fate of Dreyer’s biological mother, who died in the most cruel way following an attempted abortion. Dreyer, who was adopted by a Copenhagen family, learned about the circumstances of her death when he was eighteen years old, and Drouzy’s psychoanalytical study finds the victimized woman in all of Dreyer’s films. But of what value is the biographical approach to the understanding of a great artist? The work of an artist need not be the illumination of his private life. This may afford some explanation when we are inquiring into the fundamental point of departure for an artist, but Dreyer’s personality is expressed very clearly and graphically in his films. We can therefore well admire the consistency which has always characterized his outlook on life.

Like many great artists, Dreyer is characterized by the relatively few themes that he constantly played upon. One of the keynotes in Dreyer’s work is suffering, and his world is filled with martyrs. Yet suffering and martyrdom are surely not the fundamentals. They are merely manifestations, the results of something else. Suffering and martyrdom are the consequences of wickedness, and it is malice and its influence upon people that his films are concerned about. As early in his career as the 1921 film, Leaves from Satan’s Book, Dreyer tackled this theme of the power of evil over the human mind. He returned to examine this theme again and again.

If the popular verdict is that Dreyer’s films are heavy and gloomy, naturally the idea is suggested by the subjects which he handled. Dreyer never tried to make us believe that life is a bed of roses. There is much suffering, wickedness, death, and torment in his films, but they often conclude in an optimistic conviction in the victory of spirit over matter. With death comes deliverance. It is beyond the reach of malice.

In his delineation of suffering man, devoid of any hope before the arrival of death, Dreyer was never philosophically abstract. Though his films were often enacted on a supersensible plane, and are concerned with religious problems, his method as an artist was one of psychological realism, and his object was always the individual. Dreyer’s masterly depiction of milieu has always been greatly admired; his keen perception of the characteristic detail is simply dazzling. But this authenticity in settings has never been a means towards a meticulous naturalism. He always sought to transcend naturalism so as to reach a kind of purified, or classically simplified, realism.

Though Dreyer occupied himself with the processes of the soul, he always preserved an impartiality when portraying them. One might say that he maintained a high degree of objectivity in his description of the subjective. This can be sensed in his films as a kind of presentation rather than forceful advocacy. Dreyer himself, when describing his method in La Passion de Jeanne d’Arc, once employed the expression “realized mysticism.” The phrase indicates quite precisely his endeavours to render understandable things that are difficult to comprehend, to make the irrational appear intelligible. The meaning behind life lies in just this recognition of the necessity to suffer in order to arrive at deliverance. The characters nearly always suffered defeat in the outward world because Dreyer considered defeat or victory in the human world to be of no significance. For him the triumph of the soul over life was what was most important.

There are those who wish to demonstrate a line of development in Dreyer’s production, but there is no development in the customary sense. Dreyer’s world seemed established at an early period of his life, and his films merely changed in their way of viewing the world. There was a complete congruity between his ideas and his style, and it was typical of him to have said: “The soul is revealed in the style, which is the artist’s expression of the way he regards his material.” For Dreyer the image was always the important thing, so important that there is some justification in describing him as first and foremost the great artist of the silent film. On the other hand, his last great films were concerned with the effort to create a harmony between image and sound, and to that end he was constantly experimenting.

Dreyer’s pictorial style has been characterized by his extensive and careful employment of the close-up. His films are filled with faces. In this way he was able to let his characters unfold themselves, for he was chiefly interested in the expressions that appear as the result of spiritual conflicts. Emphasis has often been given to the slow lingering rhythm in Dreyer’s films. It is obvious that this dilatoriness is much suffering, wickedness, death, and torment in his films, but they often conclude in an optimistic conviction in the victory of spirit over matter. With death comes deliverance. It is beyond the reach of malice.

Dreyer’s pictorial style has been characterized by his extensive and careful employment of the close-up. His films are filled with faces. In this way he was able to let his characters unfold themselves, for he was chiefly interested in the expressions that appear as the result of spiritual conflicts. Emphasis has often been given to the slow lingering rhythm in Dreyer’s films. It is obvious that this dilatoriness springs from the wish to endow the action with a stamp of monumentality, though it could lead dangerously close to empty solemnity, to the formalistic.

Dreyer quickly realized the inadequacy of the montage technique, which had been regarded as the foundation of film for so many years. His films became more and more based on long uncut sequences. By the end of his career his calm, elaborating style was quite in conformity with the newer trends in the cinema.

—Ib Monty
DULAC, Germaine

Films as Director:

1915 Les Soeurs enemies
1916 Geo le mystérieux; Venus Victrix; Dans l’ouragan de la vie
1917 Ames de fous (+ sc)
1918 Le Bonheur des autres
1919 La Fête espagnole; La Cigarette (+ co-sc)
1920 Malencontre; La Belle Dame sans merci
1921 La Mort du soleil
1922 Werther (incomplete)
1923 La Souriaute Madame Beudet (The Smiling Madame Beudet); Gossette
1924 Le Diable dans la ville
1925 Ame d’artiste (+ co-sc); La Folie des vaillants
1926 Antoinette Sabrier
1927 La Coquille et le clergyman (The Seashell and the Clergyman); L’Invitation au voyage; Le Cinéma au service de l’histoire
1928 La Princesse Mandane; Disque 927; Thèmes et variations; Germination d’un haricot
1929 Etude cinégraphique sur une arabesque

Other Films:

1928 Mon Paris (Guyot) (supervision)
1932 Le Picador (Jacquelux) (supervision)

Publications

By DULAC: articles—

“Un Article? Mais que faut-il prouver?” in Le Film (Paris), 16 October 1919.
“Aux amis du cinéma,” address in Cinémagazine (Paris), 19 December 1924.
“Du sentiment à la ligne,” in Schémas, no. 1, 1927.

“Das Wesen des Films: Die visuelle idee,” and “Das Kino der Avantgarde,” in Frauen und Film (Berlin), October 1984.

On DULAC: books—

On DULAC: articles—

Van Wert, W., “Germaine Dulac: First Feminist Filmmaker,” in Women and Film (Santa Monica, California), vol. 1, nos. 5–6, 1974.
Dozoretz, W., “Madame Beudet’s Smile: Feminine or Feminist?” in Film Reader, vol. 5, 1982.
Flitterman, Sandy, “Theorizing the Feminine: Women as the Figure of Desire in The Seashell and the Clergyman,” in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 6, no. 3, 1984.

Before becoming a film director, Germaine Dulac had studied music, was interested in photography, and had written for two feminist journals—all of which played a role in her development as a filmmaker. There were three phases to her filmmaking career: in commercial production, in the avant-garde, and in newsreels. In addition, filmmaking was only one phase of her film career; she also was prominent as a theorist and promoter of the avant-garde film, and as an organizer of the French film unions and the ciné-club movement. The French historian Charles Ford wrote in Femmes Cinéastes that Dulac was the “heart” of the avant-garde in France, that without her there would have been no avant-garde. Her role in French film history has been compared to that of Maya Deren in the United States three decades later.
Dulac learned the rudiments of filmmaking by assisting a friend who was making a film in 1914. The following year she made her first film, Les Soeurs enemies, which was distributed by Pathé. It was the ideal time for a woman to enter commercial production, since many men had been called into the army. After directing several other conventional story films, Dulac became more and more drawn to the avant-garde cinema, which she defined in 1927 as “lines, surfaces, volumes, evolving directly without contrivance, in the logic of their forms, stripped of representational meaning, the better to aspire to abstraction and give more space to feelings and dreams—INTEGRAL CINEMA.”

It is generally reported that Dulac was introduced to the French film avant-garde movement through her friendship with Louis Delluc; but Esther Carla de Miro claims that it was in fact through Dulac that he became involved in film. Delluc wrote that Dulac’s first film was worth “more than a dozen of each of her colleagues. . . . But the cinema is full of people . . . who cannot forgive her for being an educated woman . . . or for being a woman at all.”

Dulac’s best known and most impressive film (of the few that have been seen outside France) is The Smiling Madame Beudet, based on a play by Andre Obey. It depicts the life and dreams of a small-town housewife married to a coarse, if not repulsive, businessman. The film created a sensation in its day. Dulac succeeded with what was, at the time, signal originality in expressing by pictorial means the atmosphere and implications of this study of domestic conflict.

Showings of The Seashell and the Clergyman, based on an original screenplay by Antonin Artaud, have generally been accompanied by program notes indicating Artaud’s outrage at Dulac’s “feminized” direction. Yet as P. Adams Sitney points out in his introduction to The Avant-Garde Film, Artaud praised the actors and thanked Dulac for her interest in his script in an essay titled “Cinema et l’abstraction.” (Wendy Dozoretz has pointed out that the protest aimed against Dulac at the film’s Paris opening in 1928 was based on a misunderstanding; at least one protester, Georges Sadoul, later said he had thought he was protesting against Artaud.)

At the other end of the cinema spectrum, Dulac began to use time-lapse cinematography to reveal the magical effects of tiny plants emerging from the soil with leaf after leaf unfolding and stretching to the sun. “Here comes Germaine Dulac and her lima bean,” became a popular joke among film-club devotees, a joke that did not exclude admiration.

The last decade of Dulac’s life was spent directing newsreels for Gaumont. She died in 1942, during the German occupation. Charles E. DuPont, who has collected her articles, indicates that she expressed ideas in “clear and accessible language” which others often set forth “in hermetic formulas.” One American writer, Stuart Liebman, sums up the opposing view: “Despite their undeniable importance for the film culture of the 1920s, the backward-looking character of Dulac’s film theory, constituted by her nostalgia for the aesthetic discourse of the past, both defines and delimits our interest in her theoretical contributions today.” The final assessment of Germaine Dulac’s life and work as filmmaker and theorist may depend on the arrival of a well-documented biography, and greater access to all her writings (some short pieces are now available in English translations) and all her existing films.

—Cecile Starr

DUPONT, E.A.

Nationality: German. Born: Ewald André Dupont in Seitz, Saxony, 25 December 1891. Education: University of Berlin. Career: Film critic for BZ am Mittag, Berlin, from 1911; story editor for Richard Oswald, 1916; directed first feature, Das Geheimnis des Amerika-Docks, 1917; director in Hollywood, 1926; signed for British-International Pictures, London, 1928; returned to Berlin, 1931; director for Universal, Hollywood, 1933–36; signed to Paramount, 1936–37; signed for Warner Brothers, 1938; dismissed from Hell’s Kitchen, began editing Hollywood Tribune, 1939; formed talent agency, 1941; returned to directing, 1951. Died: Of cancer in Los Angeles, 12 December 1956.

Films as Director:

1917 Das Geheimnis des Amerika-Docks (The Secret of the America Dock) (+ sc)
1918 Es Werde Licht (Let There Be Light) part 2 (co-d, co-sc); Europa-Postlagernd (Post Office Europe) (+ sc); Mitternacht (+ sc); Der Schatten (Der lebender Schatten) (+ sc); Der Teufel (+ sc); Die Japanerin (+ sc)
1919 Grand Hotel Babylon (+ sc); Die Apachen (Paris Underworld) (+ sc); Das Derby (+ sc); Die Würgers der Welt (+ sc); Die Maske (+ sc); Die Spione (+ sc)
1920 Der Mord ohne Täter (Murder without Cause) (+ co-sc); Die weisse Pfau (The White Peacock) (+ co-sc); Herztrumpt (+ sc); Whitechapel (+ sc)
1921 Der Geier-Wally (Ein Roman aus den Bergen; Geierwally; The Woman Who Killed a Vulture) (+ sc)
1922 Kinder der Finsternis (Children of Darkness) part 1—Der Mann aus Neapel (The Man from Naples) (+ co-sc); Kinder der Finsternis part 2—Kämpfende Welten (Worlds in Struggle) (+ co-sc); Sie und die Drei (She and the Three) (+ sc)
1923 Die grüne Manuela (The Green Manuela); Das alte Gesetz (Baruch; The Ancient Law)
1925 Der Demütige und die Sängerin (The Humble Man and the Singer; La Meurtrière) (+ co-sc); Variété (Variety; Vaudeville; Varieties) (+ co-sc)
1927 Love Me and the World Is Mine (Implacable Destiny) (+ co-sc)
1928 Moulin-Rouge (+ sc, pr); Piccadilly (sound version released 1929) (+ pr)
1929 Atlantic (+ pr); Atlantik (German version) (+ pr, co-sc)
1930 Atlantis (French version) (co-d, pr); Cape Forlorn (The Love Storm) (+ pr, co-sc); Menschen im Käfig (German version) (+ pr); Le Cap perdu (French version) (+ pr); Two Worlds (+ pr, co-story); Zwei Welten (German version) (+ pr); Les Deux Mondes (French version) (+ pr)
1931 Salto Mortale (The Circus of Sin)
1932 Peter Voss, der Millionendieb (Peter Voss, Who Stole Millions) (+ co-sc)
1933 Der Läufer von Marathon (The Marathon Runner)

(in United States):

1933 Ladies Must Love
1935 The Bishop Misbehaves (The Bishop’s Misadventures)
1936  A Son Comes Home; Forgotten Faces
1937  A Night of Mystery (The Greene Murder Case); On Such a Night; Love on Toast
1939  Hell’s Kitchen (co-d with Seiler, uncredited)
1951  The Scarf (The Dungeon) (+ sc)
1953  Problem Girls; The Neanderthal Man; The Steel Lady (Secret of the Sahara; The Treasure of Kalifa)
1954  Return to Treasure Island (Bandit Island of Karabei); Miss Robin Crasoe (co-d, uncredited)

Other Films:

1917  Rennfieber (Horse Race Fever) (Oswald) (sc); Der Onyxkopf (May) (sc); Sturmflut (Zeyn) (sc); Die sterbende Perlen (Meinert) (sc); Die Faust des Riesen parts 1 and 2 (Biebrach) (sc)
1918  Ferdinand Lassalle (Meinert) (sc); Der Saratoga-Koffer (Meinert) (sc); Die Buchhalterin (von Woringen) (co-sc); Nur um tausend Dollars (Meinert) (sc)
1927  Madame Pompadour (Wilcox) (sc)
1956  Magic Fire (Dieterle) (sc)

Publications

By DUPONT: articles—

Variété, with Leo Birinski, in Antologia di Bianco e nero, Rome, 1943.
Interview with Ezra Goodman, in Daily News (Los Angeles), 10 April 1950.

On DUPONT: books—

Kracauer, Siegfried, From Caligari to Hitler, Princeton, 1947.

On DUPONT: articles—

Weinberg, Herman, in Take One (Montreal), January/February 1970.
“E.A. Dupont—Der Augenmensch,” in Film und Fernsehen (East Berlin), no. 11, 1983.

Some directors are able to maintain a steady flow of talent in all their work. Others, like E.A. Dupont, are remembered for one outstanding moment in their career. Variété, or Vaudeville as it is also known, was one of the most exciting films to come from Germany in the 1920s. Dupont made many other good films, but his career as a whole is a rather tragic one. This was partly due to personal deficiencies and partly due to circumstances over which he had no control. Some European directors flourished in Hollywood; Dupont was not one of them.

Dupont had been a film critic and a film scriptwriter before becoming Richard Oswald’s story editor and contributing to Oswald’s sensational sex film Es werde Licht. In 1917 he began to direct thrillers like Das Geheimnis des America Docks and Europa Postlagernd. Recognition came with Die Geierwally in 1921. This Henny Porten film was distinguished by the settings of Paul Leni and the camerawork of Karl Freund. It also popularized William Dieterle. Dupont had previously launched the careers of Paul Richter and Bernhardt Goetzke, later featured in the films of Fritz Lang. Freund also photographed Dupont’s next film, Kinder der Finsternis, a film of two parts that featured striking sets by Leni.

1923 was a bumper year for Dupont. His Die grüne Manuela, about a young dancer who falls in love with a smuggler whose brother gives his life to ensure their happiness, won international appreciation. His next film, Das alte Gesetz, garnered a similar response. It told the story of a young Jew’s flight from his orthodox home to seek fame in the Austrian theater. In the depiction of Jewish rituals and the life of the Austrian court and theatre, the film had a rich authenticity.

Dupont worked outside the then-current German expressionist style, being more human and realistic in his approach to filmmaking. This was evident in his tour de force Variété, a tale of jealousy and death amongst trapeze artists. Its powerful realism, visual fluidity, and daring techniques, coupled with the superb performances of Jannings, Lya de Putti, and Warwick Ward, made it stand out in a year rich with achievement. The virtuoso camerawork of Karl Freund contributed not merely to the spatial and temporal aspects of the film but in the revelation of motive and thought. The uninhibited sensuality depicted by the film led to censorship problems in many countries. Inevitably, Dupont went to Hollywood, where he directed a not entirely successful Love Me and the World Is Mine for Universal. In 1928 he made two stylish films in England: Moulin Rouge, which exploited the sensual charms of Olga Tschechowa, and Piccadilly, with Gilda Gray and Anna May Wong (Charles Laughton made his film debut in a small role).

With the coming of sound, Atlantic, made in German and English, proved a considerable version of the Titanic story. But the two British sound films that followed suffered from weak acting that belied the striking sets. With Salto Mortale, made in Germany in 1931 and featuring Anna Sten and Adolph Wohlbruch, Dupont returned to the scene of his earlier Variété. Two more films were made in Germany before he found himself a Jewish refugee in Hollywood. Here his career was uneven. Factory-produced B pictures gave him no scope for his talents.

Dupont was dismissed for slapping a Dead End Kid who was mocking his foreign accent. This humiliating experience played havoc with his morale and withdrawn personality. He became a film publicist, a talent agent, and wrote some scripts. He returned in 1951 to direct The Scarf, a film of some merit for United Artists. Dupont also dabbled in television. He wrote the script for a film on Richard Wagner that was directed by his former protege William Dieterle in 1956. In December of the same year he died of cancer in Los Angeles.
A sad case. Sad too to see the name of his great photographer Karl Freund on the credits of _I Love Lucy._

—Liam O’Leary

DURAS, Marguerite

Films as Director:

1966 _La Musica_ (co-d, sc)
1969 _Détruire, dit-elle_ (Destroy She Said) (+ sc)
1971 _Jaune le soleil_ (+ pr, co-ed, sc, from her novel Abahn, Sabana, David)
1972 _Nathalie Granger_ (+ sc, music)
1974 _La Femme du Ganges_ (+ sc)
1975 _India Song_ (+ sc, voice)
1976 _Des journées entières dans les arbres_ (Days in the Trees) (+ sc); _Son Nom de Venises dans Calcutta desert_ (+ sc)
1977 _Baxter, Vera Baxter_ (+ sc); _Le Camion_ (+ sc, role)
1978 _Le Navire Night_ (+ sc)
1978/79 _Aurelia Steiner_ (4-film series): _Cesarée_ (1978) (+ sc); _Les Mains négatives_ (1978) (+ sc); _Aurelia Steiner—Melbourne_ (1979) (+ sc); _Aurelia Steiner—Vancouver_ (1979) (+ sc)

1981 _Agatha et les lectures illimitées_ (Agatha) (+ sc)
1985 _Les Enfants_ (The Children)

Other Films:

1959 _Hiroshima mon amour_ (Resnais) (sc)
1960 _Moderato Cantabile_ (Brook) (sc, co-adapt from her novel)
1961 _Une Aussi longue absence_ (The Long Absence) (Colpi) (co-sc from her novel)
1964 _Nuit noire, Calcutta_ (Karmitz) (short) (sc)
1965 ‘Les rideaux blancs’ (Franju) episode of _Der Augenblick des Friedens_ (Un Instant de la paix) (for W.German TV) (sc)
1966 _10:30 P.M. Summer_ (Dassin) (co-sc uncredited, from her novel (Dix heures et demie du soir en été); _La Voleuse_ (Chapot) (sc, dialogue)
1991 _L’Amant_ (The Lover) (co-sc)

Publications

By DURAS: screenplays—

_Moderato Cantabile_, with Gérard Jarlot and Peter Brook, 1960.
_Jaune le soleil_, Paris, 1971

By DURAS: fiction—

_La Vie tranquille_, Paris, 1944.
By DURAS: other books—

By DURAS: articles—

“India Song, a Chant of Love and Death,” interview with F. Dawson, in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1975.

“India Song and Marguerite Duras,” interview with Carlos Clarens, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1975/76.
Interview with D. Fasoli, in Filmcritica (Florence), June 1981.
Interview with A. Grunert, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), February-March 1982.
Interview with Jean-Luc Godard, in Cinéma (Paris), 30 December 1987.

On DURAS: books—

On DURAS: articles—

Gollub, Judith. “French Writers Turned Film Makers,” in Film Heritage (New York), Winter 1968/69.
“Reflections in a Broken Glass,” in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1975.
Andermatt, V., “Big Mach (on the Truck),” in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Spring 1980.
Fedwik, P., “Marguerite Duras: Feminine Field of Nostalgia,” in Enclitic (Minneapolis), Fall 1982.
Sarrut, B., “Marguerite Duras: Barrages against the Pacific,” in On Film (Los Angeles), Summer 1983.
Murphy, C.J., “New Narrative Regions: The Role of Desire in the Films and Novels of Marguerite Duras,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1984.
McWilliams, D., “Aesthetic Tripling: Marguerite Duras’s Le navire Night,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), January 1986.
Williams, Bruce, “Splintered Perspectives: Counterpoint and Subjectivity in the Modernist Film Narrative,” in Film Criticism (Meadville), vol. 15, no. 2, Winter 1991.
Obituary, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), April 1996.
Obituary, in Kino (Soja), no. 2, 1996.
Obituary, in Classic Images (Muscatine), May 1996.
Obituary, in Skrien (Amsterdam), June-July 1996.
Roy, André, “Marguerite Duras, moderne,” in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 82, Summer 1996.

As a writer, Marguerite Duras’s work is identified, along with that of such authors as Alain Robbe-Grillet and Jean Cayrol, with the tradition of the New Novel. Duras began working in film as a screenwriter, with an original script for Alain Resnais’s first feature, Hiroshima mon amour. She subsequently wrote a number of film adaptations from her novels. She directed her first film, La Musica, in 1966. It Hiroshima mon amour remains her best-known work in cinema, her later films have won widespread praise for the profound challenge they offer to conventional dramatic narrative.

The nature of narrative and the potential contained in a single text are major concerns of Duras’s films. Many of her works have appeared in several forms, as novels, plays, and films. This not only involves adaptations of a particular work, but also extends to cross-referential networks that run through her texts. The film Woman of the Ganges combines elements from three novels—The Ravishing of Lol V. Stein, The Vice-Consul, and L’Amour. India Song was initially written as a play, taking characters from The Vice-Consul and elaborating on the structure of external voices developed in Woman of the Ganges. India Song was made as a film in 1975, and its verbal track was used to generate a second film, Son Nom de Venises dans Calcutta desert. This process of transformation suggests that all works are “in progress,” inherently subject to being reconstructed. This is partly because Duras’s works are more concerned with the quality or intensity of experience than with events per se. The films present narrative rather than a linear, unambiguous sequence of events. In Le Camion, two characters, played by Gerard Depardieu and Duras, sit in a room as the woman describes a movie about a woman who hitchs a ride with a truck driver and talks with him for an hour and twenty minutes. This conversation is intercut with scenes of a truck driving around Paris, and stopping for a female hitchhiker (with Depardieu as the driver, and Duras as the hitchhiker). Thus, the verbal description of a potential film is juxtaposed by images of what that film might be.

An emphasis on the soundtrack is also a crucial aspect of Duras’s films; her verbal texts are lyrical and are as important as the images. In India Song, sound and image function contrapuntally, and the audience must actively assess the relation between them, reading across the body of the film, noting continuities and disjunctions. The verbal text often refers in past tense to events and characters on screen, as the viewer is challenged to figure out the chronology of events described and depicted—which name on the soundtrack corresponds to which actor, whether the voices belong to on- or off-screen characters, and so forth. In this way the audience participates in the search for a story, constructing possible narratives.

As minimal as they are, Duras’s narratives are partially derived from melodrama, focusing on relations between men and women, the nature or structure of desire, and colonialism and imperialism in both literal and metaphoric terms. In pursuing these issues through non-conventional narrative forms, and shifting the burden of discovering meaning to the audience, Duras’s films provide an alternative to conventional ways of watching movies. Her work is seen as exemplifying a feminine writing practice that challenges the patriarchal domination of classical narrative cinema. In an interview, Duras said, “I think the future belongs to women. Men have been completely dethroned. Their rhetoric is stale, used up. We must move on to the rhetoric of women, one that is anchored in the organism, in the body.” It is this new rhetoric, a new way of communicating, that Duras strives for in her films.

—M.B. White

DUVIVIER, Julien

Films as Director:

1919 Haceldama ou Le Prix du Sang (+ sc)
1920 La Réincarnation de Serge Renaudier (negative destroyed by fire before film shown) (+ sc)
1922  Les Roquevillard (+ sc); L’Ouragan sur la montagne (+ sc);
      Der unheimliche Gast (Le Logis de l’horreur) (+ sc)
1923  Le Reflet de Claude Mercœur (+ sc)
1924  Credo ou La Tragédie de Lourdes (+ sc); Coeurs farouches
      (+ sc); La Machine à refaire la vie (re-released with sound, 1933) (co-d, sc); L’Oeuvre immortelle (+ sc)
1925  L’Abbé Constantin (+ sc); Poil de carotte (+ co-sc)
1926  L’Agonie de Jerusalem (+ sc); L’Homme à l’Hispano
1927  Le Mariage de Mademoiselle Beulemans (+ sc); Le Mystère de la Tour Eiffel (+ sc)
1928  Le Tourbillon de Paris
1929  La Divine croisière (+ sc); Maman Colibri (+ co-sc); La Vie miraculeuse de Thérèse Martin (+ sc); Au bonheur des dames (+ co-sc)

(Sound films):

1930  David Golder (+ sc)
1931  Les Cinq Gentlemen maudits (+ sc); Allo Berlin? Ici Paris!
      (Hallo! Hallo! Hier spricht Berlin) (+ sc); Die fünf verfluchten Gentlemen (German version) (+ sc)
1932  Poil de carotte (remake) (+ sc); La Tête d’un homme (+ co-sc)
1933  Le Petit Roi (+ sc); Le Paquebot ‘Tenacity’ (+ co-sc)
1934  Maria Chapdelaine (+ sc)
1935  Golgotha (+ sc, adapt); La Bandera (+ co-sc)
1936  L’Homme du jour (+ co-sc); Golem (Le Golem) (+ co-sc); La
      Belle Équipe (+ co-sc)
1937  Pépé-le-Moko (+ co-sc); Un Carnet de bal (+ sc)
1938  The Great Waltz (Toute la ville danse) (+ sc); La Fin du jour
      (+ co-sc); Marie Antoinette (Van Dyke, d uncredited, sc)
1939  La Charrette Fantôme (+ sc)
1940  Untel père et fils (+ co-sc)
1941  Lydia (+ sc, co-story)
1942  Tales of Manhattan (+ co-sc)
1943  Flesh and Fantasy (+ co-pr)
1944  The Imposter (+ sc)
1946  Panique (+ co-sc)
1948  Anna Karenina (+ co-sc)
1949  Au royaume des cieux (+ sc, pr)
1950  Black Jack (+ co-sc, pr); Sous le ciel de Paris (+ co-sc)
1951  Le Petit Monde de Don Camillo (Il piccolo mondo di Don Camillo) (+ co-sc)
1952 La Fête à Henriette (+ co-sc)
1953 Le Retour de Don Camillo (Il ritorno di Don Camillo) (+ co-sc)
1954 L’Affaire Maurizius (+ sc)
1955 Marianne de ma jeunesse (+ sc)
1956 Voice le temps des assassins (+ co-sc)
1957 L’Homme à l’imperméable (+ co-sc); Pot Bouille (+ co-sc)
1958 La Femme et le panto (+ sc, co-adapt)
1959 Marie Octobre (+ co-sc)
1960 Das kunstseidene Mädchen (La Grande Vie) (+ co-sc); Boulev-vard (+ co-sc)
1962 La Chambre ardente (+ co-sc); Le Diable et les dix commandements (+ co-sc)
1963 Chair de poule (+ co-sc)
1967 Diaboliquement vôtre (+ sc, co-adapt)

Other Films:

1918 Les Travaillers de la mer (Antoine) (asst d)
1920 L’Agonie des aigles (Bernard-Deschamps) (adaptation); La
Terre (Antoine) (asst d)
1921 Crépuscule d’épouvante (Etévant) (sc)
1922 L’Arlésoisie (Antoine) (asst d)
1924 La Nuit de la revanche (Etévant) (story)
1946 Collège swing (Amours, délices et orgues) (Berthomieu)
(co-sc)

Publications

By DUVIVIER: articles—

‘‘Un Réalisateur compare deux méthodes,’’ interview with Pierre
Leprohon, in Cinémonde (Paris), 6 May 1946.
‘‘De la création à la mise en scène,’’ in Cinémonde (Paris), Christmas 1946.
‘‘Julien Duvivier: ‘Pourquoi j’ai trahi Zola,’’ interview with Yvonne
Baby, in Lettres Françaises (Paris), 31 October 1957.

On DUVIVIER: books—

Chirat, Raymond, Julien Duvivier, Lyon, 1968.

On DUVIVIER: articles—

Aubriant, Michel, ‘‘Julien Duvivier,’’ in Cinémonde (Paris), 28
November 1952.
‘‘Débat sur Duvivier,’’ in Arts (Paris), 18 April 1956.
Epstein, Marie, ‘‘Comment ils travaillent? Julien Duvivier,’’ in Technique Cinématoатегraphique (Paris), December 1958.
Marcabru, P., ‘‘Les Français à Hollywood,’’ in Arts (Paris), 8 February 1961.

Renoir, Jean, ‘‘Duvivier, le professionnel,’’ in Le Figaro Littéraire
(Paris), 6 November 1967.
Amengual, Barthélemy, ‘‘Défense de Duvivier,’’ in Cahiers de la
Cinémathèque (Perpignan), Spring 1975.
Simso, Noel, ‘‘A propos de Julien Duvivier,’’ in Image et Son
(Paris), November 1981.
‘‘Special Mac Orlan; La Bandera, Julian Duvivier,’’ in L’Avant-
Douin, Jean-Luc, ‘‘Duvivier, la mauvaise réputation,’’ in Télérama Pernod, P., ‘‘Carrousels et noeuds coulants (sur Julien Duvivier),’’ in Masson, Alain, and others, ‘‘Julien Duvivier,’’ in Positif (Paris), no.
429, November 1996.
Borger, Lenny, ‘‘Genius Is Just a Word,’’ in Sight and Sound
(London), vol. 8, no. 9, September 1998.

On DUVIVIER: film—

Viallaet, Pierre, and Marcel l’Herbier, Portraits filmées . . . Julien
Duvivier (for television), 1953.

* * *

No one speaks of Julien Duvivier without apologizing. So many of his fifty-odd films are embarrassing to watch that it is hard to believe he was ever in charge of his career in the way we like to imagine Renoir or Clair were in charge of theirs. But Duvivier had neither the luxury nor the contacts to direct his career. He began and remained a yeoman in the industry. A director at the Théâtre Antoine in the teens, he began his film career in 1922 and made over a score of silent films, mainly melodramas. From the first he separated himself from the experiments in narration and visual style that characterized much of that period.

Duvivier’s reputation as a reputable, efficient director jumped in the sound era when he made a string of small but successful films (David Golder, Les Cinq Gentilhommes maudits, Allo Berlin? Ici Paris!, Poil de carotte, La Tête d’un homme). Evidently his flair for the melodramatic and his ability to control powerful actors put him far ahead of the average French director trying to cope with the problems of sound. But in this era, as always, Duvivier discriminated little among the subjects he filmed. This aspect was most evident in 1935.
First came Golgotha, a throwback to the religious films he made in the silent era, and now completely outmoded. Duvivier struggles to energize the static tableaux the film settles into. He moves his camera wildly, but seldom reaches for a key closeup or for an authentic exchange among his actors. It is all picture postcards, or rather holy cards, set off to Jacques Ibert’s operatic score.

This solemn, even bombastic, film could not be farther from the swiftness and authentic feeling of the romantic Foreign Legion film La Bandera made the same year. Where Golgotha is an official presentation of French cinema, La Bandera seems more intimate, more in the spirit of the times. Its success was only the first of a set of astounding films that include La Belle Equipe, Pépé-le-Moko, Un
Carnet de bal, and Le Fin du jour. It is tempting to surmise that cultural history and Julien Duvivier came for once into perfect coincidence in this age of poetic realism. Like Michael Curtiz and Casablanca, Duvivier’s style and the actors who played out the roles of his dramas spoke for a whole generation. In France it was a better generation, vaguely hopeful with the popular front, but expecting the end of day.

Duvivier’s contribution to these films extends beyond the direction of actors. Every film contains at least one scene of remarkable expressiveness, like the death of Regis in Pépé-Le-Moko, gunned down by his own victim with the jukebox blaring. Duvivier’s sureness of pace in this era brought him a Hollywood contract even before the Nazi invasion forced him to leave France. Without the strong personality of Renoir or Clair, and with far more experience in genre pictures, Duvivier fit in rather well with American film production methods. He exploited the lack of personal control or even personal contribution in the industry, but he acquitted himself well until the Liberation.

Hoping to return to the glory years of poetic realism, Duvivier’s first postwar project in France replicated the essence of its style. Panique featured sparse sets, an atmosphere that dominated a reduced but significant murder drama, and the evocative work of Michel Simon and Vivian Romance in an offbeat policier from Simenon. But the country had changed. The film failed, and Duvivier began what would become a lifelong search for the missing formula. With varying degrees of box office success he turned out contemporary and historical comedies and melodramas; the only one which put him in the spotlight was Don Camillo with Fernandel.

Believing far more in experience, planning, and hard work than in spontaneity and genius, Duvivier never relaxed. Every film taught him something and, by rights, he should have ended a better director than ever. But he will be remembered for those five years in the late 1930s, a period when every choice he made in the realms of script and direction was in tune with the romantically pessimistic sensibility of the country.

—Dudley Andrew

Films as Director (incomplete list; Dwan estimated 1,850 films):

1911  Branding a Bad Man and A Western Dreamer (split reel) (+ pr, sc); A Daughter of Liberty and A Trouper’s Heart (split reel) (+ pr, sc); Rattlesnakes and Gunpowder and The Ranch Tenor (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Sheepman’s Daughter (+ pr, sc); The Sagebrush Phrenologist and The Elopements on Double L Ranch (split reel) (+ pr, sc); $5,000 Reward—Dead or Alive (+ pr, sc); The Witch of the Range (+ pr, sc); The Cowboy’s Ruse and Law and Order on Bar L Ranch (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Yiddisher Cowboy and The Bronco Buster’s Bride (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Hermit’s Gold (+ pr, sc); The Actress and the Cowboys and The Sky Pilot’s Intemperance (split reel) (+ pr, sc); A Western Wail (+ pr, sc); The Call of the Open Range (+ pr, sc); The School Ma’am of Snake and The Ranch Chicken (split reel) (+ pr, sc); Cupid in Chaps (+ pr, sc); The Outlaw’s Trail (+ pr, sc); The Ranchman’s Nerve (+ pr, sc); When East Comes West (+ pr, sc); The Cowboy’s Deliverance (+ pr, sc); The Captain’s Brand (+ pr, sc); The Parting Trails (+ pr, sc); The Bashi Bazouk (+ pr, sc); Cattle, Gold, and Oil (+ pr, sc); The Ranch Girl (+ pr, sc); The Poisoned Flower (+ pr, sc); The Brand of Fear (+ pr, sc); The Blotted Brand (+ pr, sc); Auntie and the Cowboys (+ pr, sc); The Western Doctor’s Peril (+ pr, sc); The Smuggler and the Girl (+ pr, sc); The Cowboy and the Artist (+ pr, sc); Three Million Dollars (+ pr, sc); The Stage Robbers of San Juan (+ pr, sc); The Mother of the Ranch (+ pr, sc); The Gunman (+ pr, sc); The Claim Jumpers (+ pr, sc); The Circular Fence (+ pr, sc); The Rustler Sheriff (+ pr, sc); The Love of the West (+ pr, sc); The Trained Nurse at Bar Z (+ pr, sc); The Miner’s Wife (+ pr, sc); The Land Thieves (+ pr, sc); The Cowboy and the Outlaw (+ pr, sc); Three Daughters of the West and Caves of La Jolla (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Lonely Range (+ pr, sc); The Horse Thief’s Bigamy (+ pr, sc); The Trail of the Eucalyptus (+ pr, sc); The Stronger Man (+ pr, sc); The Water War (+ pr, sc); The Three Shell Game (+ pr, sc); The Mexican (+ pr, sc); The Eastern Cowboy (+ pr, sc); The Way of the West (+ pr, sc); The Test (+ pr, sc); The Master of the Vineyard (+ pr, sc); Sloppy Bill of the Rollicking R (+ pr, sc); The Sheriff’s Sisters (+ pr, sc); The Angel of Paradise Ranch (+ pr, sc); The Smoke of the 45 (+ pr, sc); The Man Hunt (+ pr, sc); Santa Catalina, Magic Isle of the Pacific (+ pr, sc); The Last Noch (+ pr, sc); The Gold Dust (+ pr, sc); The Jewel of the Candles (+ pr, sc); Bonita of El Cajon (+ pr, sc); The Lawful Holdup (+ pr, sc); Battleships (+ pr, sc); Dams and Waterways (+ pr, sc)

1912  A Midwinter Trip to Los Angeles (+ pr, sc); The Misadventures of a Claim Agent and Bronco Busting for Flying Pictures (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Winning of La Mesa (+ pr, sc); The Locket (+ pr, sc); The Relentless Outlaw (+ pr, sc); Justice of the Sage (+ pr, sc); Objections Overruled (+ pr, sc); The Mormon (+ pr, sc); Love and Lemons (+ pr, sc); The Best Policy (+ pr, sc); The Real Estate Fraud (+ pr, sc); The Grubstake Mortgage (+ pr, sc); Where Broadway Meets the Mountains (+ pr, sc); An Innocent Grafter (+ pr, sc); Society and Chaps (+ pr, sc); The Leap Year Cowboy (+ pr, sc); The Land Baron of San Tee (+ pr, sc); An Assisted Elopement (+ pr, sc); *From the

DWAN, Allan

Nationality: American. Born: Joseph Aloysius Dwan in Toronto, Canada, 3 April 1885; family moved to United States, 1893. Education: North Division High School, Chicago; Notre Dame University, Indiana, degree in electrical engineering, 1907. Family: Married 1) Pauline Bush, 1915 (divorced 1920); 2) Marie Shelton, early 1920s (died 1954). Career: As illuminating engineer work on mercury vapor are light led to association with Essanay film company, 1909; wrote stories while supervising lighting; American Film Company (“Flying A”) formed by Essanay staff, Dwan joined as chief scenario editor, 1910; signed to Universal Pictures, 1913; signed with Famous Players Company, New York, 1914; joined Triangle Company under supervision of D.W. Griffith, 1915; worked in England, 1932–34; trained camera units for U.S. Armed Services photographic division, 1943; contracted to Republic Pictures, 1945–54. Died: In Woodland Hills, California, 21 December 1981.
Four Hundred to the Herd (+ pr, sc); The Broken Ties (+ pr, sc); After School (+ pr, sc); A Bad Investment (+ pr, sc); The Full Value (+ pr, sc); The Tramp’s Gratitude (+ pr, sc); Fidelity (+ pr, sc); Winter Sports and Pastimes of Coronado Beach (+ pr, sc); The Maid and the Man (+ pr, sc); The Cowboy Socialist (+ pr, sc); Checkmate and The Ranchman’s Marathon (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Coward (+ pr, sc); The Distant Relative (+ pr, sc); The Ranch Detective (+ pr, sc); Driftwood (+ pr, sc); The Eastern Girl (+ pr, sc); The Pensioners (+ pr, sc); The End of the Feud (+ pr, sc); The Wedding Dress (+ pr, sc); Mystical Maid of Jamasha Pass (+ pr, sc); The Other Wise Man (+ pr, sc); The Haters (+ pr, sc); The Thread of Life (+ pr, sc); The Wandering Gypsy (+ pr, sc); The Reward of Valor (+ pr, sc); The Brand (+ pr, sc); The Green-eyed Monster (+ pr, sc); Cupid through Padlocks (+ pr, sc); For the Good of Her Men (+ pr, sc); The Simple Love (+ pr, sc); The Weaker Brother and Fifty-Mile Auto Contest (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Wordless Message (+ pr, sc); The Evil Inheritance (+ pr, sc); The Marauders (+ pr, sc); The Girl Back Home (+ pr, sc); Under False Pretences (+ pr, sc); Where There’s a Heart (+ pr, sc); The Vanishing Race (+ pr, sc); The Fatal Mirror and Point Loma, Old Town (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Tell-Tale Shells (+ pr, sc); Indian Jealousy and San Diego (split reel) (+ pr, sc); The Canyon Dweller (+ pr, sc); It Pays to Wait (+ pr, sc); A Life for a Kiss (+ pr, sc); The Meddlers (+ pr, sc); The Girl and the Gun (+ pr, sc); The Battleground (+ pr, sc); The Bad Man and the Ranger (+ pr, sc); The Outlaw Colony (+ pr, sc); The Land of Death (+ pr, sc); The Bandit of Point Loma (+ pr, sc); The Jealous Rage (+ pr, sc); The Will of James Waldron (+ pr, sc); The House That Jack Built (+ pr, sc); Curtiss’s School of Aviation (+ pr, sc); The Stepfather (+ pr, sc); The Odd Job Man (+ pr, sc); The Liar (+ pr, sc); The Greaser and the Weakling (+ pr, sc); The Stranger at Coyote (+ pr, sc); The Dawn of Passion (+ pr, sc); The Vengeance That Failed (+ pr, sc); The Fear (+ pr, sc); The Foreclosure (+ pr, sc); White Treachery (+ pr, sc); Their Hero Son (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne’s Ward (+ pr, sc); Father’s Favorite (+ pr, sc); Jack of Diamonds (+ pr, sc); The Reformation of Sierra Smith (+ pr, sc); The Promise (+ pr, sc); The New Cowpuncher (+ pr, sc); The Best Man Wins (+ pr, sc); The Wooers of Mountain Kate (+ pr, sc);
One, Two, Three (+ pr, sc); The Wanderer (+ pr, sc); Maiden and Men (+ pr, sc); God’s Unfortuant ( + pr, sc); Man’s Calling (+ pr, sc); The Intrusion at Lompoc (+ pr, sc); The Thief’s Wife (+ pr, sc); The Would-be Heir (+ pr, sc); Jack’s Word (+ pr, sc); Her Own Country (+ pr, sc); Pals (+ pr, sc); The Animal Within (+ pr, sc); The Law of God (+ pr, sc); Nell of the Pampas (+ pr, sc); The Daughters of Senor Lopez (+ pr, sc); The Power of Love (+ pr, sc); The Recognition (+ pr, sc); Blackened Hills (+ pr, sc); The Loneliness of Neglect (+ pr, sc); Paid in Full (+ pr, sc); Ranch Life on the Range (+ pr, sc); The Man from the East (+ pr, sc); The Horse Thief (+ pr, sc); The Good Love and the Bad (+ pr, sc)

1913 The Fraud That Failed (+ pr, sc); Another Man’s Wife (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne’s Inheritance (+ pr, sc); Their Masterpiece (+ pr, sc); His Old-Fashioned Mother (+ pr, sc); Where Destiny Guides (+ pr, sc); The Silver-plated Gun (+ pr, sc); A Rose of Old Mexico (+ pr, sc); Building the Great Los Angeles Aqueduct (+ pr, sc); Women Left Alone (+ pr, sc); Andrew Jackson (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne’s Vanity (+ pr, sc); The Fugitive (+ pr, sc); The Romance (+ pr, sc); The Finer Things (+ pr, sc); Love Is Blind (+ pr, sc); Then the Light Fades (+ pr, sc); High and Low (+ pr, sc); The Greater Love (+ pr, sc); The Jocular Winds (+ pr, sc); The Transgression of Manuel (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne, Detective (+ pr, sc); The Orphan’s Mine (+ pr, sc); When a Woman Won’t (+ pr, sc); An Eastern Flower (+ pr, sc); Cupid Never Ages (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne’s Beauty (+ pr, sc); The Renegade’s Heart (+ pr, sc); Matches (+ pr, sc); The Mute Witness (+ pr, sc); Cupid Throws a Brick (+ pr, sc); Woman’s Honor (+ pr, sc); Suspended Sentence (+ pr, sc); In Another’s Nest (+ pr, sc); The Ways of Fate (+ pr, sc); Boobs and Bricks (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne’s Trust (+ pr, sc); Oil on Troubled Waters (+ pr, sc); The Road to Ruin (+ pr, sc); The Brothers (+ pr, sc); Human Kindness (+ pr, sc); Youth and Jealousy (+ pr, sc); Angel of the Canyons (+ pr, sc); The Great Harmony (+ pr, sc); Her Innocent Marriage (+ pr, sc); Calamity Anne Parcel Post (+ pr, sc); The Ashes of Three (+ pr, sc); On the Border (+ pr, sc); Her Big Story (+ pr, sc); When Luck Changes (+ pr, sc); The Wishing Seat (+ pr, sc); Hearts and Horses (+ pr, sc); The Reward of Courage (+ pr, sc); The Soul of a Thief (+ pr, sc); The Marine Law (+ pr, sc); The Road to Success (+ pr, sc); The Spirit of the Flag; The Call to Arms (+ sc); Women and War; The Power Flash of Death (+ sc); The Picket Guard; Mental Suicide; Man’s Duty; The Animal (+ sc); The Wall of Money; The Echo of a Song; Criminals; The Restless Spirit (+ sc); Jewels of a Sacrifice; Back to Life; Red Margaret, Mooshshine; Bloodahounds of the North; He Called Her In (+ sc); The Menace (+ sc); The Chase; The Battle of Wills

1914 The Lie; The Honor of the Mounted; Remember Mary Magdalene (+ sc); Discord and Harmony; The Menace to Carlotta; The Embezzler (+ sc); The Lamb, the Woman, the Wolf (+ sc); The End of the Feud; Tragedy of Whispering Creek; The Unlawful Trade; The Forbidden Room; The Hopes of Blind Alley; The Great Universal Mystery; Richeleau (+ sc); Wildflower, The Country Chairman (+ sc); The Small—Town Girl; The Straight Road; The Conspiracy; The Unwelcome Mrs. Hatch; The Man on the Case

1915 The Dancing Girl; David Harum; The Love Route; The Commanding Officer; May Blossom; The Pretty Sister of Jose; A Girl of Yesterday; The Foundling; Jordan Is a Hard Road (+ sc)

1916 Betty of Greystone; The Habit of Happiness (Laugh and the World Laughs) (+ sc); The Good Bad Man (Passing Through); An Innocent Magdalene; The Half-Breed; Manhattan Madness; Fifty-Fifty (+ sc)

1917 Panthea (+ sc); The Fighting Odds; A Modern Musketeer (+ sc)

1918 Mr. Fix-It (+ sc); Bound in Morocco (+ sc); He Comes up Smiling

Cheating Cheaters; Getting Mary Married; The Dark Star; Soldiers of Fortune

1920 The Luck of the Irish; The Forbidden Thing (+ pr, co-sc)

A Perfect Crime (+ pr, sc); A Broken Doll (+ pr, sc); The Scoffer (+ pr); The Sin of Martha Qued (+ pr, sc); In the Heart of a Fool (+ pr)

The Hidden Woman (+ pr); Superstition (+ pr); Robin Hood

The Glimpses of the Moon (+ pr); Lawful Larceny (+ pr); Zaza (+ pr); Big Brother (+ pr)

A Society Scandal (+ pr); Manhandled (+ pr); Her Love Story (+ pr); Wages of Virtue; Argentine Love (+ pr)

Night Life in New York (+ pr); Coast of Folly (+ pr); Stage Struck (+ pr)

Sea Horses (+ pr); Padlocked (+ pr); Tin Gods (+ pr); Summer Bachelors (+ pr)

The Music Master (+ pr); West Point (+ pr); The Joy Girl (+ pr); East Side, West Side (+ sc); French Dressing (+ pr)

The Big Noise (+ pr)

The Iron Mask; Tide of Empire; The Far Call; Frozen Justice; South Sea Rose

What a Widow! (+ pr); Man to Man

Chances; Wicked

While Paris Sleeps

Her First Affaire; Counsel’s Opinion

The Morning After (I Spy); Hollywood Party (uncredited)

Black Sheep (+ sc); Navy Wife

Song and Dance Man; Human Cargo; High Tension; 15 Maiden Lane

Woman-Wise; That I May Live; One Mile from Heaven; Heidi

Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm; Jostette; Suez

The Three Musketeers; The Gorilla; Frontier Marshal

Sailor’s Lady; Young People; Trail of the Vigilantes

Look Who’s Laughing (+ pr); Rise and Shine

Friendly Enemies; Here We Go Again (+ pr)

Around the World (+ pr)

Up in Mabel’s Room; Abroad with Two Yanks

Brewster’s Millions; Getting Gertie’s Garter

Rendezvous with Annie (+ co-pr)

Calendar Girl (+ co-pr); Northwest Outpost (+ co-pr); Driftwood

The Inside Story (+ pr); Angel in Exile

Sands of Iwo Jima

Surrender (+ co-pr)

Belle le Grand; The Wild Blue Yonder

I Dream of Jeannie (with the Light Brown Hair); Montana Belle

Woman They Almost Lynched; Sweethearts on Parade (+ co-pr)

Flight Nurse; Silver Lode; Passion; Cattle Queen of Montana
It’s Always Sunday (for Screen Director’s Playhouse television series); Escape to Burma; Pearl of the South Pacific; Tennessee’s Partner

Slightly Scarlet; Hold Back the Night

The River’s Edge; The Restless Breed

Enchanted Island

Most Dangerous Man Alive

It was the scientific aspect of motion pictures that first attracted Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but

Most of these were one- to four-reel silents, of which some two-thirds are lost, and for that reason his career remains one which has never been properly assessed. The artistic disparity of his seventy-odd sound films fail to adequately represent this technically innovative, unpretentious, avid storyteller, and his career will surely undergo considerable re-evaluation as the study of film history progresses.

It was the scientific aspect of motion pictures that first attracted Dwan to the medium, and in 1909 he joined Essanay as a lighting man. He then joined the American Flying A Company as a writer, but soon found himself directing short films, mostly Westerns. He moved next to Universal, then to Famous Players, where in 1915 he introduced the dolly shot for David Harum and directed Mary Pickford in The Foundling. That same year Dwan joined Fine Arts-Triangle, where his films were supervised by D.W. Griffith. He directed many of Griffith’s top stars, including Dorothy Gish in Betty of Greystone and her sister Lilian in An Innocent Magdalen. He once stated how impressed he was with the “economy of gesture” of Griffith’s players. He credits Griffith with developing his clean, spare visual style, while Griffith frequently sought out Dwan for his technical knowledge. One such request resulted in Dwan’s improvising an elevator on a moving track to film the massive sets of Intolerance.

Dwan also established his association with Douglas Fairbanks at Fine Arts-Triangle. This professional relationship resulted in collaboration on eleven films, including The Half-Breed, A Modern Musketeer, Bound in Morocco, and the celebrated Robin Hood, described by Robert Sherwood as “the high-water mark of film production” and “the farthest step that the silent drama has ever taken along the high road to art.”

In 1923 Dwan directed his favorite film, Big Brother, which was about underprivileged boys, and then embarked on the first of eight buoyant comedies starring Gloria Swanson, the best of which were Zaza and Manhandled. With the arrival of sound, Dwan signed a long-term contract with Fox (1930–41), where he was unfortunately relegated to their B unit except for occasional reprieves—Shirley Temple’s Heidi and Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm, and Suez, much admired for its typhoon sequence. He then signed with producer Edward Small, from whom he directed a delightful quartet of farces—Up in Mabel’s Room, Getting Gertie’s Garter, Abroad with Two Yanks, and Brewster’s Millions. He then unwisely signed an exclusive deal with Republic Pictures where, except for Sands of Iwo Jima, his creativity was constricted by studio head Herbert Yates. Moving to RKO, he persevered despite the many obstacles of 1950s filmmaking, churning out entertaining action films.

Dwan loved moviemaking and was described as the “last of the journeyman filmmakers” by Richard Roud. Of his self-imposed retirement in 1958, Dwan explained: “It was no longer a question of ‘Let’s get a bunch of people together and make a picture.’ It’s just a business that I stood as long as I could and I got out of it when I couldn’t stand it any more.”

—Ronald Bowers
EASTWOOD, Clint

Films as Director:

1971 Play Misty for Me (+ role)
1972 High Plains Drifter (+ role)
1973 Breezy
1975 The Eiger Sanction (+ role)
1976 The Outlaw Josey Wales (+ role)
1977 The Gauntlet (+ role)
1980 Bronco Billy (+ role, song composer)
1982 Firefox (+ role, pr); Honkytonk Man (+ role, pr)
1983 Sudden Impact (+ role, pr)
1985 Pale Rider (+ role, pr)
1986 Heartbreak Ridge (+ role, pr, song composer)
1987 Bird (+ pr)
1990 The Rookie (+ role); White Hunter, Black Heart (+ role, pr)
1992 Unforgiven (+ role, pr, music)
1993 A Perfect World (+ role, pr)
1995 The Bridges of Madison County (+ role, pr)
1997 Absolute Power (+ role, pr); Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil (+ pr)
1999 True Crime (+ role, pr)
2000 Space Cowboys (+ role, pr)

Other Films:

1955 Francis in the Navy (role); Lady Godiva (role); Revenge of the Creature (role); Tarantula (role)
1956 The First Travelling Saleslady (role); Never Say Goodbye (role); Star in the Dust (role)
1957 Escapade in Japan (role)
1958 Ambush at Cimarron Pass (role); Lafayette Escadrille (role)
1960 A Fistful of Dollars (role)
1965 For a Few Dollars More (role)
1966 Il Buono, il brutto, il cattivo (The Good, the Bad, and the Ugly (Leone) (role); Le Streghe (role)
1967 Hang `em High (role)
1968 Coogan’s Bluff (role)
1969 Paint Your Wagon (role); Where Eagles Dare (role)
1970 Kelly’s Heroes (role); Two Mules for Sister Sara (role)
1971 The Beguiled (role); Dirty Harry (role)
1972 Joe Kidd (role)
1973 Magnum Force (role)
1974 Thunderbolt and Lightfoot (role)
1976 The Enforcer (role)
1978 Every Which Way but Loose (role)
1979 Escape from Alcatraz (role)
1980 Any Which Way You Can (role, song composer)
1984 City Heat (role); Tightrope (role, pr)
1988 The Dead Pool (role, pr); Thelonius Monk: Straight No Chaser (exec pr)
1989 The Pink Cadillac (role)
1993 In the Line of Fire (role)
1996 Wild Bill: Hollywood Maverick (doc) (role)

Publications

By EASTWOOD: book—

By EASTWOOD: articles—

Interview with David Thomson in Film Comment, September/October 1984.
Interview with Michel Ciment and Hubert Niograt in Positif, July/August 1988.
Interview with Nat Hentoff in American Film, September 1988.
Interview with Michel Ciment in Positif, no. 351, 1990.
Interview with M. Henry in Positif, no. 380, 1992.
Interview in Reel West, October/November 1992.

On EASTWOOD: books—

On EASTWOOD: articles—

Welsh, James M., “Fixing the Bridges of Madison County,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), July 1995.

Schickel, Richard, Cathleen Murphy, and Richard Combs, “Clint on the Back Nine/The Good, the Bad & the Ugly/Old Ghosts,” in Film Comment (New York), May-June 1996.

Metz, Walter, “Another Being We Have Created Called “Us”: Point of View, Melancholia, and the Joking Unconscious in The Bridges of Madison County,” in Velvet Light Trap (Austin, Texas), Spring 1997.

* * *

In 1992, after almost forty years in the business, Clint Eastwood finally received Oscar recognition. Unforgiven brought him the awards for Best Achievement in Directing and for Best Picture, along with a nomination for Best Actor. Indeed, this strikingly powerful Western was nominated for no less than nine Academy Awards, Gene Hackman collecting Best Supporting Actor for his performance as the eponymous anti-hero, have provided Eastwood with well-established and economical starting characters for so many of his performances. In directing himself, furthermore, he has used that persona with a degree of irony and distance. Sometimes, especially in his Westerns, that has meant leaning toward stylization and almost operatic exaggeration (High Plains Drifter, Pale Rider, the last section of Unforgiven), though rarely reaching Leone’s extremes of delirious overstatement. On other occasions, it has seen him play on the tension between the seemingly assertive masculinity of the Eastwood image and the strong female characters who are so often featured in his films (Play Misty for Me, The Gauntlet, Heartbreak Ridge and, in part at least, The Bridges of Madison County). It is, of course, notoriously difficult to both direct and star in a movie. Where Eastwood has succeeded in that combination (not always the case) it has depended significantly on his inventive building on the Eastwood persona.

It is important to give Eastwood full credit for this inventiveness in any attempt to assess his work. His best films as a director have a richness to them, not just stylistically—though in those respects he has learned well from Leone’s concern with lighting and composition and from Siegel’s way with in-frame movement, editing, and tight narration—but also a moral complexity which belies the one-dimensionality of the Eastwood image. The protagonists in his better films, like Josey Wales in The Outlaw Josey Wales, Highway in Heartbreak Ridge, Munny in Unforgiven, even Charlie Parker in the flawed Bird, are not simple men in either their virtues or their failings. Eastwood’s fondness for narratives of revenge and redemption, furthermore, allows him to draw upon a rich generic vein in American cinema, a tradition with a built-in potential for character development and for evoking human complexity without giving way to art-film portentousness.

In these respects Eastwood is the modern inheritor of traditional Hollywood directorial values, once epitomised in the transparent style of a John Ford, Howard Hawks, or John Huston (himself the subject of Eastwood’s White Hunter, Black Heart), and passed on to Eastwood by that next-generation carrier of the tradition, Don Siegel. For these filmmakers, as for Eastwood, the action movie, the Western, the thriller were opportunities to explore character, motivation, and human frailty within a framework of accessible entertainment. Of course, all of them were also capable of “quieter” films, harnessing the same commitment to craft, the same attention to detail, in the service of less action-driven narratives, just as Eastwood did with The Bridges of Madison County. And all of them, too, could make films which were less than convincing, though rarely without some quality, as Eastwood has done more recently with the overwrought Absolute Power and the rather unfocused Midnight in the Garden of Good and Evil. But in the end their and Eastwood’s real art was to draw upon...
Hollywood’s genre traditions and make of them unique and perceptive studies of human beings under stress. Though his directorial career has been uneven, at his best Eastwood has proved a more than worthy carrier of this flame.

—Andrew Tudor

EGOYAN, Atom

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Cairo, Egypt, 19 July 1960; immigrated to Canada, 1962; naturalized Canadian citizen. Education: Trinity College, University of Toronto, B.A., 1982. Family: Married Arsinée Khanjian (an actress); son: Arshile. Career: Associated with Playwrights Unit in Toronto, Ontario, Canada; director of Ego Film Arts in Toronto, 1982—; director of episodes of television shows such as Alfred Hitchcock Presents, 1985, Twilight Zone, 1985, Friday the 13th, 1987, and Yo-Yo Ma Inspired by Bach, 1997; director of stage productions, including Salome, 1996; member of jury, Cannes International Film Festival, 1996. Awards: Grant from University of Toronto’s Hart House Film Board; prize from Canadian National Exhibition’s film festival, for Howard in Particular; grants from Canadian Council and Ontario Arts Council; Gold Ducat Award, Mannheim International Film Week Festival, 1984, for Next of Kin; Toronto City Award for excellence in a Canadian production, Toronto Film Festival, 1987, International Critics Award for Best Feature Film, Uppsala Film Festival, 1988, and PRIX Alcan from Festival du Nouveau Cinema, 1988, all for Family Viewing; prize for best screenplay, Vancouver International Film Festival, 1989, for Speaking Parts; Special Jury Prize, Moscow Film Festival, Golden Spike, Valladolid Film Festival, Toronto City Award, Toronto Film Festival, and award for best Canadian film, Sudbury Film Festival, all 1991, all for The Adjuster; Golden Gate Award, San Francisco Film Festival, 1992, for Gross Misconduct; prize for best film in “new cinema,” International Jury for At Cinema and prize from Berlin International Film Festival, both 1994, both for Calendar; Genie awards for best picture, best director, and best writer, International Film Critics Award, Cannes Film Festival, Prix de la Critique for best foreign film, and Toronto City Award, Toronto International Film Festival, all 1994, all for Exotica. Address: Ego Film Arts, 80 Niagara St., Toronto, Ontario M5V 1C5, Canada.

Films as Director:

1979 Howard in Particular (+ sc, ed, ph, ro as voices)
1980 After Grad with Dad (+ sc, ed, ph, mus)
1981 Peep Show (+ sc, ed, ph)
1982 Open House (+ sc, ed)
1984 Next of Kin (+ sc, pr, ed, mus)
1985 In This Corner (TV); Men: A Passion Playground
1987 Family Viewing (+ sc, pr, ed)
1988 Looking for Nothing (TV) (+ sc)
1989 Speaking Parts (+ sc, pr)
1991 Montreal vu par... (Montreal Sextet) (segment “En passant”) (+ sc); The Adjuster (+ sc, mus)
1993 Gross Misconduct (TV); Calendar (+ sc, pr, ed, ph, ro as Photographer)
1994 Exotica (+ sc, pr)
1995 A Portrait of Arshile (ro)
1997 Bach Cello Suite vn4: Sarabande; The Sweet Hereafter (De beaux lendemains) (+ sc, pr)
1999 Felicia’s Journey (+ sc)
2000 Knock & Jill (as TV Studio Guard)

Other Films:

1985 Knock! Knock! (ro); Men: A Passion Playground (ed, ph)
1994 Camilla (as Director)
1995 Curtis’s Charm (exec pr)
1996 The Stupids (as TV Studio Guard)
1998 Jack & Jill (exec pr); Babyface (exec pr)

Publications

By EGOYAN: articles—

On EGOYAN: articles—

Film Comment, November-December 1989.
Maclean’s, 3 October 1994.
Film Comment, November-December 1995.
Film Comment, January-February 1998.
The Observer, 9 April 1995.
The Observer, 28 September 1997
Positif, special section, October 1997.
Kino (Warsaw), February 1998.

Given Atom Egoyan’s background and family history, the chief preoccupations of his films might seem all but inevitable. Born in Cairo to Armenian parents, he was taken to Canada as a child and grew up in Victoria, British Columbia, a town so full of British expatriates it seemed like a colonial outpost. While he was still a child his father, an artist, began an extra-marital affair with a woman whose three children were all fatally ill. Small wonder if his films deal so insistently with problems of ethnic identity, broken families, alienation, loss, and death.

Add to these themes, at least in his earlier films, an uneasy fascination with the role of visual media in the modern world. Video in particular serves for Egoyan’s characters as an escape route, a form of do-it-yourself therapy that allows them to evade the unsatisfactory reality around them. In Family Viewing a husband and wife lie semi-naked side by side, neither touching nor speaking, grimly watching videos of their earlier couplings that the man has taped over scenes of his son’s childhood. When not viewing tapes, he calls up phone-sex lines. Two female characters in Speaking Parts, obsessed with a wannabe actor (and part-time gigolo), spend more time watching him on video than in the flesh. In The Adjuster, Egoyan’s most dreamlike and elusive film, a censor secretly videotapes the porn films she’s being shown—experience at third hand.

Repeatedly, Egoyan’s characters try to reconstruct reality to fit their own yearnings. The protagonist of his first feature, Next of Kin, bored with his own bland WASP background, reinvents himself as the long-lost son of an expatriate Armenian family. It’s typical of Egoyan’s deadpan humour that the young man is accepted without question, though not looking remotely Armenian. Identity is a charade, and not even a well-acted one.

Elliptical and enigmatic, intricately structured, Egoyan’s films have sometimes been called cold and contrived; though as Kent Jones notes, objecting to Egoyan’s work being contrived “is a little like reprimanding Monet for his loose brushwork or dismissing Schoenberg for being atonal.” As for “coldness,” Egoyan resolutely shuns sentimentality, even when dealing with so emotive a subject as the death of children, but there’s a soulful, troubled melancholy to his films that’s counterbalanced, but never cancelled out, by a concurrent sense of the absurd. This ambiguity of tone can often be unsettling, an effect the director fully intends. He stresses that his films are “designed to make the viewer self-conscious. I revel in that. . . . The viewer has to invest themself in what they’re seeing because then the emotions you are able to engage in are that much stronger.”

The films often touch on disturbing territory—voyeurism, incest, paedophilia—and with their fragmented structure, give up their secrets only gradually. Sometimes, as in Exotica, a mordant study of need and exploitation set largely in a strip club, it’s not until the final moments that we realise the full significance of what we’ve been watching—and not always even then. This mirrors the troubled outlook of his characters who rarely see anything whole, least of all themselves. Hilditch, lonely serial killer of lonely girls in Felicia’s Journey, never thinks of himself as a monster. In his own eyes he’s the kindest of men—just as Noah Render, the eponymous insurance man in The Adjuster, believes he’s acting out of pure compassion in sexually exploiting his clients.

To date, Egoyan’s most explicit statement of the cultural and emotional dislocation central to all his films comes in Calendar, where he ironically casts himself as a photographer visiting Armenia who loses his wife (played by Egoyan’s own wife, actress Arsinde Khanjian) to a handsome guide. The film is at once funny and desolate, seemingly simple (by Egoyan’s standards) in its structure yet teasingly oblique. Khanjian is one of a number of actors (others include David Hemblen, Elias Koteas, Bruce Greenwood and Maury Chaikin) who constantly recur in Egoyan’s films, reinforcing the sense of a hermetic, inward-looking world. Venues are typically bland and drab—featureless modern hotels and offices figure frequently—without much intimation of life going on beyond the edges of the screen. Even when he portrays a community, such as the small provincial township of The Sweet Hereafter, there’s little sense of social cohesion: all the houses seem remote from each other, with each person or family trapped in their own separate universe.

The Sweet Hereafter and its successor, Felicia’s Journey, marked a departure in Egoyan’s career, adapting material by others (novels by Russell Banks and William Trevor) instead of working to his own original scripts. Both films are sensitively crafted, keeping faith with Russell Banks and William Trevor) instead of working to his own authorial sensibilities into his work seems to dilute the mix rather than enriching it; neither film achieves the intensity, or the complexity, of The Adjuster or Exotica. A vision as potent and idiosyncratic as that of Egoyan is perhaps best taken neat.

—Philip Kemp

EISENSTEIN, Sergei

Nationality: Russian. Born: Sergei Mikhailovich Eisenstein in Riga, Latvia, 23 January 1898. Education: Educated in St. Petersburg and at gymnasiuim in Riga; Institute of Civil Engineering, St. Petersburg (studied architecture), 1914–17; studied Japanese at General Staff Academy, Moscow, 1920. Family: Married Peta Attasheva. Career: Sent for officer training, 1917; poster artist on front at Minsk, then demobilized, 1920; scenic artist, then co-director of Proletkult Theater, Moscow, 1920; designer for Vsevolod Meyerhold’s “directors’ workshop,” 1922; directed Stachka, 1925; made professor at State Institute for Cinema, 1926; with Grigori Alexandrov and Edouard Tisse, travelled to Hollywood, 1929; signed for Paramount, but after work on various scripts, contract broken, 1930; refused a work permit by State Department, went to Mexico to work on Que Viva Mexico!, refused reentry permit to United States, after financier Upton Sinclair halts shooting and keeps uncut film; returned to USSR, 1932; began teaching at Moscow Film Institute, 1933; Behzin Meadow project denounced, production halted, 1937; worked on Pushkin film project, named artistic director of Mosfilm Studios, 1940; after finishing Ivan the Terrible, suffered heart attack, 1946; prepared a third part to Ivan, to have been made in color, 1947. Awards: Gold Medal, Exposition Internationale des Arts Décoratifs, Paris, for Strike!, 1925; Order of Lenin, 1939; Stalin Prize, 1st Class, for Ivan the Terrible, Part I, 1946. Died: In Moscow, 11 February 1948.

Films as Director:

1923 Kinodnevnik Glumova (Glumov’s Film Diary) (short film inserted in production of Ostrovsky’s Enough Simplicity in Every Wise Man, Proletkult Theater, Moscow) (+ sc)
1925 Stachka (The Strike) (+ co-sc, ed); Bronenosets Potemkin (The Battleship Potemkin) (+ sc, ed)
1928 Oktiabr (October; Ten Days That Shook the World) (co-d, co-sc)
1929 Staroe i novoe (Old and New) [film produced as Generalnaia linia (The General Line), title changed before release] (co-d, co-sc)
1930 Romance sentimentale (co-d, sc)
1933 Thunder over Mexico (unauthorized, produced by Sol Lesser from Que Viva Mexico! footage, seen by Eisenstein in 1947 and disowned); Death Day and Eisenstein in Mexico (also unauthorized productions by Sol Lesser from Que Viva Mexico! footage)
1938 Aleksandr Nevskii (Alexander Nevsky) (+ co-sc, set des, costume des, ed)

1939 Time in the Sun (produced by Marie Seton from Que Viva Mexico! footage); The Ferghana Canal (short documentary out of footage from abandoned feature subject on same subject) (+ sc)

1941 shorts edited by William Kruse for Bell and Howell from Que Viva Mexico! footage: Mexico Marches; Conquering Cross; Idol of Hope; Land and Freedom; Spaniard and Indian; Mexican Symphony (feature combining previous five titles); Zapotecan Village

1944 Ivan Groznyi (Ivan the Terrible, Part I) (+ sc, set des, costume des, ed)

1958 Ivan Groznyi II: Boyarskii zagovor (Ivan the Terrible, Part II: The Boyars' Plot) (+ sc) (completed 1946); Eisenstein's Mexican Project (+ sc) (unedited sequences of Que Viva Mexico! assembled by Jay Leyda)

1966 Bezhin Lug (Bezhin Meadow) (+ sc) (25-minute montage of stills from original film assembled by Naum Kleiman, with music by Prokofiev)

Other Films:

1924 Doktor Mabuze—Igrok (co-ed) (Russian version of Lang's Dr. Mabuse der Spieler)

1929 Everyday (Hans Richter) (role as London policeman)

Publications

By EISENSTEIN: books—

The Soviet Screen, Moscow, 1939.

The Film Sense, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1942.

Notes of a Film Director, Moscow, 1948.

Film Form, edited by Jay Leyda, New York, 1949.

Que Viva Mexico, London, 1951.

Drawings, Moscow, 1961.

Notes of a Film Director, New York, 1970.

By EISENSTEIN: articles—

“Mexican Film and Marxian Theory,” in New Republic (New York), 9 December 1931.

“My Subject Is Patriotism,” in International Literature (Moscow), no. 2, 1939.

“Charlie the Kid,” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1946.

“Charlie the Grownop,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1946.

Interview, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1967.

“Sergei Eisenstein, Wilhelm Reich Correspondence,” edited by F. Albera, in Screen (London), vol. 22, no. 4, 1981.

On EISENSTEIN: books—

Arnheim, Rudolph, Film as Art, Berkeley, California, 1957.

On EISENSTEIN: articles—

Seton, Marie, “Eisenstein’s Images and Mexican Art,” in Sight and Sound (London), September 1953.
Siegel, R., “Masquage, an Extrapolation of Eisenstein’s Theory of Montage-as-Conflict to the Multi-Image Film,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley, California), Spring 1968.
Wollen, Peter, “Eisenstein: Cinema and the Avant-Garde,” in Art International (Lugano), November 1968.
Henderson, Brian, “Two Types of Film Theory,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1971.

Goodwin, J., “Plusiers Eisenstein: Recent Criticism,” in Quarterly Review of Film Studies (New York), Fall 1981.
“Alexander Nevsky Section” of Film Culture (New York), no. 70–71, 1983.

On EISENSTEIN: films—

Attasheva, Pera (directed and scripted by), In Memory of Eisenstein, USSR.
Eisenstein Directs Ivan (derived from previous film), Great Britain, 1969.

Kepley, V., Jr., “Eisenstein as Pedagogue,” in Quarterly Review of Film and Video (Reading), vol. 14, no. 4, August 1993.

* * *

Sergei Eisenstein is generally considered to be one of the most important figures—perhaps the most important figure—in the history of cinema. But he was not only the leading director and theorist of Soviet cinema in his own lifetime, he was also a theatre and opera director, scriptwriter, graphic artist, teacher, and critic. His contemporaries called him quite simply “the Master.”

Eisenstein’s reputation as a filmmaker rests on only seven completed feature films, but among them The Battleship Potemkin has consistently been regarded as one of the greatest films ever made. The pivotal scene in the film—the massacre on the Odessa Steps—has become the most famous sequence in film history and a paradigm of the montage techniques that were central to Eisenstein’s theories of filmmaking.

Like many early Soviet filmmakers, Eisenstein came to cinema by a circuitous route. Born in Riga, then a largely German-speaking provincial city of the Russian Empire, he saw his first film on a visit to Paris with his parents when he was only eight: Les 400 farces du diable by Méliès. He was educated at a technical grammar school so that he would follow his father’s career as an engineer. Despite, or perhaps because of, his artistic bent, he was consistently given low marks at school for his drawing. Conversely, he consistently did his best in the subject of religious knowledge. In 1909 his parents separated and his mother went to live in St. Petersburg. On various visits to her, Eisenstein was entranced by his first taste of the circus. He and his mother went to live in St. Petersburg. On various visits to her, Eisenstein was entranced by his first taste of the circus.

In 1915 Eisenstein entered the Institute for Civil Engineering in Petrograd, where he saw his first Meyerhold productions in the theatre. After the Revolution he abandoned his courses and joined the Red Army. He was assigned to a theatrical troupe, where he worked as a director, designer, and actor. In 1920 he was demobilised to Moscow and rapidly became head of design at the First Proletkult Workers Theatre. His first sets were for a production of The Mexican, written by Jack London, Lenin’s favourite writer. In 1921 he joined Meyerhold’s theatre workshop (he was later to describe Meyerhold as his “spiritual father”) and worked on designs for Puss in Boots.

Eisenstein’s first stage production, a version of Ostrovsky’s Enough Simplicity for Every Wise Man in 1923, included his first venture into cinema, Glumov’s Diary. This was inspired by the use of a short film in the Kozintsev and Trauberg production of Gogol’s The Wedding, which he had seen the year before. His production of Tretyakov’s Gas Masks in 1924 staged in the Moscow gasworks was an attempt to bridge the gap between stage “realism” and the reality of everyday life. It failed and, as Eisenstein himself put it, he “fell into cinema.”

Eisenstein had already worked with Esfir Shub re-editing Fritz Lang’s Dr Mabuse for Soviet audiences in 1923, but he made his first full-length film—The Strike, set in 1905—in 1925. In this film he applied to cinema the theory of the “montage of attractions” that he had first developed in Enough Simplicity for Every Wise Man. Eisenstein was not the first to develop the notion of montage as the essence of cinema specificity: that honour belonged to Lev Kuleshov in 1917. Unlike Kuleshov, however, Eisenstein thought that montage depended on a conflict between different elements from which a new synthesis would arise. This notion developed partly from his study of Japanese ideograms and partly from his own partial understanding of the Marxist dialectic. It followed from the primacy accorded to montage in this theory that the actor’s role was diminished while the director’s was enhanced. Eisenstein’s view of the primacy of the director was to cause him serious problems on both sides of the Atlantic.

In his silent films Eisenstein used amateur actors who were the right physical types for the part, a practice he called “typage”: hence an unknown worker, Nikandrov, played the role of Lenin in October, released in 1927. Most of the parts in his second full-length film, The Battleship Potemkin, released in 1926, were played by amateurs. Even the local actors who appeared in the Odessa Steps sequence were chosen not for their professional training, but because they looked right for the parts. It was Potemkin that secured Eisenstein’s reputation both at home and abroad, especially in Germany, where it was a spectacular commercial success and attracted far greater audiences than in the USSR itself. Potemkin put Soviet cinema on the world map.

After Potemkin Eisenstein started work on a film about collectivisation, The General Line, but broke off to make October for the tenth anniversary of the October Revolution. It was with this film that his serious problems with the authorities began. Critics were divided about the film. Some enthused about the birth of a new “intellectual cinema,” based on “intellectual montage,” which, like Brecht’s “alienation effect,” stimulated audiences to think rather than to react solely with their emotions. Other critics were troubled by what they saw as an overabundance of abstract symbolism that was, in the (officially inspired) catch-phrase of the times, “unintelligible to the millions.”

When Eisenstein returned to The General Line and completed it in 1929, the Party’s general line on agriculture had changed and Trotsky had fallen from grace: the film therefore had to be re-edited to reflect these developments, and it was finally released under the title of The Old and the New. The political problems Eisenstein encountered with this project were to recur in all his subsequent film work in the Soviet Union.

In 1929 Eisenstein went abroad with his assistants Alexandrov and Tisse, ostensibly to study the new medium of sound film. In his “Statement on Sound,” published in the summer of 1928, he had warned against the dangers of purely illustrative sound, as in the “talkies,” and argued for the application of the techniques of the montage of attractions to produce what he called “orchestral counterpoint.” It was to be another ten years before he had the chance to put these ideas into effect.

Eisenstein first visited Western Europe and then travelled to Hollywood to work for Paramount. From the outset he was subjected to a hostile press campaign characterising him as a “red dog” and a Bolshevist. After rejecting several of his film projects, Paramount cancelled his contract. He went on to start filming Que Viva Mexico! with funds provided by the socialist millionaire novelist Upton Sinclair. Eisenstein spent most of 1931 working on the film, but Sinclair was not satisfied either with the pace of progress or the escalating cost. Material for three-quarters of the Mexican film had, however, been shot when the project collapsed in acrimonious exchanges. Eisenstein returned to the Soviet Union in May 1932. He had accepted assurances from Sinclair that the raw footage would be shipped to Moscow so that he could edit it, but this assurance was never honoured.

The Soviet Union that Eisenstein returned to was significantly different from the country he had left three years earlier. The political and economic changes associated with the first Five-Year Plan had led to concomitant changes in Soviet cinema, which was now run by an Old Bolshevik, Boris Shumyatsky, who was determined to create a “cinema for the millions.” After several abortive projects, including Moscow, a history of the capital, The Black Consul, which would have starred Paul Robeson, and a film version of Karl Marx’s Das Kapital, Eisenstein began making his first sound feature, Bezhin Meadow, in 1935. The film focused on the generational conflict engendered by the collectivisation programme, but it too was dogged with problems and was eventually stopped on the orders of Shumyatsky in March 1937. Eisenstein was forced to confess his alleged errors in public. This submission, together with the dismissal of Shumyatsky in January 1938, enabled him to start filming again.

The result was Eisenstein’s most popular film, Alexander Nevsky, made in record time and released in 1938, but it was also the film that he regarded as his least successful. Nevertheless, it contains the best, and most famous, illustration of his technique of “orchestral counter-point” in the sequence of the Battle on the Ice. On the other hand, Nevsky to some extent gave Eisenstein the reputation of “court filmmaker,” particularly after he was awarded the Order of Lenin. It was because of this that, after the signature of the Nazi-Soviet Pact— and the subsequent withdrawal of Nevsky from distribution—Eisenstein was asked to direct a new production of Wagner’s Die Walküre at the Bolshoi Theatre.

When not filming, Eisenstein taught at the State Institute of Cinema, where he had been head of the directing department since his return to the Soviet Union and where he was made professor in January 1937, shortly before the final crisis with Bezhin Meadow. He also devoted an increasing amount of time and energy to his theoretical writings, but his magnum opus on Direction, like his other works on Mise-en-Scène and the theory of montage, remained unfinished at his death.

Eisenstein’s last film, arguably his masterpiece of masterpieces, was also unfinished: filming of the first part of Ivan the Terrible was begun in 1943 in Alma-Ata, where the Moscow studios had been evacuated because of the war, and released in 1945. The film was an instant success and earned Eisenstein and his associates the Stalin Prize. While celebrating this award in February 1946, Eisenstein suffered a heart attack, a development that encouraged his premonitions of an early death at the age of fifty. He threw himself into a flurry of frenzied activity, completing his memoirs and Part 2 of Ivan and starting on Part 3. In Part 2, however, the historical parallels between Ivan and Stalin became too obvious and, although completed, the film was not shown until 1958.

Eisenstein died of a second, massive heart attack in February 1948, just past his fiftieth birthday. He died very much under a cloud in his own country, but has since been universally acknowledged as one of cinema’s greatest creative geniuses and a towering figure in the culture of the twentieth century. Some of his most important theoretical texts are only now being properly assembled and published, both in the Soviet Union and abroad.

—Richard Taylor

EPSTEIN, Jean

Films as Director:

1922 Pasteur; Les Vendanges
1923 L’Auberge rouge (+ sc); Coeur fidèle (+ sc); La Montagne infidèle; La Belle Nivernaise (+ sc)
1924 Le Lion des Mogols (+ adaptation); L’Affiche, La Goutte de sang (Mariaud) (uncredited d)
1925 Le Double Amour; Les Aventures de Robert Macaire
1926 Mauprat (+ pr); Au pays de George Sand (+ pr)
1927 Six et demi onze (+ pr); La Glace a trois faces (+ pr)
1928 La Chute de la maison Usher (+ pr)
1929 Fins terres (+ sc); Sa Tête (+ sc)
1930 Le Pas de la mule (+ pr)
1931 Mor-Ran (La Mer des corbeaux) (+ pr); Notre-Dame de Paris (+ pr); La Chanson des peupliers (+ pr); Le Cor (+ pr)
1932 L’Or des mers (+ sc); Les Berceaux (+ pr); La Villanelle des Rubans (+ pr); Le Vieux Chaland (+ pr)
1933 L’Homme a l’Hispano (+ sc, pr); La Chatelaine du Liban (+ sc, pr)
1934 Chanson d’armor (+ pr, adaptation); La Vie d’un grand journal (+ pr)
1936 Coeur de Gueux (+ pr, adaptation); La Bretagne (+ pr); La Bourgogne (+ pr)
1937 Vive la vie (+ pr); La Femme du bout de monde (+ pr, sc)
1938 Les Batisseurs (+ pr); Eau vive (+ pr, sc)
1939 Arteres de France (+ pr); La Charette fantôme (Duvivier) (d superimpositions and special photographic effects)
1947  Le Tempestaire (+ pr, sc)
1948  Les Feux de la mer (+ pr); La Bataille de l’eau lourde (Rampen om tungtvannet) (Marin and Vibe-Muller) (d prologue)

Other Film:

1921  Le Tonnerre (Delluc) (asst d)

Publications

By EPSTEIN: books—

Bonjour cinéma, Paris, 1921.
L’Or des mers, Valois, 1932.

By EPSTEIN: articles—

On EPSTEIN: books—

On EPSTEIN: articles—

“Jean Epstein,” in Film Dope (London), March 1978.
“Jean Epstein,” in Travelling (Lausanne), Summer 1979.

Jean Epstein is a complex and uncompromising figure whose filmmaking who were drawn to the cinema by the impact of the Hollywood productions of Griffith, Chaplin, and Ince. Gifted with a precocious intelligence, Epstein was one of a number of these filmmakers who had previously been interested in literature. He had already published books on literature, philosophy, and the cinema when he made his debut as a filmmaker with a documentary on Pasteur in 1922 at the age of only twenty-five. Three fictional features in the following year, including Coeur fidèle, which contains virtuoso passages to rank with the work of Gance and L’Herbier, put him in the forefront of French avant-garde filmmaking.

The four films Epstein made during 1925–26 for the Albatros company run by the Russian emigré Alexandre Kamenka include two, L’Affiche and Le Double Amour, from scripts by Jean’s sister Marie Epstein. The spectacular Le Lion des Mogols, which featured a preposterous script by its star, the great actor Ivan Mosjoukine, was followed by Les Aventures de Robert Macaire, an adaptation of the play parodied by Frédéric Lemaître in Carné’s Les Enfants du paradis. None of these are generally considered to be among Epstein’s best work, but they established him as a director after the controversies which had surrounded the showings of Coeur fidèle, and enabled him to set up his own production company in 1926.

The films which Epstein both produced and directed are varied. He began with two films in which his own artistic aspirations were balanced by the demands of commercial popularity: an adaption of George Sand’s novel Mauprat, which had formed part of his childhood reading; and Six et demi onze, again from a script by his sister. But the last two films of Les Films Jean Epstein were resolutely independent works. The short feature La Glace à trois faces is remarkable for its formal pattern, which looks forward to experiments in narrative structure of a kind that were still striking to audiences thirty years later when Alain Resnais made Hiroshima mon amour. Even more accomplished in terms of acting and setting, and as intriguing in terms of narrative, is Epstein’s atmospheric evocation of the dark world of Edgar Allan Poe, La Chute de la maison Usher. This tale of love, art, and madness is told in a marvellously controlled style which makes extensive use of slow motion and multiple superimposition. Just as the hero refuses to accept the division of life and death and, through the effort of will, summons back the woman he has killed through devotion to his art, so too Epstein’s film creates a universe where castle and forest, interior and exterior interpenetrate.

After this masterly evocation of a world of northern imagination, a film that can rank with Dreyer’s Vampyr and serves as a reminder of Epstein’s part-Polish ancestry, the director largely withdrew from the world of Parisian film production. With only occasional forays into commercial filmmaking, Epstein devoted much of his efforts from the silent Finis terrae in 1929 to the short Le Tempestaire in 1947 to a masterly series of semi-documentary evocations of the Breton countryside and seascape.

Epstein is a complex and uncompromising figure whose filmmaking was accompanied by a constant theoretical concern with his chosen medium. If the central concept of his 1930s writing—La photogénie—remains not merely undefined but indefinable, and he makes recourse to notions of a magical or mystical essence of cinema that are unfortunately typical of the period, his theoretical work nonetheless remains of great interest. The republication of his complete works, Ecrits sur le cinéma, in 1974–75, demonstrated the modernity and continuing interest of his explorations of key aspects of the relationship between the spectator and the screen.

—Roy Armes

EUSTACHE, Jean

Films as Director:

1963  Du côté de Robinson (short) (+ sc, dialogue, ro as man in car)
1966  Le Père Noël a les yeux bleus (Santa Claus Has Blue Eyes) (Father Christmas Has Blue Eyes) (short) (+ sc, dialogue, ro as ex-boxer); Les Mauvaises fréquentations (Bad Company) (Title of double bill consisting of Du côté de Robinson and Le Père Noël a les yeux bleus)
1968  Aussi loin que mon enfance (short) (+ co-sc, co-d Marilù Parolini)
1969  La Rosière de Pessac (The Virgin of Pessac) (+ sc, ed, pr, ro as interviewer) (TV)
1970  Le Cochon (The Pig) (+ co-sc, co-ph, ed, co-d Jean-Michel Barjol) (for TV)
1971  Numéro zero (not released)
1973  La Maman et la putain (The Mother and the Whore) (+ sc, dialogue, ed, pr, ro as Gilberte’s husband)
1974  Mes petites amoureuses (My Little Loves) (+ sc, dialogue)
1977  Une Sale histoire (A Dirty Story) (+ sc, dialogue)
1979  La Rosière de Pessac (+ sc) (for TV)
1980  Odette Robert (+ ed) (for TV) (shortened version of Numéro zero); Avec passion Bosch, ou Le Jardin des délices de Jérôme Bosch (+ ed) (for TV); Offre d’emploi (Job Offer) (+ sc) (for TV); Les Photos d’Alix (+ sc, ed) (for TV)

Other Films:

1962  Les Roses de vie (short) (Vecchiali) (asst, ro)
1964  Dedans Paris (short) (Théaudière) (ed)
1964  Les Taches (short) (Baudry-Delahaye) (ed)
1966  Jean Renoir, le patron (Rivette) (ed) (for TV)
1967  Les Idoles (Marc ‘O) (ed); L’Accompagnement (Fieschi) (short) (ed)
1970  Une Aventure de Billy le Kid (Mouillet) (ed)
1974  Céline et Julie vont en bateau (Rivette) (ro as reader in library)
1977  Der Amerikanische Freund (Wenders) (ro as man in the bar)
1978  La Tortue sur le dos (Béraud) (ro as chief of police)

Publications:

By EUSTACHE: articles—

On EUSTACHE: books—

EUSTACHE

On EUSTACHE: articles——

Image et Son (Paris), no. 244, November 1970.
Cinema 72 (Paris); no. 195, February 1975; no. 196, March 1975; no.228, December 1977.
Apec (Brussels), vol. 12, no. 4, 1974.

Filmography in Film Dope, (Nottingham, UK) no. 14, March 1978.

* * *

Although untutored in film, Jean Eustache refined his understanding during the 1950s at the Cinémathèque and developed his critical values through Rohmer and Godard at Cahiers du Cinéma. After his stultifying adolescence in Narbonne, the diffident village boy from Pessac rejoiced in the intellectual vibrancy of hedonistic Paris. The sixties brought experience initially as Vecchiali’s assistant for Les Roses de vie (1962) and in small film roles, but principally as an editor. In 1963 he resigned as a TV researcher to make Du côté de Robinson. This début 16–mm autobiographical film contains thematic and stylistic elements characteristic of later work. Two disaffected Parisian youths, failing to pick up partners, rob a married woman who rejects their advances. In quasi-documentary style, Eustache captured contemporary adolescent attitudes so skilfully that an enthusiastic Godard provided unused film stock from Masculin–Féminin for a second semi-autobiographical film, Le Père Noël a les yeux bleus (1966). Daniel (Jean-Pierre Léaud), employed as Santa Claus, discovers a confidence with women that deserts him out of costume. Successfully exploiting Léaud’s talent for playing diffident males, Eustache constructs an unforced account of the impoverished, class-conscious Daniel’s failures in a dull provincial town. The simple, direct camerawork bringing immediacy to everyday experiences places Eustache within the seemingly artless traditions of Lumière and Renoir. These first films were marketed collectively as Les Mauvaises Fréquentations (1967).

Eustache developed his ethnographic, cinéma-vérité style (a label he testily rejected) though groundbreaking TV documentaries such as La Rostière de Pessac (1969) and Le Cochon (1970). The first chronicles Pessac’s festival honoring the village’s most virtuous girl, and seeking an unmediated, unobtrusive record of events, ‘the recording of reality without any subjective intervention or interference’, Eustache employed three independent camera crews, insisting on minimal camera movement with long takes simply edited in chronological order. A decade later, exploring evolutions in moral and social values, he made a second version (La Rostière de Pessac, 1979).

Collaboration with Jean-Michel Barjol in 1970 extended the detached, anti-auteurist style with Le Cochon, a matter-of-fact record of slaughtering a pig to make sausages. To avoid a single, dominant viewpoint, the co-directors filmed independently and, discarding TV’s traditional normative voice-over, left explanation in local patois.

Eustache’s most personal seventies documentary was Numéro Zéro (1971) in which his blind, eighty-year old grandmother Odette Robert talks directly to camera for two unedited hours about her memories of village life. Initially refusing to falsify this exceptional, intimate journal by editing, in 1980 he finally sanctioned a truncated TV version, Odette Robert. Eustache’s unmediated images of provincial life mirror Jean Rouch’s non-interventionist records of African ceremonial, Les Maîtres fous, (1955) and Parisian lifestyles, Chronique d’un été (1961).

This defining ethnographic style was central to his critically acclaimed, black-and-white feature, La Maman et la putain (1973). With a meager 700,000–franc budget, Eustache economized by filming in his own apartment and local cafés to produce a remarkable three-and-a-half hour testimony to the moral angst of individuals grappling with the sixties sexual revolution. Alexandre (Jean-Pierre Léaud), unemployed and aspiring intellectual, jettisons his pregnant girlfriend Gilberte (Isabelle Weingarten) for an accommodating, self-sufficient businesswoman, Marie (Bernadette Lafont), before falling for Veronika (Françoise Lebrun), a promiscuous nurse. With its authentic settings, naturalistic dialogue, and discreet camerawork mostly using natural light, the film has a distinctly raw documentary feel. The characters’ uncompromisingly frank exchanges about sexual experiences and faltering relationships delivered to camera in medium close-up, may still shock, particularly Veronika’s closing, drunken monologue where in crude, visceral terms she pours out her confused feelings about sex and a woman’s needs in a relationship. Despite apparent spontaneity, all was pre-scripted with Eustache allowing few deviations.

Success at Cannes allowed a long-cherished autobiographical project: Mes petites amoureuses (1974). In a film that arguably mirrors Truffaut’s Les Mistons (as La Maman et la putain might be considered a bleaker Jules et Jim), Eustache achieves a typically sensitive depiction of fumbling adolescent sexual experiences, though narrative development, dependent on voice-over, is uncharacteristically episodic.

Eustache’s interest in the blur between real and fictionalized experiences is confirmed with a dramatization of scopophilia in Une Sale histoire (1977). Here, a male simply tells a female audience of his erotic pleasure in secretly observing female pudenda while hidden in a café toilet. Two versions, one filmed as fiction with Michel Lonsdale as narrator, the other filmed as direct cinema with Jean-Noël Picq, the author, telling his story, provide comparisons between the listeners’ reactions to a personal, seemingly unrehearsed, account and a staged narration. This experimental double telling distinguishes previous films, from Les Mauvaises Fréquentations, through the twice-made La Rosière de Pessac to the private and broadcast versions of his grandmother’s memories.

In the eighties Eustache’s career was defined by TV work: a well-received programme reflecting on Bosch’s vision (Le Jardin des délices de Jérôme Bosch); a short about finding employment (Offre d’emploi); and an award-winning short about an actress recounting her life to a young man (Eustache’s son, Boris) though her photo album (Les Photos d’Alix). Here word and image vie for truth as Alix’s reminiscences seem to misrepresent the visual evidence.

With only a slim portfolio of films and TV documentaries, Jean Eustache has nevertheless left his mark as a pioneering exponent of direct cinema which frequently privileges the spoken word within the visual medium, and as the director most accurately reflecting attitudes and anxieties of the sixties post-war generation. By refusing to compromise exacting personal standards to commercialism while severely testing loyalties through his difficult, self-deprecating, yet defensively assertive personality, he effectively condemned himself to mainstream cinema’s periphery. His male-centered films may be viewed as inherently sexist, upholding traditionalist patriarchal values and subjecting passive females to the dominant, sexualized male viewpoint. Yet his sixties females, Marie or Veronika, project an assertiveness and professional self-sufficiency frequently lacking in his ill-adapted, immature, and feckless males. Largely autobiographical, Eustache’s films capture both the passing of provincial traditions and the confusions of an uncertain generation facing the destabilizing challenges of newfound political and sexual freedoms.

Feeling neglected by critics and public alike, Eustache grew increasingly self-absorbed and depressed. Leaving a TV short, La Rue s’allume, half-completed, on 5th September 1981, he shot himself.

—R. F. Cousins
FÁBRI, Zoltán

Films as Director:
1951 Gyarmat a föld alatt (Colony beneath the Earth) (co-d)
1952 Vihar (Storm)
1954 Eletjel (Vierzehn Menschenleben; Life Signs)
1955 Körhinta (Merry-Go-Round; Karussel) (+ co-sc, art d)
1956 Hannibál ionár úr (Professor Hannibal) (+ co-sc)
1957 Bolond április (Summer Clouds; Crazy April); Ódós Anna (Anna, Schuldig?) (+ co-sc)
1959 Divad (The Brute; Das Scheusal) (+ sc)
1961 Két Felidő a pokolban (The Last Goal) (+ art d)
1963 Nappali sötétseg (Darkness in Daytime; Dunkel bei Tageslicht) (+ sc, art d)
1964 Hász óra (Twenty Hours)
1965 Vizivárosi Nyár (A Hard Summer) (for TV)
1967 Utószezon (Late Season)
1968 A Pál utcai fiúk (The Boys of Paul Street) (+ co-sc)
1969 Isten izgató, örnyeg ür! (The Toth Family) (+ co-sc)
1971 Hangyaboly (+ co-sc)
1973 Plusz minusz egy nap (One Day More, One Day Less)
1974 141 perc a Befejezetlen mondatból (141 Minutes from the Unfinished Sentence) (+ co-sc)
1976 Az ötödik pecsét (The Fifth Seal) (+ sc)
1977 Magyarok (The Hungarians) (+ sc)
1979 Fábián Bálint találkozása Istennel (Balint Fabian Meets God) (+ sc)
1981 Requiem
1983 Gyertek el a névnaponra

Publications

By FÁBRI: articles—

Interview with M. Ember, in Filmkultura (Budapest), April 1975.
“Az emberi méltóság védelme foglalkoztat,” in Filmkultura (Budapest), September/October 1977.

Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), January 1980.

On FÁBRI: books—

On FÁBRI: articles—

Biofilmography in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), no. 3, 1976.

On FÁBRI: film—

* * *

Having been a theatre director and designer, Zoltán Fábri began to work in films in 1950 and quickly discovered his true vocation. In 1952 he made his first film, Vihar, a drama about the collectivization of a village. Körhintá, presented at Cannes in 1956 was astonishing for the beauty of its images and feelings, and for the appearance of a young actress, Mari Töröcsik, whom he picked again two years later for his film Édes Anna. Also in 1956 he made Hannibil tanár ár, the tragedy of a man broken by the pressure of his conformist milieu, with the outstanding Ernő Szabó in the main role. This film, honored at in the main role. This film, honored at the Karlovy Vary Festival in 1957, raised the problem of the heritage of a fascist past and indirectly attacked the oppressive atmosphere of the Stalinist period. Following the political events which supervised in 1956, it was excluded from Hungarian screens.

In all of his work, nourished by Hungarian literature, Fábri deals with moral problems bound up with the history of his country, making use of a vigorous realism. Besides the meticulous composition of his narratives, and precise evocation of atmosphere and the milieu where they unfold, it is necessary to underline the importance given to his work with actors and his own participation in the creation of some set designs.

Following a drama showing the present-day problems of life in the countryside, Dúvad, Fábri continued with Két félidő a pokolban, set in a concentration camp. The moral behavior of men in times of crisis, the confrontation of ideas and of characters, of cowardice and heroism, totally absorb him and are at the heart of all his films. In Házóra, made in 1964, he uses an investigation undertaken by a journalist as the starting point for a brilliant reflection on the impact in Hungary of political events in the recent past, confirming anew his abilities as an analyst and director. For this film he was again able to engage György Illés as cameraman, and they would continue a constant collaboration from that point on.

Having given the Hungarian cinema an international audience, Fábri in 1968 directed a Hungarian-American co-production, The Boys of Paul Street, faithfully adapted from the popular novel by Ferenc Molnár, a touching story of childhood heroism. After Hangyaboly, a drama that unfolds behind the walls of a convent, with Mari Töröcsik, he made 141 perc a Befejezetlen mondatból, then returned to a moral analysis of the wartime period with Az idődik pecsét, a work of deep psychological insight that received the Grand Prize at the Moscow Festival in 1977 and remains one of the director’s best films. With Magyarok and its sequel, Fábíin Bálint találkozása Istennel, he traces in epic style and more conventional form the fate of the peasants in the period between the wars. In Requiem, he sets against the drama of a young girl the tragic consequences of the postwar political dislocations. In attempting thus to renew his method, he succeeds once again in powerfully expressing the message of a great moralist.

Having received the Kossuth Prize three times, as well as being president of the Union of Hungarian Cinema and Television Artists, and professor at Budapest’s Academy of Dramatic and Cinema Arts, Fábri is a key figure of the Hungarian cinema.

—Karel Tabory

FASSBINDER, Rainer Werner

Nationality: German. Born: Bad Wörishofen, Bavaria, 31 May 1946. Education: The Rudolf Steiner School and Secondary schools in Augsburg and Munich until 1964; studied acting at Fridl-Leonhard Studio, Munich. Family: Married Ingrid Caven, 1970 (divorced). Career: Worked as decorator and in archives of Süddeutsche Zeitung, Munich, 1964–66; failed entrance exam to West Berlin Film and Television Academy, 1965; joined action-theater, Munich, with Hanna Schygulla, 1967; first original play produced (Katzelmacher), action-theater closed in May, co-founded anti-theater, 1968; began making films with members of anti-theater, 1969; worked in German theatre and radio, and as actor, 1969–82; founder, Tango Film, independent company, 1971; with Kurt Raab and Roland Petri, took over Theater am Turm (TAT), Frankfurt, 1974; TAT project failed, returned to Munich to concentrate on film work, 1975. Awards: Golden Bear, Berlin Festival, for Die Sehnsucht der Veronika Voss, 1982. Died: In Munich, 10 June 1982.

Films as Director (under pseudonym Franz Walsch):

1965 Der Stadtstreicher (The City Tramp) (+ sc, ed, uncredited pr, role)
1966 Das kleine Chaos (The Little Chaos) (+ sc, ed, role, uncredited pr)
1969 Liebe ist kälter als der Tod (Love Is Colder than Death) (+ sc, ed, role as Franz, uncredited pr); Katzelmacher (+ sc, ed, art d, role as Jorgos, uncredited pr); Götter der Pest (Gods of the Plague) (+ sc, ed, role as Porno Buyer, uncredited pr); Warum läuft Herr Ramok? (Why Does Herr Ramok Run?) (co-d, co-sc, co-ed, uncredited pr)
1970 Rio das Mortes (+ sc, role as Discosheque-goer); Whity (+ sc, co-ed, role as Guest in Saloon, uncredited pr); Die Niklashauer Fahrt (The Niklashausner Journey) (co-d, co-sc, co-ed, role as Black Monk, uncredited pr); Der amerikanische Soldat (The American Soldier) (sc, song, role as Franz); Warnung vor einer heiligen Nutte (Beware of a Holy Whore) (+ co-ed, sc, role as Sascha, uncredited pr)
(under real name):

1971  Pioniere in Ingolstadt (Pioneers in Ingolstadt) (+ sc, uncredited pr); Das Kaffeehaus (The Coffee House) (for television) (+ sc, uncredited pr); Der Händler der vier Jahreszeiten (The Merchant of the Four Seasons) (+ sc, role as Zucker, uncredited pr)

1972  Die bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant (The Bitter Tears of Petra von Kant) (+ sc, des, uncredited pr); Wildwechsel (Wild Game) (+ sc, uncredited pr); Acht Stunden sind kein Tag (Eight Hours Don’t Make a Day) (+ sc, uncredited pr) (shown on German television in five monthly segments); Bremer Freiheit (Bremen Freedom) (for television) (+ sc, uncredited pr)

1973  Welt am Draht (World on a Wire) (in two parts) (+ co-sc, uncredited pr); Angst essen Seele auf (Fear Eats the Soul) (+ sc, des, uncredited pr); Martha (+ sc, uncredited pr); Nora Helmer (for television) (+ sc, uncredited pr)

1974  Fontane Effi Briest (Effi Briest) (+ sc, role as narrator, uncredited pr); Faustrecht der Freiheit (Fox) (+ co-sc, role as Franz Biberkopf—“Fox,” uncredited pr); Wie ein Vogel auf dem Draht (Like a Bird on a Wire) (for television) (+ sc, uncredited pr)

1975  Mutter Küsters Fahrt zum Himmel (Mother Küster’s Trip to Heaven) (+ co-sc, uncredited pr); Angst vor der Angst (Fear of Fear) (+ sc, uncredited pr)

1976  Ich will doch nur, dass Ihr mich liebt (I Only Want You to Love Me) (+ sc, uncredited pr); Satansbraten (Satan’s Brew) (+ sc, uncredited pr); Chinesisches Roulette (Chinese Roulette) (+ sc, co-pr)

1977  Bolvieser (+ sc, uncredited pr); Frauen in New York (Women in New York); Eine Reise ins Licht (Despair)

1978  Episode of Deutschland im Herbst (Germany in Autumn) (+ sc, role, uncredited pr); Die Ehe der Maria Braun (The Marriage of Maria Braun) (+ story); In einem Jahr mit dreizehn Mondon (In a Year with Thirteen Moons) (+ sc, ph, uncredited pr)

1979  Die dritte Generation (The Third Generation) (+ sc, ph, uncredited pr)

1980  Berlin Alexanderplatz (for television, thirteen episodes with epilogue) (+ sc, ph, role as himself in dream sequence, uncredited pr); Lili Marleen (+ sc, ph, uncredited pr)
1981
Lola (+ sc, ph, uncredited pr); Theater in Trance (TV documentary) (+ commentary)

1982
Die Sehnsucht der Veronika Voss (Veronika Voss) (+ sc, uncredited pr, ph); Querelle (+ sc, ph, uncredited pr)

Other Films:

1967
Tony Freunde (Vasil) (role as Mallard)

1968
Der Bräutigam, die Komödiatrix und der Zuhalter (The Bridegroom, the Comedienne, and the Pimp) (Straub) (role as the pimp)

1969
Fernes Jamaica (Distant Jamaica) (Moland) (sc); Alarm (Lemmel) (role as the man in uniform); Al Capone im deutschen Wald (Wirth) (role as Heini); Baal (Schlöndorff) (role as Baal); Frei bis zum nächsten Mal (Köberle) (role as the mechanic)

1970
Matthias Kneissl (Haufl) (role as Fleckbauer); Der plötzliche Reichtum der armen Leute von Kombach (Schlöndorff) (role as a peasant); Supergirl (Thome) (role as man who looks through window)

1973
Zärtlichkeit der Wölfe (Lommel) (role as Wittkowski)

1974
1 Berlin-Harlem (Lambert) (role as himself)

1976
Schatten der Engel (Shadow of Angels) (Schmid) (sc, role as Raoul, the pimp)

1980
Lili Marleen (Weisenborn) (role)

Publications

By FASSBINDER: books—

Antitheater 2, Frankfurt, 1974.
Querelle Filmbuch, Munich 1982.
The Kinofilme 1, Munich, 1987.

By FASSBINDER: articles—

“Liebe ist kälter als der Tod,” in Film (London), no. 8, 1969. Interview in Filmkritik (Munich), August 1969.
Interview in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1974/75.
Interview in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1975.
Interview in Cineaste (New York), Autumn 1977.

On FASSBINDER: books—

Jansen, Peter, and Wolfram Schütte, editors, Reihe Film 2: Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1979.
Eckhardt, Bernd, Rainer Werner Fassbinder: In 17 Jahren 42 Filme—Stationen eines Lebens für den Deutschen Film, Munich, 1982.
Iden, Peter, and others, Rainer Werner Fassbinder, Munich, 1982.
Watson, Wallace Steadman, Understanding Rainer Werner Fassbinder: Film as Private and Public Art, Columbia, South Carolina, 1996.

On FASSBINDER: articles—

“Fassbinder and Sirk,” in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1975.
“Gay Men and Film Section,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 16, 1977.
“Fassbinder Issue” of October (Cambridge, Massachusetts), Summer 1982.
Riley, B., and H. Kennedy, obituaries, in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1982.

“The Other Fassbinder,” in Wide Angle (Baltimore), vol. 12, no. 1, January 1990.

“Fassbinder-Werkschau,” in Film und Fernsehen (Berlin), vol. 20, no. 4, August 1992.

On FASSBINDER: films—

von Mengeshausen, Joachim, Ende einer Kommune, West Germany, 1970.

Ballhaus, Michael, and Dietmar Buchmann, Fassbinder produziert: Film Nr. 8, West Germany, 1971.

* * *

Rainer Werner Fassbinder was the leading member of a group of second-generation, alternative filmmakers in West Germany. The first generation consisted of Alexander Kluge and others who in 1962 drafted the Oberhausen Manifesto, initiating what has come to be called the “New German Cinema.” Fassbinder’s most distinguishing trait within the tradition of “counter-cinema,” aside from his reputation for rendering fragments of the new left ideology of the 1960s on film, was his modification of the conventions of political cinema initiated in the 1920s and subsequent tailoring of these conventions to modern conditions of Hollywood cinema. He did this to a greater degree than Godard, who is credited with using these principles as content for filmic essays on narrative.

In an interview in 1971 Fassbinder asserted what has come to represent his most convincing justification for his innovative attachment to story: “The American cinema is the only one I can take really seriously, because it’s the only one that has really reached an audience. German cinema used to do so, before 1933, and of course there are individual directors in other countries who are in touch with their audiences. But American cinema has generally had the happiest relationship with its audience, and that is because it doesn’t try to be ‘art.’ Its narrative style is not so complicated or artificial. Well, of course it’s artificial, but not ‘artistic.’”

This concern with narrative and popular expression (some of his productions recall the good storytelling habits of Renoir) was evident early in the theatrical beginnings of Fassbinder’s career, when he forged an aesthetic that could safely be labeled a creative synthesis of Brecht and Artaud oriented toward the persuasion of larger audiences.

This aesthetic began to form with Fassbinder’s turn to the stage in 1967. He had finished his secondary school training in 1964 in Augsburg and Munich. He joined the Action-Theater in Munich with Hanna Schygulla, whom he had met in acting school. After producing his first original play in 1968, the Action-Theater was closed by the police in May of that year. Fassbinder then founded the “anti-theater,” a venture loosely organized around the tenets of Brechtian theater translated into terms alluring for contemporary audiences.

Although the 1969 Liebe ist kälter als der Tod marks the effective beginning of his feature film career (Der Stadtsreicher and Das kleine Chaos constituting minor efforts), he was to maintain an intermittent foothold in the theater over the years until his premature death, working in various productions throughout Germany and producing a number of radio plays in the early 1970s. The stint with “anti-theater” was followed by the assumption of directorial control, with Kurt Raab and Roland Petri, over the Theater am Turm (TAT) of Frankfurt in 1974, and the founding of Albatross Productions for coproductions in 1975.

When TAT failed, Fassbinder became less involved in the theater, but a trace of his interest always remained and was manifested in his frequent appearances in his own films. In fact, out of the more than forty feature films produced during his lifetime, there have only been a handful or so in which Fassbinder did not appear in one way or another. Indeed, he has had a major role in at least ten of these films.

Fassbinder’s mixing together of Hollywood and avant-garde forms took a variety of turns throughout his brief career. In the films made during the peak of 1960s activism in Germany—specifically Kätzelmacher, Liebe ist kälter als der Tod, Götter der Pest, and Warum läuft Herr R. Amok?—theatrical conventions, principally those derived from his Brechtian training, join forces with a “minimalist” aesthetic and the indigenous energies of the Heimatfilm to portray such sensitive issues as the foreign worker problem, contradictions within supposedly revolutionary youth culture, and concerns of national identity. These early “filmed theater” pieces, inevitably conforming to a static, long-take style because of a dearth of funding, tended to resemble parables or fables in their brevity and moral, didactic structuring. As funding from the government increased in proportion to his success, the popular forms of filmmaking associated with Hollywood became his models. His output from 1970 through the apocalyptic events of October 1977 (a series of terrorist actions culminated in Hans-Martin Schleyer’s death, etc.) is an exploration of the forms of melodrama and the family romance as a way to place social issues within the frame of sexual politics. Whity, Der Händler der vier Jahreszeiten, Die bitteren Tränen der Petra von Kant, Martha, Faustrecht der Freiheit, and Frauen in New York are perhaps the most prominent examples. A self-reflexive pastiche of the gangster film is evident as well in Der amerikanische Soldat. This attention to the mediation of other forms ultimately began to assume the direction of a critique of the “art film”: Warnung vor einer heiligen Nutte, an update of 8 1/2; Satansbraten, a comment on aesthetics and politics centered around the figure of Stephen George; and Chinesisches Roulette, a parody concerning an inbred aristocracy. The concern with the continuation of fascism into the present day received some attention in this period (specifically in Wildwechsel, Despair, and Bolwieser), but it became the dominant structuring motivation in the final period (1977–82) of Fassbinder’s career. Here there is a kind of epic recombination of all earlier innovations in service of an understanding of fascism and its implications for the immediate postwar generation. Fassbinder’s segment in Deutschland im Herbst (a collective endeavor of many German intellectuals and filmmakers) inaugurates this period. It and Die Ehe der Maria Braun, Lili Marleen, Lola, and Die Sehnsucht der Veronika Voss may be seen as a portrayal of the consolidation of German society to conform to the ‘‘American Model’’ of social and economic development. In einem Jahr mit 13 Monden, Berlin, Alexanderplatz, and Querelle are depictions of the crisis in sexual identity, and the criminal and counter-cultural worlds associated with that process, in relation to ‘‘capitalism in crisis.’’ Die dritte Generation is a kind of cynical summation of the German new left in the wake of a decade of terrorist activities.

This final phase, perhaps Fassbinder’s most brilliant cinematically, will be the one given the greatest critical attention in future years. It is the one which evinces the keenest awareness of the intellectual spaces traversed in Germany since the years of fascism (and especially since the mid-1960s), and the one which reveals the most effective assimilation of the heritage of forms associated with art and political cinema.

—John O’Kane

FAYE, Safi

Nationality: Senegalese. Born: Dakar, Senegal, 1943. Education: Primary school in Dakar; Normal School in Rufisque, Senegal, Teacher’s Certificate, 1962; studied ethnology at the Ecole Pratique des Hautes Etudes, Paris; trained as a filmmaker at the Louis Lumière Film School, graduated 1974; University of Paris VII, Doctorate in Ethnology, 1979; studied video production in Berlin, 1979–80. Family: Divorced; one daughter: Zeiba. Career: School teacher, 1963–69; actress in Jean Rouch’s Petit à petit ou les Lettres Persanes, 1970; actress in her own short film La Passante, 1972; released her first full-length docudrama, Kaddu Beykat, 1975, which spearheaded her subsequent career as ethnologist-filmmaker. Awards: Prize, Festival International du Film de l’Ensemble Francophone (FIFEF), Geneva, 1975; Georges Sadoul Prize, France, 1975; Special Award, 5th Panafrican Film Festival of Ouagadougou (FESPACO), Burkina Faso, 1976; FIPRESCI International Film Critics Award, Berlin Film Festival, 1976; Award at the Carthage Film Festival, Tunisia, 1980; Special Prize at the Leipzig Film Festival, Germany, 1982; special tribute at the 20th Festival de Femmes de Créteil, France, 1998. Address: 10, rue Friant, 75014 Paris, France.

Films as Director:

1972  La Passante (The Passerby) (+ ro)
1973  Revanche (Revenge)

1975  Kaddu beykat (The Voice of the Peasant)
1979  Fad’jal; Goob na Iku (The Harvest Is In)
1980  Man Sa Yay (I, Your Mother)
1981  Les âmes au soleil (Souls under the Sun)
1982  Selbé et tant d’autres (Selbe and So Many Others)
1983  3 ans 5 mois (Three years five months)
1984  Ambassades nourricières (Culinary Embassies)
1985  Elsie Haas, femme peintre et cinéaste d’Haiti (Elsie Haas, Haitian Woman Painter and Filmmaker); Racines noires (Black Roots)

Publications

By FAYE: articles—

‘‘Safi Faye—une Africaine derrière la caméra,’’ interview with Father Eichenberger, in Unir Cinéma (Saint Louis, Senegal), October-November 1976.

‘‘Four Filmmakers from West Africa,’’ interviews with Angela Martin, in Framework (London), Fall 1979.

‘‘J’aime filmer sur un rythme africain,’’ interview with Marc Mangin, in Droit et Liberté (Paris), March 1980.

‘‘Safi Faye: Mossane, soit on se soumet, soit on explode,’’ interview with Catherine Demy, in Amina (Paris), July 1996.

‘‘Un film en Afrique, c’est la galère,’’ interview with Allassan Cissé and Madior Fall, in Sud Week-End (Dakar), 12 October 1996.

On FAYE: articles—

“Fad’jal,” in Le Film français (Paris), 4 May 1979.
Special, Alessandra, “Mossane,” in Ecrans d’Afrique (Milan), Second Quarter 1996.
Sarr, Ibrahima, “Mossane de Safi Faye: La beauté magnifiée,” in Le soleil (Dakar), 9 October 1996.

* * *

A pioneer woman director in the male-dominated realm of African cinema, Safi Faye is today, with a career spanning more than 25 years, the best-known independent African female filmmaker.

Safi Faye met the French ethnologist and filmmaker Jean Rouch at the 1966 Dakar Festival of Negro Arts. Rouch encouraged Faye to engage in cinema and seemingly triggered her subsequent use of the camera as an investigative and pedagogical tool in ethnographic filmmaking, which, to this date, represents the bulk of her cinematic output.

Faye’s first black-and-white short, La Passante (The Passerby, 1972), illustrates the dreams and desires of a French and an African man as they watch a beautiful young African woman walk by. In a 1985 interview in Paris, where she mainly resides, Faye declared: “The female protagonist of La Passante is a foreigner who arouses a certain curiosity among the people of the country in which she is presently residing. She lives in a country where she is neither integrated nor assimilated. She is in Europe but her thoughts are in Africa. I am just like her, I define myself as a passerby.”

Faye’s first significant film, Kaddu beykat (which means “the voice of the peasant”) in Wolof, Senegal’s main African language, was made in 1975. Here, her perspective of her own ethnic group, the Serer, is a far cry from the often culturally distant and biased gaze of alien Western observers. Faye gives a voice to largely illiterate Senegalese farmers, who discuss their socioeconomic needs and political problems. Kaddu beykat, initially banned in Senegal, condemns the colonial heritage of peanut monoculture and denounces the government’s lack of agricultural diversification to insure the welfare of the rural populace.

Shot in a slow pace, depicting the close intimacy of man and nature and rural ritualistic gestures, Kaddu beykat is a black-and-white feature-length docudrama interpreted by non-professional actors, farmers who were asked to play their own roles. Yet, upon the broader canvas of collective issues, Faye’s sympathetic lens also focuses on the fate of a young villager who migrates to Dakar in order to secure the traditional dowry that will enable him to marry. Falling prey to exploitation by urban employers, the young man returns to his deprived, yet morally sounder, pastoral lifestyle.

Released in 1979, Fad’jal (which bears the name of the Serer village of Faye’s family) offers another analysis of sociocultural aspects of a Senegalese rural community. Using many of the same techniques (interviews and direct cinema) present in Kaddu beykat, the director shows how collective memory is conveyed by the elders. to the younger generations through the oral tradition. She also depicts how old values tend to disappear due to social changes from the migration of farmers to urban centers and foreign lands.

Subsequently, Faye shot a series of documentaries in the same ethnographic vein, mostly commissioned by international organizations and European television, related to conflicting dichotomies between indigenous traditions and socially destabilizing Western mores, an omnipresent theme in African cinema. Some of these films also include the topic of exile and its psychological effects.

Faye’s Goob na ñu (The Harvest Is In, 1979) treats agricultural issues, and Man Sa Say (I, Your Mother, 1980) illustrates the isolation of Senegalese guest workers in Germany. In Les âmes au soleil (Souls under the Sun, 1981), the filmmaker stresses problems related to drought, health, and development and their effect on women and children in remote areas of Africa. Selbé et tant d’autres (Selbé and So Many Others, 1982) depicts the responsibilities of Senegalese village women after their husbands migrate to cities for work. On a more personal note, 3 ans 5 mois (Three Years Five Months, 1979–83) showcases Faye’s daughter and depicts how children easily adapt to foreign cultures. Ambassades nourricières (Culinary Embassies, 1984) explores the importance of culinary rites for displaced groups attempting to maintain their primary identity. Interviews with African, Asian, European, Latin American, and Middle-Eastern restaurant owners established in Paris highlight issues surrounding emigration and acculturation. Racines noires (Black Roots, 1985), documents a meeting of writers, painters, and stage and screen actors from Africa and the Black Diaspora in Paris. Through interviews and swift portrayals, Faye deftly delineates their aspirations. Elsie Haas, femme peintre et cinéaste d’Haiti (Elsie Haas, Haitian Woman Painter and Filmmaker 1985) examines the life and career of a noted Diasporic creator living and working in Paris. Tesito (1989) pays tribute to the collective organizational killings of fishermen’s wives in Casamance, Senegal, as they dry and sell fish to generate much of their family income.

Faye’s film Mossane (“beauty” in the Serer language) was begun in 1990 and finally released in 1996 due to legal problems with the French producers. This film reflects great visual polish and iridescent luminosity, whereas some of her first films were criticized for certain technical deficiencies. Mossane narrates the tale of a young woman of such rare charm and attractiveness that even spirits fall in love with her. Enamored of a young man of modest means, Mossane rebels against the marriage arranged by her parents, who are more sensitive to the monetary benefits of matrimony than to their daughter’s happiness. At first appearing to submit to her parents’ wishes, Mossane escapes during the marriage ceremony and embarks in a canoe to the middle of a river, where spirits claim her life. With songs of incantation, Faye creates a haunting atmosphere reminiscent of ancient Greek tragedies where the chorus comments on the action, and supernatural beings intervene to determine the fate of humans.

Mossane may mark a turning point, a new artistic direction, in Safi Faye’s career. While reflecting her ethnographic interest in witnessing daily domestic activities and anomic religious rites, it is truly a work of fiction, the contemplative style and mythic content of which are drastically different from the realism of her previous works. One wonders whether she will continue with fiction or return to ethnographic film research and documentation.

—Françoise Pfaff

FEJÖS, Paul

Nationality: Hungarian. Born: Pál Fejös in Budapest, 24 January 1897; became U.S. citizen, 1930. Education: school in Veszprém and at Keckskemét; studied medicine. Military Service: Served on Italian front, organized plays for soldiers, 1914–18. Career: Set designer for opera and for Orient-Film studios, 1918; director for Studio Mobil, from 1919; travelled across Europe, worked with Max Reinhardt and Fritz Lang; left for United States, 1923; medical research assistant at Rockefeller Institute, moved to Hollywood, 1926; signed to Universal, 1928; with cameraman Hal Mohr, designed crane allowing great camera mobility, 1929; signed to MGM, 1930; invited to Paris by Pierre Braunberger, 1931; director for Films Osso in Hungary, broke MGM contract, 1932; signed to Nordisk Films, 1934; went to Madagascar, 1935–36; signed to Svensk Filmindustri, travelled to Indonesia and New Guinea, 1937; director of Viking Fund, New York, 1941; later director of Wenner-Gren Foundation for Anthropological Research. Died: In New York, 23 April 1963.

Films as Director:

(in Hungary):

1920  Pan; Lidércnyomás (Nightmare; Hallucination; Lord Arthur Saville’s Crime) (+ co-sc); Ujraélök (Reincarnation); lóslat (Prophecy)
1921  Fekete Kapitány (The Black Captain); Arsén Lupin utolsó kalandja (The Last Adventure of Arsène Lupin)
1922  Szenzáció (Sensation)
1923  Egri csillagok (The Stars of Eger) (+ sc, incomplete)

(in United States):

1928  The Last Moment (Le Dernier Moment) (+ sc, ed); Lonesome (Solitude)
1929  Broadway; The Last Performance (working title: “Erik the Great”)
1930  Captain of the Guard (Marseillaise) (co-d, uncredited); Menschen hinter Gittern (German version of George Hill’s The Big House)

(in France):

1931  Fantômas (+ co-sc)

(in Hungary):

1932  Tavasz zápor (Marie, légende hongroise; Une Histoire d’amour) (+ co-sc); Itél a Balaton (Storm at Balaton)

(in Austria):

1933  Sonnenstrahl (Gardez le sourire) (+ co-pr, co-sc); Frühlingsstimmen (Les Voix du printemps)
Paul Fejös (right) poses with the cast of The Last Performance

(in Denmark):

1934  Flugten fra millionerne (Flight from the Millions; Les Millions en fuite) (+ sc)
1935  Fange nr. 1 (Prisoner No. 1) (+ co-sc): Det gyldne Smil (The Golden Smile; Le Sourire d’or) (+ sc)

(in Madagascar):

(in Indonesia and New Guinea):

1937/38  Stammen Lever an (The Tribe Lives On); Bambuà päldern på Mentawei (The Age of Bamboo at Mentawei); Hövdingens Son är död (The Chief’s Son Is Dead); Draken på Komodo (The Dragon of Komodo); Byn vid den Trivasamma Brunnen (The Village Near the Pleasant Fountain); Tambora: Att Segla är Nödvändigt (To Sail Is Necessary) (completed by Åke Leijonhufvud)

(in Thailand):

1938  En Handfull Ris (A Handful of Rice); Man och Kvinna (Homme et femme) (co-d)

(in Peru):

1940/41  Yagua (“directed” by Yagua tribe shaman with Fejos controlling camera)

Other Films:

1923  Land of the Lawless (Buckingham) (adapt)
1931  L’Amour a l’américaine (supervision)
Publications

On FEJÖS: books—

On FEJÖS: articles—

Ban, Robert, in Film, Színhaz, Muzsika (Budapest), 17 August 1968.
Petrice, Graham, “Paul Fejos in America,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), no. 2, 1979.
“Fejos Issue” of Filmkritik (Munich), August 1979.

* * *

Few directors have had such a curious and diverse career as that of Paul Fejös, who was equally at home behind a camera directing entertainment features and documentaries or on anthropological expeditions to South America and the Far East.

After an early career in his native Hungary that embraced medicine, painting, and play production, Paul Fejös became a film director in the late teens. A trip to Paris persuaded him that he wanted to direct in the West, specifically the United States. In 1921 he arrived in America and started to work at the Rockefeller Institute. Eventually, Fejös journeyed to Hollywood—despite his penniless situation—and made his first American film, The Last Moment, for $5,000, borrowed from Edward Spitz. An experimental drama in which a drowning man (Otto Matiesen) relives his life, The Last Moment was hailed by the Hollywood intelligentsia and enabled Fejös to land a contract at Universal. The film also indicated that Fejös was to be no ordinary Hollywood-style producer. He was going to use every technical trick the cinema offered in the creation of his films, whether the works were melodramas about magicians (The Last Performance) or screen adaptations of popular Broadway productions (Broadway).

Paul Fejös’s one genuine screen masterpiece (and the only one of his films which is readily available for appraisal today) is Lonesome, which uses cinéma vérité to provide a study of two lonely New Yorkers who spend a Saturday afternoon and evening at Coney Island. Not only are the visuals in Lonesome stunningly exciting, but the director manages to obtain realistic performances from his two stars, Barbara Kent and Glenn Tryon, neither of whom had previously shown much indication that they were capable of such performances.

The director’s Hollywood career ended as suddenly as it had begun. There were arguments over the direction of All Quiet on the Western Front, a project which he cherished but which was assigned to Lewis Milestone. Fejös returned to Hungary, where he directed Marië, generally considered the best pre-war production from that country. He also directed films in Austria and Denmark before embarking on a documentary filmmaking trip to the Far East, China, and Japan, where he made Black Horizons and A Handful of Rice, among others. In 1941 he joined the Wenner-Gren Foundation in New York. He spent the rest of his life directing anthropological research.

—Anthony Slide

FELLINI, Federico

Nationality: Italian. Born: Rimini, Italy, 20 January 1920. Education: Catholic schools in Rimini, until 1938. Family: Married Giulietta Masina in Rome, 30 October 1943, one son (died). Career: Worked on 420 and Avventuroso magazines in Florence, 1938; caricature artist and writer in Rome, from 1939; through friend Aldo Fabrizi, worked as screenwriter, from 1941; worked on Rossellini’s Rome, Open City, 1944; screenwriter and assistant director, 1946–52; formed Capitolium production company with Alberto Lattuada for Variety Lights, 1950; formed Federiz production company with Angelo Rizzi (subsequently taken over by Clemente Fracuzzi), 1961. Awards: Grand Prize, Venice Festival, 1954, New York Film Critics Circle Award, 1956, Screen Directors Guild Award, 1956, and Oscar for Best Foreign Film, 1956, for La strada; Oscar for Best Foreign Film, for La notti di Cabiria, 1957; Oscar for Best Foreign Film, 1960, Palme d’or, Cannes Festival, 1960, and New York Critics Circle Award, 1961, for La dolce vita; Oscar for Best Foreign Film, for 8 1/2, 1963; Oscar for Best Foreign Film, and New York Film Critics Circle Award, for Amarcord, 1974; Special Prize, Cannes

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1950 Luci del varietà (co-d, + co-pr)
1951 Lo Sceicco Bianco
1953 I Vitelloni; “Un’agenzia matrimoniale” in Amore in città (Zavattini)
1954 La strada
1955 Il bidone
1956 La notti di Cabiria (Nights of Cabiria)
1960 La dolce vita
1962 “Le tentazioni del dottor Antonio” in Boccaccio ’70 (Zavattini)
1963 Otto e mezzo (8 1/2)
1965 Giulietta degli spiriti (Juliet of the Spirits)
1968 “Toby Dammit” (Il ne faut jamais parier sa tête contre le diable) in Histoires extraordinaires/Tre passi nel delirio (anthology film)
1969 Block-notes di un regista (Fellini: A Director’s Notebook) (for TV) (+ narration, role); Satyricon (Fellini Satyricon)
1970 I clowns (The Clowns)
1972 Roma (Fellini Roma) (+ role)
1974 Amarcord
1976 Casanova (Il Casanova di Federico Fellini)
1978 Prova d’orchestra (Orchestra Rehearsal) (for TV)
1980 La città delle donne (City of Women)
1983 E la nave va (And the Ship Sailed On)
1986 Ginger and Fred (+ co-sc)
1987 Intervista (The Interview) (+ role)
1990 La voce della luna (The Voice of the Moon)

Other Films:

1939 Lo vedi come . . . lo vedi come sei?! (Mattòli) (gagman)
1940 Non me lo dire! (Mattòli) (gagman); Il pirata sono io! (Mattòli) (gagman)
1941 Documento Z (Guarini) (sc/co-sc, uncredited)
1942 Avanti, c’è posto (Bonnard) (sc/co-sc, uncredited); Chi l’ha visto? (Alessandrin) (sc/co-sc); Quarta pagina (Manzari and Gambino) (sc/co-sc)
1943 Apparizione (de Limur) (sc/co-sc, uncredited); Campo dei fiori (Bonnard) (sc/co-sc); Tutta la città canta (Freda) (sc/ co-sc); L’ultima carrozella (Mattòli) (sc/co-sc)
1945 Roma, città aperta (Rossellini) (asst d, co-sc)
1946 Paisà (Rossellini) (asst d, co-sc)
1947 Il delitto di Giovanni Episcopo (Lattuada) (co-sc); Il passatore (Coletti) (co-sc); La fumeria d’oppio (Ritorna Za-la-mort) (Matarazzo) (co-sc); L’ebreo errante (Alessandrin) (co-sc)
1948 “Il miracolo” episode of L’amore (Rossellini) (asst d, co-sc, role as stranger mistaken for St. Joseph); Il mulino del Po (Lattuada) (co-sc); In nome della legge (Germi) (co-sc); Senza pietà (Lattuada) (co-sc); La città dolente (Bonnard) (co-sc)
1949 Francesco, giullare di Dio (Rossellini) (co-sc, asst d)
1950 Il cammino della speranza (Germi) (co-sc); Persiane chiuse (Comencini) (co-sc)
1951 La città si difende (Germi) (co-sc); Cameriera bella presenza offesi (Pastina) (co-sc)
1952 Il brigante di Tuccia del Lupo (Germi) (co-sc); Europa ‘51 (Rossellini) (co-sc, uncredited)
1958 Fortunella (De Filippo) (co-sc)
1970 Alex in Wonderland (Mazursky) (role as himself)
1974 C’eravamo tanto amati (Scola) (guest appearance)

Publications

By FELLINI: books—

La mia Rimini, Bologna, 1967.
Tre passi nel delirio, with Louis Malle and Roger Vadim, Bologna, 1968.
Federico Fellini, Discussion No. 1, Beverly Hills, 1970.
Roma di Federico Fellini, Rocca San Casciano, Italy, 1972.
4 film: I vitelloni, La dolce vita, 8–1/2, Giulietta degli spiriti, Turin, 1974.
Fare un film, Turin, 1980.
Bottega Fellini. La città delle donne, with text by Raffaele Monti, Rome, 1981.
Ginger e Fred, with Tonino Guerra and Tullio Pinelli, Milan, 1986.

By FELLINI: articles—

Interview with George Bluestone, in Film Culture (New York), October 1957.

Interview with Enzo Peri, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1961.

Interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1964.

"'I Was Born for the Cinema': A Conversation with Federico Fellini," with Irving Levine, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1966.

Interview with Pierre Kast, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, Indianapolis, 1967.

Interview with Roger Borderie and others, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May/June 1971.

Interview, in Encountering Directors by Charles Samuels, New York, 1972.

"The Cinema Seen as a Woman," an interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1980/81.

Interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1985.

Interview in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), November 1986.

Interview with Germaine Greer in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), December 1988.

Interview with A. Samueli in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1990.

Interview with Gideon Bachmann in Film Quarterly, Spring 1994.

Interview with Liselotte Millauer in Interview, January 1994.

On FELLINI: books—

Costello, Donald P., Fellini’s Road, Notre Dame, Indiana, 1983.

Grazzini, Giovanni, editor, Federico Fellini: Comments on Film, Fresno, California, 1988.

Bondanella, Peter, and Cristina Degli-Esposti, editors, Perspectives on Federico Fellini, New York, 1993.

Burke, Frank, Fellini’s Films: From Postwar to Postmodern, New York, 1996.

On FELLINI: articles—

Harcourt, Peter, “The Secret Life of Federico Fellini,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1966.

“Fellini Section,” of Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 15, no. 2, 1987.

“Fellini Section” of Postif (Paris), December 1987.

Pierson, Frank, “Fellini’s Magical 8 1/2,” in American Film (Los Angeles), June 1989.

Benigni, Roberto, article in Postif (Paris), May 1990.

Cavazzoni, E., article in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), May 1990.

Obituary in Times (London), 1 November 1993.

Obituary in Los Angeles Times, 1 November 1993.

Obituary in Chicago Tribune, 7 November 1993.

Obituary in Newsweek (New York), 8 November 1993.

On FELLINI: films—

Goldbarb, Peter, Fellini, for TV, Canada, 1968.

Fellini’s Cinema: Notes of a Director, Italy, 1992.

* * * *

Federico Fellini is one of the most controversial figures in the recent history of Italian cinema. Though his successes have been spectacular, as in the cases of La strada, La dolce vita, and Otto e mezzo, his failures have been equally flamboyant. This has caused considerable doubt in some quarters as to the validity of his ranking as a major force in contemporary cinema, and made it somewhat difficult for him to achieve sufficient financial backing to support his highly personalized film efforts in his last years. Certainly, few directors in any country could equal Fellini’s interest in the history of the cinema or share his certainty regarding the appropriate place for the body of his work within the larger film canon. Consequently, he has molded each of his film projects in such a way that any discussion of their individual merits is inseparable from the autobiographical details of his personal legend.

Fellini’s early film La sceicco bianco gave a clear indication of the autobiographical nature of the works to follow, for it drew upon his experience as a journalist and merged it with many of the conceits he had developed in his early motion picture career as a gag writer and script writer. However, he was also an instrumental part of the development of the neorealist film in the 1940s, writing parts of the screenplays of Roberto Rossellini’s Roma città aperta and Paisà, and his reshaping of that tradition toward an autobiographical mode of expression in La sceicco bianco troubled a number of his former collaborators. But on his part, Fellini was seemingly just as critical of the brand of neorealism practiced by Rossellini, with its penchant for overt melodrama.

In a succeeding film, La strada, Fellini took his autobiographical parallels a step farther, casting his wife, Giulietta Masina, in the major female role. This highly symbolic work was variously interpreted as a manifesto on human rights, or at least a treatise on women’s liberation. In these contexts, however, it roused the ire of strict neorealist who regarded it as containing too much justification for political oppression. Yet as a highly metaphorical personal parable about the relationship between a man and a woman it was a critical success and a confirmation of the validity of Fellini’s autobiographical instincts. This gave him the confidence to indulge in a subtle criticism of the neorealist style in his next film, Il bidone. The film served, in effect, a tongue-in-cheek criticism of the form’s sentimental aspects.

In the films of Fellini’s middle period, beginning in 1959 with La dolce vita, Fellini became increasingly preoccupied with his role as an international “auteur.” As a result, the autobiographical manifestations in his films became more introspective and extended to less tangible areas of his psyche than anything that he had previously brought to the screen. La dolce vita is a relatively straightforward psychological extension of what might have become of Mastroianni, the director’s earlier biographical persona (I vitelloni), after forsaking his village for the decadence of Rome. But its successors increasingly explored the areas of its creator’s fears, nightmares, and fantasies. After establishing actor Marcello Mastroianni as his alter ego in La dolce vita, Fellini again employed him in his masterpiece, Otto e mezzo (8 1/2), as a vehicle for his analysis of the complex nature of artistic inspiration. Then, in a sequel of sorts, he examined the other side of the coin. In Giulietta degli spiriti (Juliet of the Spirits), he casts his wife as the intaglio of the Guido figure in 8 1/2. Both films, therefore, explored the same problems from different sexual perspectives while, on the deeper, ever-present autobiographical plane, the two characters became corresponding sides of Fellini’s mythic ego.

Subsequent films continued the rich, flamboyant imagery that became a Fellini trademark, but with the exception of the imaginative fantasy Fellini Satyricon, they have, for the most part, returned to the vantage point of direct experience that characterized his earlier works. Finally, in 1980’s La città delle donne, which again featured Mastroianni, he returned to the larger-than-life examination of his psyche. In fact, a number of critics regarded the film as the ultimate statement in an ideological trilogy (begun with 8 1/2 and continued in Juliet of the Spirits) in which he finally attempts a rapprochement with his inner sexual and creative conflicts. Unfortunately, City of Women is too highly derivative of the earlier work. Consequently, it does not resolve the issues raised in the earlier two films.

Several of Fellini’s films are masterpieces by anyone’s standards. Yet in no other director’s body of films does each work identifiably relate a specific image of the creator that he wishes to present to the world and to posterity. Whether any of the films are truly autobiographical in any traditional sense is open to debate. They definitely do not interlock to provide a history of a man, and yet each is a deliberately crafted building block in the construction of a larger-than-life Fellini legend which may eventually come to be regarded as the “journey of a psyche.” While the final credits on Fellini’s filmography are far from his best works, they nonetheless are fitting conclusions to what is one of the legendary careers in the history of world cinema.
And the Ship Sails On is the wildly preposterous but uniquely Felliniesque tale of the miscellaneous luminaries who come together for an ocean cruise in which they will bid farewell to a just-deceased opera performer. Ginger and Fred is a sweetly nostalgic film because of its union of two of Fellini’s then-aging but still vibrant stars of the past, Giulietta Masina and Marcello Mastroianni. The Voice of the Moon, Fellini’s last feature—which did not earn a U.S. distributor—works as a summation of the cinematic subjects which had concerned the film maker for the previous quarter century. The most outstanding and revealing late-career Fellini is Intervista, an illuminating film (and characteristic Fellini union of reality and fantasy) about the production by a Japanese television crew of a documentary about the director. Fellini himself appears on screen, where he is shown to be shooting an adaptation of Kafka’s Amerika, a film that appears to be a typically Felliniesque extravaganza-in-the-making, complete with eccentric extras, surreal images, and autobiographical touches. We watch the filmmaker as he casts Amerika. We meet his various associates and underlings, from producers to actors, from casting director to assistant director. We see how Fellini directs his performers and the steps he takes to inspire feelings and attitudes within them. And we are privy to the various crises, big and small, which are standard fare during the filmmaking process. Finally, Marcello Mastroianni and Anita Ekberg, who over thirty years before had co-starred in La dolce vita, appear as themselves. Mastroianni’s entrance is especially magical; the sequence in which he and Ekberg (whom, he remarks, he has not seen since making La dolce vita) observe their younger selves in some famous clips from the film is wonderful nostalgia.

However, Intervista is primarily an homage to Cinecitta, the studio where Fellini shot his films. Revealingly, the filmmaker describes the studio as “a fortress, or perhaps an alibi.” Fellini first came to Cinecitta in 1940, when he was a young journalist. His assignment was to interview an actress for a magazine profile. This event is dramatized in Intervista; at various points in the film, the narrative drifts from images of the real Fellini, an artist in the twilight of a much-honored career, to a recreation of young Federico (played by Sergio Rubini) and his initiation into the world of Cinecitta. To fully appreciate this very personal movie about the movie-making process, you must be familiar with—and an admirer of—Fellini and fully appreciate this very personal movie about the movie-making process by Sergio Rubini) and his initiation into the world of Cinecitta. To observe their younger selves in some famous clips from the film is wonderful nostalgia.

However, Intervista is primarily an homage to Cinecitta, the studio where Fellini shot his films. Revealingly, the filmmaker describes the studio as “a fortress, or perhaps an alibi.” Fellini first came to Cinecitta in 1940, when he was a young journalist. His assignment was to interview an actress for a magazine profile. This event is dramatized in Intervista; at various points in the film, the narrative drifts from images of the real Fellini, an artist in the twilight of a much-honored career, to a recreation of young Federico (played by Sergio Rubini) and his initiation into the world of Cinecitta. To fully appreciate this very personal movie about the movie-making process, you must be familiar with—and an admirer of—Fellini and his work.

—Stephen L. Hanson, updated by Rob Edelman

FERNÁNDEZ, Emilio

Nationality: Mexican. Born: In Hondo, Coahuila, 26 March 1904. Also known as “El Indio.” Family: Married 1) Gladys Fernández, 1941 (divorced), one daughter; 2) actress Columbia Domínguez (divorced), one daughter; 3) Gloria Cabiedes (divorced), one son; 4) Beatriz (divorced). Career: Took part in the rebellion of Adolfo de la Huerta against the Mexican government, captured and sentenced to prison, but escaped to United States, 1923; actor in California, returned to Mexico following amnesty, 1934; directed first film, 1941; served six months of four-and-one-half-year sentence for manslaughter, 1976. Awards: Best Film, Cannes Festival, for María Candelaria, 1946. Died: In Mexico City, 6 August 1986.

Films as Director and Co-Scriptwriter:

1927 The Gaucho (Jones)
1933 Flying down to Rio (Freeland) (as dancer)

Films as Actor:

1941 La isla de la pasión (Passion Island)
1942 Soyupro mexicano
1943 Flor silvestre (+ role as Rogelio Torres); María Candelaria
1944 Las abandonadas; Bugambilía
1945 Pepita Jiménez; La perla (The Pearl)
1946 Enamorada
1947 Río Escondido (Hidden River)
1948 Maclovia; Salón México; Pueblerina
1949 La malquerida; Duelo en las montañas; Del odio nació el amor (The Torch; The Beloved)
1950 Undía de vida; Victimas del pecado; Islas Marias; Siempre Tuya
1951 La bien amada; Acapulco; El mar y tú
1952 Cuando levanta la niebla
1953 La red; Reportaje; El rapto; La rosa blanca
1954 La rebelión de los colgados; Nuestros dos
1955 La Tierra de Fuego se apaga
1956 Una cita de amor; El imposter
1961 Pueblito
1963 Paloma herida
1967 Un dorado de Pancho Villa (A Loyal Soldier of Pancho Villa)
1968 El crepúsculo de un Dios
1973 La Choca
1975 Zona roja
1977 México norte
1978 Erotica

Awards: Best Film, Cannes Festival, for María Candelaria, 1946. Died: In Mexico City, 6 August 1986.
1934 Corazón bandolero (Sevilla) (as Chacal); Cruz Diablo (De Fuentes) (as Toparca); Tribu (Contreras); Janitzio (Navarro) (as Zirahuen)

1935 María Elena (Sevilla) (as dancer); Celos (Boytler)

1936 Marijuana (El monstruo verde) (Bohr) (as El Indio); Las mujeres mandan (De Fuentes) (as dancer); Allá en el Rancho Grande (De Fuentes) (as dancer); El superlocos (Segura) (as Idúa); El Impostor (Kirkland)

1937 Adiós Nicanor (Portas) (as Nicanor); Las cuatro milpas (Pereda)

1938 Aquí llegó el valentín (El fanfarrón) (Rivero); Juan sin miedo (Segura) (as Valentín)

1939 Con los dorados de Villa (de Anda); Los de abajo (Con la División del Norte) (Urueta)

1940 El Charro Negro (de Anda); Rancho alegre (Aguila); El zorro de Jalisco (Benavides) (as Ernesto)

1958 La Cucaracha (I. Rodríguez) (as Coronel Antonia Zeta)

1961 Los hermanos de Hierro (I. Rodríguez) (as Pascual Velasco)

1962 La Bandida (R. Rodríguez) (as Epigmenio Gómez)

1963 El revólver sangriento (Delgado) (as Félix Gómez); Night of the Iguana (Huston) (as stray man, also assoc d)

1964 Los Hermanos Muerte (Baledón) (as Marcos Zermeño); Yo, el valiente (Corona Blake) (as El Cuervo); La recta final (Taboada) (as Lucio); Un callejón sin salida (Baledón) (as Antonio)

1965 Duelo de pistoleros (Delgado) (as Pancho Gatillo Romero); La conquista de El Dorado (Portillo) (as Indio Romo); Un tipo difícil de matar (Portillo) (as Ringo); Los malvados (Corona Blake) (as Emilio); The Reward (Bourgnion); Return of the Seven (Kennedy)

1966 El silencioso (Mariscal) (as Emilio Segura); The Appaloosa (Furie); The War Wagon (Kennedy)

1967 El caudillo (Mariscal); El jinete fantasma (Zugsmith); Cuando corre al alazán (Mendoza)

1968 El Yaqui (Martínez)

1969 The Wild Bunch (Peckinpah)

1971 Indio (de Anda)

1972 Derecho de asilo (Zeceña); El rincón de las Virgenes (Isaac); Pat Garrett and Billy the Kid (Peckinpah)

1973 Bring Me the Head of Alfredo Garcia (Peckinpah)

1980 Las cabaretaras (Cisneros); Una gallina muy ponedora (Portillo); Ahora mis pistolas hablan (Orozco)

1983 Mi abuelo, mi perro y yo (Fernández); Los amantes (Vega); Mercenarios (Cisneros); Under the Volcano (Huston); El tesoro del Amazonas (Cardona); Lola la traquera (Fernández)

Publications

By FERNÁNDEZ: books—

En su propio espejo (Entrevista con Emilio ‘‘El Indio’’ Fernández), edited by Julia Tuñón, Mexico City, 1988.

By FERNÁNDEZ: articles—

On FERNÁNDEZ: books—

Riera, Emilio García, Historia documental del cine mexicano, vols. 1–9, Mexico City, 1969.

Blanco, Jorge Ayala, La aventura del cine mexicano, Mexico City, 1979.

de Luna, Andrés, La batalla y su sombra (La revolución en el cine mexicano), Mexico City, 1984.

Blanco, Jorge Ayala, La condición del cine mexicano, Mexico City, 1986.

Fernández, Adela, El Indio Fernández: Vida y mito, Mexico City, 1986.

Taibo, Paco Ignacio, El Indio Fernández: El cine por mis pistolas, Mexico City, 1986.

On FERNÁNDEZ: articles—

‘‘El Indio,’’ in Time (New York), 11 November 1946.

Mraz, John, ‘‘Of Churros and Churros,’’ in Jump Cut (Berkeley), no. 29, 1984.

Dávalos, Federico, ‘‘Por México: La leyenda del Indio Fernández,’’ in Pantaalla (Mexico City), November 1986.

Rozoado, Alejandro, ‘‘Lo trágico en el cine de Emilio Fernández,’’ in Dice (Mexico City), November 1987.

* * *

If he did not already exist, it would be necessary to invent Emilio ‘‘El Indio’’ Fernández. His manneristic visual style, his folkloric themes and characters, and his distinctively Indian physiognomy made him an integral element of Mexico’s culture of nationalism, as well as the nation’s best-known director. Fleeing Mexico after the defeat of his faction in the rebellion of 1923, Fernández ended up digging ditches in Hollywood. As has been the case with so many Latin American artists and intellectuals, Fernández discovered his fatherland by leaving it: ‘‘I understood that it was possible to create a Mexican cinema, with our own actors and our own stories. . . . From then on the cinema became a passion with me, and I began to dream of Mexican films.’’ Making Mexican cinema became Fernández’s obsession and, as is so often true of cultural nationalism, a short-term gain was to turn into a long-term dead end.

Perhaps that which most distinguishes Fernández’s films is their strikingly beautiful visual style. Fernández and Gabriel Figueroa, the cinematographer, created the classical visual form of Mexican cinema. Ironically, their expressive cinematic patriotism was significantly inspired by foreign models—the most important of which was that of Sergei Eisenstein and his cameraman Eduard Tisse. Fernández evidently saw Qué Viva Mexico! in Hollywood, and he later played the lead in Janíciro, a film influenced by Eisenstein and the documentaries of Robert Flaherty and Willard Van Dyke. He even went on to “re-make” Qué Viva Mexico! twice with María Candelaria and Maclovia. Another important antecedent was Paul Strand’s photography in Los Redes, which must itself have reflected Eisenstein’s examples as well as Strand’s experiences in the Film and Photo League.

Foreign models were prominent at a formal level, but nationalism was presumably communicated in the content of the visual images. The films of Fernández and Figueroa are a celebration of Mexico’s natural beauty: stony Indian faces set off by dark rebozos and white shirts, charros and their stallions riding through majestic cactus formations, fishermen and their nets reflected in the swirling ocean tides, flower vendors in Xochimilco’s canals moving past long lines of tall poplar trees; and over it all, the monumentally statuesque masses of rolling clouds made impossibly luminous by photographic filters.

In the earlier films, the incredible beauty of the visual structures functioned as a protagonist, providing context for the story and resonating with the characters’ emotions. However, Fernández and Figueroa apparently became victims of their own myths, for their later films manifest a coldness and immobility which indicate an emphasis on visual form at the expense of other cinematic concerns. The dangers inherent in their “tourist” images of Mexico were ever-present, of course; but they became increasingly obvious with the petrifaction of the style.

Fernández’s stories have been summed up by Carlos Monsivais, a leading Mexican critic, as “monothematic tragedies: the couple is destroyed by the fate of social incomprehension, Nature is the essence of the Motherland, beauty survives crime, those who sacrifice themselves for others understand the world.” One is tempted to add: the Indian is a cretin, the charro a blustering macho, women are long-suffering and self-denying saints—and the revolution a confused tangle of meaningless atrocities.

Fernández’s picturesque myths still retain vigor in the statist nationalism which dominates ideological discourse in Mexico. And, judging from the international attention that Fernández received for his early works, they were evidently also what the world expected from Mexican cinema. The pity is that Emilio “El Indio” Fernández did not demand a little more from himself.

—John Mraz

FERRARA, Abel

Nationality: American. Born: The Bronx, New York, 1951. Education: Attended Rockland Community College, one year; State University of New York at Purchase. Career: While at SUNY, made a number of shorts; formed Navaron Films with long-term collaborator Nicholas St. John; directed television special, The Loner, for NBC, 1988. Awards: Independent Spirit Award nomination for best director, Independent Feature Project/West, 1993, for Bad Lieutenant. Address: William Morris Agency, 151 El Camino Dr., Beverly Hills, CA 90212, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>Not Guilty: For Keith Richards (short); Nine Lives of a Wet Pussy (+ ed, role as Old Man)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>The Driller Killer (+ ed, role as Reno)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>Ms. 45 (Angel of Vengeance) (+ role as 1st Rapist)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Fear City</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>“The Home Invaders” and “The Dutch Oven” episodes of Miami Vice (for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>Gladiator; pilot episode of Crime Story (for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>China Girl</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Cat Chaser</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>King of New York</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1992</td>
<td>Bad Lieutenant (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993</td>
<td>Body Snatchers</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993</td>
<td>Dangerous Game (Snake Eyes)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>The Addiction</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>The Funeral; California</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997</td>
<td>The Blackout (+ co-sc); Subway Stories: Tales from the Underground (segment of TV series Love on a Train)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1998</td>
<td>New Rose Hotel (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2001</td>
<td>R-Xmas (+ co-sc)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By FERRARA: articles—

“Abel down the Cable,” interview with N. Helms, in Fatal Visions (Victoria, Australia), no. 18, February 1995.

On FERRARA: book—

On FERRARA: articles—

Smith, Gavin, “In the Gutter,” in Film Comment, July/August 1990.

According to Abel Ferrara: “There’s only one kind of film to make, the kind you go all out on. Maybe some people don’t like these subjects, but I don’t think there can be any other subjects.” To those horrified by the violence of his films he gives the uncompromising answer that “once you’re an adult, then that’s it; anything within the scope of an artist’s imagination has got to be portrayed, and if you don’t like it then leave.” Given his in-your-face, unflinchingly brutal, yet unquestionable and still-developing sense of style, it’s not surprising to discover that the director he most admires is Pasolini (“because he filmed his visions and did it without qualifications”) and that the first film he remembers being taken to see was Douglas Sirk’s devastating, no-holds-barred melodrama Imitation of Life. Ferrara is undoubtedly one of the most notable American directors to have emerged during the 1980s. His films have aroused considerable controversy, but even those who dislike them would be hard put to deny their kinetic energy and verve, and the remarkable performances at the heart of many of them (for example, Zoe Tamerlis in Ms.45, Christopher Walken in King of New York, and above all, Harvey Keitel in Bad Lieutenant). To his admirers, though, he has been greeted in much the same terms that were used to hail Scorsese on the release of Mean Streets. Thus, Jim Shelley in the Guardian, “Ferrara is American cinema’s most uncompromising maverick, someone who genuinely doesn’t give a damn and one of the few American directors who not only has some kind of personal ‘vision’ but has the single-minded determination to express it.” In the States Film Comment has championed Ferrara in much the same way as it did Scorsese in his early days; it named Ms.45 as one of the ten best films of 1981, and in 1990 Gavin Smith compared Ferrara’s films to what Scorsese and Schrader “might have made together if they had remained in orbit around Taxi Driver’s lurid nighttime New York and carried on exploring the pulp violence of Hardcore and Rolling Thunder and the ethnic obsessions of Mean Streets,” praising his “way-out melodramas bursting with outrageous excess” for their “hyperbolic style, a subversive vein of sociopolitical comment, and a no-holds-barred pulp inventiveness” reminiscent of early Jonathan Demme and Larry Cohen.
Ferrara began making eight-millimeter shorts at high school with his friend Nicholas St. John, who went on to script Driller Killer, Ms.45, Fear City, China Girl, King of New York, and Dangerous Game/Snake Eyes. Their first feature together was Nine Lives of a Wet Pussy, a love story with fantasy elements, which they made after forming Navarone Films. Their first film to garner any attention, however, was The Driller Killer, which became something of a cult hit on the drive-in circuit in the States. In Britain, by contrast, this story of a New York artist who goes crazy and starts attacking derelicts with an electric drill became infamous as one of the films which started off the “video nasty” panic in the early 1980s, and soon found itself totally banned both on film and video, the victim of a particularly rabid and ill-informed campaign by an ill-matched alliance of pro-censorship campaigners and a sensation-hungry and grotesquely hypocritical tabloid press which revelled in what it purported to condemn. In all the furor of condemnation and vilification, no journalist or critic actually bothered to see the offending item, of course. The only magazine that attempted (in vain) to stem the tide of outraged censoriousness was the British Film Institute’s Monthly Film Bulletin, which devoted several articles to this and other “videos maudits,” with the present writer daring to suggest that The Driller Killer was a film of “very considerable merit,” and horror guru Kim Newman noting that although “The Driller Killer has a collage of revolting sights and sounds unmatched since Peeping Tom and Performance . . . there is no denying the cheapskate proficiency with which Ferrara puts his films together, or the painful accuracy of his probing for the unhealthy nerve.” He also suggests that its central character, Reno (played by Ferrara himself), is “perhaps the only psycho in the movies to be driven mad by economic/environmental, rather than sexual/psychological, factors.” Whatever the case, any cinema in Britain that tried to show Driller Killer, or any shop that tried to rent or sell a video of it, would even today risk a visit from the police, a court case, and a hate campaign by the press.

Ferrara’s next film, Ms.45 is the story of a mute young woman (Zoe Tamerlis) who is raped twice in a single afternoon and turns into an angel of vengeance (the film’s alternate title) by dressing up as a nun and blasting away at everybody until she is stabbed (put out of her misery?) by a female friend. It might be described as the first pro-feminist exploitation film. [Tamerlis claims an assault was made on her life because of the strong female avenger image she created in the film.] Thanks partly to the advocacy of William Friedkin, Ms. 45 was taken up and distributed by Warner Bros. In Britain, meanwhile, it was not released in cinemas and heavily cut on video. By this time Ferrara’s name spelled danger to an increasingly nervous British Board of Film Classification, although the fuss over The Driller Killer had brought him to the admiring attention of many horror aficionados. There followed the bigger-budget Fear City, starring Tom Berenger and Melanie Griffith. This story of the hunt for a psychopath who mutilates and kills strippers also failed to find a cinema release in Britain and was cut to bits on video. In the States, however, it brought Ferrara to the attention of Michael Mann, for whom he directed two first-season episodes of Miami Vice (“Home Invaders” and “Dutch Oven”) and the pilot of Crime Story, all displaying his customary style and verve. China Girl updated Romeo and Juliet (and West Side Story) to take in a love story set against conflict between the Chinatown and Little Italy districts of New York. Cut Chaser remains the best adaptation of an Elmore Leonard thriller to date (Alan Sharp provided the first-rate screenplay), even though Ferrara himself left the project before the editing was completed to work on The King of New York. This is one of his very finest films.

The story of a gangster with a moral streak (he wants to save a children’s hospital with funds raised from drug-dealing) pitted against three cops who break every moral code in the book, this is a truly stunning contemporary “film noir” and can also be read as a wry comment on Reaganite (and Thatcherite) “trickle down” economics, or as a very dark-hued Robin Hood for our times. Christopher Walken’s performance as the ambitious crook-with-a-conscience is nothing short of mesmerizing. When he’s confronted on a subway by several black youths out to rob him, we see in his response to them what makes him “king of New York” for the 1980s. Instead of shooting the youths, he tosses them a wad of cash and tells them to report to his Plaze Hotel suite headquarters if they want more.

Even more remarkable, however, is Harvey Keitel as the utterly ravaged, almost deranged cop in Bad Lieutenant, undoubtedly Ferrara’s darkest, bleakest, most tormented film, and a frighteningly intense addition to the cinema of abjection. This is also the film in which the curious religious streak, almost always present in Ferrara’s work, is closest to the surface. For although Bad Lieutenant presents us with an appalling catalogue of human turpitude, it is, ultimately, a story of redemption, and one presented in often quite explicitly Christian terms; as Mark Kermode put it in a perceptive review of the film in Sight and Sound, “like The Exorcist, the film frequently seems to revel in obscenity, but remains draped throughout in the pious clothing of the priesthood.” Similarly, Variety compared it to Ingmar Bergman’s The Silence in that it “tackled the subject of God’s absence from people’s lives in such a sexually explicit and morbid context.” The comparison with Bergman is also telling in that this harsh, tortured film, with its spare, elliptical, real-time narrative, delivers almost none of the conventional pleasures normally associated with “Hollywood” cinema, coming across instead as a particularly angst-ridden, contemporary “art movie.” As such, it’s a film to admire rather than like, but it does prove triumphantly (as if proof were needed) that Keitel is an absolutely major talent and that Ferrara, as well as being a fine visual stylist, is a first-class actor’s director. As he himself put it: “The most fulfilling part of directing is to create a space for a performance. To be there for the actor, and to find the actors who can do it.” Much of Keitel’s performance seems to be improvised (for example, the infamous and queasy long-drawn-out scene in which he frenziedly masturbates whilst harassing two young female traffic offenders, all the while moulding obscenities) but, just like Jack Nicholson’s celebrated dope-smoking scene in Easy Rider, one suspects it isn’t. As Ferrara himself puts it: “Improvisation is a funny concept because the basis of any great improvisation is great material, a great script, to begin with. And then it’s very hard to say where it starts and stops. These scenes have been discussed and worked on and written together, so who knows where that improv begins or where there are real lines.”

In a different key altogether is Body Snatchers, the third feature film version (this time set claustrophobically in a sealed-off military base rather than a small town or big city) of Jack Finney’s classic parable of the loss of individualism and identity. It is the least successful of the trio, however, due to its trouble production history which involved multiple rewrites, the firing of its original director, and Ferrara’s stepping into that role well after pre-production. The result was neither as gripping as the original Invasion of the Body Snatchers directed by Don Siegel, nor as suffused in urban paranoia as Phil Kaufman’s 1978 remake.

Dangerous Game reunited Ferrara with Keitel in a film-within-a-film which he has described as being like “Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? on acid.’’ Certainly it’s an extraordinarily reflexive and self-conscious work where it’s often made extremely difficult to work out the reality status of the images we’re watching, which is something of a new departure for Ferrara and seems to take us back into ‘‘art movie’’ territory. On the other hand, the remark by Keitel’s Eddie Israel, the director of Mother of Mirrors, the film-within-the-film, that ‘‘the ultimate is pain and suffering—that’s what it takes to survive’’ could well be taken — as evidenced by this and Ferrara’s next feature, The Addiction, a gloomy tale of vampirism among the drug culture — as a distillation of the Ferrara philosophy and a summary of the import of his entire œuvre.

—Julian Petley, updated by John McCarty

FEUILLADE, Louis

Films as Director (Feuillade wrote and directed an estimated eight hundred films; this partial listing includes all series titles and known non-series titles):

1906 Le billet de banque; C’est Papa qui prend la purge; Les deux Gosses; La Porteuse de pain; Mireille (co-d); N’te promène donc pas toute nue
1907 Un accident d’auto; La course des belles-mères; Un facteur trop ferré; L’homme aimanté; La légende de la fileuse; Un paquet embarrassant; La sirène; Le thè chez la concierge; Vive le sabotage
1908 Les agents tels qu’on nous les présente; Une dame vraiment bien; La grève des apaches; Nettoyage par le vide; Une nuit agitée; Prométhé; Le récit du colonel; Le roman de Sœur Louise; Un tic
1909 L’aveugle de Jerusalem; La châtre métamorphosée en femme; La cigale et la fourmi; Le collier de la reine; Les filles du cantonnier; Les heures; Histoire de puce; Le huguenot; Judith et Holopherne; Fra Vincenzi; La légende des phares; La mère du moine; La mort de Mozart; La mort; La possession de l’enfant; Le savetier et le financier; Le printemps; Vainqueur de la course pédestre;
1910 Benvenuto Cellini; Le Christ en croix; Esther, L’Exode; Le festin de Balthazar; La fille de Jephté; Mil huit cent quatorze; Mater dolorosa; Maudite soit la guerre; Le pater; Le roi de Thulé
1910/11 ‘‘Le Film Esthétique’’ series: (1910: Les sept péchés capitaux, La naivété; 1911: La vierge d’Argos)
1910/13 ‘‘Bébé’’ series (74 films, from 88 to 321 meters length) (series begins with Bébé fume in 1910; final title is Bébé en vacances in 1913)
1911 L’aventurière, dame de compagnie; Aux lions les chrétiens; Dans la vie; Les doigts qui voient; Fidélité romaine; Le fils de la sunamité; Le fils de Locuste; Les petites apprenties; Quand les feuilles tombent; Sans le joug; Le trafiquant
1911/13 ‘‘La vie telle qu’elle est’’ series: (1911: Les vipères, Le mariage de l’aînée, Le roi Lear au village, En grève, Le bas de laine [Le Trésor], La tare, Le poison, La souris blanche, Le trust [Les batailles de l’argent], Le chef-lieu de Canton, Le destin des mères, Tant que vous serez heureux; 1912: L’accident, Les braves gens, Le nain, Le pont sur-l’Abime; 1913: S’affranchir)
1912 Amour d’automne; Androcles; L’anneau fatal; L’attract du bouge; Au pays des lions; L’Aventurière; La casserette de l’émigrée; Le château de la peur; Les cloches de Paques; Le cœur et l’argent; La course aux millions; Dans la brousse; La demoiselle du notaire; La fille du margrave; La hantise; Haut les mains!; L’homme de proie; La maison des lions; Le maléfice; Le mort vivant; Les noces sicilienne; Le Noël de Francesca; Pré méditation; La prison sur le gouffre; Le témoin; Le tourment; Tyrtée; La vertu de Lucette; La vie ou la mort; Les yeux qui meurent
1912/16 ‘‘Bout-de-Zan’’ series (53 films, from 79 to 425 meters length) (series begins with Bout-de-Zan revient du cirque (1912); final title is Bout-de-Zan et la torpille (1916))
1912/13 ‘‘Le Détective Dervieux’’ series (1912: Le Proscrit, L’oubliette; 1913: Le gaet-apens, L’écrin du rajah)
1913 L’agonie de Byzance; L’angoisse; Les audaces du cœur; Bonne année; Le bon propriétaire; Le browning; Les chasseurs de lions; La conversion d’Irma; Un drame au pays basque; L’effroi; Erreur tragique; La gardienne du feu; Au gré des flots; L’intruse; La marche des rois; Le mariage de miss Nelly; Le ménestrel de la reine Anne; La mort de Lucrèce; La petite danseuse; Le revenant; La rose blanche; Un scandale au village; Le secret du forçat; La vengeance du sergent de ville; Les yeux ouverts

1913/14 ‘‘Fantômas’’ series: (1913: Fantômas, Juve contre Fantômas, La mort qui tue; 1914: Fantômas contre Fantômas, Le faux magistrat)

1913/16 ‘‘La vie drôle’’ series (35 films, of which 26 are preserved) [series begins with Les millions de la bonne (1913), and includes L’Illustre Machefer (1914), Le colonel Bontemps (1915), and Lagourdette, gentleman cambrioleur (1916)]

1914 Le calvaire; Le coffret de Tolède; Le diamant du Sénéchal; L’enfant de la roulotte; L’épreuve; Les fiancés de Séville; Les fiancés de Séville; Le gendarme est sans cuvette; La gitanela; L’hôtel de la gare; Les lettres; Manon de Montmartre; La nueva; Paques rouges; La petite Andalouse; La rencontre; Severo Torelli

1915 L’angoisse au foyer; La barrière; Le blason; Celui qui reste; Le collier de perles; Le coup du faris; La course à l’abîme; Deux Françaises; L’escapade de Filoche; L’expiation; Le fer a cheval; Fifi tambour; Le furoncle; Les noces d’argent; Le Noël du poilu; Le soste; Union sacrée

1915/16 ‘‘Les vampires’’ series (1915: La tête coupée; La bague qui tue; Le cryptogramme rouge; 1916: Le spectre; L’évasion du mort; Les yeux qui fascinent; Satanas; Le maître de la foudre; L’homme des poisons; Les noces sanglantes)

1916 L’aventure des millions; C’est le printemps; Le double jeu; Les fiancées d’Agénor; Les fourberies de Pingouin; Le malheur qui passe; Un mariage de raison; Les mariés d’un jour; Notre pauvre cœur; Le poète et sa folle amante; La peine du talion; Le retour de Manivel; Si vous ne m’aimez pas; Judex (serial in a prologue and twelve episodes)

1917 L’autre; Le bandeau sur les yeux; Débrouille-toi; Déserteur; La femme fatale; La fugue de Lily; Herr Doktor; Mon oncle; La nouvelle mission de Judex (serial in twelve episodes); Le passé de Monique

1918 Aide-toi; Les petites marionnettes; Tih Minh (serial in twelve episodes); Vendémiaire

1919 Barrabas (serial in twelve episodes); L’engrenage; L’enigme (Le mot de l’); L’homme sans visage; Le nocturne

1920 Les deux Gaminés (serial in twelve episodes)

1921 L’Orpheline (serial in twelve episodes); Parisette (serial in twelve episodes)

1921/22 ‘‘Belle humeur’’ series (1921: Gustave est médium, Marjolin ou la fille marquée, Saturnin ou le bon allumeur, Séraphin ou les jambes nues, Zidore ou les métamorphoses; 1922: Gaétan ou le commis audacieux, Lahire ou le valet de cœur)

1922 Le fils du filibustier (serial in twelve episodes)

1923 Le gamin de Paris; La goseline; L’orphelin de Paris (serial in six episodes); Vindicta (film released in five parts)

1924 La fille bien gardée; Lacette; Pierrot Pierrette; Le stigmatie (serial in six episodes)

Other Films:

1905 Le coup de vent (Le chapeau) (sc)

1906 La course au potiron (sc)

Publications

By FEUILLADE: books—

Le Clos (play), with Etienne Arnaud, Paris, 1905.

Tih Minh, with Georges Le Faure, Paris, 1919.

Barrabas, with Maurice Level, Paris, 1920.

By FEUILLADE: articles—

‘‘Naundor, la genèse d’un crime historique,’’ (under pseudonym P. Valergues), in Revue mondiale (Paris), 10 November 1904 through 25 October 1905.

On FEUILLADE: books—

Florey, Robert, La Lanterne magique, Lausanne, 1966.

On FEUILLADE: articles—

Florey, Robert, ‘‘Une Saison dans la cage à mouches avec Feuillade,’’ in Cinéma (Paris), June 1962.

Fieschi, Jean-André, ‘‘Feuillade (l’homme aimanté),’’ in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1964.

Roud, Richard, ‘‘Maker of Melodrama,’’ in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1976.

‘‘Louis Feuillade,’’ in Film Dope (London), September 1978.

Cartier, C., and M. Oms, ‘‘Quand Louis Feuillade cinématographiait à la cité de Carcassonne,’’ in Cahiers de la Cinématheque (Paris), Winter 1979.
Louis Feuillade was one of the most solid and dependable talents in French cinema during the early twentieth century. He succeeded Alice Guy as head of production at Gaumont in 1906 and worked virtually without a break—aside from a period of war service—until his death in 1925. He produced some eight hundred films of every conceivable kind: comedies and contemporary melodramas, biblical epics and historical dramas, sketches and series with numerous episodes adding up to many hours of running time. Although most of these films were made from his own scripts, Feuillade was not an innovator. The years of his apprenticeship in the craft of filmmaking were those in which French producers reigned supreme, and he worked uncomplainingly in a context in which commercial criteria were paramount. For Feuillade—as for so many of his successors in the heyday of Hollywood—aesthetic strategies not rooted in sound commercial practices were inconceivable, and a filmmaker’s only viable ambition was to reach the widest possible audience.

Most of Feuillade’s output forms part of a series of some kind and he clearly saw films in generic terms rather than as individually sculpted works. Though not an originator in terms of the forms or styles he adopted, he made films which are among the finest examples of the various popular genres he successively explored. Before 1914 his work is enormously diverse. It included thirty comic films in the series of La Vie drôle, a group of seriously intended dramas in which a concern with the quality of the pictorial image is apparent (marketed under the banner of the Film esthétique), and a number of contemporary dramas, La Vie telle qu’elle est, with somewhat ambiguous claims to realism. In addition, he made some seventy-six films with a four-year-old child star, Bébé, and another fifty or so with the urchin Bout-de-Zan.

But the richest vein of Feuillade’s work is the series of crime melodramas that extended from Fantômas in 1913–14 to Barrabas in 1920. Starting with his celebration of Fantômas, master criminal and master of disguise, who triumphs effortlessly over the dogged ordinariness of his opponent Inspector Juve, Feuillade went on to make his wildest success with Les Vampires. Made to rival the imported American serials, this series reflects the chaotic wartime state of French production. It is marked by improvised stories refusing all logic, bewildering changes of casting (necessary as actors were summoned to the war effort), economical use of real locations, and dazzling moments of total incongruity.

Les Vampires reached a level that Feuillade was never able to duplicate. Subsequent works like Judex and especially La Nouvelle Mission de Judex are marked by a new tone of moralising, with the emphasis placed on the caped avenger rather than the feckless criminals. If the later serials, Tih Minh and Barrabas, contain sequences able to rank with the director’s best, Feuillade’s subsequent work in the 1920s lacks the earlier forcefulness.

It was the films’ supreme lack of logic, the disregard for hallowed bourgeois values—so appropriate at a time when the old social order of Europe was crumbling under the impact of World War I—which led the surrealists such as André Breton and Louis Aragon to hail Fantômas and Les Vampires, and most of Feuillade’s subsequent advocates have similarly celebrated the films’ anarchistic poetry. But this should not lead us to see Feuillade as any sort of frustrated artist or poet of cinema, suffocating in a world dominated by business decisions. On the contrary, the director was an archetypal middle class family man who prided himself on the commercial success of his work and conducted his personal life in accord with strictly ordered bourgeois principles.

—Roy Armes

FEYDER, Jacques

Films as Director:

1915 Monsieur Pinson, policier (co-d)
1916 Têtes de femmes, femmes de tête; Le Pied qui etrait (four episodes) (+ sc); L’Homme au foulard à pois (+ sc); Le Bluff (+ sc); Un Conseil d’ami (+ sc); L’Homme de compagnie; Tiens, vous êtes à Poitiers? (+ sc); Le Frère de lait (+ sc)
Jacques Feyder

1917  L’Instinct est maître; Le Billard cassé (+ sc); Abrégeons les formalités! (+ sc); La Trouve de Bâche (+ sc); Le Pardessus de demi-saison; Les Vieilles Femmes de l’Hospice

1919  La Faute d’orthographe (+ sc)

1921  L’Atlantide (Missing Husbands) (+ sc)

1922  Crainquebille (+ sc, art d)

1925  Visages d’enfants (Faces of Children) (+ sc, art d); L’Image (+ co-sc, role); Gribiche (Mother of Mine) (+ sc)

1926  Carmen (+ sc)

1927  Au pays du Roi Lépreux (documentary) (+ sc)

1928  Thérèse Raquin (Du sollst nicht Ehe brechen; Shadows of Fear) (+ co-sc); Les Nouveaux Messieurs (The New Gentlemen) (+ co-sc)

1929  The Kiss (+ co-sc); Anna Christie (German version of Clarence Brown film) (+ sc)

1930  Le Spectre vert (French version of Lionel Barrymore’s The Unholy Night) (+ sc); Si l’Empereur savait ça (French version of His Glorious Night) (+ sc); Olympia (French version) (+ sc)

1931  Daybreak; Son of India

1934  Le Grand Jeu (+ co-sc)

1935  Pension Mimosas (+ co-sc); La Kermesse héroïque (Carnival in Flanders) (+ co-sc)

1936  Die klugen Frauen (German version of La Kermesse héroïque) (+ sc)

1937  Knight without Armour

1938  Les Gens du voyage (+ co-sc); Fahrendes Volk (German version of Les Gens du voyage) (+ sc)

1942  La Loi du nord (made 1939; during Occupation titled La Piste du nord) (+ co-sc); Une Femme disparaît (Portrait of a Woman) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1913  First episode of series Protéa (Jasset) (role)

1914  Quand minuit sonna (role)

1915  Autour d’une bague (Ravel) (role); Les Vampires (serial) (Feuillade) (bit role)

1925  Poil de carotte (Duvivier) (sc)

1928  Gardiens de Phare (Grémillon) (sc)
1943 Maturareise (Jeunes filles d’aujourd’hui) (Steiner) (tech + artistic supervision)
1946 Macadam (Back Streets of Paris) (Blistène) (art d)

Publications

By FEYDER: book—

By FEYDER: articles—

On FEYDER: books—

Jacques Feyder ou le Cinéma concret (anthology), Brussels, 1949.

On FEYDER: articles—

“Jacques Feyder” in Film Dope (London), September 1978.

On FEYDER: film—

* * *

Underneath everything Jacques Feyder did was a great love and mastery of his medium that gave integrity and style to his work. As a young man he rejected the bourgeois background of his Belgian home and became an actor. He fell in love with the talented Françoise Rosay, who became his partner for life. He acted in the cinema of Victorin Jasset, Feuillade, and Léon Gaumont, then became a scriptwriter, and finally began directing.

Feyder’s individual approach to La Faute d’orthographe did not commend itself to Gaumont, and Feyder raised the money to make the popular novel of Pierre Benois, L’Atlantide. This film, despite the presence of an ill-chosen Napierkowska in the lead, was an international success. The scenes shot in the Sahara under difficult conditions balanced the picturesque and exotic interiors, depicting an underground city.

Dining out in Montmartre, Feyder and Françoise discovered a boy playing in the street. This child was little Jean Forest, whom Feyder directed with consummate skill in three films, Crainquebille, Visages d’enfants, and Gribiche. The first, based on the Anatole France story, added to Feyder’s reputation, while the second, shot with simplicity and sensitivity in the Haut Valais, Switzerland, showed that Feyder possessed a remarkable skill for directing child actors. Gribiche was his first film for the Russian-inspired Albatros Company. It introduced the designer Lazare Meerson, working in the Art Deco style. It also featured Françoise Rosay in her first major role. Following a pictorially beautiful Carmen, with a recalcitrant Raquel Meller in the title role, came Feyder’s masterpiece. Thérèse Raquin was shot in a German studio and featured Gina Manes in her greatest part. Zola’s sombre bourgeois tragedy was brought vividly to life. The details of the Raquin home, the human tensions, the unspoken words, and the looming shadows created an unforgettable effect. At the end of the saga, the old, dumb, and paralysed woman peers through those shadows to watch the dead bodies of the murderous lovers lying on the floor. This scene remains one of the great moments of cinema.

After an irreverent satire on French politics, Les Nouveaux Messieurs, which succeeded in getting itself banned, Feyder set out for Hollywood. He directed Garbo in The Kiss, her last silent film and one of her most intelligent roles. Feyder proceeded to tackle the sound film with European versions of Anna Christie, Le Spectre vert, and Olympia. In 1931 he directed Ramon Novarro in Son of India and Day Break before returning to France. Teaming up with his fellow countryman Charles Spaak he made in quick succession Le Grand Jeu, one of the best films of the Foreign Legion; Pension Mimosas, with Rosay in a great tragic role; and the delightful, decorative, and witty La Kermesse héroïque, a costume film that defies the ravages of time. The latter outraged the sensibilities of his fellow Belgians even as it delighted the rest of the world.

Feyder directed Knight without Armour for Alexander Korda in London, Dietrich playing opposite Robert Donat. This story of the revolution in Russia featured an elegant Dietrich moving through picturesque landscapes and great buildings designed by Lazare Meerson in one of his last assignments. Feyder then went to Germany to make Les Gens du voyage in two versions. After this story of circus life he returned to France and made his last important film, La Loi du nord, with Michele Morgan. This story of a Mounted Police search for a murderer in the Far North still showed the Feyder quality. Shortly after its completion, France was invaded. Feyder chose to live in Switzerland during the war. He turned out a star vehicle for Françoise Rosay, Une Femme disparait, in 1941. He died in Switzerland in 1948, a year which also saw the passing of Eisenstein and Griffith.
Feyder was in the company of his peers. But in 1970 René Clair could still say "Jacques Feyder does not occupy today the place his work and his example should have earned him."

—Liam O’Leary

FINCHER, David

Films as Director:

1985 The Beat of the Live Drum
1992 Alien 3
1995 Se7en (Seven)
1997 The Game
1999 Fight Club

Other Films:

1983 Twice upon a Time (Korty, Swenson) (special photographic effects); Star Wars: Episode VI—Return of the Jedi (Marquand) (assistant cameraman: miniature and optical effects unit)
1984 Indiana Jones and the Temple of Doom (Spielberg) (matte photography); The NeverEnding Story (Die Unendliche Geschichte) (Petersen) (matte photography assistant)
1999 Being John Malkovich (Jonze) (uncredited ro as Christopher Bing)

Publications

By FINCHER: articles—

Interview in Sight and Sound (London), January 1996.
Probst, Christopher, “Playing for Keeps on The Game,” in American Cinematographer (Hollywood), vol. 78, n0. 9, September 1997.

On FINCHER: articles—

Rolling Stone, 17 October 1996.
Rolling Stone, 3 April 1997.
Smith, Gavin, article in Film Comment (New York), September-October 1999.

* * *

David Fincher is a devotee of darkness. Scene after scene in his films takes place in cramped, sparsely lit rooms where malignancy seems to hang in the air like ineradicable damp. For the shadows that pervade his films are moral and psychological no less than physical. Using darkness as a metaphor for evil and danger is hardly original—it is the entire basis of film noir, for a start—but Fincher brings to the banal equation a degree of emotional intensity that reinvigorates it. The darkness in his films is organic, the element in which his characters swim. When the Narrator in Fight Club quits his bland, Ikea-styled apartment to move into the derelict Victorian mansion where Tyler Durden lives, it’s clear that he’s coming home. This leaky ruin, squalid and underlit, is where he spiritually belongs.

On the face of it Fincher, with his dark sensibility and nervy, MTV-honed style, should have been the ideal director to take on Alien 3. It was the Alien series, after all, that had brought shadows into space, grafting the conventions of the Old-Dark-House horror movie on to a genre previously typified by brightly lit sets and gleaming, sterile surfaces. But Fincher found himself mired in a hopelessly jinxed project that had already chewed up and spat out two previous directors—not to mention a cinematographer, a small army of writers, and a lot of studio money. “I got hired for a personal vision,” he later recounted, “and was railroaded into something else. I had never been devalued or lied to or treated so badly.... I thought I’d rather die of colon cancer than do another movie.”

The experience evidently left its scars; even with three far more accomplished films to his credit, Fincher claims not to enjoy directing at all, describing it as “kind of a masochistic endeavor.” Something of this penchant for willed self-torment transfers itself to his characters, haunted as they are by their demonic alter egos to the point of possession. The actions and character of John Doe (Kevin Spacey), the sadistic serial killer in Se7en, increasingly obsess Brad Pitt’s young homicide detective until Doe is able to direct the cop’s will, using him as an instrument to complete his own murderous design. In The Game Michael Douglas’s rich banker becomes a puppet, jerked this way and that in the devious scheme devised by his scapegrace younger brother. The pattern is even there in embryo (literally) in the flawed Alien 3, with Ripley (Sigourney Weaver) impregnated by the Alien; but it reaches its logical conclusion in Fight Club, where Edward Norton’s Narrator and the dangerous, charismatic Tyler Durden (Brad Pitt again), disciple and manipulative guru, turn out to be one and the same person.

This view of people as constantly in thrall to their dark side, ever vulnerable to takeover by their worst submerged instincts, might seem intolerably bleak were it not for the sense of subversive glee that underpins Fincher’s work. Gavin Smith, writing of Fight Club (though his comments apply, to a lesser degree, to the earlier films), refers to “a mocking sense of flux and liminality in its attitudes both formally and conceptually . . . insolence towards cinematic codes and conventions concerning authenticity and the narrative representation of space and time.” Fincher plays sophisticated mind-games with his audience, taking their cine-literacy for granted and teasing them to follow him as he switches between different levels of subjective and objective reality, just as John Doe cruelly teases the detectives on his trail. At their most achieved, his films contrive to have it both ways, being at once grim metaphysical statements of the human condition and intricate ludic conundrums set in hermetically enclosed worlds. Unsettlingly pleasurable, they at once defy us to take them seriously and challenge us not to.

This kind of conceptual balancing-act requires the highest degree of precisely gauged scripting. When it’s lacking, as in John Brancato and Michael Ferris’s not-quite-cunning-enough screenplay for The Game, the movie lapses into ingenious spectator sport—diverting, but ultimately uninvolving. But at their most sublimely ambiguous, Fincher’s films can set up disquieting tensions in the viewer—as shown by the outraged reactions of certain critics to Se7en and Fight Club. Fincher talks of being “drawn to things that begin to dismantle the architecture, not of movies, but of the pact that a movie that’s responsible entertainment makes with an audience.” Such disruptive tactics are never likely to make for commercial smash-hits. But if this self-styled “malcontent and miscreant” can resist pressure to tone down the edginess and mordant humour in favour of something less disturbing, his future films—and his influence on mainstream Hollywood cinema—promise to be, at the least, highly stimulating.

—Philip Kemp

---

FLAHERTY, Robert

Nationality: American. Born: Robert Joseph Flaherty in Iron Mountain, Michigan, 16 February 1884. Education: Upper Canada College, Toronto, and Michigan College of Mines. Family: Married Frances Hubbard, 1914. Career: Explorer, surveyor, and prospector...
Robert Flaherty

Awards: International Prize, Venice Festival, for Louisiana Story, 1948.

Died: 23 July 1951.

Films as Director:

1922 Nanook of the North (+ ph, ed, sc)
1925 The Potterymaker (Story of a Potter) (short) (+ ph, sc)

1927 The Twenty-four-Dollar Island (short) (+ sc, ph)
1931 Tabu (co-d, co-sc, uncredited co-ph)
1933 Industrial Britain (co-d, co-ph); The English Potter (short) (+ ph) (edited by Marion Grierson from footage shot for Industrial Britain); The Glassmakers of England (short) (+ ph) (edited from Industrial Britain footage); Art of the English Craftsman (short) (+ ph) (from Industrial Britain footage)

1934 Man of Aran (+ sc, co-ph)
1937 Elephant Boy (co-d)
1942 The Land (+ sc, co-ph, narration)
1948 Louisiana Story (+ co-sc, co-ph, pr)
1949 The Titan (+ sc, ph)
1967 Studies for Louisiana Story (+ sc, ph) (fifteen hours of outtakes from Louisiana Story edited by Nick Cominos)

Other Films:

1945 What’s Happened to Sugar (David Flaherty) (pr)
1949 The Story of Michelangelo (co-pr)
1950 Green Mountain Land (short) (David Flaherty) (pr)
1951 St. Matthew’s Passion (ed, narration) (reedited version of Ernst Marischka’s 1949 Matthaus-Passion)

Publications

- By FLAHERTY: books—

- By FLAHERTY: articles—
  - Article on North Sea, a film by Harry Watt, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1938.
  - Interview with Theodore Strauss, in the New York Times, 12 October 1941.

- On FLAHERTY: books—

On FLAHERTY: articles—

Grierson, John, “Flaherty as Innovator,” in Sight and Sound (London), October/November 1951.

Van Dongen, Helen, “Robert J. Flaherty, 1884–1951,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1965.

Eymen, S., “Sunrise in Bora Bora,” in Film Comment (New York), vol. 26, no. 6, July-August 1990.

On FLAHERTY: films—

the Aran Islands, and the Louisiana Bayou demonstrate a more or less constant concern with people who live in natural settings. These geographical locations are incidental; others would have done just as well. Eskimo culture was the only one in which he was deeply versed. Nevertheless, the locations were chosen because they represented societies on the verge of change. Indeed, Flaherty has often been criticized for presenting his subjects as they existed years ago, not as he found them. But Flaherty saw his projects as the last opportunity to capture a way of life on film.

Another consistent feature of Flaherty’s technique was the selection of a “cast.” Although he pioneered the use of real people to re-enact their own everyday lives before the camera lens, he deliberately chose ideal types on the basis of physical appearance and even created artificial families to act before the camera.

Flaherty worked without a plot or script, allowing for a maximum of improvisation. The Flaherty method entailed total immersion in these cultures in order to discover the basic patterns of life. Nanook represented the least difficulty because of his thorough familiarity with Eskimo culture. However, Moana and Man of Aran represented unfamiliar territory. Flaherty had to become steeped in strange cultures. His search for struggle and conflict in Savaii misled him and he later abandoned it. Struggle was more readily apparent in the Aran Islands, in terms of conflict between man and the sea; the hunt for the basking shark which he portrayed, abandoned in practice some years earlier, helps the audience to visualize this conflict.

Flaherty’s technical facility also served him well. Generally he carried projectors and film printers and developing equipment to these far-off places so that he could view his rushes on a daily basis. Flaherty, a perfectionist, shot enormous quantities of footage for his films; the lack of a script or scenario contributed to this. He went to great lengths to achieve photographic excellence, often shooting when shadows were longest. In Moana he used the new panchromatic film stock, which was much more sensitive to color than orthochromatic film. He pioneered the use of long lenses for close-up work, a method that allowed him an intimacy with his subjects that was novel for its time.

Flaherty’s films were generally well received in the popular press and magazines as well as in the more serious critical literature. Nanook was praised for its authenticity and its documentary value as well as its pictorial qualities. John Grierson was the first to use the term “documentary” to describe a film when he reviewed Moana. Subsequently, Grierson, through his filmmaking activities and writings, began to formulate a documentary aesthetic dealing with social problems and public policy, subjects that Flaherty (except for The Land) tried to avoid. Nevertheless, Grierson’s writings, which were to influence the development of the modern sponsored film, had their foundations in Flaherty’s work. Their purposes were ultimately quite different, but Grierson gave due credit to Flaherty for working with real people, shaping the story from the material, and bringing a sense of drama to the documentary film.

Man of Aran aroused the most critical responses to Flaherty’s work. It was released at a time when the world was beset with enormous political, social, and economic problems, and many enthusiasts of documentary film believed it was irresponsible and archaic of Flaherty to produce a documentary that made no reference to these problems or concealed them from public view. Louisiana Story, on the other hand, was greeted as the culminating work of a master filmmaker. Recognized for its skillful interweaving of sound and image, one critic described the film as an audiovisual symphony. However, in today’s world of pollution and oil spills it is much more difficult to accept the film’s picture of the oil industry as a benign presence in the bayou.

Although Flaherty made a relatively small number of films in his long career, one would be hard pressed to find a more influential body of work. He always operated outside the mainstream of the documentary movement. Both he and Grierson, despite their contradictory purposes, can be credited with the development of a new genre and a documentary sensibility; Flaherty by his films, Grierson by his writing. Watching today’s 16mm distribution prints and video cassettes, it is often difficult to appreciate the photographic excellence of Flaherty’s work. Nevertheless, the clean lines are there, as well as an internal rhythm created by the deft editing touch of Helen Van Dongen. Although his films were improvised, the final product was never haphazard. It showed a point of view he wished to share.

—William T. Murphy

FLEMING, Victor

Nationality: American. Born: Pasadena, California, 23 February 1883. Career: Car-racing driver and chauffeur, then hired as assistant cameraman at American Film Company, 1910; began working with Allan Dwan, 1911; cameraman at Triangle, under D.W. Griffith, 1915; joined photographic section of U.S. Army Signal Corps, 1917; cameraman for Walter Wanger at Versailles Peace Conference, 1919; cameraman and director at 20th Century-Fox, 1929–1939; executive producer at United Artists, 1939–1945; president, Variety Arts, 1945–1951; president, American Society of Cinematographers, 1952.

Vicente Minnelli and Victor Fleming on the set of Reckless directed first feature, 1920; contract director for MGM, from 1932.

Awards: Oscar for Best Director, for Gone with the Wind, 1939. Died: In 1949.

Films as Director:

1919 When the Clouds Roll By (co-d) (private film featuring Douglas Fairbanks Sr., made for the Duke of Sutherland)
1920 The Mollycoddle
1921 Mamma’a Affair; Woman’s Place
1922 The Lane That Had No Turning; Red Hot Romance; Anna Ascends
1923 Dark Secrets; The Law of the Lawless; To the Last Man; The Call of the Canyon
1924 Code of the Sea; Empty Hands
1925 The Devil’s Cargo; Adventure; A Son of His Father; Lord Jim
1926 The Blind Goddess; Mantrap
1927 The Rough Riders (The Trumpet Call); The Way of All Flesh; Hula
1928 The Awakening
1929 Abie’s Irish Rose; Wolf Song; The Virginian
1930 Common Clay; Renegades
1931 Around the World with Douglas Fairbanks (Around the World in Eighty Minutes with Douglas Fairbanks) (+ role)
1932 The Wet Parade; Red Dust
1933 The White Sister; Bombshell (Blond Bombshell)
1934 Treasure Island
1935 Reckless; The Farmer Takes a Wife
1937 Captains Courageous; The Good Earth (co-d with Franklin, un credited); A Star Is Born (Wellman) (d add’l scenes)
1938 *Test Pilot; The Crowd Roars (Thorpe) (d add’l scenes); The Great Waltz (co-d with Duvivier, un credited)
1939 The Wizard of Oz; Gone with the Wind
1940 Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde (+ pr)
1942 Tortilla Flat
1943 A Guy Named Joe
1945 Adventure
1948 Joan of Arc

Other Films (incomplete listing):

1916 His Picture in the Papers (Emerson) (ph); The Habit of Happiness (Laugh and the World Laughs) (Dwan) (ph); The Good Bad Man (Passing Through) (Dwan) (ph); Betty of Greystone (Dwan) (ph); Macbeth (Emerson) (ph); Little Meena’s Romance (Powell) (ph); The Mystery of the Leap ing Fish (Emerson) (ph) (short); The Half-Breed (Dwan) (ph); An Innocent Magdalene (Dwan) (ph); A Social Secretary (Emerson) (ph); Manhattan Madness (Dwan) (ph); 50–50 (Dwan) (ph); American Aristocracy (Ingraham) (ph); The Matrimoniac (Powell) (ph); The Americano (Emerson) (ph)
1917 Down to Earth (Emerson) (ph); The Man from Painted Post (Henabery) (ph); Reaching for the Moon (Emerson) (co-ph); A Modern Musketeer (Dwan) (ph)
1919 His Majesty, the American (One of the Blood) (Henabery) (ph)

Publications

On FLEMING: books—

On FLEMING: articles—

* * *

Victor Fleming was a successful, respected director of some of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer’s biggest and most celebrated films (Red Dust, Captains Courageous, Test Pilot) as well as two undisputed Hollywood classics by the standards of popular taste, The Wizard of Oz and Gone with the Wind. Ironically, it is probably the enormous continuing popularity of the last two titles that has eclipsed Fleming’s personal reputation. Correctly perceived as producer-dominated, studio-influenced cinema, both Oz and Gone with the Wind are talked and written about extensively, but never as Victor Fleming films. They are classic examples of the complicated collaborations that took place under the old studio system. Although Fleming received directorial credit (and 1939’s Oscar as Best Director) for Gone with the Wind, others made significant contributions to the final film, among them George Cukor.

Fleming served his film apprenticeship as a cinematographer, working with such pioneers as Allan Dwan at the Flying A company and D.W. Griffith at Triangle. He photographed several Douglas Fairbanks films, among them The Americano, Wild and Woolly, and Down to Earth. He developed a skillful sense of storytelling through the camera, as well as a good eye for lighting and composition during those years. After he became a director, his critical reputation became tied to the studio at which he made the majority of his films, Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer. Known unofficially as a “producer’s studio,” MGM concentrated on showcasing its well-known stable of stars in suitable vehicles.

At Metro, Fleming was frequently thought of as a counterpart to George Cukor; Cukor was labelled a “woman’s director,” Fleming a “man’s director.” Besides being a close personal friend and favorite director of Clark Gable, Fleming was responsible for directing the Oscar-winning performance of Spencer Tracy in Captains Courageous. His flair for getting along with male stars enabled him to create an impressive group of popular films that were loved by audiences, who saw them as “Gable films” or “Tracy films.” Both Henry Fonda (whose screen debut was in Fleming’s The Farmer Takes a Wife) and Gary Cooper (whose first big screen success was in...
The Virginian) owed much of their early recognition to Fleming’s talent for directing actors. Fleming had a talent for spotting potential stars and understanding the phenomenon of the star persona. In addition to his work with male actors, he also played a key role in the career development of Jean Harlow. Under Fleming’s direction, she was encouraged to mix comedy with her sex appeal.

The Virginian, Fleming’s first sound film, is an undated movie that demonstrates a remarkable ability to overcome the problems of the early sound era, shooting both outdoors and indoors with equal fluidity and success. Fleming’s use of naturalistic sound in this film did much to influence other early films. However, Fleming’s work is not unified by a particular cinematic style, although it is coherent in thematic terms. His world is one of male camaraderie, joyous action, and lusty love for women who are not too ladylike to return the same sort of feelings. In this regard, his work is not unlike that of Howard Hawks, but Fleming lacked Hawks’ ability to refine style and content into a unified vision.

Fleming’s name is not well known today. Although he received directorial credit for what is possibly the most famous movie ever made in Hollywood (gone with the Wind), he is not remembered as its director. His work stands as an example of the best done by those director-controlled creative units that were the hallmark of the early sound era, shooting both outdoors and indoors with equal success.

Fleming was encouraged to mix comedy with her sex appeal.

—Jeanine Basinger

FLOREY, Robert

Films as Director:

1919 Heureuse Intervention (+ sc); Isidore sur le lac (+ sc); Isidore a la devenue (+ sc)
1923 Valentino en Angleterre (+ sc); 50–50 (+ sc)
1926 One Hour of Love; That Model from Paris (co-d with Gasnier, uncredited, + sc);
1927 The Romantic Age; The Cohens and the Kellys (Beaudine) (2nd unit d); Face Value; Life and Death of a Hollywood Extra (The Life and Death of 9413—A Hollywood Extra) (+ sc); Johann the Coffin Maker (+ sc); The Loves of Zero (+ sc)
1928 series of twenty-four shorts for Paramount featuring New York stage stars; Night Club; Skyscraper Symphony (+ sc, ph); The Pusher-in-the-Face; Bonjour, New York! (+ sc); The Hole in the Wall
1929 The Cocoanuts (+ co-d); The Battle of Paris (The Gay Lady); Eddie Cantor (+ sc); La Route est belle 1930 L’Amour chante (also directed German version: Komm’ zu mir Zum Enden, and Spanish version: Professor de mi Señora); Anna Christie (Brown) (d New York exteriors, uncredited)
1932 Le Blanc et le noir (co-d); The Murders in the Rue Morgue (+ sc); The Man Called Back; Those We Love; A Study in Scarlet (+ sc); The Blue Moon Murder Case; Girl Missing; Ex-lady
1933 The House on 56th Street; Bedside; Registered Nurse; Smarty (Hit Me Again)
1934 Oil for the Lamps of China (LeRoy) (d exteriors); Shanghai Orchid (d exteriors); I Sell Anything; I Am a Thief; The Woman in Red
1935 Go into Your Dance (co-d with Mayo, uncredited); The Florentine Dagger; Going Highbrow; Don’t Bet on Blondes; The Payoff; Ship Cafe; The Rose of the Rancho (Gering) (d add’l scenes, uncredited); The Preview Murder Mystery
1936 Till We Meet Again; Hollywood Boulevard (+ co-sc); Outcast
1937 The King of the Gamblers; This Way Please; Mountain Music; Daughter of Shanghai (Daughter of the Orient); Disbarred; King of Alcatraz
1938 Dangerous to Know; Hotel Imperial
1939 The Magnificent Fraud; Parole Fixer; Death of a Champion; Women without Names
1940 Meet Boston Blackie; The Face behind the Mask
1941 Two in a Taxi; Dangerously They Live; Lady Gangster
1942 The Desert Song (+ co-sc)
1943 Bomber’s Moon (co-d with Fuhr, uncredited); Roger Toulhy, Gangster (The Last Gangster); The Man from Frisco
1944 Escape in the Desert (co-d with Blatt, uncredited); God Is My Co-Pilot
1945 Danger Signal; The Beast with Five Fingers;
1947 Tarzan and the Mermaids
1948 Rogue Regiment (+ sc); Outpost in Morocco
1949 The Crooked Way; Johnny One-Eye
1950 The Vicious Years (The Gangster We Made)

Other Films:

1918 Le Cirque de la mort (Lindt) (role as le detective)
1921 L’Orpheline (serial in twelve episodes) (Feuillade) (asst d, role as an apache); Saturnin (Le Bon Allioure) (Feuillade) (asst d, role as un gazer); Monte Cristo (Flynn) (historical advisor)
1922 Robin Hood (Dwan) (French sub-titles)
1923 Wine (Gasnier) (asst d)
1924 Parisian Nights (Santell) (asst d, tech advisor); The Exquisite Sinner (von Sternberg) (asst d); Time the Comedian (Leonard) (asst d)
1925 The Masked Bride (von Sternberg) (asst d); La Boheme (King Vidor) (asst d); Escape (Rosen) (asst d); Paris (Shadows of Paris) (Goulding) (asst d, tech advisor); Dance Madness (Leonard) (asst d); Toto (Stahl) (asst d)
1926 Monte Carlo (Dreams of Monte Carlo) (Cabanne) (asst d); Bardelys the Magnificent (King Vidor) (asst d)
Robert Florey (third from right) on the set of Till We Meet Again

1926 The Magic Flame (King) (asst d)
1927 The Woman Disputed (King) (asst d)
1932 Frankenstein (Whale) (sc)
1947 Monsieur Verdoux (Chaplin) (co-assoc d)
1948 Adventures of Don Juan (Sherman) (sc under pseudonym Florian Roberts)

Publications

By FLOREY: books—

By FLOREY: articles—

From 1921 to 1926: several hundred articles for Cinémagazine (Paris); numerous articles for Parisian publications, including Pour Vous, Saint Cinéma des Prés, Ciné-Club, Le Technicien du Film, La Cinématographie Française, and Cinéma

Interview in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1988.

On FLOREY: books—

On FLOREY: articles—

* * *

It is not easy to define Robert Florey’s status in the history of the American film. As a list of his films quite clearly attests, he was not a major director, but he was certainly an interesting and intriguing one who seemed able to keep abreast with trends and changes in the methodology of filmmaking.

After working on a number of minor silent program features, Florey reached the peak of his artistic filmmaking career in the late 1920s with the production of four experimental shorts—The Life and Death of 9413—A Hollywood Extra, The Loves of Zero, Johann the Coffin Maker, and Skyscraper Symphony—that showed a skillful understanding of editing and the influence of German expressionist cinema. The best known of these shorts is A Hollywood Extra, which no longer appears to survive in its entirety, but which nonetheless illustrates Florey’s grasp of montage and satire. Florey never again returned to this form of filmmaking, but thanks to these shorts he was invited to direct a number of early talkies at Paramount. Aside from Cocoanuts, which is more Marx Brothers than Florey, these Paramount features—notably The Battle of Paris—again demonstrate that the director was not only totally cognizant of developments in the sound film but also was able to bring ingenuity and fluidity to the medium.

A crucial point in Florey’s career came in 1931 when he was asked to script and direct Frankenstein. Although some elements of the Florey screenplay are utilized, his script was basically scrapped and he was replaced as director by James Whale. Had Florey been allowed to keep the assignment, he would doubtless have become a major Hollywood director. Instead he was assigned Murders in the Rue Morgue, which, while it contains some nice atmospheric lighting effects as well as moments of surprising brutality, never achieved the cult popularity of Frankenstein. For the next twenty years Robert Florey toiled away as a reliable contract director, churning out pleasant and diverting entertainments. Even when he worked as co-director with Chaplin on Monsieur Verdoux, Florey saw his more daring directing ideas rejected by the comedian in favor of a static filmmaking style which Chaplin favored. Florey moved exclusively into television direction in 1950, and seemed very much at ease working on programs such as The Loretta Young Show, whose star and content suited his own conservative temperament.

Aside from his work as a director, Robert Florey deserves recognition as a commentator on and witness to the Hollywood scene. He loved cinema from his first involvement in his native France as an assistant to Louis Feuillade. That love led to his arrival in Hollywood in the early 1920s as a correspondent for a French film magazine. He eventually wrote eight books on the history of the cinema, all of which are exemplary works of scholarship.

—Anthony Slide

FORD, John

Nationality: American. Born: Sean Aloysius O’Feeney (or John Augustine Feeney) in Cape Elizabeth, Maine, 1 February 1895. Education: Portland High School, Maine; University of Maine, 1913 or 1914 (for three weeks).

Military Service: Lieutenant-Commander, U.S. Marine Corps, 1942–45 (wounded at Battle of Midway); in U.S. Naval Reserve, given rank of Admiral by President Nixon. Family: Married Mary McBryde Smith, 1920, one son, one daughter. Career: Joined brother Francis (director for Universal) in Hollywood, 1914; actor, stuntman and special effects man for Universal, 1914–17; assumes name “Jack Ford,” 1916; contract director for Universal, 1917–21; signed to Fox Film Corp., 1921; began collaboration with screenwriter Dudley Nichols on Men without Women, 1930; assembled film crew that became Field Photographic Branch of U.S. Office of Strategic Services, 1940. Awards: Oscar for Best Director, and Best Direction Award, New York Film Critics, for The Informer, 1935; Best Direction Award, New York Film Critics, for Stagecoach, 1939; Oscar for Best Director, for Grapes of Wrath, 1940; Oscar for Best Director and Best Direction Award, New York Film Critics, for How Green Was My Valley, 1941; Oscar for Best Documentary, for Battle of Midway, 1942; Legion of Merit and Purple Heart; Annual Award, Directors Guild of America, 1952; Grand Lion Award, Venice Festival, 1971; Lifetime Achievement Award, American Film Institute, 1973. Died: In Palm Desert, California, 31 August 1973.

Films as Director:

1917 The Tornado (+ sc, role); The Trail of Hate (may have been directed by Francis Ford); The Scrapper (+ sc, role); The Soul Herder; Cheyenne's Pol (+ story); Straight Shooting; The Secret Man; A Marked Man (+ story); Bucking Broadway
1918 The Phantom Riders; Wild Woman; Thieves' Gold; The Scarlet Drop (+ story); Hell Bent (+ co-sc); A Woman's Foot; Three Mounted Men
1919 Roped; The Fighting Brothers; A Fight for Love; By Indian Post; The Rustlers; Bare Fists; Gun Law; The Gun Packer (The Gun Pusher); Riders of Vengeance (+ co-sc); The Last Outlaw; The Outcasts of Poker Flat; The Ace of the Saddle; The Rider of the Law; A Gun Fighting Gentleman (+ co-story); Marked Men
1920 The Prince of Avenue A; The Girl in Number 29; Hitchin' Posts; Just Pals; The Big Punch (+ co-sc)
1921 The Freeze Out; Desperate Trails; Action; Sure Fire; Jackie
1922 The Wallop; Little Miss Smiles; The Village Blacksmith; Silver Wings (Carewe) (d prologue only)
1923 The Face on the Barroom Floor; Three Jumps Ahead (+ sc); Cameo Kirby; North of Hudson Bay; Hoodman Blind
1924 The Iron Horse; Hearts of Oak
1925 Lightnin'; Kentucky Pride; The Fighting Heart; Thank You
1926 The Shamrock Handicap; Three Bad Men; The Blue Eagle
1927 Upstream
1928 Mother Machree; Four Sons; Hangman's House; Napoleon's Barber; Riley the Cop
1929 Strong Boy; Salute; The Black Watch
1930 Men without Women (+ co-story); Born Reckless; Up the River (+ co-sc, uncredited)
1931 Seas Beneath; The Brat; Arrowsmith; Flesh
1933 Pilgrimage; Dr. Bull
1934 The Lost Patrol; The World Moves On; Judge Priest
1935 The Whole Town's Talking; The Informer; Steamboat round the Bend
1936 The Prisoner of Shark Island; Mary of Scotland; The Plough and the Stars
1937 Wee Willie Winkie; The Hurricane
1938 Four Men and a Prayer; Submarine Patrol
1939 Stagecoach; Drums along the Mohawk; Young Mr. Lincoln
1940 The Grapes of Wrath; The Long Voyage Home
1941 Tobacco Road; Sex Hygiene; How Green Was My Valley
1942 The Battle of Midway (+ co-ph); Torpedo Squadron
1943 December Seventh (co-d); We Sail at Midnight
1945 They Were Expendable
1946 My Darling Clementine
1947 The Fugitive (+ co-pr)
1948 Fort Apache (+ co-pr); Three Godfathers (+ co-pr)
1949 She Wore a Yellow Ribbon (+ co-pr)
1950 When Willie Comes Marching Home; Wagonmaster (+ co-pr); Rio Grande (+ co-pr)
1951 This Is Korea!
1952 What Price Glory; The Quiet Man (+ co-pr)
1953 The Sun Shines Bright; Mogambo
1955 The Long Gray Line; Mister Roberts (co-d); “Rookie of the Year” (episode for Screen Directors Playhouse TV series); “The Bamboo Cross” (episode for Fireside Theater TV series)

Other Films:

1914 Lucille Love, the Girl of Mystery (fifteen-episode serial) (Francis Ford) (role); The Mysterious Rose (Francis Ford) (role)
1915 The Birth of a Nation (Griffith) (role); Three Bad Men and a Girl (Francis Ford) (role); The Hidden City (Francis Ford) (role); The Doorway of Destruction (Francis Ford) (asst d, role); The Broken Coin (twenty-two-episode serial) (Francis Ford) (role)
1916 The Lumber Yard Gang (Francis Ford) (role); Peg o’ the Ring (fifteen-episode serial) (Francis Ford and Jacques Jaccard) (role); Chicken-hearted Jim (Francis Ford) (role); The Bandit’s Wager (Francis Ford) (role)
1929 Big Time (Kenneth Hawks) (role as himself)
1970 Vietnam! Vietnam! (Beck, for USIA) (exec pr)

Publications

By FORD: books—

By FORD: articles—

Interview with Jean Mitry, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1967.

On FORD: books—

McBride, Joseph, and Michael Wilmington, On FORD: books—

On FORD: articles—

Beresford, Bruce, “Decline of a Master,” in Film (London), Autumn 1969.

“John Ford Issue” of Focus on Film (London), Spring 1971.

“Special Issue Devoted to John Ford and His Towering Achievement, Stagecoach,” in Action (Los Angeles), September/October 1971.

Editors of Cahiers du Cinéma, “John Ford’s Young Mr. Lincoln,” in Screen (London), Autumn 1972.

Rubin, M., “Ford and Mr. Rogers,” in Film Comment (New York), January/February 1974.

Dempsey, M., “John Ford: A Reassessment,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1975.

Stowell, H.P., “John Ford’s Literary Sources: From Realism to Romance,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Spring 1977.

“John Ford Section” of Casablanca (Madrid), January 1983.

Nolley, Ken, “Reconsidering Ford’s Military Trilogy,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), April 1986.

Gallagher, Tag, “John Ford’s Indians,” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1993.

On FORD: films—

* * *

John Ford has no peers in the annals of cinema. This is not to place him above criticism, merely above comparison. His faults were unique, as was his art, which he pursued with a single-minded and single-hearted stubbornness for sixty years and 112 films. Ford grew up with the American cinema. That he should have begun his career as an extra in the Ku Klux Klan sequences of The Birth of a Nation and ended it supervising the documentary Vietnam! Vietnam! conveys the remarkable breadth of his contribution to film, and the narrowness of its concerns.

Ford’s subject was his life and his times. Immigrant, Catholic, Republican, he spoke for the generations that created the modern United States between the Civil and Great Wars. Like Walt Whitman, Ford chronicled the society of that half century, expansionist by design, mystical and religious by conviction, hierarchical by agreement; an association of equals within a structure of command, with practical, patriotic, and devout qualities. Ford portrayed the society Whitman celebrated as “something in the doings of man that corresponds with the broadcast doings of night and day.”

Mythologizing the armed services and the church as paradigms of structural integrity, Ford adapts their rules to his private world. All may speak in Ford’s films, but when divine order is invoked, the faithful fall silent, to fight and die as decreed by a general, a president, or some other member of a God-appointed elite.

In Ford’s hierarchy, Native and African Americans share the lowest rung, women the next. Businessmen, uniformly corrupt in his world, hover below the honest and unimaginative citizenry of the United States. Above them are Ford’s elite, within which members of the armed forces occupy a privileged position. In authority over them is an officer class of career military men and priests, culminating in the retiring Nathan Brittles in She Wore a Yellow Ribbon, and outgoing mayor Frank Skeffington in The Last Hurrah all face the decline in their powers with a moral strength drawn from a belief in the essential order of their lives. Mary goes triumphantly to the scaffold, affirming Catholicism and the divine right of kings. Duty to his companions of the 7th Cavalry transcending all, Brittles returns to rejoin them in danger. Skeffington prefers to lose rather than succumb to modern vote-getting devices such as television. “I make westerns,” Ford announced on one well-publicized occasion. Like most of his generalizations, it was untrue. Only a third of his films are westerns, and of those a number are rural comedies with perfunctory frontier settings: Doctor Bull, Judge Priest, Steamboat Round the Bend, The Sun Shines Bright. Many of his family films, like Four Men and a Prayer and Pilgrimage, belong with the stories of military life, of which he made a score. A disciple of the U.S. Navy, from which he retired with the emeritus rank of Rear Admiral, Ford found in its command structure a perfect metaphor for moral order. In They Were Expendable, he chose to falsify every fact of the Pacific War to celebrate the moral superiority of men trained in its rigid disciplines—men who obey, affirm, keep faith.

Acts, not words, convey the truths of men’s lives; public affirmations of this dictum dominate Ford’s films. Dances and fights signify in their vigor a powerful sense of community; singing and eating and getting drunk together are the great acts of Fordian union. A film like The Searchers, perhaps his masterpiece, makes clear its care for family life and tradition in a series of significant actions that need no words. Ward Bond turns away from the revelation of a woman’s love for her brother-in-law, exposed in his reverent handling of his cloak; his turn away is the instinctive act of a natural gentleman. Barred from the family life which his anger and independence make alien to his character, John Wayne clutches his arm in a gesture borrowed from Ford’s first star, Harry Carey; in a memorable final image, the door closes on him, a symbol of the rejection of the eternal clan-less wanderer.

Ford spent his filmmaking years in a cloud of critical misunderstanding, with each new film unfavorably compared to earlier works. The Iron Horse established him as an epic westerner in the mold of Raoul Walsh, The Informer as a Langian master of expressionism, the cavalry pictures as Honest John Ford, a New England primitive whose work, in Lindsay Anderson’s words, was “unsophisticated and direct.” When, in his last decades of work, he returned to reexamine earlier films in a series of revealing remakes, the skeptical saw not a moving reiteration of values but a decline into self-plagiarism. Yet it is The Man Who Shot Liberty Valance, in which he deals with the issues raised in Stagecoach, showing his beloved populist west destroyed by law and literacy, that stands today among his most important films.

Belligerent, grandiose, deceitful, and arrogant in real life, Ford seldom let these traits spill over into his films. They express at their best a guarded serenity, a skeptical satisfaction in the beauty of the American landscape, muted always by an understanding of the dangers implicit in the land, and a sense of the responsibility of all men to protect the common heritage. In every Ford film there is a gun behind the door, a conviction behind the joke, a challenge in every toast. Ford belongs in the tradition of American narrative art where telling a story and drawing a moral are twin aspects of public utterance. He saw that we live in history, and that history embodies lessons we must learn. When Fordian man speaks, the audience is meant to listen—and listen all the harder for the restraint and circumspection of the man who speaks. One hears the authentic Fordian voice nowhere more powerfully than in Ward Bond’s preamble to the celebrating enlisted men in They Were Expendable as they to toast the retirement of a comrade. "I'm not going to make a speech," he states. "I've just got something to say."

—John Baxter

FORMAN, Milos

Nationality: Czech. Born: Kaslov, Czechoslovakia, 18 February 1932, became U.S. citizen, 1975. Education: Academy of Music and Dramatic Art, Prague, and at Film Academy (FAMU), Prague, 1951–56. Family: Married 1) Jana Brejchová, 1951 (divorced, 1956); 2) Vera Kresadlova, 1964 (divorced), two sons (twins), Matej and Petr; 3) Martina Zborilova, 28 November 1999, two sons (twins), Andrew and James (b. 1998). Career: Collaborated on screenplay for Frič’s Leave It to Me, 1956; theatre director for Laterna Magika, Prague, 1958–62; directed first feature, Black Peter, 1963; moved to New York, 1969, after collapse of Dubcek government in Czechoslovakia; co-director of Columbia University Film Division, from 1975. Awards: Czechoslovak Film Critics’ Prize, for Black Peter, 1963; Grand Prix Locarno, for Black Peter, 1964; Czechoslovak State Prize, 1967; Grand Prize of the Jury, Cannes Film Festival, for Taking Off, 1971 (tied with Johnny Got His Gun); Oscar for Best Director, and Best Director Award, Directors Guild of America, and Silver Ribbon Award, Italian National Syndicate of Film Journalists, for One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest, 1975; Oscar for Best Director, for Amadeus, 1984; Golden Globe (USA) and Cesar (France) for Best Foreign Film, and Silver Ribbon, Italian National Syndicate of Film Journalists, for Best Director, Foreign Film, for Amadeus, 1985; Golden Globe for Best Director, for The People vs. Larry Flynt, 1997; Outstanding European Achievement in World Cinema, European Film Awards, for The People vs. Larry Flynt, 1997 Golden Berlin Bear, Berlin International Film Festival, for The People vs Larry Flynt, 1997; Special Prize for Outstanding Contribution to World Cinema, Karlovy Vary International Film Festival, 1997; Silver Berlin Bear, Berlin International Film Festival, for Man on the Moon, 2000; Lifetime Achievement Award, Palm Springs International Film Festival, 2000. Agent: Robert Lantz, 888 Seventh Ave., New York, NY 10106, U.S.A. Address: Milos Forman, The Hampshire House, 150 Central Park South, New York, NY10019, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1963 Černý Petr (Black Peter; Peter and Pavla); (+ co-sc); Konkurs (Talent Competition) (+ co-sc)
1965 Lásky jedné plavovlásky (Loves of a Blonde) (+ co-sc); Dobrě placená procházka (A Well–Paid Stroll) (+ co-sc)
1967 Hoří, má panenko (The Firemen’s Ball) (+ co-sc)
1970 Taking Off (+ co-sc)
1972 ‘‘Decathlon’’ segment of Visions of Eight (+ co-sc)
1975 One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest
1979 Hair
1981 Ragtime
1983 Amadeus
1989 Valmont
1996 People vs. Larry Flynt
1999 The Little Black Book; Man on the Moon

Other Films:

1955 Nechte to na mně (Leave It to Me) (Frič) (+ co-sc); Dědeček automobil (Old Man Motorcar) (Radok) (asst d, role)
1957 Stěnata (The Puppies) (+ co-sc)
1962 Tam za lesem (Beyond the Forest) (Blumenfeld) (asst d, role as the physician)
1968 La Pire à ongles (Carrière) (+ co-sc)
1975 Le Mâle du siècle (Berri) (story)
1986 Heartburn (Nichols) (role)
1989 New Year’s Day (Jaglom) (role)
1990 Dreams of Love (pr)
1991 Why Havel? (Jasny) (narrator)
1992 L’Envers du décor: Portrait de Pierre Guffroy (Salis) (role)
1995 Heavy (Mangold) (misc. crew)
1996 Who Is Henry Jaglom? (Rubin and Workman) (role, as Himself)
1997 Cannesples 400 coups (Nadeau—for TV) (role, as Himself)
1998 V centru filmu—v temple domova (Jancek and Marek—for TV) (role, as Himself)
2000 Way Past Cool (Davidson) (pr); Keeping the Faith (Norton) (role)
Publications

By FORMAN: books—

By FORMAN: articles—

Interview with Galina Kopaněvová, in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 8, 1968.
“Getting the Great Ten Percent,” an interview with Harriet Polt, in Film Comment (New York), Fall 1970.
Interview in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1972.
Interview with T. McCarthy, in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1979.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), July/August 1979.
Interview in Films (London), March 1985.
Interview with T.J. Slater, in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring/Summer and Fall 1985.
Interview with Rachel Abramowitz, in Premiere (Boulder), January 2000.
Interview with Ian Spelling, “‘Hello, My Name Is Andy and This Is My Feature,’” in Film Review (London), March 2000.

On FORMAN: books—

On FORMAN: articles—

Bor, Vladimír, “Formanovský film a nektéré předsudky” [‘‘The Formanesque Film and Some Prejudices’’], in Film a Doba (Prague), no. 1, 1967.
Quart, Leonard, and Barbara Quart, “Ragtime without a Melody,” in Literature-Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 10, no. 2, 1982.
Warchol, T., “The Rebel Figure in Milos Forman’s American Films,” in New Orleans Review, 1990.
Newman, Kim, review of People vs. Larry Flynt in Empire (London), May 1997.

On FORMAN: film—

* * *

In the context of Czechoslovak cinema in the early 1960s, Milos Forman’s first films (Black Peter and Talent Competition) amounted to a revolution. Influenced by Czech novelists who revolted against the establishment’s aesthetic dogmas in the late 1950s rather than by Western cinema (though the mark of late neorealism, in particular Ermanno Olmi, is visible), Forman introduced to the cinema after 1948 (the year of the Communist coup) portrayals of working-class life untainted by the formulae of socialist realism.

Though Forman was fiercely attacked by Stalinist reviewers initially, the more liberal faction of the Communist Party, then in ascendancy, appropriated Forman’s movies as expressions of the new concept of ‘socialist’ art. Together with great box office success and an excellent reputation gained at international festivals, these circumstances transformed Forman into the undisputed star of the Czech New Wave. His style was characterized by a sensitive use of non-actors (usually coupled with professionals); refreshing, natural-sounding, semi-improvised dialogue that reflected Forman’s intimate knowledge of the milieu he was capturing on the screen; and an unerring ear for the nuances of Czech folk-rock and music in general.

All these characteristic features of Forman’s first two films are even more prominent in Loves of a Blonde, and especially in The Firemen’s Ball. The latter film works equally well on one level as a realistic, humorous story and on an allegorical level that points to the aftermath of the Communist Party’s decision to reveal some of the political crimes committed in the 1950s (the Slánský trial). In all these films—developed, except for Black Peter, from Forman’s original ideas—he closely collaborated with scriptwriters Ivan Passer and Jaroslav Papousek, who later became directors in their own right.

Shortly after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968, The Firemen’s Ball was banned and Forman decided to remain in the West, where he was working on the script for what was to become the only film in which he would apply the principles of his aesthetic method and vision to indigenous American material, Taking Off. It is also his only American movie developed from his original idea; the rest are either adaptations or based on real events.

Traces of the pre-American Forman are easily recognizable in his most successful U.S. film, One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest, which radically changed Ken Kesey’s story and—just as in the case of Papousek’s novel Black Peter—brought it close to the director’s own objective and comical vision. The work received an Oscar in 1975. In that year Forman became an American citizen.

The Forman touch is much less evident in his reworking of the musical Hair, and almost—though not entirely—absent from his version of E.L. Doctorow’s novel Ragtime. The same is true of the box-office smash hit and multiple Oscar winner Amadeus, and his later adaptation, Valmont. Of marginal importance are the two remaining parts of Forman’s oeuvre, The Well-Paid Stroll, a jazz opera adapted from the stage for Prague TV, and Decathlon, his contribution to the 1972 Olympic documentary Visions of Eight. Forman is a merciless observer of the comedie humaine and has often been accused of cynicism, both in Czechoslovakia and in the West. To such criticisms he answers with the words of Chekhov, pointing out that what is cruel in the first place is life itself. But apart from such arguments, the rich texture of acutely observed life and the sensitive portrayal of and apparent sympathy for people as victims—often ridiculous—of circumstances over which they wield no power, render such critical statements null and void. Forman’s vision is deeply rooted in the anti-ideological, realistic, and humanist tradition of such “cynics” of Czech literature as Jaroslav Hasek (The Good Soldier Svejk), Bohumil Hrabal (Closely Watched Trains), and Josef Skvorecký (whose novel The Cowards Forman was prevented from filming by the invasion of 1968).

Although the influence of Forman’s filmmaking methods may be felt even in some North American films, his lasting importance will, very probably, rest with his three Czech movies. Taking Off, a valiant attempt to show America to Americans through the eyes of a sensitive, if caustic, foreign observer, should be added to this list as well. After the mixed reception of this film, however, Forman turned to adaptations of best sellers and stage hits.

In the early 1990s Forman was inactive as a director, with a gap of almost seven years between Valmont and People vs. Larry Flynt. Valmont attempted to capture the spirit of his smash hit Amadeus but suffers in the comparison. Moreover, it was released after Stephen Frears’ superior Dangerous Liaisons, adapted from the same Choderlos de Laclos novel. Forman remains an outstanding craftsman and a first-class actors’ director; however, in the context of American cinema he does not represent the innovative force he was in Prague.

Nevertheless, in the late 1990s he has returned to something like his earlier form with the somewhat idealistic People vs. Larry Flynt, the story of a pornographer’s efforts to keep his magazine on the newsstands in a fight for freedom of speech. The more melancholy Man on the Moon is a biographical film about the comedian Andy Kaufman, who died of cancer aged thirty-five, after a turbulent career that saw him first lauded and then dumped by TV networks nervous about his erratic style. Both films have re-established Forman as an arch commentator on American popular culture.

Besides filmmaking, Forman has also been involved in the academic world in recent years, accepting a position as professor of film and co-chair of the film division at Columbia University’s School of the Arts. He also appeared onscreen in several small roles, such as Catherine O’Hara’s husband in Mike Nichols’ Heartburn, in which he was reunited with his One Flew over the Cuckoo’s Nest star, Jack Nicholson, and, oddly enough, as an apartment house janitor in Henry Jaglom’s New Year’s Day. He has appeared as himself in several documentaries.

—Josef Skvorecký, updated by Rob Edelman and Chris Routledge

FORST, Willi

Films as Director:

1933 Leise flehen meine Lieder (The Unfinished Symphony) (+ sc with Walter Reisch)
1934 The Unfinished Symphony (with Anthony Asquith) (+ sc with Benn W. Levy); Maskerade (Maskerade in Vienna) (+ sc with Walter Reisch)
1935 Mazurka (+ ro)
1936 Allotria (+ sc with Jochen Huth); Burgtheater (Vienna Burgtheater) (+ sc with Jochen Huth, pr)
1937 Serenade (+ sc with Curt J. Braun, pr)
1939 Bel Ami (+ sc with Axel Eggebrecht, pr, ro as “Bel Ami” Georges Duroy); Ich bin Sebastian Ot (I Am Sebastian Ott) (with Viktor Becker) (+ pr, ro as Sebastian Ott/Ludwig Ott)
1940 Operette (+ sc with Axel Eggebrecht, pr, ro as Franz Jauner)
1942 Wiener Blut (Vienna Blood) (+ sc, pr, ro as director)
1943 Frauen sind keine Engel (Women Are No Angels) (+ pr)
1944/49 Wiener Mädel (Viennese Maidens) (+ sc with Franz Gribitz, pr, ro as Carl Michael Zieher)
1951 Die Sünderin (The Sinner); Es geschehen noch Wunder (Miracles Still Happen) (+ sc with Johannes Mario Simmel, pr, ro as Bobby Sanders)
1952 Im Weißen Rößl (The White Horse Inn)
1954 Dieses Lied bleibt bei Dir (Kabarett; This Song Remains with You; Cabaret) (+ sc with Johannes Mario Simmel)
1956 Kaiserjäger (Imperial Infantry); Le chemin du paradis (The Way to Paradise)
1957 Die unentschuldigte Stunde (The Unexcused Hour) (+ sc with Kurt Nachmann); Wien—du Stadt meiner Träume (Vienna, City of my Dreams) (+ sc with Kurt Nachmann)

Films as Actor:

Silent Films:

1920 Der Wegweiser (The Road Sign) (Kottow)
1922 Sodom und Gomorrha (The Queen of Sin) (Kertész) (as extra); Oh du lieber Augustin (Dear Augustin) (Breslauer)
1923 Lieb’ mich und die Welt ist mein (Love Me and the World Is Mine) (Breslauer)
1924 Strandgut (Driftwood) (Breslauer)
1927 Die drei Niemandskinder (The Three Children of Nobody) (Freisler); Die elf Teufel (The Eleven Devils) (Zoltan Korda); Café Electric (Ucicky) (as Ferdl)
1928 Amor auf Ski (Love on Skis) (Randolf); Ein besserer Herr (A Distinguished Gentleman) (Ucicky); Die lustigen Vagabunden (The Merry Vagabonds) (Fleck); Die blau Mause (The Blue Mouse) (Guter); Unfug der Liebe (Mischief of Love) (Wiene); Lieb’ mich und die Welt ist mein (Love Me and the World Is Mine) (Breslauer)
1929 Die weissen Rosen von Ravensberg (The White Roses of Ravensberg) (Meinert); Fräulein Fährbrich (Miss Ensign) (Sauer); Der Häftling aus Stambul (The Prisoner from Stambul) (Ucicky); Gefahren der Brautzeit/Liebesnächte (Dangers of the Engagement) (Sauer) (as Baron van Geldern). Sound Films:

1929 Atlantic (Dupont) (as Poldi); Katharina Knie (Grune)
1930 Ein Burschenlied aus Heidelberg (A Student’s Song from Heidelberg) (Hartl); Zwei Herzen im Dreivierteltakt (Two Hearts in Waltz Time) (von Bolvary); Ein Tango für Dich (A Tango for You) (von Bolvary); Das Lied ist aus (The Song Is Ended) (von Bolvary) (as Ulrich Weidenau); Der Herr auf Bestellung (The Callboy) (von Bolvary); Die lustigen Weiber von Wien (The Merry Wives of Vienna) (von Bolvary); Petit officier . . . Adieu! (von Bolvary)
1931 Der Raub der Mona Lisa (The Theft of the Mona Lisa) (von Bolvary) (as Vicenzo Peruggia); Peter Voss, der Millionendieb (Peter Voss Who Stole Millions) (Dupont)
1932 Der Prinz von Arcadia (The Prince of Arcadia) (Hartl); Ein blonder Traum (A Blonde Dream; Happy Ever After) (Martin) (as Willy II); So ein Mädel vergisst man nicht (Such a Girl Is Unforgettable) (Kortner); Brennendes Geheimnis (The Burning Secret) (Siodmak)
1933 Ihre Durchlaucht, die Verkäuferin (Her Highness the Salesgirl) (Hartl); Ich kenn’ Dich nicht und liebe Dich (I Don’t Know You but I Love You) (von Bolvary)
1934 So endete eine Liebe (Thus Ended a Love) (Hartl)
1935 Königswalzer (The Royal Waltz) (Maisch) (as Ferdinand)
1938 Es leuchten die Sterne (The Stars Shine) (Zerlett) (cameo as himself)
1944 Ein Blick zurück (A Look Back) (Menzel) (cameo)
1948 Leckerbissen (Tidbits) (Malbran)
1950 Herrliche Zeiten (Wonderful Times) (Neumann/Ode)
Other Films:

1937  Capriolen (Gründgens) (sc with Jochen Huth, pr)
1944  Handstage (Dog Days) (von Cziffra) (pr)
1947  Der Hofrat Geiger (Privy Counselor Geiger) (Wolff) (pr)
1948  Die Frau am Wege (The Woman by the Road) (von Borsody) (pr); Das Kuckuckssei (The Cuckoo’s Egg) (Firner) (pr)
1949  Die Stimme Österreichs (The Voice of Austria) (doc) (Langbein) (pr)
1952  Alle kann ich nicht heiraten (I Can’t Marry Them All) (Wolff) (sc)

Publications

By FORST: articles—

‘‘Mein Filmschaffen,’’ excerpt from the radio program Radio-Universität, Radio Vienna, Filmarchiv Austria.

Willi Forst, ‘‘Filme kann man nur mit Freunden machen,’’ in Die Filmwoche, no. 16, 20 April 1932.

On FORST: books—

Bab, Julius, Schauspieler und Schauspielkunst, Berlin, 1926.

Willi Forst in Bild und Ton, Berlin, 1941.

Gesek, Ludwig, Gestalter der Filmkunst: Von Asta Nielsen bis Walt Disney, Vienna, 1948.
Kramer, Thomas, and Martin Prucha, Film im Lauf der Zeit. 100 Jahre Kino in Deutschland, Österreich, und der Schweiz, Vienna, 1994.
Fritz, Walter, Im Kino erlebe ich die Welt: 100 Jahre Kino und Film in Österreich, Vienna, 1997.
Steiner, Gertraud, Traumfabrik Rosenhügel, Vienna, 1997.

On FORST: articles—
Haider-Pregler, Hilde, “. . . Das Theater hört nie auf. Willi Forsts Film vom Burgtheater,” in Modern Austrian Literature (Riverside, California), vol. 32, no. 4, 1999.

Willi Forst to date is the greatest talent in Austrian film history, with the possible exception of Billy Wilder, who had to emigrate. He was born in 1903 into the Viennese lower middle class; his father earned his living in the Biedermeier sounding profession of porcelain painter. The young Forst did not attend school any longer than was required—his ambition was a career on the stage. At the age of 16 he began acting in the provincial theaters of the former Austrian monarchy, until in 1925 he could make the leap to the operetta stages of Vienna and Berlin. The experience gained in these early years provided him with a sound knowledge of the theatrical effects that pleased audiences.

Forst could be found in the crowd of thousands in Kolowrat’s monumental film Sodom and Gomorrha (1922), and it was the flamboyant “film count” Sascha Kolowrat himself who discovered Willi Forst at the Apollotheater in Vienna and gave him his first “near” leading role in Café Elektric (1927) as the petty thief “Polli” opposite the then equally unknown Marlene Dietrich. But Kolowrat died in the same year, and, like all of the enterprising talents from Vienna, Forst migrated to the film metropolis Berlin, where the opportunities were greater. Here he became a popular film actor playing in numerous films with most of the important directors, among others, Gustav Ucicky, Karl Hartl, and Geza von Bolvary, who, like Forst, had come from Kolowrat’s Sascha-Film to Berlin after the death of the count. His breakthrough to stardom came with Atlantic (1929), an early “Titanic” film, where he sings in a whiny voice on the sinking ship, “Es wird ein Wein sein und wir werden nimmer sein” (“There Will Still Be Wine When We Are Gone”), a foreshadowing of his later style: a lot of sentiment, always bordering on kitsch. But, as it happens, life itself is often kitschy enough. His career blossomed with the transition from silent to sound film. Now he could charm his way into women’s hearts not only by flattery and their kissing hands, but also by the erotic, velvet timbre of his voice, singing of flirtation, love, and pain, always with a core of truth in the words.

A major success in Germany was Ein blonder Traum (1931) with Lilian Harvey, the fragile female leading star, actress, dancer, and singer of the early thirties in Germany. Willi Forst and Willy Fritsch compete for her favors; contrary to the usual pattern Willi Forst does not get the girl but is consoled with a Hollywood contract.

Now an acknowledged film star, Forst returned to his beloved Vienna to make his debut as a director. Together with Walter Reisch, an Austrian scriptwriter in Berlin who had tailored nearly all of Willi Forst’s German roles for him, Forst coauthored the screenplay for the Schubert film Leise flehen meine Lieder (1933). Thus was the “Viennese film” born, with its inimitable blend of music and action. The film was romantic, but Forst did not dwell on a sugary Biedermeier image, but also showed the poor living conditions and class barriers. In 1934 he produced and directed the big production, Maskerade (1934), the film which launched Paula Wessely on her way to film stardom and Hans Moser as comic. This social comedy set in turn-of-the-century Vienna featured the big ball scenes of which Willi Forst became the unsurpassed master, and a frivolous love story ending very conservatively: the famous painter (Adolf Wohlbrück) chooses the plain, wholesome poor girl (Paula Wessely), thus reflecting the contemporary ideological attitude toward women in the Austrian corporate state. Beginning with this big success Forst as actor, director, screenwriter, and producer dominated the Austrian filmmaking scene for the next fifteen years. In life as in film, he was the quintessential elegant Viennese gentleman. As a film maker he aimed at perfection.

In 1936 he founded his Forst-Film company in Vienna, with headquarters in the elegant Philippof next to the Opera House. In the meantime he had also acquired a large estate in the 14th district, half way between the two main studios in Austria, Sievering and Rosenhügel. In Bel Ami (1938), in which he also played the main role, he created his “trademark” protagonist: the gallant ladies’ man, charming, but no hero. Nazi bureaucrat Goebbels regarded Forst with suspicion but tolerated him because of his box office hits. When the Austrian film industry was unified by the Nazis at the end of 1938 into “Wien-Film,” Forst was allowed to keep his own company, which produced films exclusively for “Wien-Film.” Forst, granted lavish production budgets, was able to create his greatest films. Although his films had to fit into the concept of the propaganda ministry, he never made a political film. Goebbels wanted high-quality, entertaining films to distract people from the war. Forst turned to the past for his topics to avoid any political statements, and one can find a subtle form of resistance in the nuances he used to remind people of Austria. The Vienna Trilogy is Forst’s outstanding contribution from the war years: Operette (1940), Wiener Blut (1942), and finally Wiener Mädels (1944/49). Forst dragged out the filming to save his large cast and crew from being sent to the front and only finished in 1949. Goebbels wanted him to play the anti-Semitic role of “Jud Süss,” but Forst escaped this threat. He was not seduced, as were colleagues such as Gustav Ucicky and Paula Wessely, into making political films for the rich financial reward they brought. Forst is the proof that one could remain decent even in those years. Curd Jürgens, whom Forst had discovered in Germany and included in several of his films, remembered that Forst always warned him never to become involved in a political film, for they would all have to account for their actions at a later time.

Ironically, after the war, Willi Forst would never resume his leading position in the film industry. He had to liquidate his company in 1950 and never really found his line again. He was used to unlimited budgets, but the funding for cinema after the war was meager. One film he made in Germany, Die Sünderin (1951), starring Hildegard Knef, created a gigantic scandal started by the church. A woman becomes a prostitute to earn the money for an operation for the man she loves; in addition, she is seen for a fraction of a second in the nude, as her boyfriend is a painter. At the end she kills him to spare him pain and takes her own life.

His very last film, Wien—Du Stadt meiner Träume (1957), a title that could also serve as his life’s motto, is set neither in the past nor the present. Forst recognized that he was out of phase with the time and withdrew entirely from the film business. He also sold his Viennese estate and lived in Brissago (Tessin, Switzerland) overlooking Lake Maggiore. Considering his importance to film, Willi Forst is not well enough known today.

—Gertraud Steiner Daviau

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>That Sinking Feeling</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>Gregory’s Girl</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Local Hero</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Comfort and Joy</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Housekeeping (Sylvie’s Ark)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Breaking In</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>Rebecca’s Daughter</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1994</td>
<td>Being Human</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999</td>
<td>Gregory’s Two Girls</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By FORSYTH: articles—

Interview in Sight and Sound (London), Autumn 1981.

Interview with Graham Fuller, in Listener (London), 19 November 1987.

Interview in Films and Filming (London), December 1987.

On FORSYTH: books—

Hardy, Forsyth, Scotland in Film, Edinburgh, 1990.

On FORSYTH: articles—

Films Illustrated (London), August 1981.

Malcomson, S.L., “Modernism Comes to the Cabbage Patch,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1985.

---

FORSYTH, Bill

Nationality: Scottish. Born: Glasgow, 1947. Education: Studied at National Film School, Beaconsfield, Bucks., for three months, 1971. Family: One son, one daughter. Career: Left school at age sixteen and worked for documentary filmmaker Stanley Russell; set up Tree Films with Charles Gormley, 1972; producer of documentaries, 1970s; began working with Glasgow Youth Theatre, 1977; directed first feature, That Sinking Feeling, 1979. Awards: British Academy Award for Best Screenplay, for Gregory’s Girl, 1981; BAFTA Award for Best Screenplay, 1983; Honorary Doctorate, University of Glasgow, 1983.
For a while during the early 1980s Scottish cinema was virtually synonymous with Bill Forsyth. Today his work remains among the most original and distinctive to have emerged not only from Scotland but from Britain as a whole. The Forsyth oeuvre is rooted in a gentle and extremely charming offbeat view of the world which has affinities with a variety of comic traditions including Ealing comedy, Frank Capra, Jacques Tati, and Ermanno Olmi (Il Posto is practically a blueprint in tone and feel of Gregory’s Girl), but which maintains its own individuality and character. Forsyth’s choice of comedy as his mode of expression was partly dictated by the fact that his first two films were made on tiny budgets. In characteristically modest fashion he regarded comedy as more appropriate, being less self-indulgent and more fun to do for everyone involved. Crucially, the comic character of these films gave them a vitality which helped them transcend their budgetary limitations and, in the case of Gregory’s Girl, find a sizable audience outside Scotland. Forsyth’s charm lies in his attention to detail, particularly the various quirks and idiosyncrasies of his characters, which are conveyed equally effectively through both image and dialogue. These characters are often marginalised individuals caught up in circumstances they are ill equipped to deal with. Forsyth finds a great deal of humour in their predicaments but he does so in a wry and generous manner which is never at the expense of the characters. Instead, his approach amounts to a celebration of the human spirit with all its foibles and shortcomings.

For a while during the early 1980s Scottish cinema was virtually synonymous with Bill Forsyth. Today his work remains among the most original and distinctive to have emerged not only from Scotland but from Britain as a whole. The Forsyth oeuvre is rooted in a gentle and extremely charming offbeat view of the world which has affinities with a variety of comic traditions including Ealing comedy, Frank Capra, Jacques Tati, and Ermanno Olmi (Il Posto is practically a blueprint in tone and feel of Gregory’s Girl), but which maintains its own individuality and character. Forsyth’s choice of comedy as his mode of expression was partly dictated by the fact that his first two films were made on tiny budgets. In characteristically modest fashion he regarded comedy as more appropriate, being less self-indulgent and more fun to do for everyone involved. Crucially, the comic character of these films gave them a vitality which helped them transcend their budgetary limitations and, in the case of Gregory’s Girl, find a sizable audience outside Scotland. Forsyth’s charm lies in his attention to detail, particularly the various quirks and idiosyncrasies of his characters, which are conveyed equally effectively through both image and dialogue. These characters are often marginalised individuals caught up in circumstances they are ill equipped to deal with. Forsyth finds a great deal of humour in their predicaments but he does so in a wry and generous manner which is never at the expense of the characters. Instead, his approach amounts to a celebration of the human spirit with all its foibles and shortcomings.

Forsyth’s acute perception of human behaviour gives his films a depth which transcends their initial charm as quirky comedies. Gregory’s Girl, for example, is populated by dreamers lost in their various obsessions. The film centre is the first stirrings of sexuality in rather awkward male adolescents. Gregory is obsessed with the enigmatic and ultimately unobtainable Dorothy (a situation repeated in Local Hero with the unrequited love that Danny and McIntyre feel for Marina and Stella, respectively). But Forsyth also uncovers a variety of obsessions, ranging from a fascination with numbers to useless facts and cookery, that serve as expressions of the problems and confusions associated with adolescence; these obsession are presented as, in essence, a redirection of sexual energy. Although equally obsessed with boys, the girls in the film are more knowing and sophisticated (Gregory constantly seeks advice on matters of the heart from his eleven-year-old sister) and wield greater control over their own destinies—Dorothy overcomes the sexist opposition of the coach to earn a place in the football team, while Susan ingeniously uses her friends to divert Gregory’s romantic attentions away from Dorothy and toward herself. Forsyth obviously has a great empathy with the female point of view, and it is no coincidence that Housekeeping, his most mature and accomplished work, concentrates totally on the relationship between two young girls and their rather eccentric aunt.

Despite the generally upbeat ambience, Forsyth’s cinema has its darker side. There are poignant moments of irony in That Sinking Feeling, a film which, despite its quirkiness and innocence, features a group of teenagers attempting to cope with the problems of unemployment. The film is set against a bleak and crumbling urban landscape. Local Hero has a rather subdued ending, which compensates for the cozy and contrived resolution reached between beachcomber Ben Knox and Happer the oil tycoon; McIntyre resumes a life in Texas that he has come to regard as shallow and meaningless. Comfort and Joy is darker than its predecessors not only in theme but in visual style. It concentrates on one solitary character, charting his development from morbid introspection (after his girlfriend leaves him at Christmas) to fascination with the absurdities of the world around him. Despite Forsyth’s intention to make a gloomier film, Comfort and Joy appears rather whimsical when compared to the brutality of the real Glasgow “Ice Cream Wars” which occurred at about the same time.

But Forsyth’s most serious effort by far is Housekeeping, his first adaptation and the first film that he shot outside Scotland. In exploring the dilemma of whether to conform to social expectations or opt out altogether, it successfully mixes very real moments of tragedy and grief (it is the only Bill Forsyth film to provoke real anxiety and even tears) with lighter and more familiar Forsythian observations and character traits. Housekeeping marks a major development in Forsyth’s career, demonstrating a greater emotional complexity and directorial assuredness. It opens out his cinema from its provincial Scottish roots while retaining the charm and warmth of his earlier work and suggests that we may not yet have seen the best of this major filmmaking talent.

Since Housekeeping, though, Forsyth has not made any films that rival the work of his early career. Breaking In, a comedy which charts the relationship between a young thief (Casey Siemaszko) and his aging mentor (Burt Reynolds), was a dud. Being Human is an oddity—and a box office disaster—featuring Robin Williams as five separate characters from different eras of history, each of whom are laboring to attain satisfaction in their lives. Being Human is an adventuresome and well-intentioned project, to be sure. But the result is maddeningly uneven, and one hopes that Forsyth will be able to recapture the spirit of his first features.

—Duncan J. Petrie, updated by Rob Edelman

FOSSE, Bob

Nationality: American. Born: Robert Louis Fosse in Chicago, 23 June 1927. Education: Amundsen High School, Chicago, graduated 1945; studied acting at American Theatre Wing, New York, 1947.

Family: Married 1) Mary Ann Niles (divorced); 2) Joan McCracken (divorced); and 3) Gwen Verdon, 1960 (divorced). Career: Formed dance team, “The Riff brothers,” with Charles Grass, 1940; master of ceremonies in a night club, 1942; enlisted in U.S. Navy, 1945, assigned to entertainment units in Pacific; chorus dancer in touring companies, 1948–50; Broadway debut in Dance Me a Song, 1950; signed to MGM, Hollywood, 1953; Broadway debut as choreographer with The Pajama Game, 1954; directed first film, Sweet Charity, 1968. Awards: Nine “Tony” Awards; Oscar for Best Director, and British Academy Award for Best Director, for Cabaret, 1972; also Emmy Award, for Liza with a ‘Z’, 1973. Died: Of a heart attack, in Washington, D.C., 23 September 1987.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>Sweet Charity (+ chor)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>Cabaret (+ chor)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1974</td>
<td>Lenny</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>All That Jazz (+ chor)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Star 80</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>The Affairs of Dobie Gillis (Weis) (role); Kiss Me Kate (Sidney) (role); Give a Girl a Break (Donen) (role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>My Sister Eileen (Quine) (chor, role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>The Pajama Game (Donen and Abbott) (choir)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Damn Yankees (What Lola Wants) (Donen and Abbott) (chor, dancer in “Who’s Got the Pain” number)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1974</td>
<td>The Little Prince (Donen) (chor “Snake in the Grass” number, role)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1976</td>
<td>Thieves (Berry) (role)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By FOSSE: articles—

Interview in Cinématographe (Paris), March 1984.

On FOSSE: books—

Bob Fosse (left) on the set of Star 80

On Fosse: articles—

Rex Reed once said of Bob Fosse (in a review of his performance as The Snake in The Little Prince), “The man can do anything!” Somewhat effusive, Reed’s comment nonetheless has more than a kernel of truth: Fosse won eight Tonys, one Oscar, and one Emmy over the course of his career. In fact, he garnered four of the awards (the Oscar for Cabaret, the Emmy for Liza with a Z, and two Tonys for Pippin) in one year.

Fosse started his career as a dancer and choreographer on Broadway and divided his time almost equally between directing for the stage and for films. All of Fosse’s films are musicals (with the exception of Lenny) and it is within this genre that he made significant contributions. The directorial choices employed by Fosse stemmed, not surprisingly, from his style of dancing and choreography: a type of eccentric jazz that isolates and exaggerates human motion, breaking it up into small components. It has been noted that there appears to be little difference between the dance material for Fosse’s stage and film choreography. But the presentation of the dance is radically different. On the stage, only the performers could create the fragmentation of Fosse’s choreography. In film, the use of multiple camera set-ups and editing allowed an amplification of this fragmentation, essentially obliterating the dance material and the mise-en-scène.

This style can be seen as the complete opposite of Astaire’s presentation, which strives to preserve spatial and temporal integrity. “I love the camera,” Fosse once said, “I love camera movement and camera angles. As a choreographer you see everything with a frame.” Camera angle and camera image become more important choreographic components than the dancing. The dance routine itself is non-essential, subordinated to a more complex system of integration and commentary, as Jerome Delameter has noted.

Fosse’s notions of integration and commentary drastically altered the structure of the American musical film. Reacting against thirty-odd years of the Arthur Freed musical, Fosse broke new ground in 1972 with Cabaret. No longer were the musical numbers “integrated” into the narrative with people singing to each other. All dance performances were logically grounded, occurring where they might be expected—on a stage, for example (and never leaving that stage, as Berkeley did)—and was distinctly separated from the narrative. The “integration” took place in the sense that each performance was a comment on the narrative action. In an interview with Glenn Loney for After Dark, Fosse shed some light on his approach. “I don’t think there is any such thing as a realistic musical. As soon as people start to sing to each other, you’ve already gone beyond realism in the usual sense. . . . I have generally tried to make the musical more believable.” Fosse did not seek to make the events more realistic, just more plausible and logical. Fosse expounded on his concepts of “believability,” “integrated commentary,” and visual fragmentation of performance via camera angle and editing with All That Jazz, a film in which musical numbers are literal hallucinations, obviously separated from the narrative but still logically grounded within it.

—Greg Faller

FRANKENHEIMER, John

Nationality: American. Born: Malba, New York, 19 February 1930. Education: La Salle Military Academy, graduated 1947; Williams College, B.A., 1951. Military Service: Served in newly formed Film Squadron, U.S. Air Force, 1951–53. Family: Married Carolyn Miller, 1954 (divorced, 1961), two daughters; remarried, 1964. Career: Worked as assistant director on such TV series as You Are There, Person to Person, and The Garry Moore Show, 1953–54; directed over 150 live TV shows, 1954–60; directed his first feature, The Young Stranger, 1957; formed John Frankenheimer Productions, 1963. Awards: Christopher Award, 1954; Bodil Film Festival Best American Film, for Seven Days in May, 1963; Emmy Award for Outstanding Individual Achievement in Directing for a Miniseries or a Special, for The Burning Season, 1994; Emmy Award for Outstanding Individual Achievement in Directing for a Miniseries or a Special, for Andersonville, 1996; Emmy Award for Outstanding Directing for a Miniseries or a Movie, for George Wallace, 1997; Ft. Lauderdale International Film Festival Robert Wise Director of Distinction, 1998; San Diego World Film Festival Lifetime Achievement Award, 1998; Casting Society of America Lifetime Achievement Award, 1998; National Board of Review Billy Wilder Award, 1999. Address: c/o John Frankenheimer Productions, 2800 Olympic Blvd., Suite 201, Santa Monica, CA 90404, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1957 The Young Stranger
1961 The Young Savages
1962 The Manchurian Candidate (+ co-pr, uncredited sc); All Fall Down; Birdman of Alcatraz
1963 Seven Days in May (+ co-pr)
1964 The Train
1966 Grand Prix; Seconds
1968 The Extraordinary Seaman; The Fixer
1969  The Gypsy Moths
1970  I Walk the Line, The Horsemen
1973  L’Impossible Objet (Impossible Object); The Iceman Cometh
1974  44/100 Dead (re-titled Call Harry Crown for general release in U.K.)
1975  French Connection II
1976  Black Sunday (+ bit ro as TV controller)
1979  Prophecy
1982  The Challenge
1985  The Holcroft Covenant
1986  52 Pick-Up
1987  Across the River and into the Trees
1989  Dead Bang; The Fourth War
1991  Year of the Gun
1994  Against the Wall (for TV); The Burning Season (for TV)
1996  Andersonville (for TV) (+ co-exec pr); The Island of Dr. Moreau
1997  George Wallace (for TV) (+ co-pr)
1998  Ronin
2000  Reindeer Games

Other Films:

1991  Reflections on Citizen Kane (short) (doc) (ro as himself)
1999  The General’s Daughter (West) (ro as General Sonnenberg)
2000  Listen with Your Eyes (Benedikt) (doc) (ro as himself)

Publications

By FRANKENHEIMER: book—

By FRANKENHEIMER: articles—

“Seven Ways with Seven Days in May,” in Films and Filming (London), June 1964.
Interview with Russell Au Werter, in Action (Los Angeles), May/June 1970.

Hoberman, J., “When Dr. No Met Dr. Strangelove,” in Sight and Sound (London), December 1993.
The Burning Season of John Frankenheimer,” an interview with Mary Hardesty, in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), August-September 1994.
“The Island of Dr. Moreau,” an interview with Michael Helms, in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), October 1996.

On FRANKENHEIMER: books—

On FRANKENHEIMER: articles—

Thomas, John, “John Frankenheimer, the Smile on the Face of the Tiger,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1965/66.
Article by Frederic Rosen in Video (New York), December 1984.
The seven feature films John Frankenheimer directed between 1961 and 1964 stand as a career foundation unique in American cinema. In a single talent, film had found a perfect bridge between television and Hollywood drama, between the old and new visual technologies, between the cinema of personality and that of the corporation and the computer.

Frankenheimer’s delight in monochrome photography, his instinct for new light cameras, fast stocks, and lens systems like Panavision informed The Manchurian Candidate, Seven Days in May, and Seconds with a flashing technological intelligence. No less skillful with the interior drama he had mastered as a director of live television, he turned All Fall Down and The Young Savages into striking personal explorations of familial disquiet and social violence.

He seemed unerring. Even Birdman of Alcatraz and The Train, troubled projects taken over at the last minute from Charles Crichton and Arthur Penn, respectively, emerged with the stamp of his forceful technique.

Frankenheimer’s career began to sour with Seconds, a film that was arguably too self-conscious with its fish-eye sequences and rampant paranoia. Grand Prix, an impressive technical feat in Super Panavision, showed less virtuosity in the performances. His choices thereafter were erratic: heavy-handed comedy, rural melodrama, a further unsuccessful attempt at spectacle in The Horsemen, which was shot in Afghanistan. Frankenheimer relocated to Europe, no doubt mortified that Penn, Lumet, and Delbert Mann, lesser lights of American South. Andersonville offers a vivid portrait of the infamous Confederate prisoner-of-war camp, where almost 13,000 Union soldiers died; George Wallace is a solid biopic about the controversial anti-segregationist Alabama governor. All were above average, quality-wise. Three of them even netted Frankenheimer Best Direction Emmy Awards.

—John Baxter, updated by Rob Edelman

FRANKLIN, Sidney

Nationality: American. Born: Sidney Arnold Franklin in San Francisco, 21 March 1893; also known as Sid Franklin, S.A. Franklin, Sidney A. Franklin, Sydney A. Franklin, and Sydney Franklin.
Family: Father of producer-director Sidney Franklin Jr.; brother of director Chester M. Franklin. Career: Began working in the motion pictures as an assistant cameraman, 1913; co-directed his first short films with his brother, 1914; began directing features, 1916; began work as a director at Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer, 1926; abandoned his career as director after The Good Earth, and became a producer, 1937; returned to directing with remake of The Barretts of Wimpole Street, 1957; resigned from MGM, 1958. Awards: Special Academy Award (Irving G. Thalberg Award) for “consistent high quality of production achievement,” for Mrs. Miniver, 1942. Died: Of natural causes in Santa Monica, California, 18 May 1972.

Films as Director, with Chester Franklin:

1914 The Sheriff (short); A Ten–Cent Adventure (short)
1915 The Ash Can, or Little Dick’s First Adventure (Little Dick’s First Adventure) (short); The Baby (short); Dirty-Face Dan (short); The Dollhouse Mystery (short); Her Filmland Hero (short); The Kid Magicians (short)
1916 The Little Cupids (short); Little Dick’s First Case (short); Pirates Bold (short); The Rivals (short); The Runaways (short); The Straw Man (short); Let Katie Do It; Martha’s Vindication; The Children of the House; Going Straight (Corruption); The Little School Ma’am; Gretchen the Greenhorn; A Sister of Six
1917 Jack and the Beanstalk (+ co-sc); Aladdin and the Wonderful Lamp; Babes in the Woods
1918 Treasure Island; Six Shooter Andy; Her Only Way; Forbidden City; Fan Fan; Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves

Films as Director

1918 The Safety Curtain (+ co-sc); The Bride of Fear (+ sc); Confession (+ sc, story)
1919 The Heart of Weton; The Probation Wife; The Hoodlum; Heart o’ the Hills
1920 Two Weeks; Unseen Forces (+ pr)
1921 Not Guilty; Courage
1922 The Primitive Lover; Smilin’ Through (+ co-adaptation); East Is West
1923 Brass; Dulcy; Tiger Rose
1924 Her Night of Romance
1925 Learning to Love; Her Sister from Paris
1926 Beverly of Graustark; The Duchess of Buffalo
1927 Quality Street
1928 The Actress (Trelawny of the Wells)
1929 Wild Orchids; The Last of Mrs. Cheyney; Devil May Care
1930 The Lady of Scandal; A Lady’s Morals
1931 The Guardsman; Private Lives (+ pr)
1932 Smilin’ Through
1933 Reunion in Vienna
1934 The Barretts of Wimpole Street
1935 The Dark Angel
1937 The Good Earth
1946 Duel in the Sun (co-d with Vidor and others, uncredited)
1957 The Barretts of Wimpole Street

Other Films:

1919 The Man in the Moonlight (Powell) (ro); A Rogue’s Romance (Young) (ro)
1920 The Blue Moon (Cox) (ro); Down Home (Willat) (ro); Drag Harlan (Edwards) (ro unconfirmed)
1939 On Borrowed Time (Bucquet) (pr); Goodbye, Mr. Chips (Wood) (special acknowledgment)
1940 Waterloo Bridge (LeRoy) (co-pr)
1942 Mrs. Miniver (Wyler) (co-pr); Random Harvest (LeRoy) (pr); Bambi (Hand) (artistic contributor)
1943 Madame Curie (LeRoy) (pr)
1944 The White Cliffs of Dover (Brown) (pr)
1946 The Yearling (Brown) (pr)
1948 Homecoming (LeRoy) (pr); Command Decision (Wood) (pr)
1950 The Miniver Story (Potter) (pr)
1953 Young Bess (Sidney) (pr); The Story of Three Loves (Minnelli, Reinhardt) (pr)

Publications

By FRANKLIN: articles—

On FRANKLIN: articles—

* * *

Throughout his lengthy Hollywood career, Sidney Franklin worked as a director, producer, screenwriter, assistant cameraman, and actor. He was, however, no celluloid renaissance man. He was not an artist of the cinema, in the way that a Woody Allen or an Orson Welles is considered to be. Franklin was more of an all-purpose man, one of the scores of film pioneers who in the early years of the 20th-century entered the industry almost by accident. (While eliciting a curiosity about film in his youth, he had toiled as a stock boy, travelling salesman, and factory and oil field worker prior to becoming an assistant cameraman at age 20.) Franklin then matured and flourished, as the industry matured and flourished, becoming first a director and then a producer. In the end he was a product of the Hollywood studio system and, even more specifically, a loyal and trustworthy employee of the Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer movie factory. Franklin’s films range from the child-oriented comedy shorts and features he co-directed early in his career with his brother, Chester M. Franklin, to the polished dramas and comedies he directed at MGM during the late 1920s and 1930s and the high-profile dramas he produced during the 1940s. Through the mid-1920s, he directed a wide range of product, honing his craft and becoming a technically accomplished and reliable professional. Franklin’s best, most representative films are those he made at MGM, where he came to work in 1926, and he was adept at directing actresses and understanding their characters’ motivations. He was especially close to Irving Thalberg, the studio’s “Boy Wonder” production executive, and did well guiding Mrs. Thalberg—Norma Shearer—through several films, including The Actress, Smilin’ Through (which he previously had made as a silent, with Norma Talmadge), Private Lives, and The Barretts of Wimpole Street. He also directed Greta Garbo in Wild Orchids, and guided Louise Rainer to an Academy Award in The Good Earth.

Franklin directed several adaptations of plays, all sophisticated comedies, including Molnár’s The Guardsman (the lone starring celluloid vehicle of Broadway legends Alfred Lunt and Lynn Fontanne), Robert E. Sherwood’s Reunion in Vienna, and Noel Coward’s Private Lives. His concern for detail, and maintaining the essence of the original material, is reflected in an article he published in the New York Times in 1934. “Even in Hollywood the play is the thing,” Franklin wrote. “We are grateful for good plays, we respect them and in translating them to the new medium we try our level best to do right by them. We realize we can get a good motion picture only by guarding with our lives the essence and structure which make the play important or significant.” Then he added, “Perhaps the greatest satisfaction that can come to a director is to hear some one [sic] say of one of our efforts: ‘It was as good as a play!’” In these remarks, Franklin amplifies a point that often is forgotten in a contemporary Hollywood ruled by high-concepts and special effects: without rich characterizations and a good story, you cannot have a good film.

Still, the overriding fact of Franklin’s career is that, while his films as director exude class, and he served his stars well, they are not reflective of any individual artistic vision. Rather, they collectively mirror his studio’s patented luster. Upon completing The Good Earth in 1937—and after the premature death of Irving Thalberg—Franklin left directing; he returned only to assist King Vidor on David O. Selznick’s Duel in the Sun and a bland remake of The Barretts of Wimpole Street in 1957. Otherwise, he went on to produce some of MGM’s most prestigious pictures during the 1940s, from Waterloo Bridge, Random Harvest, and the Academy Award-winning Mrs. Miniver through The Yearling and Command Decision. With the exception of Mrs. Miniver, which benefits from the strengths of its director, William Wyler, all are products of a studio rather than an individual.

—Rob Edelman

FREARS, Stephen

Nationality: British. Born: Leicester, Great Britain, 20 June 1941. Education: Studied law at Cambridge University, 1960–63. Career: Assistant at the Royal Court Theatre, 1964; assistant on films, from 1966; directed first film, 1967; director and producer for TV, from 1969, including Me! I’m Afraid of Virginia Woolf (series of plays by Alan Bennett, 1978) and Walter for Channel 4, 1982; also director of TV commercials. Awards: People’s Choice Award, Toronto International Film Festival, for The Snapper, 1993; Douglas Sirk Award, FilmFest Hamburg (Germany), 1996; César Award for Best Foreign Film, for Dangerous Liaisons, 1988; Berlinale Camera, Berlin International Film Festival, 1989; Bodil Award for Best American Film, for Dangerous Liaisons, 1990; Silver Berlin Bear, Berlin International Film Festival, for The Hi-Lo Country, 1999.

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Morgan, a Suitable Case for Treatment (Reisz)</td>
<td>(asst d)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>The Burning</td>
<td>(+ pr)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1971</td>
<td>Gunsho</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Three Men in a Boat</td>
<td>(for TV); Sunset across the Bay (for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>Doris and Doreen</td>
<td>(for TV); Me! I’m Afraid of Virginia Woolf (for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>One Fine Day</td>
<td>(for TV); Afternoon Off (for TV); Bloody Kids (for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>Going Gently</td>
<td>(for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>Walter</td>
<td>(for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Saigon: Year of the Cat</td>
<td>(for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>The Hit</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>My Beautiful Laundrette</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Prick up Your Ears; Sammy and Rosie Get Laid</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1988</td>
<td>Dangerous Liaisons</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>The Grifters</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1992</td>
<td>Hero</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1993</td>
<td>The Snapper</td>
<td>(for TV)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1994</td>
<td>A Personal History of British Cinema by Stephen Frears (for TV)</td>
<td>(+ role as himself)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>The Van; Mary Reilly</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1998</td>
<td>The Hi-Lo Country</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2000</td>
<td>The Brief Decency</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>O Lucky Man! (Anderson)</td>
<td>(asst d)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>If . . . (Anderson)</td>
<td>(asst d)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>O Lucky Man! (Anderson)</td>
<td>(asst d)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>Long Shot (Hatton)</td>
<td>(role as Biscuit Man)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>The Old Crowd</td>
<td>(Anderson—for TV) (pr)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997</td>
<td>Beyond Fear (Green/Wilkes—for TV)</td>
<td>(exec pr)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2000</td>
<td>Unforgettable Richard Beckinsale (Garnsey)</td>
<td>(role as himself)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By FREARS: books—

By FREARS: articles—

Interview in Time Out (London), 10 November 1983.
Interview with Harlan Kennedy, in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1987.
Interview in InterView (New York), April 1987.

On FREARS: articles—

McDonagh, Maitland, “‘Straight to Hell,’” in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1990.

Like so many of his contemporaries in the British cinema, Stephen Frears began his directorial career in television, making dramas for the BBC and its commercial rival Channel 4. He has continued to bounce back and forth between film and television ever since. He first came to the moviegoing public’s notice as the director of 1971’s Gumshoe, a whimsical nod to American films noir of the 1940s that was laced with parodic, self-reflexive overtones. The comedy/drama starred Albert Finney—as a down-at-the-heel vaudevillian who, influenced by seeing too many Bogart movies, turns private eye to improve his fortunes—and Billie Whitelaw. It also had a music score by a then comparatively unknown Andrew Lloyd Webber. A gentle, unassuming film, it has its adherents, but is an all but forgotten part of Frears’s filmography.

During the 1980s, though, Frears directed a blistering series of features that established him as one of the more important British directors of the period. The breakthrough film was My Beautiful Laundrette, a movie partly funded by Channel 4 TV that also launched Daniel Day Lewis as an actor, brought Shirley Anne Field (a fixture of British New Wave cinema of the 1960s) back to the screen, and gave the screenwriter Hanif Kureishi his first substantial hit.

Before My Beautiful Laundrette put Frears on the map, however, Frears made The Hit. It had a great cast (John Hurt, Terence Stamp, and Fernando Rey), and told the story of a small-time hood named Willie Parker (Stamp) who informs upon his partners-in-crime. Ten years later, he suddenly finds that his long-time hiding place has been discovered by his former associates who have put out a contract to have him terminated for squealing on them. Eric Clapton wrote the theme song for the film.

The Hit is tense, well acted, and has an authentic air of despair and failure in its tightly constructed visuals, yet at the same time it manages to be quite funny. It reminds one of the Hammer psychological thrillers of the early 1960s, in which Jimmy Sangster’s scripts kept the audience guessing throughout; despite its failure to catch on (good reviews notwithstanding), it stands up well against more celebrated works in the British crime film genre, such as The Long Good Friday. But then came My Beautiful Laundrette, which took Frears out of the grind of ordinary television production and genre films, and afforded him a more luxurious canvas with which to work. Nevertheless, it is clear that his years in television and genre films, which requires working at a fast pace, prepared him for this moment by enabling him to wring every last value out of the film’s minimal funding.

A titillating, cheaply exotic, and yet deeply romantic film, Laundrette is set firmly in the world of 1980s London, a barren, Thatcherite landscape of failing businesses, exploited workers, and simmering racial tension. The love affair between Johnny (Day Lewis) and the Asian Omar crosses the “barrier” of the heterosexual ruling faction and serves as an “affront” to the rigid class and racial barriers of an England caught in the grip of a pervasive economic depression. The film’s look is lush, multi-hued, and dreamy; it exists outside of time, as its protagonists most truly come to life outside the structures imposed upon them. With Laundrette, Frears aligned himself with a strong scenarist (Kureishi) who also sought to revitalize British cinema, and the iconic structures that had come to be taken as fixed points of reference in its landscape (Kureishi stated that one of his ambitions in writing the script for the film was to make a gay-themed British movie “without Dirk Bogarde”). A surprise “art house” hit in the United States, the film revived Frears’s career as a director. He was thus able to plunge into a group of new works that consolidated his reputation.

Sammy and Rosie Get Laid, another Kureishi script, was perhaps less successful than Laundrette, but it still did respectable business in the United States and Britain, and found several critical champions. Sammy and Rosie took the basic image of London in collapse posited in Laundrette several steps further. Sammy and Rosie is a clever reinterpretation of Godard’s vision of the city-as-apocalypse, with a Buñuelian flair for surreal interruptions and a grimy look similar to that used by 1960s British directors like Tony Richardson and Karel Reisz.

In the same year, Frears’s Prick up Your Ears, an examination of the life of gay playwright Joe Orton, from an Alan Bennett screenplay, received substantial critical acclaim both in England and the United States.

Frears’s most successful and popular film up to that point, Dangerous Liaisons, owes a considerable stylistic debt to Roger Vadim’s 1960 Les liaisons dangereuses, a modern-dress version of the same text by Laclos. Vadim’s film featured Jeanne Moreau and Gerard Philipe; Frears’s film, from a screenplay by Christopher Hampton, is anchored by the brilliant performances of Glenn Close and John Malkovich, and succeeds because of the sense of period verisimilitude it creates. Frears’s camera seems almost a recording angel within the context of the film’s narrative; it is omnipresent, but never oppressive, and maintains a discreet distance, except in the climactic dueling sequence.

Dangerous Liaisons does not strive to be sumptuous; rather, it plants the characters firmly within the context of the decor, and lets them do their work. Malkovich, in particular, has never appeared to better advantage, and the final shot of Glenn Close, after having been scorned in public, wiping her evening’s make-up off her face with brutal finality while regarding herself in her dressing room mirror, is one of the most despairingly triumphant moments in recent cinema history.

Interestingly, Frears completely eschews the aggressive visual style of Laundrette and Sammy and Rosie in Dangerous Liaisons; rather, his camera seems entirely at the service of the actors. He frames them in introductory wide-shots in the classical studio manner before going in for intimate close-ups. In this, the film is a double period piece, recreating the British studio system and its inherent dependence upon actors, as well as the eighteenth-century period in which the fictive text is set. Perhaps because of this double classicism, the film has proven to be Frears’s most accessible and popularly praised work.

Frears further consolidated his position in the cinema with The Grifters, his first film made in America. A noirish crime drama based on a novel by pulp fiction icon Jim Thompson, it featured Annette Bening, John Cusack, and Angelica Huston, and won critical and popular accolades all-around. After The Grifters, Frears switched gears with The Snapper, adapted from a novel by Roddy Doyle, the author of The Commitments—a book then successful film (by Alan Parker) to which The Snapper is a companion piece. It tells the story of a working-class family in Ireland (the same locale as The Commitments). When its eldest daughter, who is unmarried, becomes pregnant, her relationship with her father is sorely tested. Made for British television but released theatrically in the U.S., the film is ultimately a warm portrait of family imperfections and loyalties. As is The Van, Frears’s next film, made in 1996. Also based on novel by Roddy Doyle, it completed Doyle’s Irish trilogy begun with The Commitments.

The same year, Frears took over direction of the troubled production Mary Reilly, a distaff version of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde told from the perspective of the housekeeper (Julia Roberts) who works in Jekyll’s (John Malkovich) home. The result, though visually impressive, was a ponderous period piece that collapsed under its own dreary weight at the box office despite the star power of Roberts in the title role. The Hero, an attempt by Frears at a Capraesque fantasy, was another misfire. Largely due to a charismatic lead performance by Woody Harrelson, Frears’ modern-day western The Hi-Lo Country, based on a novel by Max Evans, clicked better with audiences and critics, though it lacks the grit that a Sam Peckinpah (who had long wanted to film Evans’ novel himself) might have brought to it.

—Wheeler Winston Dixon, updated by John McCarty

FRIČ, Martin

Nationality: Czech. Born: Prague, 29 March 1902. Family: Married actress Suzanne Marville, 1932. Career: Actor in Prague and Bratislava, 1918; lab man, cameraman, and designer, 1919–21; began film acting, scriptwriting, 1922; began collaboration with Karel Lamac, the most important editor of his generation. Frič apprenticed. He was by turns an actor, a scenarist, a film laboratory worker, and a cameraman. Of crucial importance to the young Frič was his collaboration and friendship with Karel Lamac, the most important editor of his generation.

FRIČ, Martin

Career:

Films as Director (partial listing):

1928 Páter Vojtech (Father Vojtech) (+sc, role)
1929 Varhaník v sv. Vita (The Organist at St. Vitus) (+co-sc); Chudá holka (Poor Girl) (+sc)
1930 Vše pro lásku (All for Love) (+co-sc)
1931 Der Zinker (The Informer) (co-d); On a jeho sestra (He and His Sister) (co-d); Dobrý voják Svejk (The Good Soldier Schweik) (+ed)
1932 Kantor Ideál (Master Ideál); Sextra Angelika (Sister Angelica) (+ed)
1933 Revisor (The Inspector) (+ed); U sněženého krámu (The Empty-out Grocer’s Shop) (+ed); Pobočník Jeho Výsosti (Adjutant to His Highness) (+ed); Život je pes (A Dog’s Life) (+co-sc); Dvacát křísel (The Twelve Chairs) (co-d); S vyloučením veřejnosti (Closed Doors)
1934 Hej rup! (Heave-ho!) (+ed, co-sc); Poslední muž (The Last Man); Mažlíček (Darling) (+ed, co-sc)
1935 Hrdina jedné noci (Hero for a Night) (+ed); Jánůšek (ed, co-sc); Jedenácté přikázání (The Eleventh Commandment) (+ed); Ar žije nebožtík (Long Live the Deceased) (+ed, co-sc)
1936 Pater Vojtech (Father Vojtech) (remake); Svadlenka (The Seamstress); Ulička v ráji (Street, the Basis of Life)
1937 Svět patriš nám (The World Is Ours) (+co-sc, role); Hordubalove (The Hordubals); Lidé na kře (People on a Glacier)
1938 Krok do tmy (Madman in the Dark); Skola, základ života (School, the Basis of Life)
1939 Eva tropi hlouposti (The Escapades of Eva); Krístian (Christian) (+co-sc); Muž z neznáma (The Reluctant Millionaire)
1940 Muzikantská Liduška (Liduška of the Stage; Musicians’ Girl); Baron Prašil (Baron Munchausen); Katakomby (Catacombs); Drahá směna (Second Tour)
1941 Těžký život dobrodruha (Hard Is the Life of an Adventurer); Hotel Modrá hvězda (The Hotel Blue Star) (+co-sc)
1942 Barbora Hlavsová
1943 Experiment; Der zweite Schuss (The Second Shot) (+co-sc)
1944 Počestné pani paradubické (The Virtuous Dames of Pardubice); Prstýnek (The Wedding Ring)
1945 13. revír (Beat 13)

1947 Varuj! (Warning!) (+co-sc); CAPKOVY POVIDKY (Tales from Capek) (+co-sc)
1948 Návrat domu (Lost in Prague); Políbek ze stadionu (A Kiss from Stadium) (+co-sc)
1949 Pěstitovka (Motorcycles); Pyltková schovanka (The Kind Millionaire)
1950 Past (The Trap); Zoceleni (Tempered Steel; Steel Town)
1951 Cisarova pekař a Pekařova pekář (The Emperor’s Baker and the Baker’s Emperor) (+co-sc); Akce B (Action B) (+co-sc)
1952 Tajemství krve (The Secret of Blood) (+co-sc)
1954 Psohlavci (Dog-Heads) (+co-sc)
1955 Nechte to na mě (Leave It to Me) (+co-sc)
1956 Zaostrí, prosím (Watch the Birdie!) (+co-sc)
1958 Povodeň (The Flood); Dnes naposled (Today for the Last Time)
1959 Princezna se zlatou hvězdou (The Princess with the Golden Star) (+co-sc)
1960 Daňbujú a Pandròhola (A Compact with Death); Bílá spona (The White Slide)
1961 Krák Králu (King of Kings); Tři zlaté vlasy děda Vševěda (The Three Golden Hairs of Old Man Know-All)
1964 Hvězda zvaná Pelyněk (A Star Named Wormwood)
1966 Lidé z maringotek (People on Wheels) (+co-sc)
1967 Přísně tajné premiéry (Recipe for a Crime; Strictly Secret Previews)
1968 Nejlepší ženská mého života (The Best Woman of My Life) (+co-sc)

Publications

By FRIČ: article—

On FRIČ: book—

Modern Czechoslovak film, Prague, 1965.

On FRIČ: articles—

Hrabs, J., “Martin Frič: Lidový vyprávěč,” (in four parts) in Film a Doba (Prague), January through April 1972.
Taussig, P., Film a Doba (Prague), December 1983 and April 1984.

* * *

Scion of a notable middle-class Prague family, Martin Frič left the road marked out by family tradition at the age of sixteen to follow the uncertain path of a cabaret performer, actor, and filmmaker. In 1919 he designed a poster for Jan Stanislav Kolár’s film Dáma s malou nožkou (Lady with a Little Foot), and thus began his years of apprenticeship. He was by turns an actor, a scenarist, a film laboratory worker, and a cameraman. Of crucial importance to the young Frič was his collaboration and friendship with Karel Lamac, the most influential director in Czech film. Lamac taught him the film trade and enabled him to become familiar with the film studios of Berlin and Paris.

In 1928 Frič made his debut with the film Páter Vojtěch (Father Vojtech) and followed it immediately with his most important film of the silent era, Varhaník u sv. Vita (The Organist at St. Vitus), which dealt with the tragedy of a man suspected of murder. In the sound era Frič quickly gained a position of prominence, chiefly through his ability to work quickly (making up to six films a year) and, no matter the circumstances, with surprising ease and dexterity. Comedy became his domain. His comedies, often produced in two-language versions (German or French), featured popular comedians as well as actors and actresses whose comic talent he recognized and helped to develop. First and foremost of these was Vlasta Burian, who appeared in the situation comedies On a jeho sestra (He and His Sister) with Amy Ondrákova, Pobočník Jeho Výsosti (Adjutant to His Highness), Dvanáct křesel (The Twelve Chairs), Takatombý (Catacombs), and also in the film adaptation of Gogol’s Revisor (The Inspector).

Frič had much to do with shaping the film acting of Hugo Haas in such films as Zivot je pes (A Dog’s Life)—the first Czech screwball comedy with Adina Mandlová), Ať žije nebožský (Long Live the Deceased), Jedenácté přikázání (The Eleventh Commandment), and Ulička a ráji (Paradise Road). Together with Voskovec and Werich he made the social comedy Hej rap! (Heave-ho) and the modern political satire Svět patří nám (The World Is Ours). Then came Kristián (Christian), a social comedy with Oldrich Nový that is undoubtedly Frič’s best work.

But Frič also demonstrated his directorial abilities in infrequent excursions into other genres. His Jánosik, a poetic epic about a legendary highwayman, is one of the pinnacles of Czechoslovak cinematography. Frič showed sensitivity and an understanding of the atmosphere of the time in his film rendition of U snědeného krámu (The Empty-handed Grocer’s Shop), a story by the nineteenth-century Czech writer Ignát Hermann. He also made felicitous film versions of the dramas Hordubalovo (The Hordubals), based on the novel by Karel Capek, Lidé na kře (People on a Glacier), and Barbara Hlasová. Following the nationalization of Czechoslovak filmmaking, Frič aided in the development of filmmaking in Slovakia with his film Varuj. . . ! (Warning!). In 1949, in collaboration with Oldrich Nový, he fashioned his next masterpiece, Varhaník u sv. Vita, which can be numbered among the world’s best of the period. The best proof of the quality and vitality of his creative work is the fact that almost a third of the films he made are still shown in the theaters of Czechoslovakia, where they bring pleasure to new generations of viewers.

—Vladimír Opela

FRIDRIKSSON, Fridrik Thor

Nationality: Icelandic. Born: Iceland, 12 May 1953. Education: Attended Icelandic University; self-educated in filmmaking. Career: Began making 16mm short films while still a student, 1970s; operated the Icelandic University film club, 1974–1978; founded the Reykjavik Film Festival, 1978; founded, edited, and wrote for Kvikmyndabladid, Iceland’s first film magazine; founded his own film production company, The Icelandic Film Corporation, 1984. Awards: Lubeck Nordic Film Days Audience Prize of the “Lubecker Nachrichten,” for Skytturmar, 1987; Lubeck Nordic Film Days Children’s Film Prize of the Nordic Film Institutes, Rouen Nordic Film Festival Young Audience Award and A.C.O.R. Award and Audience Award, for Born naturunnar, 1991; Lubeck Nordic Film Days Baltic Film Prize for a Nordic Feature Film, for Biodagar, 1994; Edinburgh Film Festival Channel 4 Director’s Award, Rimini International Film Festival Grand Prix, for A koldum klaka, 1995; Karlovy Vary International Film Festival FIPRESCI Award, Rouen Nordic Film Festival Young Audience Award, for Djoflaeyjan, 1996. Address: c/o The Icelandic Film Corporation, Hverfisgata 46, 101 Reykjavik, Iceland.

Films as Director:

1981 Eldsmiourinn (The Blacksmith) (doc) (short)
1982 Rokk in Reykjavik (Rock in Reykjavik) (doc)
1984 Kurekar Noroursins (Icelandic Cowboys) (doc )
1985 The Circle (doc)
1987 Skytturmar (White Whales) (+ co-sc, pr)
1989 Sky without Limits (for TV)
1990 Pretty Angels (for TV)
1991 Born naturunnar (Children of Nature) (+ co-sc, pr)
1994 A koldum klaka (Cold Fever) (+ co-sc); Biodagar (Movie Days) (+ co-sc, pr)
1996 Djoflaeyjan (Devil’s Island) (+ pr)
2000 Englar alheimsins (Angels of the Universe)

Other Films:

1997 Stikkfrí (Count Me Out) (Kristinsson) (pr); Blossi/810551 (Kemp) (pr)
1998 Vildspor (Wildside) (Staho) (pr); The Tale of Sweety Barrett (Bradley) (co-pr)
2000 Dancer in the Dark (von Trier) (assoc pr)
Publications

By FRIDRIKSSON: articles—

“Cold Fever,” interview with P. Frans, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), February 1996.

On FRIDRIKSSON: article—

* * *

Iceland is the Wyoming of Western European countries. It is sparsely populated, with a stark landscape that might resemble the surface of Mars. With this in mind, perhaps it is no great distinction to be recognized as the foremost Icelandic film director. But that precisely is what Fridrik Thor Fridriksson is. And, even though he hails from a country that is no cinematic mecca, he is a world-class filmmaker.

Fridriksson began his career by directing several documentaries. His first, The Blacksmith, is the portrait of an elderly tradesman and inventor who resides by himself in rural Iceland. In two others, Fridriksson began examining the impact of western culture on his homeland, a theme that reverberates throughout his work. Rock in Reykjavik explores the music scene in Iceland’s capital city. Icelandic Cowboys offers a portrait of his country’s first (and, to date, only) cowboy festival, an event organized by Icelandic country-western singer Hallbjorn Hjartarson.

Fridriksson’s narrative films are appealingly quirky and crammed with wry humor, in a manner reminiscent of Jim Jarmusch, Hal Hartley, and the Kaurismaki brothers. They spotlight aspects of Icelandic life and culture; they are cinematic odysseys in which rural Icelanders flee their narrow, sheltered environs and explore what for them are the far reaches of the world (from the nightlife of Reykjavik to the pop culture-dominated United States); or they portray the effect of the country on foreigners who come to Iceland. At their core, they are deadpan comic-dramatic explorations of Iceland in transition, with Fridriksson eliciting a flair for delving beneath the surface of his characters.

Most often, Fridriksson’s characters find themselves displaced; they are strangers in strange lands. In White Whales, his narrative debut, the strangers are Grimur and Bubbi, two rootless veteran whalers. The strange land is Reykjavik, where they decide to settle—and where they end up thoroughly disoriented. Children of Nature, Fridriksson’s first internationally acclaimed film, is the story of Thorgein Kristmundsson, an aged farmer and widower who has spent his life in Iceland’s outer reaches. His strange land also is Reykjavik, where he comes to live with his daughter and her children. Unable to adapt to this alien environment, he eventually sets out in search of his childhood roots; he is accompanied by Stella, a girlfriend from his youth, with whom he has become reacquainted while in a nursing home.

In Cold Fever (which, not surprisingly, was produced by Jim Stark, who is best known for his work with Jim Jarmusch), Fridriksson introduces foreigners to the Icelandic landscape. He charts the adventures of Atsushi (Masatoshi Nagase, who appeared in Jarmusch’s Mystery Train), a Japanese businessman who decides to go to Iceland and trek to the remote site where his parents died, to perform a ceremony so their souls can rest in peace. Upon his arrival, Atsushi is in for quite a bit of culture shock; throughout his journey, as he mixes with an assortment of lighthearted, idiosyncratic natives, he keeps describing Iceland as a “very strange country.” The vulgarity of America is personified by Jack and Jill, a pair of loud, violent hitchhikers Atsushi picks up while driving cross-country. Jack is garbed in a New York Yankees cap, and is unable to differentiate between a Chinese and a Japanese. When Jill is hungry, she demands a hot dog and Diet Pepsi.

If much of Cold Fever is set amid Iceland’s austere, natural beauty, the landscape Fridriksson spotlights in Devil’s Island is a gloomy, junk-littered wasteland that is left over from the American military presence in the country during World War II. Devil’s Island, set in the 1950s, is the story of Baddi and Danni, brothers whose mother has married an American pilot and gone off to live in Kansas. They have been raised by their grandparents in the dismal environs of what once was an American military barracks. Baddi visits his mother and returns home thoroughly Americanized. His new black leather jacket, Elvis-inspired hairdo, and sneer mark the trappings that start an epic culture clash, pitting conventional Icelandic values against new-fashioned, rock ‘n’ roll-inspired attitudes. In Iceland there are no slick, media-created role models for a young person to emulate, so it is inevitable that Baddi becomes transfixed by American pop culture. At the same time, he has not been transformed into a fashionably alienated being who has found his salvation in his discovery of hot cars and rock ‘n’ roll. Simply put, Baddi is a selfish, egomanical moron.

Fridriksson, like Wim Wenders, explores the inexorable impact of America on post-war Europe, yet he does not blindly rail against the Americanization of his homeland; he is not at all offended by the sociological displacement and cultural incursion that has materialized in Iceland during his lifetime. He either is amused by it, or is a curious observer of it. And in Movie Days, perhaps his most personal film, he directly examines how he himself has been affected by American culture. A valentine to Hollywood moviemaking, Fridriksson offers a portrait of a character who might be his alter-ego: Tomas, a young boy growing up in Iceland during the early 1960s, whose world is expanded upon discovering a universe of cowboys, spies, and monsters—all within the confines of a movie theater. As a heartfelt ode to the pop cultural influences of one’s youth, Movie Days may be favorably compared to Woody Allen’s Radio Days and Giuseppe Tornatore’s Cinema Paradiso.

—Rob Edelman

FRIDKIN, William

William Friedkin (standing with script) on the set of Twelve Angry Men

assistant, then studio floor manager, WGN-TV, Chicago, 1955; TV director, 1957–67; partner, with Francis Ford Coppola and Peter

Awards: Oscar for Best Director, for The French Connection, 1971.

Agent: c/o Edgar Gross International Business Management, 9696
Culver Blvd., Culver City, CA 90232, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1967  Good Times
1968  The Night They Raided Minsky’s; The Birthday Party
1970  The Boys in the Band
1971  The French Connection
1973  The Exorcist
1977  Sorcerer (Wages of Fear)
1978  The Brinks Job
1980  Cruising (+ sc)
1981  Duet for One
1983  The Deal of the Century
1985  To Live and Die in L.A. (+ sc); Sea Trial
1986  Judgement Day
1990  The Guardian (+ co-sc)
1992  Rampage (+ co-sc)
1994  Blue Chips
1995  Jade
1997  Twelve Angry Men (for TV)
2000  Rules of Engagement

Publications

By FRIEDKIN: articles—

‘‘Anatomy of a Chase,’’ in Take One (Montreal), July/August 1971.

‘‘Photographing The French Connection,’’ with Herb Lightman, in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), February 1972.

Interview with M. Shedlin, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1972.

Interview with R. Gentry, in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Spring/Summer and Fall 1986.

Interview, in American Film, December 1990.

On FRIEDKIN: book—

On FRIEDKIN: articles—

Maslin, Janet, ‘‘Friedkin Defends His Cruising,’’ in New York Times,
18 September 1979.

‘‘William Friedkin,’’ in Film Dope (London), September 1979.

Bornet, J., ‘‘William Friedkin: le chaos final,’’ in Revue du Cinéma, July/August 1990.

Everschor, Franz, in Film-Dienst (Cologne), 23 April 1996.

Jansen, Peter W., ‘‘Wege zu Lolita,’’ in Filmbulletin (Winterthur),
August 1997.

Kermode, Mark, and Paul Burston, ‘‘Cruse Control/So Good It Hurts,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), November 1998.

* * *

The success, both critical and commercial, of William Friedkin’s films has been uneven since the release of his first feature in 1967. Although his works span several different genres, they share some common thematic and technical characteristics. His heroes are nontraditional and find themselves in unconventional situations or environments foreign to the average viewer. Technically, Friedkin often seems more concerned with creating mood and establishing atmosphere than with the progress of the narrative or character development. His great attention to detail and characteristic use of long establishing shot sequences do create mood and atmosphere but often do not contribute to the film as a whole.

In two of Friedkin’s early films, The Birthday Party and The Boys in the Band (both based on stage productions), the use of establishing prologues works very well. The Birthday Party begins with an early morning shot of a deserted beach. Empty canvas beach chairs look out over an unnatural vastness of sameness—a seemingly endless grayish blue ocean that disappears into a grayish blue sky. This slightly unsettling visual sets the mood for Harold Pinter’s play. To the beginning of The Boys in the Band, Friedkin adds a montage prologue that introduces all of the main characters. But these are the only personal interpretations evident in these two works.

In The Night They Raided Minsky’s, Friedkin’s attention to detail successfully establishes 1920s period authenticity and adds to a richness of character missing in his other works. The film was criticized, however, for having too broad a narrative told through overly long sequences that do not contribute to the story. This characteristic would prove to be a major flaw of several of Friedkin’s subsequent films. Friedkin’s two most popular films, The French Connection and The Exorcist, have some aspects in common. In addition to nontraditional heroes in unusual situations, both films have broad narratives expressed through similar filmic techniques: minimal dialogue; long, detailed sequences; and documentary-style use of the camera.

The French Connection, Friedkin’s most critically acclaimed work, maintains a precarious balance between becoming tedious to watch and portraying the tedium and fatigue of Jimmy Doyle and Buddy Russo’s lives. Friedkin uses a long prologue to establish the drug operation in Marseilles. This sequence, filmed with little dialogue and great attention to detail, not only serves to introduce the drug operation but also to contrast the lifestyles of French narcotics dealer Alain Charnier and New York City cops Doyle and Russo. This very long sequence is followed by another that establishes the cops’ personalities and beat. Consequently, it takes quite some time before the actual narrative begins.

Friedkin’s ability to create atmosphere does work well in The French Connection because the environment itself, New York City, is one of the main characters. The city and its inhabitants are depicted in detail. The scenes—sometimes gritty, sometimes gory, sometimes dull—produce the urban reality, and at the same time reflect the reality of policework, which is also sometimes dull, but sometimes dangerous.

The Exorcist, a commercially successful film, is tedious throughout. The film plods along through an excessively long opening sequence (the significance of which is never made clear), a pseudo psychological explanation of the character Father Karras, countless close-ups of “meaningful” facial expressions, and predictable stages in both the possession and exorcism of Regan MacNeil. Friedkin does succeed at times in creating tension and suspense, but this mood is not sustained throughout the film. Apparently, the shock value of watching the disturbing physical transformation of Regan from young girl to hideous monster is enough to maintain viewer interest, since this continues to be a popular film.

Sorcerer did not follow the trend of commercial success begun by the two previous films. A remake of Clouzot’s The Wages of Fear, Sorcerer is a good action adventure once the story finally gets underway. Like other Friedkin films, it is weighed down by several long introductory sequences. After these initial sequences, the use of documentary technique, including hand-held tracking shots, creates a reality of place that can almost be smelled and touched.

Friedkin’s subsequent films contain his characteristic cinematic techniques. His filmic representation of the sadomasochistic homosexual subculture in New York City in Cruising is too realistic and brutal for many reviewers. Deal of the Century, although not commercially or critically popular, is a satirical satire on the profitable business of selling arms to Third World nations, using an introductory sequence very effectively to set the tone.

The Guardian, Friedkin’s first horror film since The Exorcist, was not well received critically or at the box office. As in The Exorcist, Friedkin employs an unconventional situation for the narrative and uses mood and atmosphere to gradually turn reality into a nightmare. Unlike the narrative in The Exorcist, however, this story of a yuppie couple who hire a nanny that feeds newborns to trees is told on a much smaller scale, but still is not consistently interesting. Jade, Friedkin’s most recent feature, has been criticized not only for unsuccessful attempts to establish mood that bog down the narrative, but also for original dialogue and stale action sequences. The screenwriter of Jade, Joe Eszterhas, is equally credited for the film’s flaws, along with Friedkin, in many critical reviews.

—Marie Saeli

---

FULLER, Samuel

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1948</td>
<td>I Shot Jesse James (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>The Baron of Arizona (+ sc); The Steel Helmet (+ sc, co-pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1951</td>
<td>Fixed Bayonets (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1952</td>
<td>Park Row (+ sc, co-pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>Pickup on South Street (+ sc) [remade in 1968 as Cape Town Affair (Webb)]</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1954</td>
<td>Hell and High Water (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>The House of Bamboo (+ co-sc; role as Japanese policeman)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>Run of the Arrow (+ pr, sc); China Gate (+ pr, sc); Forty Guns (+ pr, sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Verboten! (+ pr, sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1959</td>
<td>The Crimson Kimono (+ pr, sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>Underworld USA (+ pr, sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Merrill’s Marauders (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Shock Corridor (+ pr, sc); The Naked Kiss (+ co-pr, sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>Caine (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>Dead Pigeon on Beethoven Street (+ sc, role as United States Senator)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>The Big Red One (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1982</td>
<td>White Dog</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Thieves after Dark</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Samuel Fuller

1989  Street of No Return (+ co-sc)
1990  Le Madonne et le dragon (for TV) (+ mus); The Day of Reckoning (for TV) (+ co-sc); Tales (series for TV) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1936  Hats Off (Petroff) (sc)
1937  It Happened in Hollywood (Lachman) (sc)
1938  Gangs of New York (Cruze) (remade in 1945 as Gangs of the Waterfront) (Blair) (sc); Adventure in Sahara (Lederman) (sc); Federal Man-Hunt (Grinde) (sc)
1940  Bowery Boy (Morgan) (sc)
1941  Confirm or Deny (Lang, Mayo) (sc)
1943  Power of the Press (Landers) (sc)
1948  Shockproof (Sirk) (sc)
1951  The Tanks Are Coming (Seiler) (sc)
1952  Scandal Sheet (Karlson) (sc)
1953  The Command (Butler) (sc)
1965  Pierrot le fou (Godard) (role as himself)
1966  Brigitte et Brigitte (Moulet) (role as himself)
1971  The Last Movie (Hopper) (role as himself)
1974  The Klansman (Young) (sc)
1976  Der Amerikanische Freund (The American Friend) (Wenders) (role as The American)
1979  1941 (Spielberg) (small role)
1994  Girls in Prison (McNaughton—for TV) (sc)

Publications

By FULLER: books—

Burn, Baby, Burn, New York, 1935.

New York in the 1930s (Pocket Archive Series), New York, 1997.

By FULLER: articles—

Interview in The Director’s Event by Eric Sherman and Martin Rubin, New York, 1970.

Interview with Ian Christie and others, in Cinema (Cambridge), February 1970.

“Sam Fuller Returns,” interview with Claude Beylie and J. Lourcelles, in Ecran (Paris), January 1975.

“War That’s Fit to Shoot,” in American Film (Washington, D.C.), November 1976.

Interview with Russell Merritt and P. Lehman, in Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 1, 1980.

Interview with A. Hunter, in Films and Filming (London), November 1983.

Interview in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), March 1984.

“Conversazione con Samuel Fuller,” an interview with Gisella Bochicchio and B. Roberti, in Filmcritica (Siena), September-October 1989.

“A Fuller View,” an interview with Eric Monder, in Filmfax (Evanston), March-April 1995.

On FULLER: books—

Will, David, and Peter Wollen, editors, Samuel Fuller, Edinburgh, 1969.

Hardy, Phil, Samuel Fuller, New York, 1970.

Garnham, Nicholas, Samuel Fuller, New York, 1971.

Caprara, Valerio, Samuel Fuller, Florence, 1985.

On FULLER: articles—

Wollen, Peter, “Notes toward a Structural Analysis of the Films of Samuel Fuller,” in Cinema (Cambridge), December 1968.

McConnell, F., “Pickup on South Street and the Metamorphosis of the Thriller,” in Film Heritage (New York), Spring 1973.

“Fuller Section” of Image et Son (Paris), April 1981.

Dossier on Fuller, in Framework (Norwich), no. 19, 1982.

Sanjek, David, “‘Torment Street between Malicious and Crude’: Sophisticated Primitivism in the Films of Sam Fuller,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), July 1994.

Obituary, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), December 1997.

Stevens, Brad, “Play It Again, Sam,” in Sight and Sound (London), April 1998.

Obituary, in 24 Images (Montreal), no. 91, Spring 1998.

* * *

Sam Fuller’s narratives investigate the ways that belonging to a social group simultaneously functions to sustain and nurture individual identity and, conversely, to pose all sorts of emotional and ideological threats to that identity. Fuller’s characters are caught between a solitude that is both liberating and debilitating, and a communality that is both supportive and oppressive. Unlike Howard Hawks, whose films suggest the triumph of the group over egoism, Fuller is more cynical and shows that neither isolation nor group membership is without its hardships and tensions.

Many of the films touch upon a broad kind of belonging, as in membership in a nation—specifically the United States (although China Gate comments on several other nationalities)—as a driving idea and ideal, national identity becoming a reflection of personal identity. For example, in Fuller films about the building of the West, such as Forty Guns, The Baron of Arizona, or Run of the Arrow, the central characters initially understand their own quests as necessarily divergent from the quest of America for its own place in the world. Even though the course of the films suggests the moral and emotional losses that such divergence leads to, the films also imply that there is something inadequate in the American quest itself, in the ways such a quest undercuts its own purity by finding strength in a malevolent violence (the readiness of “ordinary” people in The Baron of Arizona to lynch at a moment’s notice), in mistrust and prejudice (unbridled racism in Run of the Arrow), or in political corruption.

Similarly, in films such as House of Bamboo, Underworld USA, and Pickup on South Street, about criminal organizations infiltrated by revenging outsiders, the narrative trajectory will begin by suggesting the moral separation of good guys and bad guys, but will then continue to demonstrate their parallelism, their intertwining, even their blurring. For example, in Underworld USA, the criminals and crimefighters resemble each other in their methods, in their cold calculation and determination, and in their bureaucratic organization. Tolly, the film’s central character, may agree to map his own desire for revenge onto the crimefighters’ desire to eliminate a criminal element, but the film resolutely refuses to unambiguously propa gandize the public good over personal motives.

At a narrower level of group concern, Fuller’s films examine the family as a force that can be nurturing but is often stifling with contradictions. Not accidentally, many of Fuller’s films concentrate on childless or parentless figures: the family here is not given but something that one loses or that one has to grope towards. Often, the families that do exist are, for Fuller, like the nation-state, initially presenting an aura of innocent respectability but ultimately revealing a corruption and rotted perversity. Indeed, The Naked Kiss connects questions of political value to family value in its story of a woman discovering that her fiancé, the town’s benefactor and a model citizen, is actually a child molester. Similarly, Verboten! maps the story of postwar America’s self-image as benefactor to the world onto an anti-love love story. A German woman initially marries a G.I. for financial support and then finds she really loves him, only to discover that he no longer loves her. Love, to be sure, is a redemptive promise in Fuller’s films but it is run through by doubt, anger, mistrust, deception. Any reciprocity or sharing that Fuller’s characters achieve comes at a great price, ranging from mental and physical pain to death. For example, in Underworld USA, Tolly is able to drop his obsessional quest and give himself emotionally to the ex-gangster’s moll, Cuddles, only when he is at a point of no return that will lead him to his death. Against the possibility of love (which, if it ever comes, comes so miraculously as to call its own efficacy into doubt), Fuller’s films emphasize a world where everyone is potentially an outsider and therefore a mystery and even a menace. No scene in Fuller’s cinema encapsulates this better than the opening of Pickup on South Street where a filled subway car becomes the site of intrigued and intriguing glances as a group of strangers warily survey each other as potential victims and victimizers. Echoing the double-entendre of the title (the pickup is political—the passing on of a secret microfilm—as well as sexual), the opening scene shows a blending of sexual desire and aggression as a sexual come-on reveals itself to be a cover for theft, and passive passengers reveal themselves to be government agents.

In a world of distrust, where love can easily betray, the Fuller character survives either by fighting for the last vestiges of an honest, uncorrupted love (in the most optimistic of the films) or, in the more cynical cases, by displacing emotional attachment from people to ideas; to myths of masculine power in Forty Guns; to obsessions (for example, Johnny Barratt’s desire in Shock Corridor to win the Pulitzer Prize even if that desire leads him to madness); to mercenary self-interest; to political or social ideals; and ultimately, to a professionalism that finally means doing nothing other than doing your job right without thinking about it. This is especially the case in Fuller’s war films, which show characters driven to survive for survival’s sake, existence being defined in Merrill’s Marauders as “put(ting) one foot in front of the other.”

Fuller’s style, too, is one based on tensions: a conflict of techniques that one can read as an enactment for the spectator of Fuller themes. Fuller is both a director of rapid, abrupt, shocking montage, as in the alternating close-ups of robber and victim in I Shot Jesse James, and a director who uses extremely long takes incorporating a complex mix of camera movement and character action. Fuller’s style is the opposite of graceful; his style seems to suggest that in a world where grace provides little redemption, its utilization would be a kind of lie. Thus, a stereotypically beautiful shot like the balanced image of Mount Fujiyama in House of Bamboo might seem a textbook example of the well-composed nature shot but for the fact that the mountain is framed through the outstretched legs of a murdered soldier.

—Dana B. Polan
GAÁL, István

Films as Director:

1957 Pályamunkások (Surfacemen; Railroaders) (+ sc, ed) (short)
1961 Etude (+ sc, ed) (short)
1962 Tisza—őszi vázlatai (Tisza—Autumn Sketches) (+ sc, ed) (short); Oda—vissza (To and Fro) (+ sc, ed) (short)
1964 Sodrásban (The Stream; Current) (+ sc, ed)
1965 Zöldár (Green Flood; The Green Years) (+ ed, co-sc)
1967 Krónika (The Chronicle) (+ sc, ed, ph) (short); Keresztelő (Christening Party) (+ sc, ed)
1969 Tiz éves Kuba (Cuba’s Ten Years) (+ sc, ed, ph) (short)
1971 Holt vidék (The Dead Country) (+ co-sc, ed)
1977 Legato (Ties) (+ co-sc, ed); Naponta két vonat (Two Trains a Day) (+ sc, ed) (for TV); Vámhatár (Customs Frontier) (+ ed) (for TV)
1981 Cserepek (Buffer Zone) (+ sc, ed)
1985 Orfeusz és Eurydike (+ sc)
1989 Éjszaka
1996 Római szondáta

Other Films:

1962 Cigányok (Gypsies) (Sára) (ed, ph) (short)
1964 Férfiarckép (Portrait of a Man) (Gyöngössy) (co-ph) (short)
1967 Vízkereszet (Twelfth Night) (Sára) (co-sc) (short)

Publications

By GAÁL: articles—

Interview in Cinema Canada (Montreal), April/May 1973.
“A Challenge and a Trial of Strength,” an interview in Hungarofilm Bulletin (Budapest), no. 5, 1983.

On GAÁL: books—

On GAÁL: articles—

Petrie, Graham, “István Gaál and The Falcons,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1974.
“István Gaál,” in Film Dope (London), September 1979.
Pörös, G., in Filmkultura (Budapest), May/June 1984.

* * *

The artistic personality of the film editor, cameraman, scriptwriter, and director István Gaál was formed by his study at the Higher School of Theatrical and Film Art in Budapest, where he arrived as a young electrical engineer determined to devote himself to the art of film. Here he shaped and precisely defined his artistic viewpoint in a classroom that is already legendary today as the meeting place of later notable personalities in Hungarian cinematography—Judit Elek, Pál Gábor, Imre Gyöngössy, Zoltán Huszarik, Ferenc Kardos, Zsolt Kérdi-Kovács, János Rózsza, István Szabó, Sándor Sára, Ferenc Kósa, and others. Gaál took his first, already conspicuous step in a creative workshop, the experimental studio of Béla Balázs. The artistic path he chose was a difficult one, because it was the specific, individual form of documentary. In the course of his creative career he returns constantly to this basic source, but at the same time he applies its elements in his not very extensive but masterfully suggestive artistic film work. Gaál is one of the founders of the Hungarian new wave of the mid-1960s, which he inaugurated with Sodrásban, his deeply emotive debut. Not only did this work reflect the positive social events of the time, but the author also applied genuine elements of a subjectively motivated poetics. With every important subsequent film—and these are for the most part adaptations of his own literary work—Gaál reveals the strange world of the Hungarian countryside, a world of desolation and unromantically flat landscapes with scattered, lonely settings where solitary tree trunks, well-beams, and the...
GANCE DIRECTORS, 4th EDITION

whitewashed walls of old buildings occasionally loom. In this microcosm he uncovers human community, relationships, and problems of morality. In intimate episodes he manages to take up and treat delicate problems of the past and generalize them in the form of a profound philosophical drama that reveals the roots of violence and evil and the dangerous elements of apathy and indifference, despair and loneliness. At the same time, his films, with their limited dialogue and almost totally graphic conception, are poetic pictures that have dramatic tension. However, István Gaál is not the romantic poet of the countryside he may appear to be. In a brief moment and in simple fashion he suggests the atmosphere and the relationships among characters, and he is equally adept at capturing the essence of a hunting lodge in the wilderness, a depopulated village, or the smell of a provincial town. For him the environment is merely a symbolic medium, because each of his works offers a kind of parallel between the world of nature and human society, a metaphor with deep ideological and moral significance.

There is a close union of all artistic components in films under his direction—a carefully constructed script, a poetic form of screen photography, simple non-illustrative music, and dramatically motivated editing, along with prodigious acting by the noted performers whom the director gets to “shed their theatrical skin,” enabling them to achieve quite a remarkable degree of expression before the camera.

In the intervals between making his fictional film works, Gaál constantly returns to the pure documentary, which is for him a starting point and perhaps also an experimental station. Here again, there is an alteration between people and nature, and a struggle between the two.

In his most recent films, Gaál turns more to the inner world of his contemporaries. His works delineate masterful psychological portraits in which there is more and more reflection of history on a general plane. His films are personal, poetically veiled confessions about present-day people, their problems and their relations.

—Václav Merhaut

GANCE, Abel

Collège de Chantilly; Collège Chaptal, Paris, baccalaureate 1906.
Served with Service Cinématographique et Photographique de l’Armée,
1917. Family: Married (second wife) actress Odette Vérié, 1933.
Théâtre du Parc, Brussels, 1908–09; began selling screenplays to Gaumont, 1909; formed production company, Le Film Français, 1911; artistic director of Le Film d’Art, 1917; after death of first wife, travelled to United States, 1921; patented widescreen “Polyvision” process, 1926; patented “Perspective Sonore,” stereophonic sound process, 1929; directed Marie Tudor for television, 1965; lived in Nice, worked on screenplay for Christophe Colomb project, first begun in 1939, 1970s; reassembled Napoléon premiered in New York, 1981. Awards: Gold Medal, Union Française des Inventeurs, and Cinéma Gold Medal, Société des Auteurs, 1952; Théâtre de l’Empire named for Gance, Paris, 1961; Grand prix national de Cinéma, 1974; César Award, 1980; Commandeur de la Légion d’honneur; Grand officier de l’ordre national du Merité, et des Arts et

Films as Director:
1911 La Digue, ou Pour sauver la Hollande (+ sc)
1912 Le Nègre blond (+ sc, role); Il y a des pieds au plafond (+ sc);
Le Masque d’honneur (+ sc)
1915 Un drame au Château d’Acre (Les Morts reviennent-ils?)
(+ sc); Ecce Homo (+ sc, unfinished)
1916 La Folie du Docteur Tube (+ sc); L’Enigme de dix heures
(+ sc); Le Fleur des ruines (+ sc); L’Heroïsme de Paddy
(+ sc); Fioritures (La Source de beauté) (+ sc); Le Fou de la faise ( + sc); Ce que les flots racontent (+ sc); Le Périscope (+ sc); Barberousse (+ sc); Les Gaz mortels (Le Brouillard sur la ville) (+ sc); Strass et compagnie (+ sc)
1917 Le Droit à la vie (+ sc); La Zone de la mort (+ sc); Mater
Dolorosa (+ sc)
1918 La Dixième Symphonie (+ sc); Le Soleil noir (+ sc, unfinished)
1919 J’Accuse (+ sc)
1923 La Roué (+ sc); Au secours! (+ sc)
1927 Napoléon (Napoléon vu par Abel Gance) (+ sc)
1928 Marines et Cristeaux (+ sc) (experimental footage for “Polyvision”)
1931 La Fin du monde (+ sc)
1932 Mater Dolorosa (+ sc)
1934 Poliche (+ sc); La Dame aux Camélias (+ sc); Napoléon
Bonaparte (+ sc, sound version, with additional footage)
1935 Le Roman d’un jeune homme pauvre (+ sc); Lucrèce Borghia 1936 Un Grande Amour de Beethoven (The Life and Loves of Beethoven) (+ sc); Jérome Perreau, héro des barricades
(The Queen and the Cardinal); Le Voleur de femmes (+ sc)
1937 J’accuse (That They May Live) (+ sc)
1939 Louise (+ co-sc); Le Paradis perdu (Four Flights to Love)
(+ co-sc)
1941 La Vénus aveugle (+ sc)
1942 Le Capitaine Fracasse (+ co-sc)
1944 Manolete (+ sc, unfinished)
1954 Quatorze Juillet (+ sc); Le Tour de Nesle (+ sc) 1956 Magrima (+ sc, co-pr) (demonstration of “Polyvision” in color)
1960 Austerlitz (co-d, + co-sc)
1964 Cyrano et d’Artagnan (co-sc)
1971 Bonaparte et la révolution (+ sc, co-pr)

Other Films:
1909 Le Portrait de Mireille (Perret) (sc); Le Glas du Père Césaire
(+ sc); La Légende de l’arc-en-ciel (sc) (Perret)
1909/10 Some Max Linder short comedies (role as Max’s brother)
1910 Paganini (sci); La Fin de Paganini (sci); Le Crime de Grandpère (Perret) (sci); Le Roi des parfums (sci); L’Alumineté
(sc); L’Auberge rouge (sc); Le Tragique Amour de Mona
Lisa (Capellani) (sci)
1911 Cyrano et D’Assoucy (Capellani) (sci); Un Clair de lune sous
Richelieu (Capellani) (sci); L’Électrocution (Morlino) (sci)
1912 Une Vengeance d’Edgar Poe (Capellani) (sci); La Mort du Duc d’Enghien (Capellani) (sci); La Conspiration des drapeaux (sci); La Pierre philosophe (sci)
1914 L’Infirmière (Pouctal) (sci)
Abel Gance

1920  L’Atre (Boudrioz) (pr)
1929  Napoléon auf St. Helena (Napoléon à Saint-Hélène) (Pick) (sc)
1933  Le Maître de forges (Rivers) (sc, supervisor)
1953  Lumière et l’invention du cinématographe (Louis Lumière) (Paviot) (commentary, narration)
1954  La Reine Margot (Dréville) (sc)

Publications

By GANCE: books—

La Roué, scénario original arrangé par Jean Arroy, Paris, 1930.
Prisme, Paris, 1930.

By GANCE: articles—

“The Kingdom of the Earth,” in Film Culture (New York), December 1957.
“Film as Incantation: An Interview with Abel Gance,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1974.

On GANCE: books—

On GANCE: articles—

On GANCE: films—

Abel Gance’s career as a director was long and flamboyant. He wrote his first scripts in 1909, turning to directing a couple of years later, and made his last feature, Cyrano et d’Artagnan, in 1964. As late as 1971 he re-edited a four-hour version of his Napoleon footage to make Bonaparte et la révolution, and he lived long enough to see his work again reach wide audiences.

Gance’s original aspirations were as a playwright, and throughout his life he treasured the manuscript of his verse tragedy La Victoire de Samothrace, written for Sarah Bernhardt and on the brink of production when the war broke out in 1914. If Gance’s beginnings in the film industry he then despised were unremarkable, he showed his characteristic audacity and urge for experimentation with an early work, the unreleased La Folie du Docteur Tube, which made great use of distorting lenses, in 1916. He learned his craft in a dozen or more films during 1916 and 1917—the best remembered of which are Les Gaz mortels, Barberousse, and Mater dolorosa. He reached fresh heights with a somewhat pretentious and melodramatic study of a great and suffering composer, La Dixième Symphonie. Even more significant was his ambitious and eloquent antiwar drama, J'Accuse, released in 1919. These films established him as the leading French director of his generation and gave him a preeminence he was not to lose until the coming of sound.

The 1920s saw the release of just three Gance films. If Au secours!, a comedy starring his friend Max Linder, is something of a lighthearted interlude, the other two are towering landmarks of silent cinema. La Roue began as a simple melodramatic tale, but in the course of six months scripting and a year’s location shooting, the project took on quite a new dimension. In the central figure of Sisif, Gance seems to have struggled to create an amalgam of Oedipus, Sisyphus, and Lear. Meanwhile portions of the film that were eventually cut apparently developed a social satire of such ferocity that the railway unions demanded its excision. The most expensive film as yet made in France, its production was again delayed when the death of Gance’s wife caused him to abandon work and take a five-month trip to the United States.

Like his previous work, La Roue had been conceived and shot in the pre-1914 style of French cinema, which was based on a conception of film as a series of long takes, each containing a significant section of the action, rather than as a succession of scenes made up of intercut shots of different lengths, taken from varying distances. But in Hollywood, where he met D.W. Griffith, Gance came into contact with the new American style of editing. Upon his return to France, Gance spent a whole year reediting his film. On its release in 1923 La Roue proved to be one of the stunning films of the decade. Even in its shortened version—comprising a prologue and four parts—the film had a combined running time of nearly eight hours.

Gance’s imagination and energy at this period seemed limitless. Almost immediately he plunged into an even vaster project whose title clearly reflects his personal approach, Napoléon va par Abel Gance. La Roue was particularly remarkable for its editing (certain sequences are classic moments of French 1920s avant-garde experimentation), Napoléon attracted immediate attention for its incredibly mobile camerawork, created by a team under the direction of Jules Kruger. Napoléon thus emerges as a key masterpiece of French cinema at a time when visual experimentation took precedence over narrative and the disorganization of production offered filmmakers the chance to produce extravagant and ambitious personal works within the heart of the commercial industry. Gance’s conception of himself as visionary filmmaker and of Napoleon as a master of his destiny points to the roots of Gance’s style in the nineteenth century. and his romantic view of the artist as hero. The scope of Gance’s film, bursting into triple screen effects at the moment of Napoleon’s climactic entry into Italy, remains staggering even today.

The 1920s in France was a period of considerable creative freedom. Given this atmosphere, a widespread urge to experiment with the full potential of the medium was apparent. If the freedom came from the lack of a tightly controlled studio system, the desire to explore new forms of filmic expression can be traced to a reaction against the situation imposed by Pathé and Gaumont before 1914, when film was seen as a purely commercial product, underfinanced and devoid of artistic or personal expression. This had been the cinema in which Gance had made his debut, and he was one of those striving most forcefully in the 1920s both to increase the possibilities for personal expressiveness and to widen the technical scope of cinema. He pioneered new styles of cutting and camerawork, as well as widescreen and multiscreen techniques.

It is ironic, then, that the advent of the greatest technical innovation of the period left Gance stranded. The explanation for this lies less in the irrelevance of sound to his personal vision of the medium—he was pioneering a new stereophonic system with La Fin du monde as early as 1929—than the fact that new forms of tighter production control were implemented as a result of the greater costs associated with sound filmmaking.

The 1930s emerge as a sad era for a man accustomed to being in the forefront of the French film industry. Gance, whose mind had always teemed with new and original projects, was now reduced to remaking his old successes: sound versions of Mater dolorosa in 1932, Napoléon Bonaparte in 1934, and J’accuse in 1937. Otherwise, the projects he was allowed to make were largely adaptations of fashionable stage dramas or popular novels: Le Maître de forges, Poliche, La Dame aux camélias, and Le Roman d’un jeune homme pauvre. In the late 1930s he was able to treat subjects in which his taste for grandly heroic figures is again apparent: Savonarola in Lucrèce Borgia and the great composer—played by Harry Baur—in Un Grand Amour de Beethoven, but by 1942, when he made Le Capitaine Fracasse, Gance’s career seemed to have come to an end.

Though a dozen years were to pass before he directed another feature film, Gance maintained his incredible level of energy. Refusing to be beaten, he continued his experiments with “polyvision” which were to culminate in his Magirama spectacle. He eventually made three further features, all historical dramas in which his zest, if not the old towering imagination, is still apparent: La Tour de Nesle, Austerlitz, and Cyrano et d’Artagnan. The French 1920s cinema of which Gance is the major figure has consistently been undervalued by film historians, largely because its rich experimentation with visual style and expressiveness was not accompanied by a similar concern with the development of film narrative. Gance’s roots were in the nineteenth–century romantic tradition, and despite his literary background, he, like his contemporaries, was willing to accept virtually any melodramatic story that would allow him to pursue his visual interests. For this reason French 1920s work has been marginalized in accounts of film history that see the growth of storytelling techniques as the central unifying factor. The rediscovery of Gance’s Napoléon in the 1980s, though—thanks largely to twenty years of effort by Kevin Brownlow—has made clear to the most skeptical the force and mastery achieved in the years preceding the advent of sound, and restored Gance’s reputation as a master of world cinema.

—Roy Armes

GARCÍA BERLANGA, Luis

Nationality: Spanish. Born: Luis García-Berlanga Marti in Valencia, 12 July 1921. Education: Studied at Jesuit school, Switzerland; Valencia University; IIEC (School of Cinema), Madrid, 1947–50. Military Service: Served in División Azul (Blue Division) of Spanish volunteers with German forces on Russian front, early 1940s. Career: Painter and poet, 1942–47; with Antonio Bardem, directed first film, 1951; several projects banned by censor, 1950s; began collaboration with writer Rafael Azcona on Plácido, 1961; professor at IIEC, 1970s; president of Filmoteca Nacional, 1980s.

Films as Director:

1948/49 Paseo sobre una guerra antigua (as IIEC student); Tres cantos (IIEC student); El circo (+ sc, ed) (IIEC student)
1951 Esa pareja feliz (That Happy Couple) (co-d, ph, co-sc)
1952 ¡Bienvenido, Mr. Marshall! (Welcome, Mr. Marshall) (+ co-sc)
1953 Novio a la vista (Fiancé in sight) (+ co-sc)
1956 Calabuch (+ co-sc)
1957 Los jueves, milagro (Thursdays, Miracle) (+ co-sc)
1961 Plácido (+ co-sc)
1962 “La muerte y el leñador” (“Death and the Woodcutter”) episode of Las cuatro verdades (+ co-sc)
1963 El verdugo (The Executioner; Not on Your Life) (+ co-sc)
1967 Las pirañas (+ co-sc)
1969 Vivan los novios (Long Live the Bride and Groom) (+ co-sc)

Luis García Berlanga
This approach is supported by Berlanga’s distinctive camera style. He tends to use very long takes in which the camera surreptitiously follows the movement of the characters, the shot lasting as long as the sequence. (In Patrimonio nacional there are some takes that last six or seven minutes.) These sequences are not, however, the carefully arranged and choreographed efforts of a Jancsó. As Berlanga explains it, until he begins shooting he has no specific setup in mind. “What I do is organize the actors’ movements and then tell the cameraman...”

---

On GARCÍA BERLANGA: articles—

Other Films:

1953 Sangre y luces (Muñoz) (sc) (Spanish–language version of Georges Rouquier’s Sang et lumières)
1955 Familia provisional (Rovira Beleta) (co-sc)
1967 No somos de piedra (We Are Not Made out of Stone) (Summers) (role)
1968 Sharon vestida de rojo (Lorente) (role)
1971 Apunte sobre Ana (Memorandum on Ana) (Galán) (role)

Publications

By GARCÍA BERLANGA: book—

By GARCÍA BERLANGA: articles—

Filmihullu (Helsinki), vol. 6, no. 17, 1995.

* * *

For many years in Spain strict censorship guidelines inhibited the development of a vital and creative film industry. The first original auteur of the post-Civil War period was Luis García Berlanga. When he began to make movies in the early 1950s, Berlanga and fellow filmmaker Juan Antonio Bardem were referred to as the two palm trees in the desert of Spanish film. Since then, and in spite of the fact that he could make relatively few films under Franco, Berlanga has remained one of Spain’s foremost talents.

In the early years, the most important influence on Berlanga’s filmmaking was Italian neo-realism. At the Conversations of Salamanca (1955) Berlanga and other young directors enthusiastically supported it as an antidote to Francoist cinema, a way of making authentic films that dealt with the everyday problems of ordinary people. From his first movie, Esa pareja feliz, which he co-directed with Bardem in 1951, to his “trilogy” on the Spanish aristocracy, Berlanga has remained true to the spirit of Salamanca.

In many movies he has exposed the pitfalls of Spanish society and satirized those institutions or individuals who take themselves too seriously, often using black humor to deflate their pretensions. Berlanga’s sympathies are with the underdogs of whatever social class, those who are victims of fate, institutions, or other forces they cannot control. In a number of his films we follow the efforts of an individual who wants to achieve something or attain some goal, struggles to do so, and in the end is defeated, ending up in the same or in a worse situation than before. This unfortunate outcome reflects Berlanga’s pessimism about a society in which the individual is powerless and in danger of being devoured. There are no winners in Berlanga’s movies; all of the victories are Pyrrhic. But never one to deliver messages or lessons, Berlanga expresses his pessimistic viewpoint with such verve, vitality and humor that audiences leave the theatre elated with the spontaneity and inventiveness of his films.

Berlanga prefers working with groups of characters rather than concentrating on the fate of a single protagonist. Rarely does one individual dominate the action. Usually we move from one person to the next so that our point of view on the action is constantly shifting. This approach is supported by Berlanga’s distinctive camera style. He tends to use very long takes in which the camera surreptitiously follows the movement of the characters, the shot lasting as long as the sequence. (In Patrimonio nacional there are some takes that last six or seven minutes.) These sequences are not, however, the carefully arranged and choreographed efforts of a Jancsó. As Berlanga explains it, until he begins shooting he has no specific setup in mind: “What I do is organize the actors’ movements and then tell the cameraman...”
how to follow them. When we bump into some obstacle, we stop shooting.” In shooting the often feverish activities of his characters in this way, Berlanga gives a fluid, spontaneous feeling to his films. His predilection for these shots expresses what Berlanga calls his “god complex”—his desire to be everywhere at once and to express the totality of any scene.

In his scrutiny of contemporary Spanish life, Berlanga is also attached to much older Spanish literary and cultural traditions, most notably to that of the picaresque novel, in which a pícaro or rogue is thrust out into the world and forced to fend for himself. At the bottom of the social heap, the pícaro is afforded “a worm’s eye view” of society and learns to be tricky in order to survive. The pícaro keeps hoping and waiting for a miracle, a sudden change in fate that will change his or her fortune in one stroke. Berlanga’s picaros, whether they be naive like Plácido (Plácido) or noble like the Marquis of Leguineche (Patrimonio nacional), share the same hopes and tenacious desire to survive. These characters, like Berlanga himself, are deeply attached to Spanish cultural traditions. In fact, one might even consider Berlanga to be a sort of picaresque hero who managed to survive the vagaries of the Franco regime and its system of censorship. A popular director since ¡exclam;Welcome Mr. Marshall!, Berlanga has gone on to even greater success since Franco’s death with La escopeta nacional, a satiric look at a hunting party of Spain’s notables during the Franco regime. In this irreverent and amusing comedy and in its two sequels, Berlanga introduced himself and his vision of his country to a new generation of Spaniards.

—Katherine Singer Kovács

GERASIMOV, Sergei

Nationality: Soviet. Born: Sergei Apollinariievich Gerasimov in Zlatoust, Ural region, 21 May 1906. Education: Leningrad Art School; studied scenic design at State Institute of Dramatic Art, Leningrad, 1920–25. Career: Joined FEKS group founded by Grigori Kozintsev and Leonid Trauberg, early 1920s; directed first film, 1930; head of Acting and Directing Master Class, Lenfilm Studios, 1931–41; in charge of official films of Yalta and Berlin conferences, 1942–44; head of Central Newsreel and Documentary Studios, Moscow, 1944; Professor, Moscow Film School (VGIK), 1944–1970s; artistic supervisor, Gorki Film Studios, 1955; served as deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the RSFSR, secretary of Soviet Union of Cinematographers, and on editorial board of Isskustvo Kino, 1970s. Awards: Red Banner of Labor, 1940 and 1950; Red Star, 1944; Peoples’ Artist of USSR, 1948; State prizes, for Uchitel, 1941, The Young Guard, 1949, and Liberated China, 1951. Died: 27 November 1985.

Films as Director:

1930 Twenty-two Misfortunes (co-d)
1931 The Forest (+ sc)
1932 Solomon’s Heart (co-d, + sc)
1934 Do I Love You? (+ sc)
1936 Semero smelykh (The Bold Seven)
1938 Komolomisk (+ co-sc)
1939 Uchitel (Teacher) (+ sc)
1941 Masquerade (+ sc, role as the stranger); Meeting with Maxim segment of Fighting Film Album No. 1; The Old Guard
1943 The Invincible (The Unconquerable) (co-d, + co-sc); Film-Concert Dedicated to the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Red Army (Cine-Concert Dedicated to the Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the Red Army) (co-d, + co-sc)
1944 Great Land (The Mainland) (+ sc)
1947 Molodaya gvardiya (Young Guard) (+ sc)
1950 Liberated China (+ sc)
1951 Selskiy vrach (Country Doctor)
1954 Nadezhda (+ sc)
1957/58 Tikhiy Don (And Quiet Flows the Don) (+ sc)
1959 Sputnik Speaking (The Sputnik Speaks) (co-d, co-sc)
1962 Men and Beasts (+ sc)
1967 Zhirnalist (The Journalist) (+ sc)
1969 O razaar (By the Lake) (+ sc)
1972 Lyubit cheloveka (For the Love of Man) (+ sc)
1974 Materi i docheri (Mothers and Daughters)
1984 Lev Tolstoj

Other Films:

1925 Michki protiv Youdenitsa (Mishka against Yudenitch) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (role as spy)
1926 Chyortovo koleso (The Devil’s Wheel) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (role as the conjuror); Shinel (The Cloak) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (role as the card-shark); Bratichka (Little Brother) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (role as the driver)
1927 S.V.D. (The Club of the Big Deed) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (role as Medoks); Someone Else’s Jacket (Boris Shpis) (role as Skalkovsky)
1929 Novyi Vavilon (The New Babylon) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (asst d, role as the journalist Lutreau); Oblomok imperii (Fragment of an Empire) (Ermler) (role as the Menshevik)
1931 Odna (Alone) (Kozintsev and Trauberg) (asst d, role as the chairman of the village soviet)
1932 Three Soldiers (Ivanov) (role as Commander of the Iron Regiment)
1933 Dezertir (Deserter) (Pudovkin) (role as the bone); Razbudite Lenochka (Wake up Lenochka) (Kudryavtseva) (role)
1935 The Frontier (Dubson) (role as Yakov the Tailor)
1939 Chapayev Is with Us (co-sc); Vyborgskaya storona (New Horizons; The Vyborg Side) (Kozintsev) (role as the Socialist-Revolutionary)
1944 The Yalta Conference (pr supervisor)
1945 The Berlin Conference (pr supervisor)
1955 Dany (Organisyan and Kulidzhanov) (artistic supervisor)
1956 The Road of Truth (Frid) (sc)
1958 Memory of the Heart (Lioznova) (sc)
1961 Dimy Gorina (Career of Dina) (Doblatyan and Mirski) (artistic supervisor)
1962  U Krutovo Yara (On the Steep Cliff) (K. and A. Morakov)
      (artistic supervisor)
1963  Venski Les (Vienna Woods) (Grigoriev)
      (artistic supervisor)
1964  Sostyazanie (Controversy) (Mansurev)
      (artistic supervisor)

Publications

By GERASIMOV: books—
Vospitanie kinorezhisseeva, Moscow, 1978.
Kinostsenarii, Moscow, 1982.
Kinopedagogika, Moscow, 1983.
Stat’i, ocherki, vospominaniia, Moscow, 1984.

By GERASIMOV: articles—
“All Is Not Welles,” in Films and Filming (London), September 1959.
Interview with Roger Hudson, in Film (London), Spring 1969.
“V dobyri chast’,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 10, 1976.
“Akual’nost’ istorii,” interview with G. Maslovskij, in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), September 1980.
Interview in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), December 1982.
Interview in Soviet Film (Moscow), February 1984.
Film a Doba (Prague), May 1986.

On GERASIMOV: articles—
Vronskaya, J., “Recent Russian Cinema,” in Film (London), Summer 1971.
Wuss-Mundeciema, L., Sergei Gerassimow, and H.-J. Rother, “In memoriam Sergei Gerassimow,” in Film un Fernsehen (Frankfurt), vol. 14, no. 6, June 1986.
Obituary in Soviet Film (Moscow), no. 6, 1987.

* * *

The very survival of the brilliant, original, almost iconoclastic Sergei Gerasimov through turbulent eras of Soviet history has tended to obscure the importance of his early contributions to cinema. The somewhat stern image of a grim conservative headmaster he seemed to project to students at the Moscow Film School (VGIK) in the early 1970s was an antithesis of his prewar self. Gerasimov’s career started in Leningrad when, after graduating as a theatrical designer, he joined the “Factory of Eccentric Actors” (FEKS). He became one of the strongest and most original actors in Soviet silent cinema, with a special attraction to complex roles. Together with what he learned from Kozintsev and Trauberg, who directed most of the productions in which he appeared, his deep study of acting was an important part of Gerasimov’s apprenticeship as a filmmaker.

Gerasimov cut his directorial teeth on three silent productions in the early 1930s, but it was not until 1936, with his first sound film Semero Smelykh (The Bold 7), that came into his own as a major talent. In this and his next film (Komsomol’ski) he broke new ground in his choice of subject and in his sincere and unusually successful attempt to portray ordinary young people as varied, breathing, living human beings rather than animated heroic sculptures. His sympathetic direction of his young cast, together with his romantic but naturalistic scripts (pitting teams of young people against the elements) achieved something approaching the elusive ideal of socialist realism.

Gerasimov’s works were by far the most successful films of their genre during the 1930s. Uchitel (Teacher), released in 1939, completed his trio of lyrical but unpretentious evocations of the new Soviet generation in the Russian countryside. Uchitel told the tale of a young man who leaves the bright lights of the city to return to his native village as a schoolmaster. This film begins, perhaps, to show some signs of the stress imposed by the increasing rigidity of official dogma, for it does not achieve the freshness of the previous two films. Yet, sadly, some seven years later Gerasimov castigated himself for not having adhered more strictly to the party line. “I loved the film,” he wrote, “and I still love it, despite the fact that it is far too polished . . . and not a little too obsessional in its attitude to Art.” By this time the war had intervened and Gerasimov (in 1944) had become a member of the Communist Party.

Besides Gerasimov’s rural trilogy, his only other prewar feature, Masquerade, was a lavish version of Lermontov’s verse tragedy. He had certainly set himself an uphill task in trying to combine his FEKS style with the tradition of stage drama and dialogue in verse, although his own performance as “The Stranger” was an echo of his old FEKS philosophy and the Leningrad setting was spectacular. Although successful at the time, the film was criticized by the director himself, a stern exponent of “socialist self-criticism.” While he admitted that the film had helped him “refine his art,” he considered it “haphazard and unplanned” and lacking sufficient appreciation of Lermontov’s particular genius.

During World War II, Gerasimov was put in charge of the documentary film studios. There he brought together the talents of feature directors and documentarists and once more proved his flair for encouraging good work from others. This led to his appointment in 1944 as head of the directing and acting workshops of the Moscow Film School (VGIK). Occupying this seminal position through the following thirty years, he had an enormous influence on the whole present generation of Soviet filmmakers.

After the war Gerasimov’s own work seems to have swung dramatically from his self-effacing, sympathetic form of filmmaking to the grandiose style fashionable during Stalin’s final phase. Fadeev’s patriotic, lyrical novel The Young Guard would seem to have been ideal source material for a typical Gerasimov film, yet it turned out to be bombastic, pompous, and overblown. His other huge epic, And Quiet Flows the Don, shown in three full-length parts, unfortunately suffered from similar grandiosity. Apart from this foray into gigantism, and a documentary on China, much of Gerasimov’s post-Stalin output saw a return to his themes of the 1930s. While he remained a highly competent director, however, he never quite recaptured the freshness of approach and lightness of touch that marked his earlier work.

—Robert Dunbar

GERIMA, Haile

Films as Director:

1971 Hourglass
1972 Child of Resistance
1975 Mirt Sost Shi Amit (Harvest: 3000 Years) (+sc, ed, pr)
1976 Bush Mama (+sc, ed, pr)
1982 Wilmington 10—USA 10,000 (doc) (+sc, pr)
1982 Ashes and Ambers (for TV)
1985 After Winter: Sterling Brown (doc)
1994 Sankofa (+sc, ed, pr)
1994 Imperfect Journey (doc-for TV)
1999 Adwa: An African Victory (+sc, pr, ed)

Publications

By GERIMA: articles—

On GERIMA: books—

On GERIMA: articles—

Quam, Michael D., “Harvest: 3,000 Years. Sowers of Maize and Bullets,” in Jump Cut (Berkeley), March 1981.

* * *

“I’m a Third World, independent filmmaker,” declared Haile Gerima in a 1983 interview. He now resides in the United States “for many historical reasons.” Gerima—professor of film, philosopher, writer, producer, and director of a singular stature—has earned a unique place in film history as one of a handful of African filmmakers to earn international notoriety.

Gerima arrived in the United States as a youngster of twenty-one with an interest in theatre and enrolled in acting classes at the Goodman School of Drama in Chicago, Illinois. “When I was growing up,” he reveals in the Los Angeles Times, “I wanted to work in theatre—it never occurred to me I could be a filmmaker because I was raised on Hollywood movies that pacified me to be subservient. Filmmaking isn’t encouraged or supported by the Ethiopian government.” He felt limited by theatre and was resigned, notes Francoise Pfaff, to “subservient roles in Western plays.” By 1970 he had discovered “the power of cinema.” He migrated to California to attend the University of California, where he earned Bachelor’s and Master of Fine Arts degrees in film.

Influenced in part by the pioneering work of film luminaries Vittorio de Sica, Fernando Solanas, Tomás Gutiérrez Alea, and Med Hondo, Gerima makes films that tell of the human condition. He exploits the medium as a political weapon and as a catalyst for understanding and social change at the same time, consciously eschewing what he describes as the “narrative dictatorship” of Hollywood pictures.

Gerima’s 1976 Bush Mama provides a striking example of this mission. The film presents a poignant contrast, produced as it was during the period of film history known as the “Blaxploitation” era. Gerima’s depiction of the travails of black life and culture are far-removed from that of the drug deals and revenge killings of Superfly (1972) and Foxy Brown (1976). Bush Mama is the story of Dorothy and her husband T.C., a discharged Vietnam veteran who thought he would return home to a “hero’s welcome.” Instead he is falsely arrested and imprisoned for a crime he didn’t commit. Theirs is a world of welfare, perennial unemployment, and despair. To some, the film may appear bleak and nihilistic with its stark black-and-white photography, but its message is moving and distinct. Issues of institutionalized racism, police brutality, and poverty remain sadly pertinent and the film, nearly twenty-five years old, retains its potency.

For the production of Mirt Sost Shi Amit (Harvest: 3,000 Years) Gerima returned to his native Ethiopia to produce the tale of a poor peasant family who eke out an existence within a brutal, exploitative, and feudal system of labor. In 1985 he again focused his camera upon the travails of black urban life in the two-hour film, Ashes and Embers, the story of a moody and disillusioned black veteran of the Vietnam War. The film’s characters, notes Shepard in the New York Times, “are human rather than cardboard types.” Wilmington 10—USA 10,000 exposed the impact of racism and the short-comings of the criminal justice system by examining the infamous history of the nine black men and one white woman who became known as the “Wilmington 10.”

Though now well established and respected as a filmmaker, Gerima’s path has not always been paved with gold. His name is not likely to be bandied about in the boardrooms of Hollywood studios, a reality he finds bittersweet. “I was never enamored of the film industry,” he reveals in the San Francisco Chronicle. “Every Hollywood story is Eurocentric and if it isn’t, then it will simply be disregarded. So I never wanted to be part of an industry that fails to represent the world as it really exists.”

“Money is an incessant worry for independent filmmakers and Haile Gerima is no exception,” notes Pfaff. Indeed, Gerima has endured his share of the indignities of being an independent filmmaker of color, including elusive funding, closed doors, and distributors refusing to show his film. “[S]ome indie black filmmakers,” notes Porter in The Village Voice, “are reluctantly becoming do-it-yourself distributors.” Gerima began his self-distribution by booking his films at “art” theatres—only to find they were not reaching the black community for which they were created. Now he distributes his films and that of other low-budget, independent filmmakers through Mypheduh Films, a distribution company that he and his filmmaker wife Sirikiana Aina established in 1984. He speaks with rancor of the “incestuous relationship” between Hollywood, theatre owners, and video stores. “We’ve been evicted from several theatres when Hollywood wanted use of the theatre,” he complained in the Los Angeles Times. “Why? Because if theatres don’t take whatever junk comes from the industry pipe, they won’t get movies they want in the future. . . . Hollywood is incapable of allowing African Americans to make the films they want to make, what they want from us is hooligan movies.”

“Spirit of the dead, rise up and claim your story!” is the haunting opening of what is probably Gerima’s most successful production, the 1993 film, Sankofa. It presents with brutal realism the horrors of African slavery. The story is revealed through the eyes of Mona, a modern-day woman who is “possessed by spirits” and transported back in time as the Shola, a house slave on the Lafayette plantation in Louisiana. The savagery and violence of the evil institution are clearly disturbing and go far beyond the safe and conventional images of slavery presented by Hollywood. In Sankofa, we hear the chilling sound of human flesh as it is seared with a hot branding iron and see the barren faces of the human cargo; women are stripped of all dignity and subject to the continual sexual exploitation of their owners; human necks are enclosed in iron shackles and rape is used as a tool of terror and domination. Some panned Gerima for his stylistic flourishes but the response by the black community was positive and enthusiastic. The film was well received and played to full houses for many weeks in major cities.

Adwa: An African Victory is a compelling documentary drama of the largely forgotten history of the 1896 battle of resistance in which the Ethiopian people arose and united to defeat the Italian army. The film is skilfully interlaced with paintings, sound, music, rare historical photographs, and interviews of “elders” who recall the details of the story of Adwa. It concludes with a dramatic recreation of the final battle.

In spite of numerous limitations and against all odds, writer-producer-director Haile Gerima has succeeded in a tough industry for nearly thirty years and has emerged as one of the more potent “outsider” voices in the history of filmmaking.

—Pamala S. Deane

GERMI, Pietro

Films as Director:

1946 Il testimone (+ co-sc)
1947 Gioventù perduta (Lost Youth) (+ co-sc)
1949 In nome della legge (Mafia) (+ co-sc)
1950 Il cammino della speranza (The Path of Hope) (+ co-story, co-adapt)

1951 La città si difende (Four Ways Out) (+ co-sc)
1952 La presidentessa (Mademoiselle Gobette) (+ co-sc); Il brigante di Tacco del Lupo (+ co-sc)
1953 Gelosia (+ co-sc)
1954 “Guerra 1915–1918” episode of Amori di mezzo secolo
1956 Il ferroviere (The Railroad Man; Man of Iron) (+ co-sc, role)
1957 L’uomo di paglia (+ co-sc, role)
1961 Divorzio all’italiana (Divorce Italian Style) (+ co-sc)
1964 Sedotta e abbandonata (Seduced and Abandoned) (+ co-sc)
1965 Signore e signori (The Birds, the Bees, and the Italians) (+ co-sc, co-pr)
1966 L’immorale (The Climax; Too Much for One Man) (+ co-sc)
1967 Serafino (+ co-sc, pr)
1970 Le castagne sono buone (Till Divorce Do You Part) (+ co-sc, pr)
1972 Alfredo, Alfredo (+ co-sc, pr)

Other Films:

1939 Retroscena (Blasetti) (asst d, co-sc)
1943 Nessuno torna indietro (Blasetti) (asst d)
1945 I dieci comandamenti (Chili) (co-sc)
1946 Monte Cassino (Gemmiti) (role)
1948 Fuga in Francia (Soldati) (role)
1959 Jovanka e le altre (Five Branded Women) (Ritt) (role)
1960 Il rossetto (Damiani) (role)
1963 La viaccia (Bolognini) (role); Il sicario (Damiani) (role)
1967 The Directors (pr: Greenblatt) (appearance)
1975 Amici miei (Monicelli) (co-sc, + credit “A Film by Pietro Germi”)

Publications

By GERMI: articles—

On GERMI: books

On GERMI: articles—

* * *

Pietro Germi
Pietro Germi, though often regarded by scholars as fundamentally a neorealist director who made a transition in mid-career to social comedy, never actually considered himself to be an adherent to the style popularized by Roberto Rossellini. Like several other Italian directors achieving prominence in the late 1940s, notably Alberto Lattuada, Alberto De Santis and, of course, Vittorio DeSica, he produced films notable for breaking with prevailing themes that dealt with the immediate aftermath of World War II. His early works addressed themselves instead to the fundamental, even timeless, social issues affecting postwar Italy and in particular, those exemplified in the poverty of the island of Sicily.

Germi’s early films, notably In nome della legge and Il cammino della speranza, owe as much, if not more, to the influence of American director John Ford as they do to neorealism. In Germi’s work, Sicily easily replaces Ford’s Monument Valley and the island’s traditional knife duels supplant the American director’s classic showdowns. In all other respects, the fundamental issues in Germi’s first few films differ little from a typical John Ford production like Stagecoach. Indeed the themes of the aforementioned Germi films (in In nome della legge, a clash between a young judge and the local Mafia over his attempts to enforce the law and, in Il cammino della speranza, the problem of illegal immigration) deal with problems not too far removed from those of the actual post-Civil War American West.

Interestingly, the fact that Germi dared to propose solutions to the problems that he examined in these and in succeeding films effectively removed him from the realm of pure neorealism which, as construed by Rossellini and his immediate followers, must limit itself merely to the exposition of a particular social condition. It cannot suggest solutions. Unfortunately, in a number of cases (Il cammino della speranza, in particular), the director’s solutions were overly romanticized, pat, and simplistic.

During the latter part of the 1950s, Germi began to compress the scope of his social concerns to those affecting the individual and his relationship to the family unit, albeit as components of the larger society. In Il ferrovieri and L’uomo di Paglia, however, he continued to be plagued by his penchant for simplistic and overly contrived solutions as well as a tendency to let the films run on too long. They are redeemed to some extent by their realistic portrayals of working class characters which, though considered melodramatic by many reviewers at the time of their release, these characterizations have come to be more highly regarded.

Germi corrected his problems in the 1960s by changing his narrative style to one dominated by satirical devices. Yet he did not compromise his family-centered social vision. Divorzio all’italiana, for which he won an Academy Award for best screenplay, Sedotta e abbandonata, and Signori e signore all magnify social questions all out of proportion to reality and thus, through the chaos that results, reduce the issues to absurdity.

Divorzio all’italiana, in particular, is a craftsmanlike portrayal of the internal upheavals within a family, set in the oppressive atmosphere of a small Sicilian village. It features the deft use of a moving camera that passes swiftly, almost intimately, through endless groups of gawking townspeople. In addition, the director’s use of actors, including Marcello Mastroianni and Daniella Rocca, as well as his own latent sense of humor, make the social commentary in this film quite possibly more penetrating than in his early neorealist films.

Though Germi shifted over the length of his career from social dramas to socio-moral satires, his social concerns and his favorite setting for them—Sicily—remained constant. As is not normally the case with many artists of his stature, his most polished and commercially successful efforts also turned out to be the critical equals of his earlier and more solemn ones.

—Stephen L. Hanson

---

GETINO, Octavio

See SOLANAS, Fernando E., and Octavio GETINO

GILLIAM, Terry

Nationality: American. Born: Terry Vance Gilliam in Minneapolis, Minnesota, 22 November 1940. Education: Studied political science at Occidental College, Los Angeles. Family: Married make-up artist Margaret Weston; three children: Amy Rainbow, Holly du Bois, Harry Thunder. Career: Associate editor, HELP magazine, and freelance illustrator, New York, from 1962; moved to London, 1967; illustrator and animator for Marty, We Have Ways of Making You Laugh, and Do Not Adjust Your Set, for TV, 1968; member of Monty Python’s Flying Circus, from 1969; directed first solo project, Jabberwocky, 1977. Awards: British Academy of Film and Television Arts Special Award for Graphics, for Monty Python’s Flying Circus, 1969; Montreux Festival Silver Award, for Monty Python’s Flying Circus, 1971; Best Director and Best Screenplay, Los Angeles Film Critics Association, for Brazil, 1985; Michael Balcon Award, Outstanding British Contribution to Cinema, 1987; Venice Film Festival Silver Lion, for The Fisher King, 1991. Address: The Old Hall, South Grove, Highgate, London N6 6BP England.

Films as Director:

- 1975 Monty Python and the Holy Grail (co-d, + co-sc, anim, ro)
- 1977 Jabberwocky (+ co-sc, ro)
- 1981 Time Bandits (+ co-sc, pr, ro—uncredited)
- 1985 Brazil (+ co-sc)
- 1989 The Adventures of Baron Munchausen (+ co-sc)
- 1991 The Fisher King
- 1995 Twelve Monkeys
- 1998 Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas (+ co-sc)
- 2001 The Man Who Killed Don Quixote (+ co-sc)
- 2002 Good Omens (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

- 1971 And Now for Something Completely Different (co-sc, anim, ro)
- 1979 Monty Python’s Life of Brian (Jones) (co-sc, design, anim, ro)
1982  Monty Python Live at the Hollywood Bowl (co-sc, ro)
1983  Monty Python’s The Meaning of Life (Jones) (co-sc, anim, d some sequences, ro)
1984  The Secret Policeman’s Private Parts (Graef, Temple) (ro)
1985  Spies like Us (Landis) (ro)

By GILLIAM: articles—
Interview in Inter/View (New York), vol. 7, no. 6, 1975.
Interview in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1981.
Interview with Nick Roddick, in Stills (London), February 1985.
Interview with B. Howell, in Films and Filming (London), March 1985.
Interview with M. Girard and A. Caron, in Séquences (Montreal), April 1986.
Interview in Starburst (London), April 1989.
Interview with P. Kremski, in Film Bulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 5/6, 1991.

Publications

By GILLIAM: books—

Harvey Kurtzman’s Fun and Games, with Harvey Kurtzman, New York, 1965.
'Terry Gilliam’s Guilty Pleasures,’” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1991.

‘Empire OneOnOne,’ interview with Bob McCabe, in Empire (London), December 1998.

On GILLIAM: books—

On GILLIAM: articles—

Mathews, J., ‘Earth to Gilliam,’ in American Film (Los Angeles), March 1989.

Van Gelder, L., ‘‘At the Movies,‘’ in New York Times, 1 June 1990.

Ciment, Michel, article in Positif (Paris), November 1990.

Stefanic, M., Jr., ‘‘Kraljevi ribic,’’ in Ekrak (Ljubljana, Yugoslavia), no. 8, 1991.

Drucker, E., ‘‘The Fisher King,’’ in American Film (Los Angeles), September/October 1991.

‘‘Filmografie,’’ in Segnocinema (Vicenza, Italy), January/February 1992.

Frankel, Martha, ‘‘Terry Does Vegas,’’ in Movieline (Los Angeles), June 1998.

**

‘‘A trilogy about the ages of Man and the subordination of magic to realism.’’ So Terry Gilliam described the trio of films which stretched from Time Bandits through Brazil to The Adventures of Baron Munchausen. Gilliam has worked resolutely in the space between the two elements of magic and reality in all his work, hardly surprising in a man who first became widely known as the provider of brilliant, surreal animation sequences for the Monty Python comedy team in the late 1960s and early 1970s.

Gilliam is very much a champion of imagination in his films in both visual and narrative terms. Despite his often surreal vision, however, the products of the imagination do not necessarily have to be fantastic. Love, for example—often a triumph of emotional imagination over reality—has been an important arena in Gilliam’s battle between magic and realism—comical and childlike in Jabberwocky, bittersweet and adult in Brazil. For Gilliam, magic counterbalances what he perceives as the sterility of the rational, a view that is manifested in extreme form in the Orwellian nightmare world of Brazil. If love is perhaps the emotional expression of Gilliam’s magic, then visual and narrative fantasy is the conceptual. Elements of the fantastic have been ever-present in Gilliam’s work from his Monty Python days to the spectacles of Baron Munchausen (an island transformed into a giant fish, a ship gliding through a desert strewn with statues). His feature films often seem, in fact, semi-conscious attempts to recreate the world of his early animations in live-action.

Fellow director Alex Cox has described Gilliam as a “highly skilled visualist,” a judgement which cannot really be disputed. (It is worth noting that Gilliam’s cinematographer for the dazzling Brazil was Roger Pratt, later to give a similar gloss to the mega-buck Batman.) Gilliam is often criticized, however, for opting for visual pyrotechnics at the expense of narrative solidity. The issue is clouded by Gilliam’s constant return to the fairy tale/fantasy format, where the requirement of narrative sense or continuity is arguably less strict anyway. Arthurian legend in Monty Python and The Holy Grail (co-directed with Terry Jones), Lewis Carroll’s nonsense world in Jabberwocky, time travel in Time Bandits, an insane world in Brazil, eighteenth-century tall tales in Baron Munchausen, and a psychedelically garish Las Vegas in Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas all exemplify Gilliam’s fascination with fantasy. Is Gilliam merely an escapist with a remarkably fertile imagination? In opting to undermine the bedrock of dull rationality does he fail to offer anything in return? It is, after all, perfectly possible to make films which are funny and surreal and which have bite—satire as opposed to escapism.

Gilliam’s defense against such charges is Brazil. Without Brazil, Gilliam’s output smacks a little too much of clownish entertainment. But with Brazil it is clear that the clown can also wear a sadder, darker face. For here, Gilliam opts to take on board the challenging burdens of rationality rather than trying merely to escape them. His vision has weight. If he escapes here it is through facing the deadening products of rationality and triumphing over them through a combination of acid ridicule and emotional willpower. The sights which influenced his perception of the story included a Los Angeles riot, and he has half-cryptically, half-menacingly described the setting of the film as “somewhere on the Los Angeles/Belfast border.”

Brazil revealed depths to Gilliam’s talent which had only been glimpsed in his blackly comic Monty Python animations rather than his earlier features. Baron Munchausen, disappointingly, proved a regression back to escapism rather than a development of the inspired mood of Brazil (though the pressures of an ever-escalating budget cannot have helped). Perhaps the battle he had to fight with Warner Bros. over Brazil—first over a re-edit (read massacre), then over even releasing the film—had warned him against attempting anything with real edge.

The Fisher King, Gilliam’s follow-up to The Adventures of Baron Munchausen, ranks with Brazil as among his most thoughtful works. The film, a dazzlingly visual allegory that offers a profound commentary on ethics in contemporary society, ponders a tarnished soul’s chance to reclaim a moral lifestyle. Its scenario (authored by Richard LaGravenese, rather than Gilliam) spotlights the plight of Jack Lucas (Jeff Bridges), a cold-hearted, self-centered radio talk show host who undergoes a personality crisis when one of his listeners, whom he has just crudely dismissed, promptly commits mass murder. Lucas is delivered from the brink of despair by a character who might have been concocted during Gilliam’s early Monty Python days, an odd-ball street person (Robin Williams) who is consumed with finding the Holy Grail and hooking up with an evasive young woman (Amanda Plummer).
In 1995 Gilliam released Twelve Monkeys, a film set in post-apocalyptic America. Reminiscent of Brazil in its dark vision of the future, Twelve Monkeys concerns a criminal of the future (played by Bruce Willis) who is sent back in time to late twentieth-century America to gather information about a devastating plague that pushed survivors into a bleak underground existence. The film was more accessible to mainstream audiences than some of Gilliam’s earlier films (in part because of its big-name cast, which also included Madeleine Stowe and Brad Pitt), but still featured Gilliam’s signature cynicism about society’s dark underbelly.

The filmmaker’s follow-up, Fear and Loathing in Las Vegas, was a complete misfire, and easily is his least-successful feature. It is an ill-advised visualization of Hunter S. Thompson’s 1971 book, in which the writer’s alter ego, Raoul Duke (Johnny Depp), and his lawyer, Dr. Gonzo (Benicio Del Toro), do Las Vegas while zonked to the gills. Thompson’s book may accurately capture a time and place; the film, though crammed with Gilliam’s patented visual wizardry, seems sorely dated and totally unnecessary.

Gilliam’s films are brilliantly imaginative, though sometimes maddeningly uneven. He remains an outstanding talent who, unfortunately, works too infrequently on screen—and one wonders if he ever will approach the depth of vision he so successfully mined in Brazil.

—Norman Miller, updated by Rob Edelman

GILLIAT, Sidney

See LAUNDER, Frank, and Sidney GILLIAT

GODARD, Jean-Luc

Jean-Luc Godard
1965  “Montparnasse—Levallois” in Paris vu par . . . (+ sc); Alphaville (+ sc); Une Étrange aventure de Lemmy Caution (+ sc); Pierrot le fou (+ sc)

1966 Masculin-féminin (Masculin féminin: quinze faits précis) (+ sc); Made in U.S.A. (+ sc, voice on tape recorder)

1967 Deux ou trois choses que je sais d'elle (co-d, + sc) (unfinished)

1968 Le Gai Savoir (+ sc); Cinétracts (+ sc) (series of untitled, creditless newreels); Un Film comme les autres (+ sc, voice); One Plus One (Sympathy for the Devil) (+ sc, voice); One A.M. (One American Movie) (+ sc) (unfinished)

1969 British Sounds (See You at Mao) (co-d, co-sc); Pravda (+ sc) (collective credit to Groupe Dziga-Vertov); Lotte in Italia (Lutes en Italie) (+ sc) (collective credit to Groupe Dziga-Vertov); “L’amore” episode of Amore e rabbia (+ sc) (completed 1967: festival showings as “Andante et ritorno dei figli prodighi” episode of Vangelo 70)

1970 Vent d’est (co-d, co-sc); Jusqu’à la victoire (Till Victory) (co-d, + sc) (unfinished)

1971 Vladimir et Rosa (+ sc, collective credit to Groupe Dziga-Vertov, role as U.S. policeman, appearance, narration)

1972 Tout va bien (co-d, + co-sc, pr); A Letter to Jane or Investigation about a Still (Lettre à Jane) (co-d, + co-sc, co-pr, narration)

1975 Numéro deux (+ co-sc, co-pr, appearance)

1976 Ici et ailleurs (co-d, + co-sc) (includes footage from Jusqu’à la victoire); Comment ça va (co-d, + co-sc)

1977 6 x 2: sur et sous la communication (co-d, + co-sc) (for TV)

1980 Sauve qui peut (La vie; Every Man for Himself) (+ co-sc, co-ed)

1982 Passion (+ sc)

1983 Prenom: Carmen (First Name: Carmen) (role)

1985 Hail Mary; Detective

1986 Grandeur et Decadence d’un Petit Commerce du Cinema (The Rise and Fall of a Little Film Company) (for TV)

1987 Soigne ta droite (Keep up Your Right) (ed, role); episode in Aria; King Lear (role)

1990 Nouvelle Vague (New Wave) (+ sc)

1991 Visages Suisse (Faces of Switzerland) (co-d)

1992 Allemagne Neuf Zero (Germany Nine Zero) (+ sc)

1993 Helas Pour Moi (Oh, Woe Is Me) (+ sc, ed)

1994 JLG/JLG—Autoportrait de Decembre (JLG/JLG—Self-Portrait in December) (+ sc, appearance)

1995 Deux fois cinquante ans de cinema Français (Two times 50 Years of French Cinema) (co-d, + co-sc, co-ed); Les enfants jouent a la Russie (The Kids Play Russian) (+ sc, ed, appearance)

1996 For Ever Mozart

1998 The Old Place; Histoire du cinema: Fatale beauté (+ sc, ed); Histoire du cinema: La monnaie de l’absolu (+ sc, ed); Histoire du cinema: Le contrôle de l’univers (+ sc, ed); Histoire du cinema: Les signes parmi nous (+ sc, ed); Histoire du cinema: Seul le cinema (+sc, ed); Histoire du cinema: Une vague nouvelle (+sc,ed)

1999 Éloge de l’amour (+ sc)

2000 L’Origine du XXIème siècle (+ sc)

Other Films:

1950 Quadrille (Rivette) (pr, role)

1951 Présentation ou Charlotte et son steack (Rohmer) (role)

1956 Kreutzer Sonata (Rohmer) (pr); Le Coup de berger (Rivette) (role)

1958 Paris nous appartient (Rivette) (Godard’s silhouette)

1959 Le Signe du lion (Rohmer) (role)

1961 Cléo de cinq à sept (Varda) (role with Anna Karina in comic sequence); Le Soleil dans l’oeil (Bourdon) (role)

1963 Scheherazade (Gaspard-Huit) (role); The Directors (pr: Greenblatt) (appearance); Paparazzi (Rozier) (appearance); Begegnung mit Fritz Lang (Fleischmann) (appearance); Petit Jour (Pierre) (appearance)

1966 L’Espion (The Defector) (Levy) (role)

1971 One P.M. (One Parallel Movie) (Pennebaker) (includes footage from abandoned One A.M. and documentary footage of its making)

Publications

By GODARD: books—

Godard on Godard: Critical Writings by Jean-Luc Godard, with Jean Luce Godard and Annette Michelson, edited by Jean Narboni, New York, 1988.

By GODARD: articles—

Interview with Tom Milne, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1962.

Interview with Herbert Feinstein, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1964.

“A bout de souffle,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), March 1968.
“Struggle on Two Fronts,” an interview with Jacques Bontemps, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1968.
Interview with Don Ranvaud and A. Farassino, in Framework (Norwich), Summer 1983.
“The Carrots Are Cooked,” an interview with Gideon Bachman, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1984.
“Godard in His ‘Fifth’ Period,” an interview with K. Dieckmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1985/86.
Godard, Jean-Luc, article in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 30, no. 2/3, 1988.
Interview in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), November 1990.
Interview in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), October 1993.
Interview with Andrew Sarris, in Interview, July 1994.
Interview with Scott Kraft, in Los Angeles Times, 2 April 1995.
Interview with Hal Hartley, in Chaplin (Stockholm), vol. 37, no. 1, 1995.
Interview with J. Tykwer, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), November 1995. Article iniskassio Kino (Moscow), January 1998.

On GODARD: books—
Mancini, Michele, Godard, Rome, 1969.
Farassino, Alberto, Godard, Florence, 1974.
Kawin, Bruce, Mindscreen: Bergman, Godard, and First-Person Film, Pinceton, New Jersey, 1978.
Lesage, Julia, Jean-Luc Godard, a Guide to References and Resources, Boston, 1979.
Kreidl, John Francis, Jean-Luc Godard, Boston, 1980.
Achard, Maurice, Vous avez dit Godard: ou J’m’appelle pas Godard, Paris, 1980.
Lefevre, Raymond, Jean-Luc Godard, Paris, 1983.
Weis, Elisabeth, and John Belton, Film Sound: Theory and Practice, New York, 1985.
Cerisuelo, Marc, Jean-Luc Godard, Paris, 1989.
Paech, Joachim, Passion, oder, Die Einbildungen des Jean-Luc Godard, Frankfort, 1989.

On GODARD: articles—
Bellour, Raymond, “Godard or Not Godard,” in Les Lettres Françaises (Paris), 14 May 1964.
Sarris, Andrew, and Andrew Blasi, “Waiting for Godard,” in Film Culture (New York), Summer 1964.
“Godard Issue” of Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1968.
Clouzot, Claire, “Godard and the U.S.,” in Sight and Sound (Lon- don), Summer 1968.
MacBean, James, “Politics, Poetry, and the Language of Signs in Godard’s Made in U.S.A.,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1969.
MacBean, James, “Godard and the Dziga Vertov Group: Film and Dialectic,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1972.
“Godard Issue” of Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1982.
Dossier on Godard, in Cinématographe (Paris), December 1983.
“Godard Issue” of Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), Summer 1986.
Francois Quennin, article in Cinéma (Paris), June 1988.
Article in L’avant Scene Cinéma (Paris), April 1989.
Stam, Robert, “The Lake, the Trees,” in Film Comment, January/February 1991.
Dieckmann, Katherine, “Godard’s Counter Memory,” in Art in America (New York), October 1993.
Price, Brian, “Plagiarizing the Plagiarist: Godard Meets the Situationists,” in Film Comment (New York), November–December 1997.
Dixon, Wheeler Winston, “For Ever Godard: Notes on Godard’s For Ever Mozart,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), April 1998.

On GODARD: films—

Bazin, Janine, and others, Jean-Luc Godard, ou le cinéma de défi, for TV, 1964.
Doniol-Valcroze, Jacques, Pour le plaisir, for TV, 1965.
Breckmann, Jean-Pierre, La Longue Marche de Jean-Luc Godard, Belgium, 1972.
Costard, Hellmuth, Der kleine Godard, West Germany, 1978.

* * *

If influence on the development of world cinema is the criterion, then Jean-Luc Godard is certainly the most important filmmaker of the past thirty years; he is also one of the most problematic.

Godard’s career so far falls roughly into three periods: the early works from About de souffle to Weekend (1959–1968), a period whose end is marked decisively by the latter film’s final caption, “Fin de Cinéma”; the period of intense politicization, during which Godard collaborated (mainly though not exclusively) with Jean-Pierre Gorin and the Dziga Vertov group (1968–1972); and the subsequent work, divided between attempts to renew communication with a wider, more “mainstream” cinema audience and explorations of the potentialities of video (in collaboration with Anne-Marie Miéville). One might also separate the films from Masculin-Féminin to Weekend as representing a transitional phase from the first to the Dziga Vertov period, although in a sense all Godard’s work is transitional. What marks the middle period off from its neighbours is above all the difference in intended audience: the Dziga Vertov films were never meant to reach the general public. They were instead aimed at already committed Marxist or leftist groups, campus student groups, and so on, to stimulate discussion of revolutionary politics and aesthetics, and, crucially, the relationship between the two.

Godard’s importance lies in his development of an authentic modernist cinema in opposition to (though, during the early period, at the same time within) mainstream cinema; it is with his work that film becomes central to our century’s major aesthetic debate, the controversy developed through such figures as Lukács, Brecht, Benjamin, and Adorno as to whether realism or modernism is the more progressive form. As ex-Cahiers du Cinéma critic and New Wave filmmaker, Godard was initially linked with Truffaut and Chabrol in a kind of revolutionary triumvirate; it is easy, in retrospect, to see that Godard was from the start the truly radical figure, the ‘revolution’ of his colleagues operating purely on the aesthetic level and easily assimilable into the mainstream.

A simple way of demonstrating the essential thrust of Godard’s work is to juxtapose his first feature, Breathless, with the excellent American remake. Jim McBride’s film follows the original fairly closely, with the fundamental difference that in it all other elements are subordinated to the narrative and the characters. In Godard’s film, on the contrary, this traditional relationship between signifier and signified shows a continuous tendency to come adrift, so that the process of narration (which mainstream cinema strives everywhere to conceal) becomes foregrounded; A bout de souffle is ‘about’ a story and characters, certainly, but it is also about the cinema, about film techniques, about Jean Seberg, etc.

This foregrounding of the process—and the means—of narration is developed much further in subsequent films, in which Godard systematically breaks down the traditional barrier between fiction documentary, actor/character, narrative film/experimental film to create free, ‘open’ forms. Persons appear as themselves in works of fiction, actors address the camera/audience in monologues or as if being interviewed, materiality of film is made explicit (the switches from positive to negative in Une Femme mariée, the turning on and off of the soundtrack in Deux ou trois choses que je sais d’elle, the showing of the clapper-board in La Chinoise). The initial motivation for this seems to have been the assertion of personal freedom: the filmmaker shatters the bonds of traditional realism in order to be able to say and do whatever he wants, creating films spontaneously. (Pierrot le fou—significantly, one of Godard’s most popular films—is the most extreme expression of this impulse.) Gradually, however, a political motivation (connected especially with the influence of Brecht) takes over. There is a marked sociological interest in the early films (especially Vivre sa vie and Une Femme mariée), but the turning-point is Masculin-féminin with its two male protagonists, one seeking fulfillment through personal relations, the other a political activist. The former’s suicide at the end of the film can be read as marking a decisive choice: from here on, Godard increasingly listens to the voice of revolutionary politics and eventually (in the Dziga Vertov films) adopts it as his own voice.

The films of the Dziga Vertov group (named after the great Russian documentarist who anticipated their work in making films that foreground the means of production and are continuously self-reflexive) were the direct consequence of the events of May 1968. More than ever before the films are directly concerned with their own process, so that the ostensible subjects—the political scene in Czechoslovakia (Pravda) or Italy (Lotte in Italia), the trial of the Chicago Eight (Vladimir and Rosa)—become secondary to the urgent, actual subject: how does one make a revolutionary film? It was at this time that Godard distinguished between making political films (i.e., films on political subjects: Costa-Gavras’s Z is a typical example) and making films politically, the basic assumption being that one cannot put radical content into traditional form without seriously compromising, perhaps negating, it. Hence the attack on realism initiated at the outset of Godard’s career manifests its full political significance: realism is a bourgeois art form, the means whereby the bourgeoisie endlessly reassures itself, validating its own ideology as ‘true,’ ‘natural,’ ‘real’; its power must be destroyed. Of the films from this period, Vent d’ester (the occasion for Peter Wollen’s seminal essay on ‘‘Counter-Cinema’’ in After Image) most fully realized this aesthetic: the original pretext (the pastiche of a Western) recedes into the background, and the film becomes a discussion about itself—about the relationship between sound and image, the materiality of film, the destruction of bourgeois forms, the necessity for continuous self-criticism and self-awareness.

The assumption behind the Dziga Vertov films is clearly that the revolutionary impetus of May 1968 would be sustained, and it has not been easy for Godard to adjust to its collapse. That difficulty is the subject of one of his finest works, Tout va bien (again in collaboration with Gorin), an attempt to return to commercial filmmaking without abandoning the principles (both aesthetic and political) of the preceding years. Beginning by foregrounding Godard’s own problem (how does a radical make a film within the capitalist production system?), the film is strongest in its complex use of Yves Montand and Jane Fonda (simultaneously fictional characters/personalities/star images) and its exploration of the issues to which they are central. These issues include the relationship of intellectuals to the class struggle; the relationship between professional work, personal commitment, and political position; and the problem of sustaining a radical impulse in a non-revolutionary age. Tout va bien is Godard’s most authentically Brechtian film, achieving radical force and analytical clarity without sacrificing pleasure and a degree of emotional involvement.

Godard’s relationship to Brecht has not always been so clear-cut. While the justification for Brecht’s distanciation principles was always the communication of clarity, Godard’s films often leave the spectator in a state of confusion and frustration. He continues to seem by temperament more anarchist than Marxist. One is troubled by the continuity between the criminal drop-outs of the earlier films and the political activists of the later. The insistent intellectualism of the films is often offset by a wilful abeyance of systematic thinking, the abeyance, precisely, of that self-awareness and self-criticism the political works advocate. Even in Tout va bien, what emerges from the political analysis as the film’s own position is an irresponsible and ultimately desperate belief in spontaneity. Desperation, indeed, is never far from the Godardian surface, and seems closely related to the treatment of heterosexual relations: even through the apparent feminist awareness of the recent work runs a strain of unwitting misogyny (most evident, perhaps, in Sauve qui peut). The central task of Godard criticism, in fact, is to sort out the remarkable and salutary nature of the positive achievement from the temperamental limitations that flaw it.
From 1980 on, Godard commenced the second phase of his directorial career. Unfortunately, far too many of his films have become increasingly inaccessible to the audiences who had championed him in his heyday during the 1960s. Saute qui peut (La Vie) (Every Man for Himself), Godard’s comeback film, portended his future work. It is an awkward account of three characters whose lives become entwined: a man who has left his wife for a woman; the woman, who is in the process of leaving the man for a rural life; and a country girl who has become a prostitute. In fact, several of Godard’s works might best be described as anti-movies. Passion, for example, features characters named Isabelle, Michel, Hanna, Laszlo and Jerzy (played respectively by Isabelle Huppert, Michel Piccoli, Hanna Schygulla, Laszlo Szabo, and Jerzy Radziwilowicz), who are involved in the shooting of a movie titled Passion. The latter appears to be not so much a structured narrative as a series of scenes which are visions of a Renaissance painting. The film serves as a cynical condemnation of the business of moviemaking-for-profit, as the extras are poorly treated and the art of cinema is stained by commercial considerations.

Prenom: Carmen (First Name: Carmen) is Godard’s best latter career effort, a delightfully subversive though no less pessimistic mirror of the filmmaker’s disenchantment with the cinema. His Carmen is a character straight out of his earlier work; a combination seductress/terrorist/wannabe movie maker. Her uncle, played by Godard, is a once-celebrated but now weary and faded film director named, not surprisingly, Jean-Luc Godard.

It seemed that Godard had simply set out to shock in Hail, Mary, a redo of the birth of Christ set in contemporary France. His Mary is a young student and gas station attendant; even though she has never had sex with Joseph, her taxi-driving boyfriend, she discovers she is pregnant. Along with Scorsese’s The Last Temptation of Christ, this became a cause celebre among Catholics and even was censured by the Pope. However, the film is eminently forgettable; far superior is
The Book of Mary, a perceptive short about a girl and her constantly quarrelling parents. It accompanied showings of Hail, Mary, and is directed by long-time Godard colleague Anne-Marie Miéville.

Detective, dedicated to auteur heroes John Cassavetes, Edgar G.
Ulmer, and Clint Eastwood, is a verbose, muddled film noir. Despite its title, Nouvelle Vague (New Wave), an observance of the lives of a wealthy and influential couple, only makes one yearn for the days of the real ‘‘Nouvelle Vague.’’ The narrative, which focuses on the sexual and political issues that are constans in Godard’s films, is barely discernable; the dialogue—including such lines as ‘‘Love doesn’t die, it leaves you,’’ ‘‘One man isn’t enough for a woman—or too much,’’ ‘‘A critic is a soldier who fires at his own regiment,’’ ‘‘Have you ever been stung by a dead bee?’’—is superficially profound. King Lear, an excessive, grotesque updating of Shakepeare, is of note for its oddball, once-in-a-lifetime cast: Godard;
Woody Allen; Norman and Kate Mailer; stage director Peter Sellars;
Burgess Meredith; and Molly Ringwald. The political thriller Allemagne
Neuf/Zero (Germany Nine Zero), although as confusing as any latter-day Godard film, works as nostalgia because of the presence of Eddie Constantine. He is recast as private eye Lemmy Caution, who last appeared in Alphaville. Here, he encounters various characters in a reunified Germany.

Hellas Pour Moi (Oh, Woe Is Me), based on the Greek legend of Alcmena and Amphitryon and a text penned by the Italian poet Leopardi, is a long-winded bore about a God who wants to perceive human feeling; those intrigued by the subject matter would be advised to see Wim Wenders’ Wings of Desire and Faraway, So Close. JLG/JLG—Autoportrait de Decembre (JLG/JLG—Self-Portrait in December), filmed in and near Godard’s Swiss home, is a semi-abstract biography of the filmmaker. Its structure is appropriate, given the development of Godard’s cinematic style. Ultimately, it is of interest mostly to those still concerned with Godard’s life and career.

—Robin Wood, updated by Rob Edelman

GÓMEZ, Sara

Nationality: Cuban. Born: Havana, 1943. Education: Conservatory of Music, Havana. Career: Assistant director at Instituto Cubano del
Arte e industria Cinematograficos (ICAIC), under Tomás Gutiérrez
Alea, Jorge Fraga, and Agnes Varda, from 1961; directed first film,
Ire a Santiago, 1964; shot and edited first feature, De cierta manera, 1974; original negative, damaged in processing, restored under supervision of Gutiérrez Alea and Rigoberto Lopez, 1974–76. Died:
Of acute asthma, 2 June 1974.

Films as Director:

1964 Ire a Santiago
1965 Excursion a Vueltabajo
1967 Y tenemos sabor
1968 En la otra isla
1969 Isla del tesero
1970 Poder local, poder popular
1971 Un documental a proposito del trasno
1972 Atencion prenatale; Ano uno
1973 Sobre horas extras y trabajo voluntario
1977 De cierta manera (One Way or Another)

Publications

On GÓMEZ: book—

On GÓMEZ: articles—Chijona, Geraldo, and Rigoberto López, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 93.
Burton, Juliianne, “Individual Fulfillment and Collective Achieve-Burton, Juliianne, “Introduction to the Revolutionary Cuban Cinema,” and Carlos Galiano, “One Way or Another: The Revolu-
Lesage, Julia, “One Way or Another: Dialectical, Revolutionuy,
We shall never know all that Sara Gómez might have given to us. We have her one feature film, the marvelous _De cierta manera_, and a few short documentaries to indicate what might have been had she lived beyond the age of thirty-one. But we will never really know all that this prodigiously talented black woman was capable of.

Sara Gómez could be seen as prototypical of the new Cuban directors. Entering the Cuban Film Institute (ICAIC) at an early age, she worked as assistant director for various cineastes, including Tomás Gutiérrez Alea, whose influence marked her work as it has so many young directors. During a ten-year period (1964–74) she fulfilled the usual apprenticeship among Cuban cineastes by directing documentary films. Documentaries are seen as an important training ground for Cuban directors because they force them to focus on the material reality of Cuba and thus emphasize the use of cinema as an expression of national culture. As Gutiérrez Alea noted, “the kind of cinema which adapts itself to our interests, fortunately, is a kind of light, agile cinema, one that is very directly founded upon our own reality.’’ This is precisely the kind of cinema Sara Gómez went on to produce, beginning work on _De cierta manera_ in 1974 and finishing the editing of the film shortly before her death of acute asthma.

Gómez’s early training in documentaries and the influence of Gutiérrez Alea is evident in _De cierta manera_. The film combines the documentary and fiction forms so inextricably that they are impossible to disentangle. Through this technique, she emphasized the material reality that is at the base of all creative endeavor and the necessity of bringing a critical perspective to all forms of film.

In choosing this style, which I call “dialectical resonance,” Gómez appeared to follow Gutiérrez Alea’s example in the superb _Memories of Underdevelopment_. But there is a crucial difference between the two films—a difference that might be said to distinguish the generation of directors who came of age before the triumph of the revolution (e.g., Gutiérrez Alea) from those who have grown up within the revolution. In spite of its ultimate commitment to the revolutionary process, _Memories_ remains in some ways the perspective of an “outsider” and might be characterized as “critical bourgeois realism.” However, _De cierta manera_ is a vision wholly from within the revolution, despite the fact that every position in the film is subjected to criticism—including that of the institutionalized revolution, which is presented in the form of an annoyingly pompous omniscient narration. Thus, the perspective of Gomez might be contrasted to that of _Memories_ by calling it “critical socialist realism.” The emphasis on dialectical criticism, struggle, and commitment is equally great in both films, but the experience of having grown up within the revolution created a somewhat different perspective.

Despite its deceptively simple appearance—a result of being shot in 16mm on a very low budget—_De cierta manera_ is the work of an extremely sophisticated filmmaker. Merely one example among many of Gómez’s sophistication is the way in which she combined a broad range of modern distanciation techniques with the uniquely Cuban tropical beat to produce a film that is simultaneously rigorously analytic and powerfully sensuous—as well as perhaps the finest instance to date of a truly dialectical film. Although we are all a little richer for the existence of this work, we remain poorer for the fact that she will make no more films.

—John Mraz

GORETTA, Claude

Nationality: Swiss. Born: Geneva, 23 June 1929. Education: Law coursework at Université de Genève. Career: With Alain Tanner, moved to London, 1955; worked at British Film institute, 1956–57; television director in Switzerland, from 1958; formed production company “Groupe de 5,” with Tanner, Jean-Louis Roy, Claude Soutter, and Yves Yersin, 1968; directed first feature, _Le Fou_, 1970.
Awards: Ecumenical Prize, Cannes Festival, for _La Dentellière_, 1977.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>Nice Time (co-d, co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>Le Fou (The Madman) (+ co-pr)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1973</td>
<td>L’Invitation (The Invitation) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Pas si méchant que ça (Not as Wicked as That; The Wonderful Crook) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>La Dentellière (The Lacemaker) (co-sc); Jean Piaget (The Epistemology of Jean Piaget)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>La Provinciale (The Girl from Lorraine); Bonheur toi-même</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>La Mort de Mario Ricci (The Death of Mario Ricci)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>Orfeo</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Si le soleil ne revenais pas (If the Sun Never Returns); Le Rapport du Gendarme (for TV)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>L’Ombre; Visages Suisses</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1994</td>
<td>Het Verdriet Van Belgie (d only)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997</td>
<td>Le Dernier été (for TV) (d only)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By GORETTA: book—

By GORETTA: articles—

Interview with M. Boujut, in _Cinema_ (Zurich), vol. 21, no. 1, 1975.

Interview with Judith Kass, in _Movietone News_ (Seattle), 14 August 1978.
On GORETTA: articles—

Buache, F., article in Cinemaction, April 1990.

Schlappner, Martin, article in Film bulletin (Winterthur), January 1998.

***

Claude Goretta’s gentle comedies and sensitive depictions of provincial naifs have been among the most successful Swiss films of the twentieth century. Although Goretta shares his countryman Alain Tanner’s preoccupation with Renoiresque evocations of landscape and lovable eccentrics, there is a sharp disparity between these two idiosyncratic Swiss directors. As Goretta himself has observed, “Tanner’s films always have a discourse, while mine do everything they can to avoid one.”

Goretta’s first film, an experimental short called Nice Time, was in fact made with the collaboration of Alain Tanner when both men were affiliated with the British Film Institute. This impressionistic view of Piccadilly Circus, one of the sleazier parts of central London, prefigures both directors’ subsequent interest in whimsical vignettes with serious, and occasionally acerbic, sociological underpinnings. Like many contemporary directors of note, Goretta served his apprenticeship in television. Many of his early television films were literary adaptations, including an adaptation of four Chekhov stories, Chekov ou le miroir des vie perdues. Goretta’s first feature film, Le Fou, featured one of his favorite actors, the distinguished character player, François Simon. Despite a mixed critical reception, Le Fou was awarded a prize as the best Swiss film of 1970 by the Swiss Critics’ Association. L’Invitation was the first of Goretta’s films to receive widespread international recognition. This unpretentious comedy about the loss of inhibitions experienced by a group of office workers during a mildly uproarious party was ecstatically reviewed by British and American critics who casually invoked the names of both Bunuel and Renoir for the sake of comparison. Pas si méchant que ça fared less well with both the critics and public, although Gérard Depardieu’s charming portrayal of a whimsical thief was widely praised.

Le Dentellière, an incisive character study of a guileless young beautician played flawlessly by Isabelle Huppert (in her first major role), received an even more rhapsodic critical reception than L’Invitation. Jean Boffety’s pristine cinematography and Goretta’s restrained direction were singled out for praise, although several feminist critics cogently observed that Goretta’s reverence for the Huppert character’s enigmatic passivity was a singularly insidious example of male condescension.

Les Chemins de l’exil marked Goretta’s return to his roots in documentary filmmaking. This leisurely biographical portrait of Jean-Jacques Rousseau stars François Simon as the famed philosophe who remains one of the most celebrated figures in Swiss cultural history. La Provinciale was a somewhat muddled attempt to reiterate many of the themes first explored in La Dentellière, although Nathalie Baye’s performance was suffused with integrity. The Death of Mario Ricci was favorably received at the 1983 Cannes Film Festival.

—Richard Porton

GOSHO, Heinosuke

Films as Director:

1925 Nanto no haru (Spring of Southern Island) (+ sc); Sora wa haretari (No Clouds in the Sky); Otokogokoro (Man’s Heart) (+ sc); Seishun (Youth) (+ sc); Tosei tanatebako (A Casket for Living)
1926 Machi no hitobito (Town People); Hatsukoi (First Love) (+ sc); Habayo koishi (Mother, I Miss You; Mother’s Love); Honryu (A Torrent); Musume (A Daughter) (+ sc); Kaeranu sasabue (Bamboo Leaf Flute of No Return; No Return); Itoshi no wa gakko (My Loving Child) (+ sc); Kanojo (She; Girl Friend) (+ sc)
1927 Sabishiki ranbomono (Lonely Hoodlum); Hazukashii yume (Shameful Dream), Karakuri musume (Fake Girl) (+ co-sc); Shojo no shi (Death of a Maiden) (+ co-sc); Okane (A Plain Woman) (+ sc); Tokyo koshinkyoko (Tokyo March)
1928 Sukinareba koso (Because I Love; If You Like It) (+ co-sc); Mura no hanayome (The Village Bride); Doraku shinan (Guidance to the Indulgent; Debauchery Is Wrong) (+ co-sc); Kami e no michi (Road to God); Hito no yo no sugata (Man’s Worldly Appearance); Kaido no kishi (Knight of the Street); Haha yo, kimi no na o kegasu nakare (Mother, Do Not Shame Your Name)
1929 Yora no mesuneko (Cat of the Night); Shin josei kagami (A New Kind of Woman); Oyaji to sono ko (Father and His Son); Ukiyo-buro (The Bath Harem) (+ sc); Netsujo no ichiya (A Night of Passion) (+ co-sc)
1930 Dokushinsa gyojojin (Bachelors Beware) (+ co-sc); Dai-Tokyo bi ikkaka (A Corner of Great Tokyo) (+ add’l dialogue); Hohoemu jinsei (A Smiling Life); Onna yo, kimi no na o kegasu nakare (Women, Do Not Shame Your Names); Shojo nyayo (Virgin Wanted); Kinuyo monogatari (The Kinuyo Story); Aiyoku no ki (Record of Love and Desire)
1931 Jokyu aishi (Sad Story of a Barmaid); Yora hiraku (Open at Night); Madamu to nyobo (Next Door Madame and My Wife; The Neighbor’s Wife and Mine); Shima to ratai jiken (Island of Naked Scandal) (+ add’l dialogue); Gutei kenkei (Stupid Young Brother and Wise Old Brother) (+ add’l dialogue); Wakaki hi no kangeki (Memories of Young Days)
1932 Niisan no baka (My Stupid Brother) Ginza no yamagi (Willows of Ginza); Tengoku ni musubi koi (Heaven Linked with Love); Satsueiromansu: Renai annai (Romance at the Studio: Guidance to Love); Hototogisu (A Cuckoo); Koi no Tokyo (Love in Tokyo)
1933 Hanayome no negoto (The Bride Talks in Her Sleep); Izu no odoriko (Dancer of Izu); Jukyu-sai no haru (The Nineteenth Spring); Shojo yo sayonara (Virgin, Goodbye); Lamuru (L’Amour)
1934 Onna to umaretakaranya (Now That I Was Born a Woman); Sakura Ondo (Sakura Dance); Ikitoshi Ikerumono (Everything That Lives)
1935 Hanamuku no negoto (The Bridegroom Talks in His Sleep); Hidari uchiwa (Wood and Stone) (+ add’l dialogue); Wakare-gumo (Drifting Clouds) (+ co-sc); Gekka no kin o kuresa (A Smiling Life); Akogare (Yearning); Jinsei no omonotsu (Burden of Life)
1936 Oboro yo no onna (Woman of Pale Night); Shindo (New Way) parts I and II; Okasama shakuyosho (A Married Lady Borrows Money)
1937 Hanakago no uta (Song of the Flower Basket) (+ adapt)
1940 Mokukei (Wood and Stone)
1942 Shinsetsu (New Snow)
1944 Goju no to (The Five-storied Pagoda)
1945 Izu no musumetachi (Girls of Izu)
1947 Ima hitotabi no (One More Time)
1948 Omakage (A Vestige)
1951 Wakare-gumo (Drifting Clouds) (+ co-sc)
1952 Asa no hamon (Trouble in the Morning)
1953 Entotsu no mieru basho (Four Chimeras; Where Chimeras Are Seen)
1954 Osaka no yado (An Inn at Osaka) (+ co-sc); Niwatori wa futatabi naku (The Cock Crows Twice); Ai to shi no tanima (The Valley between Love and Death)
1955 Takekurabe (Growing Up)
1956 Aruyo futatabi (Again One Night) (+ co-sc)
1957 Kiiro karasu (Yellow Crow; Behold Thy Son); Banka (Elegy of the North)
1958 Hotarubi (Firefly’s Light); Yoka (Desire); Ari no Machi no Maria (M aria of the Street of Ants)
1959 Karatachi niki (Journal of the Orange Flower)
1960 Waga ai (When a Woman Loves); Shiroi kiba (White Fangs)
1961 Ryoju (Hunting Rifle); Kumo ga chigireru toki (As the Clouds Scatter) (+ co-pr); Aijo no keifu (Record of Love) (+ co-pr)
1962 Kachan kekkon shiroyo (Mother, Get Married) (+ co-sc)
1963 Hyakumanin no musumetachi (A Million Girls) (+ co-sc)
1964 Osore-zan no onna (A Woman of the Osore Mountains; An Innocent Witch)
1966 Kachan to Juichi-nin no Kodomo (Mother and Eleven Children; Our Wonderful Years)
1967 Utage (Feast; Rebellion in Japan)
1968 Onna no misoshiru (Women and Miso Soup); Meiji haruuki (Seasons of Meiji)

Publications

On GOSHO: books—

On GOSHO: articles—

Heinosuke Gosho: A Pattern of Living,” in National Film Theatre Booklet (London), March 1986.

* * *

Heinosuke Gosho began his career in 1925 as a disciple of Yasujiro Shimazu at Shochiku Studio. Young Gosho immediately proved his skill at the genre of ‘shomin-geki,’ stories of the life of ordinary people, characteristic of his mentor’s work at that studio. Gosho’s early films were criticized as “unsound” because they often involved characters physically or mentally handicapped (The Village Bride and Faked Daughter). Gosho’s intention, however, was to illustrate a kind of warm and sincere relationship born in pathos. Today, these films are highly esteemed for their critique of feudalistic village life. Gosho was affected by this early criticism, however, and made his next films about other subjects. This led him into a long creative slump, although he continued to make five to seven films annually.

The first film by Gosho to attract attention was Lonely Hoodlum of 1927, a depiction of the bittersweet life of common people, Gosho’s characteristic subject. In 1931 Shochiku gave him the challenge of making the first Japanese “talkie” (because many established directors had refused). The film, Next Door Madame and My Wife, was welcomed passionately by both audiences and critics. It is a light and clever comedy that effectively uses ambient sounds such as a baby’s cries, an alarm clock, a street vendor’s voice, and jazz music from next door. Because every sound had to be synchronized, Gosho explored many technical devices, and used multiple cameras, different lenses, and frequent cuts to produce a truly “filmic” result.

Gosho preferred many cuts and close-up shots, a practice he related to his studying Lubitsch carefully in his youth. Gosho’s technique of creating a poetic atmosphere with editing is most successful in Dancer of Izu, in which he intentionally chose the silent film form after making several successful talkies.

Even after the success of these films, Gosho had to accept many projects which he did not want to do. He later reflected that only those films that he really wanted to do were well-made. For example, he found the subject of The Living most appealing—its protagonist tries to protest against social injustice but is unable to continue his struggle to the end.

Gosho is believed to be at his best making films depicting the human side of life in his native Tokyo (Woman of Pale Night, Song of the Flower Basket, Where Chimneys Are Seen, and Comparison of Heights). However, the director also worked in many other genres, including romantic melodrama, family drama, light comedy, and social drama. He further extended his range in such films as An Elegy, a contemporary love story, and A Woman of Osore-zan, which is unusual for its unfamiliar dark tones and its eccentricity. His experimental spirit is illustrated by his story of the treatment of a disturbed child with color-oriented visual therapy in Yellow Crow. Throughout his career, Gosho expressed his basic belief in humanistic values. The warm, subtle, and sentimental depiction of likable people is characteristic both of Gosho’s major studio productions and his own independent films.

—Kyoko Hirano

GOULDING, Edmund

Nationality: British. Born: London, 20 March 1891. Career: Stage debut in London, 1903; writer, actor, and director, London theatre, until 1914; New York stage debut, 1915; served with British Army in France, 1915–18; returned to America, worked as writer, 1919; hired by MGM as director/scriptwriter, 1925. Died: In Los Angeles, 24 December 1959.
Edmund Goulding

Films as Director:

1925  Sun-up (+ sc); Sally, Irene and Mary (+ sc)
1926  Paris (Shadows of Paris) (+ sc)
1927  Women Love Diamonds (+ story); Love (Anna Karenina) (+ adapt, uncredited, pr, sc)
1930  ‘Dream Girl’ episode of Paramount on Parade (+ role); The Devil’s Holiday (+ sc, music, song) [foreign language versions: Les Vacances du diable (Cavalcanti); La vacanza del diavolo (Salvatori); La fiesta del diablo (Millar); Sonntag des Lebens (Mittler); En kvinnas morgondag (Bergman)]
1931  Reaching for the Moon (+ sc); The Night Angel (+ sc, song melodies)
1932  Grand Hotel; Blondie of the Follies (+ co-lyrics, bit role as Follies director)
1934  Rip tide; Hollywood Party (co-d, uncredited)
1935  The Flame Within (+ sc)
1937  That Certain Woman (+ sc)
1938  White Banners; The Dawn Patrol
1939  Dark Victory (+ song); The Old Maid; We Are Not Alone
1940  ’Til We Meet Again
1941  The Great Lie
1943  one episode of Forever and a Day; The Constant Nymph; Claudia
1946  Of Human Bondage; The Razor’s Edge; The Shocking Miss Pilgrim (Seaton) (d several scenes while Seaton ill)
1947  Nightmare Alley

1949  Everybody Does It
1950  Mr. Eight Hundred Eighty
1952  Down among the Sheltering Palms; We’re Not Married
1956  Teenage Rebel (+ music for song Dodie)
1958  Mardi Gras

Other Films:

1911  Henry VIII (Parker) (role)
1914  The Life of a London Shopgirl (Raymond) (role)
1916  Quest of Life (sc, co-play basis)
1917  The Silent Partner (Neilan) (sc, story)
1918  The Ordeal of Rosetta (Chauvard) (sc, story)
1919  The Perfect Love (Ralph Ince) (sc); The Glorious Lady (Irving) (sc, story); A Regular Girl (Young) (sc, co-story); Sealed Hearts (Ralph Ince) (sc, co-story); The Imp (Ellis) (sc, co-story)
1920  A Daughter of Two Worlds (Young) (sc); The Sin That Was His (Henley) (sc); The Dangerous Paradise (Earle) (sc, story); The Devil (Young) (sc)
1921  Dangerous Toys (Don’t Leave Your Husband) (Bradley) (sc, story); The Man of Stone (Archainbaud) (sc, co-story); Tol’able David (King) (co-sc); Peacock Alley (Leonard) (sc)
1922  The Seventh Day (King) (sc); Fascination (Leonard) (sc); Broadway Rose (Leonard) (sc); ‘Til We Meet Again (Cabanne) (sc); Heroes of the Street (Beaudine) (co-sc); Fury (King) (sc; d erroneously attributed to Goulding in Library of Congress Copyright Catalogue); Three Little Ghosts (Fitzmaurice) (role)
1923  Dark Secrets (Fleming) (sc); Jazzmania (Leonard) (sc); The Bright Shawl (Robertson) (sc); Bright Lights of Broadway (Bright Lights and Shadows) (Campbell) (sc); Tiger Rose (Franklin) (co-sc)
1924  Dante’s Inferno (Otto) (sc); The Man Who Came Back (Flinn) (sc); Gerald Cranstons’s Lady (Flynn) (sc)
1925  The Dancers (Flynn) (sc); The Scarlet Honeymoon (Hale) (sc, story; some sources credit story to Fannie Davis); The Fool (Millarde) (sc); Havoc (Lee) (sc); The Beautiful City (Webb) (sc, story)
1926  Dancing Mothers (Brenon) (co-play basis)
1928  Happiness Ahead (Seiter) (story); A Lady of Chance (Leonard) (adapt)
1929  The Broadway Melody (Beaumont) (story)
1930  The Grand Parade (Newmeyer) (sc, pr, songs)
1932  Flesh (Ford) (story); No Man of Her Own (Ruggles) (co-story)
1940  Two Girls on Broadway (Choose Your Partner) (Simon) (remake of The Broadway Melody, 1929)
1944  Flight from Folly (Mason) (story basis)

Publications

By GOULDING: book—

Fury, 1922.
By GOULDING: article—

On GOULDING: articles—

Sarris, Andrew, “Likable but Elusive,” in Film Culture (New York), Spring 1963.

* * *

Our sense of Edmund Goulding is, of course, skewed by his frequently revived Grand Hotel and Dark Victory. These films are viewed today not as examples of the director’s art, but rather as star acting vehicles, the second also being seen as a prototypical “woman’s film.” It is generally assumed that such films were primarily authored by the studio and the stars. Yet, without suggesting that Goulding had a visual signature as distinctive as von Sternberg’s or a thematic/ideological one as coherent as Capra’s, we must recognize the director’s personality in the care of the stagings and in the vitality of the performances complemented by those stagings.

Grand Hotel seems, at first, a product of MGM’s collective enterprise rather than Goulding’s particular imagination. The sleekness of the writing, photography, and art direction are exemplary of the studio that defined cinematic luxury. The assembly of stars—Garbo, Crawford, Beery, John and Lionel Barrymore—in a “hotel” as grand as the studio itself would seem sufficient direction of the film. Yet we must give Goulding credit for the exceptionally involved choreography of faces, voices, and bodies in Grand Hotel when we look at the same stars in other movies of the period. The film’s numerous two-shots are organized with a nuance that makes us as attentive to the shifting relationships between those starry faces as we are to the faces themselves. And we need only see Garbo as directed by Clarence Brown or George Fitzmaurice to appreciate the contribution of Edmund Goulding. He is exceptionally sensitive to the time it takes the actress to register thought through her mere act of presence.

That sensitivity is not diminished when Goulding directs Bette Davis, whose rhythm is totally dissimilar to Garbo’s. In Dark Victory and The Old Maid the director presides over shots that permit us to perceive star and character simultaneously, a requisite of successful screen star performance. Goulding’s strength is in characterization, in creating the kind of atmosphere in which actors explore the richest areas within themselves, and in creating the visual/aural contexts that put such exploration in relief for the viewer. This is certainly the case in The Constant Nymph. Its precious narrative conceit—a soulful adolescent girl (Joan Fontaine) inspires an excessively cerebral composer (Charles Boyer) to write music with emotion—both reflects the emotional qualities of Goulding’s films and displays the actors at their most courageous.

For Goulding, the mature Joan Fontaine is able to sustain her impersonation of an impulsive, loving girl for the whole length of a film. And in Nightmare Alley, Tyrone Power is pushed to expose his own persona in the most unflattering light—the “handsome leading man” as charlatan. But that exposure, one of many in the films of Goulding, is also evidence of his affinity for the dilemma of the performing artist, vulnerable in the magnifying exposures of the cinematic medium and dependent on the director’s empathy if that vulnerability is to become a meaningful cinematic sign.

—Charles Affron

GREENAWAY, Peter

Nationality: British. Born: Newport, Gwent, Wales, 5 April 1942.

Education: Studied painting. Career: had first exhibition of paintings, London, 1964; worked as a film editor for the Central Office of Information, 1965–1976; directed his first short film, Train, 1966; directed his first feature, The Falls, 1980. Awards: British Film Institute Special Award, for The Falls, 1980; Melbourne Film Festival Best Short Film, for Act of God, 1981; Cannes Film Festival Best Artistic Contribution, Seattle International Film Festival Golden Space Needle—Best Director, for Drowning by Numbers, 1988; Catalonian International Film Festival Best Director, for The Cook, the Thief, His Wife, and Her Lover, 1989; two prizes at Festival International du Nouveau Cinema et de la Video, for A TV Dante, 1990; Seattle International Film Festival Golden Space Needle—Best Director, Catalonian International Film Festival Best Film, for The Pillow Book, 1996; Istanbul International Film Festival Honorary Award, 1997.

Films as Director/Screenwriter:

1966 Train; Tree
1967 Revolution; Five Postcards from Capital Cities
1969 Intervals
1971 Erosion
1973 H Is for House (+ ph, ed, voice)
1975 Windows (+ ph, ed, voice); Water; Water Wrackets (+ ph, ed)
1976 Goole by Numbers
1977 Dear Phone (+ ph, ed)
1978 I—100; A Walk through H (+ ed); Vertical Features Remake (+ ph, ed)
1980 The Falls (+ ed, narration)
1981 Act of God (for TV) (doc); Zandra Rhodes; Terence Conran (d only)
1982 The Draughtsman’s Contract
1983 Four American Composers
1984 Making a Splash (d only); A TV Dante—Canto 5
1985 Inside Rooms—The Bathroom (Inside Rooms: 26 Bathrooms, London & Oxfordshire, 1985) (doc) (d only); A Zed and Two Noughts
1987 The Belly of an Architect
1988  Drowning by Numbers; Fear of Drowning (co-d) (+ narration); Death in the Seine
1989  The Cook, the Thief, His Wife and Her Lover; A TV Dante (co-d) (for TV); Hubert Bals Handshake (+ narration)
1991  Prospero’s Books; M Is for Man, Music, Mozart
1992  Rosa (d only)
1993  The Baby of Macon; Darwin (for TV)
1995  Stairs 1 Geneva (doc) (d only) (+ narration); Lumiere and Company (co-d)
1996  The Pillow Book (+ ed)
1997  The Bridge (d only)
1999  8 1/2 Women; Death of a Composer (+ narration)

Other Films:

1968  Love Love Love (Nyman) (ed)

Publications

By GREENAWAY: books—

The Cook, the Thief, His Wife, and Her Lover, London, 1989.
Flying out of This World, Paris, 1992; Chicago, 1994.
The World of Peter Greenaway, with Leon Steinmetz, Boston, 1995.

By GREENAWAY: articles—

Interview with Don Ranvaud, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1987.
Interview in Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Winter 1989.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), November 1989.
Interview in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), March 1990.
Interview with Gary Indiana, in Interview (New York), March 1990.
“Food for Thought,” interview with Gavin Smith, in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1990.

“Die Moeglichkeiten dieser aufregenden Rahmen-Geschichten koeene beliebig weitergesponnen werden,” interview with M. Bodmer, in Film Bulletin (Winterthur, Switzerland), no. 5/6, 1991.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), April 1991.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), October 1991.
Interview with D.E. Williams, in Film Threat (Beverly Hills), February 1992.
Greenaway, Peter, “Minden, ami el minden, ami halott,” in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 1, 1993.

On GREENAWAY: books—

Bencivieni, Alexxandro, and Anna Samueli, Peter Greenaway: il cinema delle idee, Recco, Genova, 1996.

On GREENAWAY: articles—

Rayns, Tony, “Peter Greenaway,” in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), September 1983.

Rayns, Tony, ‘‘Of Natural History and Mythology Born,’’ in MONTHLY FILM BULLETIN (London), December 1985.

‘‘Peter Greenaway Section’’ of POSITIF (Paris), April 1986.

Bohringer, R., article in POSITIF (Paris), November 1989.

De Feo, R., ‘‘Fantasy in Crimson,’’ in ART NEWS (New York), March 1990.

Trucco, T., ‘‘The Man Will Eat Literally Anything,’’ in NEW YORK TIMES, 1 April 1990.

Acker, K., ‘‘The Color of Myth,’’ in VILLAGE VOICE (New York), 17 April 1990.

Van Gelder, L., ‘‘At the Movies,’’ in NEW YORK TIMES, 29 June 1990.

Canavas, C., ‘‘Das Kino, das (neue) Fernsehen, die Malerei und ihr Liebhaber Peter Greenaway,’’ in FILMBULLETIN WINTERTHUR, SWITZERLAND, no. 5/6, 1991.

Ardaí, Z., ‘‘Az undor titokzatos torgya,’’ in FILMVILAG (Budapest), no. 12, 1991.

Jacobs, K., ‘‘For Peter Greenaway, Movies Are a Dutch Treat,’’ in NEW YORK TIMES, 21 April 1991.

Olofsson, A., ‘‘In pa bara skinnet,’’ in CHAPLIN (Stockholm), no. 5, 1992.

Csake, M.C., ‘‘Az eltorhetetlen palca’’ in FILMVILAG (Budapest), no. 7, 1992.

De Gaetano, R., ‘‘Lo spessore della superficie,’’ in CINEFORUM (Bergamo, Italy), January/February 1992.

‘‘Percorso fotografico nell’universo di Greenaway,’’ in CINEFORUM (Bergamo, Italy), January/February 1992.

‘‘Filmografie,’’ in SEGNOCINEMA (Vicenza, Italy), January/February 1992.

Imparato, E., ‘‘Il corpo salvato,’’ in CINEFORUM (Bergamo, Italy), July/August 1992.

Rother, R., ‘‘Aesthetik der Quantitaet,’’ in FILMWAERTS (Hanover), Winter 1992.

Lajta, G., ‘‘Vilagszertar,’’ in FILMVILAG (Budapest), no. 1, 1993.

Kozma, G., ‘‘A legy es a mezepsohar,’’ in FILMVILAG (Budapest), no. 4, 1993.

* * *

An ancient Chinese encyclopedia, according to Borges, divides animals into ‘‘(a) those that belong to the Emperor, (b) embalmed ones, (c) those that are trained, (d) suckling pigs, (e) mermaids, (f) fabulous ones, (g) stray dogs, (h) those that are included in this classification, (i) those that tremble as if they are mad, (j) innumerable ones, (k) those drawn with a very fine camel’s hair brush, (l) others, (m) those that have just broken a flower vase, (n) those that resemble flies from a distance.’’ One is tempted to add, (o) those featured in Peter Greenaway’s films. The inclusion would seem appropriate for a filmmaker who has constantly displayed a fascination for the organic and the classificatory in a body of films that have themselves retained an art-house individuality within the broader criteria of popular success.

Greenaway’s biography implies a deeper integration between life and his art than some critics might suggest. He grew up in post-war Essex, his father was an ornithologist—perhaps the quintessential English hobby—and the petit-bourgeois world of public respectability and private eccentricity seems to have left him with a taste for the contradictory that hallmarks his work (‘‘The black humour, irony, distancing, a quality of being in control, an interest in landscape, treating the world as equal with an image, these are very English qualities. I can’t imagine myself living abroad’’). He trained as a painter rather than a filmmaker, but his first exhibition, ‘‘Eisenstein at the Winter Palace,’’ indicated an interest that led him into film editing at the Central Office of Information, the government department responsible for informing the public in the unique ‘‘home-counties’’ voice of domestic propaganda.

These years also saw Greenaway developing a crop of his own absurdist works—films, art, novels, illustrated books, drawings—with titles such as GOOLE BY NUMBERS AND DEAR PHONE, as well as directing (non-absurdist) Party Political Broadcasts for the Labour Party. They also saw the introduction of his fictional alter ego, Pulse Luper, archivist, cartographer, ornithologist extraordinaire (‘‘He’s me at about 65. A know-all, a Buckminster Fuller, a McLuhan, a John Cage, a pain’’). Nomenclature means a lot to Greenaway in determining where one would be filed in the unfortunate event of a statistically (im)probable end. The Falls is a catalogue of victims of V.U.E. (Violent Unknown Event), with characters such as Masher Fallack, Carlos Fallanty, Raskado Fallcastle, and Hearty Fallparco. The epitome of absurdity was perhaps reached in ACT OF GOD, a film based around interviews with people who’d been struck by lightning in an attempt to find out what led to such an unpredictable event.

But perhaps the most tickling piece of absurdity for Greenaway came in the commercial success of The Draughtsman’s Contract, his first film made on a reasonable budget. It made an uncharacteristic concession to plot, characterization, and scenic coherence. A stylish, lavish, and enigmatic puzzle revolving around murder in a stately seventeenth-century English home, it soon became the subject of a mythical French film conference that discussed its title for five days, and gained popular fame as everyone asked what was it all about. But it made Greenaway’s name, and briefly contested box office ratings with the likes of E.T. and Gandhi, although Greenaway’s intended length was four hours—‘‘one suspects it was originally closer to Tristram Shandy than Murder at the Vicarage,’’ as one critic remarked.

392

Greenaway’s ideas tend to work in twos. A Zed and Two Noughts took Siamese twins separated at birth and saw them cope with their grief at the death of their wives in a study in the decomposition of zoo animals. Belly of an Architect silhouetted the visceral mortality of Stourley Kracklite against his plans for an exhibition on a visionary eighteenth-century architect, Étienne-Louis Boullée. But the dialectic seems more important than the ideas themselves, as Greenaway hints: ‘‘The important thing about Boullée—and this is where he’s very like a filmmaker, who tends to spend much more time on uncompleted projects than completed ones—is that very few of his buildings were constructed. I’ve taken that up in Kracklite’s fear of committal, being prepared to go half-way and no further, which is Kracklite’s position and maybe my position as well.’’

In this position Greenaway has always been most successful when casting strong leading actors. He secured Brian Dennehy as Kracklite, for instance, and the cast of arguably his most successful film, The Cook, The Thief, His Wife and Her Lover, included Michael Gambon (the Thief) and Helen Mirren (his Wife).

Greenaway’s ideas are always sufficiently ambiguous to resist trivialisation, but invariably involve death: Death and Landscape, Death and Animals, Death and Architecture, Death and Sex, Death and Food (cannibalism). But there are factors which make them more palatable. One of them is a taste for sumptuous framing (helped by cinematographer Sacha Vierny; the images are dazzling, and there is abundant use of split screens and other visual devices. Part of the dialogue is in Japanese and is translated not so much by traditional subtitles as calligraphy, which blends into Greenaway’s imagery and becomes an integral part of the film’s overall design. Indeed, watching the film is the equivalent of viewing a moving painting.

Unfortunately, Greenaway’s subsequent feature, 8 1/2 Women, is arguably his most disappointing. The story of a businessman and his son who create a bordello in their Geneva home, 8 1/2 Women is inconsequential and boring—and a trial even for the filmmaker’s most ardent supporters.

There are contradictions in Greenaway’s works, a fact that seems to openly provoke divided opinion. Some would suggest that the fecundity of his vision and intellectual rigor are the stuff of great cinema; others, while admitting its originality, would still look for evidence of a deeper engagement with film as a medium, rather than as a vehicle for ideas. Lauded in Europe, under-distributed in the United States, loved and reviled in his own country, Greenaway is, nevertheless, in an enviable position for a filmmaker.

—Saul Frampton, updated by Rob Edelman

GRÉMILLON, Jean

Française, 1944; president of C.G.T., film technicians union, 1946–50.

Died: 25 November 1959.

Films as Director:

1923  Chartres (Le Cathédrale de Chartres) (+ ed); Le Revêtement des routes (+ ed)

1924  La Fabrication du fil (+ ed); Du fil à l’aiguille (+ ed); La Fabrication du ciment artificiel (+ ed); La Bière (+ ed); Le Roulement à billes (+ ed); Les Parfums (+ ed); L’Étirage des ampoules électriques (+ ed); La Photogénie mécanique (+ ed)

1925  L’Éducation professionnelle des conducteurs de tramway (six short films) (+ ed); L’Electrification de la ligne Paris-Vierzon (+ ed); L’Auvergne (+ ed); La Naissance des cigognes (+ ed); Les Aciéries de la marine et d’Homécourt (+ ed)

1926  La Vie des travailleurs italiens en France (+ ed); La Croisière de L’Atalante (+ ed); Un Tour au large (+ ed, sc, music—recorded on piano rolls)

1927  Maldone (+ ed, co-music); Gratuités (+ ed)

1928  Bobs (+ ed)

1929  Gardiens de phare (+ ed)

1930  La Petite Lise (+ ed)

1931  Dainah la métisse (+ ed) (disowned due to unauthorized reediting); Pour un sou d’amour (no d credit on film; + ed)

1932  Le Petit Babouin (+ ed, music)

1933  Gonzague ou L’Accordeur (+ sc)

1934  La Dolorosa

1935  La Valse royale (French version of Herbert Maisch’s Königswalzer)

1936  Centinella alerta! (not completed by Grémillon); Pattes de mouches (+ co-sc)

1937  Gueule d’amour

1938  L’Etrange Monsieur Victor

1941  Remorques

1943  Lumière d’été

1944  Le Ciel est à vous

1945  Le Six Juin à l’aube (Sixth of June at Dawn) (+ sc, music)

1949  Pattes blanches (+ co-dialogue); Les Charmes de l’existence (co-d, co-sc, co-commentary, music advisor)
1951  L'Etrange Madame X
1952  Astrologie ou Le Miroir de la vie (+ sc, co-music); “Alchimie” episode of L'Encyclopédie filmée—Alchimie, Azur, Absence (+ sc)
1954  L'Amour d'une femme (+ sc, dubbed actor Paolo Stoppa); Au cœur de l'Ile de France (+ sc, co-music)
1955  La Maison aux images (+ sc, music)
1956  Haute Lisse (+ sc, music adapt)
1958  André Masson et les quatre éléments (+ sc, music)

Other Film:
1951  Désastres de la guerre (Kast) (commentary and co-music)

Publications
By GRÉMILLON: books—

By GRÉMILLON: articles—

“Propositions,” inComoedia (Paris), 27 November 1925.
“Le Cinéma? Plus qu'un art . . . ,” in L’Ecran Français (Paris),
August 1947.
“Jacques Feyder, ce combattant,” in L’Ecran Français (Paris),
8 June 1948.
“Ma rencontre avec André Masson,” in Les Lettres Françaises

On GRÉMILLON: books—

Agel, Henri, “Jean Grémillon,” in Cinéma d’aujourd’hui, no. 58,

On GRÉMILLON: articles—

Hackett, Hazel, “Jean Grémillon,” in Sight and Sound (London),
Summer 1947.
Cinéma (Paris), August 1948.
Laurent, F., “Sur Jean Grémillon,” in Image et Son (Paris), February 1955.
Chevassu, François, “Dossier Jean Grémillon,” in Image et Son
Mayoux, Michel, “Jean Grémillon, cinéaste de la réalité,” in Cahiers “Grémillon Issue” of Cinéma (Paris), March 1960.

Clair, René, “Jean Grémillon devant l’avenir,” in Lettres Françaises
Vivet, J.-P., “Hommage à Jean Grémillon,” in Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15 September 1962.
Siclier, Jacques, “Portrait: Jean Grémillon,” in Radio-Télé-Cinéma
(Paris), 24 November 1969.
Le Dantec, and M. Latil, “Jean Grémillon: le réalisme et le tragique,” Le Dantec, and M. Latil, “Le Cinéma de Jean Grémillon,” in Biofilmography, in Film Dope (London), October 1980.
“Jean Grémillon Section” of Cinéma (Paris), November 1981.
“Le Ciel est à vous Issue” of Avant-Scène du Cinéma (Paris), 15
November 1981.
“Grémillon Issue” of Filmkritik (Munich), April 1983.
Detassis, P., “Jean Grémillon, ‘l’uomotramite’ tra due epoche del cinema francese,” in Bianco e Nero (Rome), October/December 1983.
Ory, P., “Présence paradoxale de la petite bourgeoisie dan l’ouevre de Jean Grémillon,” in in Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Paris), no.
Ory, P., “Grémillon, le Grand,” in Positif (Paris), no. 359, January 1991.
Bruyn, O. De, “Jean Grémillon ou l’art de la discrétion,” in Positif
Denny, J.S., “La collectoin Jean Grémillon de la Bibliothèque

Jean Grémillon is finally beginning to receive the international reputation most French film scholars always bestowed upon him.
Although Americans have until recently been able to see only one or two of his dozen important works, he has generally been placed only slightly below Renoir, Clair, and Carné in the hierarchy of French classical cinema.

Evidently, no one was more versatile than Grémillon. A musician, he composed many of his own scores and supervised all aspects of his productions scrupulously. Along with the search for a romantic unity of feeling and consistency of rhythm, his films also display an attention to details and locations that derives from his earliest documentaries.

No one was more prepared than Grémillon for the poetic realist sensibility that dominated French cinema in the 1930s. Even in the silent period his Maldone and Gardiens de phare reveal a heightening of strange objects as they take on fatal proportions in these tense and dark melodramas. La Petite Lise displayed these same qualities, along with an incredibly imaginative and rigorous use of sound. It should be called the first poetic realist film, anticipating Carné’s work in particular.

After a few years of obscurity, Grémillon re-emerged with Gueule d’amour, a Foreign Legion love story with Jean Gabin. Then came a series of truly wonderful films: L’Étrange M. Victor, Remorques, Le Ciel est à vous, and Lumière d’été. Spanning the period of French subjugation by the Nazis, these films capture the sensibility of the times with their wishful romanticism, the fatality of their conclusions, and their attention to social classes.

Le Ciel est à vous must be singled out as a key film of the Occupation. Enormously popular, this tale of a small-town couple obsessed with aviation has been variously interpreted as a work promoting Vichy morality (family, small-town virtues, hard work) and as a representation of the indomitable French spirit, ready to soar beyond the temporary political restraints of the Occupation. Charles Vanel and Madeleine Renaud give unforgettable performances.

Grémillon often sought mythic locations (mysterious villages in the Alps or Normandy, the evocative southern cities of Orange and Toulon) where his quiet heroes and heroines played out their destinies of passion and crime. Unique is the prominent place women hold in his dramas. From the wealthy femme fatale murdered by Gabin in Gueule d’amour to the independent professional woman who refuses to give up her medical career, even for love (L’Amour d’une femme), women are shown to be far more prepossessed than the passionate but childish men who pursue them.

It is perhaps the greatest tragedy of French cinema that Grémillon’s career after World War II was derailed by the conditions of the industry. His Sixth of June at Dawn shows how even a documentary project could in his hands take on poetic proportions and become a personal project. Yet the final years before his death in 1959 (when he was only fifty-seven) were spent in teaching and preparing unfinanced scripts. This is a sad end for the man some people claim to have been the most versatile cinematic genius ever to work in France.

—Dudley Andrew

GRIERSON, John

Films as Director:

1929 Drifters (+ sc)

Other Films:

1930 Conquest (pr, co-ed)
1931 The Country Comes to Town (Wright) (pr); Shadow on the Mountain (pr); Upstream (pr)
1931/32 Industrial Britain (Flaherty) (pr, co-ed)
1932 King Log (pr); The New Generation (pr); The New Operator (pr); O’er Hill and Dale (Wright) (pr); The Voice of the World (pr)
1933 Aero-Engine (pr); Cargo from Jamaica (Wright) (pr); The Coming of the Dial (pr); Eskimo Village (pr); Line Cruising South (Wright) (pr); So This Is London (pr); Telephone Workers (pr); Uncharted Waters (pr); Windmill in Barbados (Wright) (pr)
1934 BBC: Droitwich (Watt) (pr); Granton Trawler (Cavalcanti) (pr, ph); Pett and Pott (Cavalcanti) (pr); Post Haste (pr); Six-Thirty Collection (Watt) (pr); Song of Ceylon (Wright) (pr, co-sc); Spring Comes to England (co-pr); Spring on the Farm (pr); Weather Forecast (pr)
1935 BBC: The Voice of Britain (co-pr); Coalface (Cavalcanti) (pr); Introducing the Dial (pr)
1936 Night Mail (Watt and Wright) (pr, co-sc); The Saving of Bill Blewett (Watt) (pr); Trade Tattoo (pr)
1937 Calendar of the Year (pr); Children at School (Wright) (co-pr); Four Barriers (pr); Job in a Million (pr); Line to Tschiera Hart (Cavalcanti) (pr); The Smoke Menace (co-pr); We Live in Two Worlds (pr)
1938 The Face of Scotland (Wright) (pr)
1939 The Londoners (co-pr)
1951 Judgment Deferred (exec pr); Brandy for the Parson (exec pr)
1952 The Brave Don’t Cry (exec pr); Laxdale Hall (exec pr); The Oracle (exec pr); Time Gentlemen Please (exec pr); You’re Only Young Twice (exec pr)
1953 Man of Africa (exec pr); Orders Are Orders (exec pr)
1959 Seawards the Great Ships (treatment)

Heart of Scotland (treatment)

Publications

By GRIERSON: books—

By GRIERSON: articles—

“Future for British Film,” in Spectator (London), 14 May 1932.
“The Symphonic Film I,” in Cinema Quarterly (London), Spring 1933.
“The Symphonic Film II,” in Cinema Quarterly (London), Spring 1934.
“Prospect for Documentary,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1948.
“Flaherty as Innovator,” in Sight and Sound (London), October/December 1951.
“The BBC and All That,” in Quarterly of Film, Radio, Television (Berkeley), Fall 1954.
“I Derive My Authority from Moses,” in Take One (Montreal), January/February 1970.
“Grierson on Documentary: Last Interview,” with Elizabeth Sussex, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1972.

On GRIERSON: books—

On GRIERSON: articles—

Ellis, Jack C., “John Grierson’s First Years at the National Film Board,” in Cinema Journal (Evaston, Illinois), Fall 1970.
James, R., “‘Le Rêve de Grierson,’” in Cinéma Québec (Montreal), May 1972.
Pratley, Gerald, “‘Only Grierson,’” in Films and Filming (London), March 1982.
Swann, P., “‘John Grierson and the G.P.O. Film Unit, 1933–39,’” in Historical Journal of Film, Radio and TV (Abindon, Oxon), March 1983.
Ellis, Jack C., “The Final Years of British Documentary as the Grierson Movement,” in Journal of Film and Video (Boston), Fall 1984.

More than any one other person, John Grierson was responsible for the documentary film as it has developed in the English-speaking countries. He was the first to use the word documentary in relation to film, applying it to Robert Flaherty’s Moana while Grierson was in the United States in the 1920s.

Grierson took the term and his evolving conception of a new kind and use of film back to Britain with him in 1927. There he was hired by Stephen Tallents, secretary of the Empire Marketing Board, a unique government public relations agency intended to promote the marketing of the products of the British Empire.

The first practical application of Grierson’s ideas at the EMB was Drifters in 1929, a short feature about herring fishing in the North Sea. Following its success, Grierson established, with the full support of Tallents, the Empire Marketing Board Film Unit instead of pursuing a career as an individual filmmaker. He staffed the Film Unit with young people, mostly middle class and well educated (many were from Cambridge University). Basil Wright, Arthur Elton, Edgar Anstey, and Paul Rotha were among the early recruits; Stuart Legg and Harry Watt came later, as did Humphrey Jennings. Alberto Cavalcanti joined the group shortly after it moved to the General Post Office and served as a sort of co-producer and co-teacher with Grierson.

The training at the EMB Film Unit and subsequently the General Post Office Film Unit was ideological as well as technical and aesthetic. The young filmmakers exposed to it came to share Grierson’s broad social purposes and developed an extraordinary loyalty to him and to his goals. It was in this way that the British documentary movement was given shape and impetus.

Grierson wanted documentaries to inform the public about their nation and involve them emotionally with the workings of their government. His assumptions were as follows: if people at work in one part of the Empire are shown to people in the other parts, and if a government service is presented to the population at large, an understanding and appreciation of the interrelatedness of the modern world, and of our dependency on each other, will develop and everyone will want to contribute his or her share to the better functioning of the whole. On these assumptions was based the first phase in Grierson’s lifelong activity on behalf of citizenship education. Phase one included some of the most innovative, lovely, and lasting of the British documentaries: Drifters, Industrial Britain, Granton Trawler, Song of Ceylon, Coal Face, and Night Mail. Phase two, which began in the mid-1930s, consisted of calling public attention to pressing problems faced by the nation, insistence that these problems needed to be solved, and suggestions about their causes and possible solutions. Since these matters may have involved differing political positions (and in any case did not relate directly to the concerns of the sponsoring General Post Office), Grierson stepped outside the GPO to enlist sponsorship from private industry. Big oil and gas concerns were especially responsive to his persuasion. The subjects dealt with in this new kind of documentary included unemployment (Workers and Jobs), slums (Housing Problems), malnutrition among the poor (Enough to Eat?), smog (The Smoke Menace), and education (Children at School). Unlike the earlier British documentaries, these films were journalistic rather than poetic, and seemed quite unartistic. Yet they incorporated formal and technical experiments. Most notable among these was the direct interview, with slum dwellers in Housing Problems, for example, presaging the much later cinéma vérité method. The direct interview remains a standard technique of television documentary today.

Grierson’s use of institutional sponsorship—public and private—to pay for his kind of filmmaking, rather than depend on returns from the box office, was a key innovation in the development of documentary. A second innovation, complementing the first, was nontheatrical distribution and exhibition: going outside the movie theaters to reach audiences in schools and factories, union halls and church basements.

During the ten years between Drifters and Grierson’s departure for Canada in 1939, the sixty or so filmmakers who comprised the British documentary movement made over three hundred films. These films and the system they came out of became models for other countries. Paul Rotha, one of Grierson’s principal lieutenants, went on a six-month missionary expedition to the United States in 1937, and film people from America and other countries visited the documentary units in Britain. Grierson, meanwhile, carried his ideas not only to Canada, where he drafted legislation for the National Film Board and became its first head, but to New Zealand, Australia, and later South Africa, all of which established national film boards.

The National Film Board of Canada stands as the largest and most impressive monument to Grierson’s concepts and actions relating to the use of film by governments in communicating with their citizens. During his Canadian years he moved beyond national concerns to global ones. The Film Board’s The World in Action, a monthly series for the theaters along March of Time lines, expressed some of these concerns. His ideas regarding the education of citizens required in a world at war, and a new world to follow, were expressed in major essays that have inspired many who have read them. “The Challenge of Peace,” reprinted in Grierson on Documentary, is one of them.

It is for his many-faceted, innovative leadership in film and in education that Grierson is most to be valued. As a theoretician he articulated the basis of the documentary film, its form and function, its aesthetic and its ethic. As a teacher he trained and, through his writing and speaking, influenced many documentary filmmakers, not only in Britain and Canada but throughout the world. As a producer he was responsible to one extent or another for thousands of films, and he played a decisive creative role in some of the most important of them. In addition, he was an adroit political figure and dedicated civil servant for most of his life. Whether in the employ of a government or not, his central concern was always with communicating to people (of a nation and of the world) the information and attitudes that he thought would help them to lead more useful, productive, satisfying, and rewarding lives.

—Jack C. Ellis

GRIFFITH, D.W.

Nationality: American. Born: David Wark Griffith on Oldham County Farm, near Centerfield, Kentucky, 23 January 1875. Education: District schools in Oldham County, Shelby County, and Louisville, Kentucky. Family: Married 1) Linda Arvidson, 1906 (divorced 1936); 2) Evelyn Baldwin, 1936 (divorced 1947). Career: As “Lawrence Griffith,” “Alfred Lawrence,” “Lawrence Brayington,” and “Thomas Griffith,” actor in regional stock companies, 1895–99; actor in New York and in touring companies, 1899–1906; actor for Edison Company and Biograph Pictures, also sold scenarios to Biograph and American Mutoscope, 1907; director and scriptwriter for Biograph (approximately 485 one- and two-reelers), 1908–13; began association with cameraman G.W. (Billy) Bitzer, and with actress Mary Pickford, 1909; supervised Mack Sennett’s first films, 1910; made first film with Lillian and Dorothy Gish, An Unseen Enemy, 1912; joined Reliance Majestic (affiliated with Mutual), 1912; joined Reliance Majestic (affiliated with Mutual), 1912; joined Reliance Majestic (affiliated with Mutual), 1912; joined Reliance Majestic (affiliated with Mutual), 1912; joined Reliance Majestic (affiliated with Mutual), 1912; became partner in Triangle Pictures, 1915; travelled to Britain to aid war effort, 1917; engaged by Paramount, 1918; with Pickford, Fairbanks, and Chaplin, formed United Artists, 1919; built own studio at Mamaroneck, New York, 1920; directed three pictures for Paramount, 1925–26; returned to United Artists, 1927 (through 1931); directed his first talking picture, Abraham Lincoln, 1930; resigned as head of his own production company, resigned from United Artists Board and sold UA stock, 1932–33; returned to Hollywood to work on One Million B.C., 1939. Awards: Director of the Year, 1931, and Special Award, 1936, from Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences; Honorary Doctorate, University of Louisville, 1945. Died: In Los Angeles, 23 July 1948.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

(at Biograph):

1908  The Adventures of Dolly; The Redman and the Child; The Tavern Keeper’s Daughter; The Bandit’s Waterloo; A Calamitous Elopement; The Greaser’s Gauntlet; The Man and the Woman; For Love of Gold; The Fatal Hour; For a Wife’s Honor; Balked at the Altar; The Girl and the Outlaw; The Red Girl; Betrayed by a Hand Print; Monday Morning in a Coney Island Police Court; Behind the Scenes; The Heart of Oyama; Where the Breakers Roar; The Stolen Jewels; A Smoked Husband; The Zula’s Heart; The Vaquero’s Vow; Father Gets in the Game; The Barbarian, Ingomar; The Planter’s Wife; The Devil; Romance of a Jewess; The Call of the Wild; After Many Years; Mr. Jones at the Ball; Concealing a Burglar; Taming of the Shrew; The Ingrate; A Woman’s Way; The Pirate’s Gold; The Guerrilla; The Curtain Pole; The Song of the Shirt; The Clubman and the Tramp; Money Mad; Mrs. Jones Entertains; The Feud and the Turkey; The Test of Friendship; The Reckoning; One Touch of Nature; An Awful Moment; The Helping Hand; The Maniac Cook; The Christmas Burglars; A Wreath in Time; The Honor of Thieves; The Criminal Hypnotist; The Sacrifice; The Welcome Burglar; A Rural Elopement; Mr. Jones Has a Card Party; The Hindoo Dagger; The Salvation Army Lass; Love Finds a Way; Tragic Love; The Girls and a Daddy

1909  *Those Boys; The Cord of Life; Trying to Get Arrested; The Fascinating Mrs. Frances; Those Awful Hats; Jones and the Lady Book Agent; The Drive for Life; The Brahma Diamond; Politician’s Love Story; The Jones Have Amateur Theatricals; Edgar Allan Poe; The Roué’s Heart; His Wife’s Mother; The Golden Louis; His Ward’s Love; At the Altar; The Prussian Spy; The Medicine Bottle; The Deception; The Lure of the Gown; Lady Helen’s Escapade; A Fool’s Revenge; The Wooden Leg; I Did It, Mama; The Voice of the Violin; And a Little Child Shall Lead Them; The French Duel; Jones and His New Neighbors; A Drunkard’s Reformation; The Winning Coat; A Rude Hostess; The Road to the Heart; The Eavesdropper, Schneider’s Anti-Noise Crusade; Twin Brothers; Confidence; The Note in the Shoe; Lucky Jim; A Sound Sleeper; A Troublesome Satchel; Tis an Ill Wind That Blows No Good; The Suicide Club; Resurrection; One Busy Hour; A Baby’s Shoe; Eloping with Auntie; The Cricket on the Hearth; The Jilt; Eradicating
Auntie; What Drink Did; Her First Biscuits; The Violin Maker of Cremona; Two Memories; The Lonely Villa; The Peach Basket Hat; The Son’s Return; His Duty; A New Trick; The Necklace; The Way of Man; The Faded Lilies; The Message; The Friend of the Family; Was Justice Served?; Mrs. Jones’ Lover or “I Want My Hat!”; The Mexican Sweethearts; The Country Doctor; Jealousy and the Man; The Renunciation; The Cardinal’s Conspiracy; The Seventh Day; Tender Hearts; A Convict’s Sacrifice; A Strange Meeting; Sweet and Twenty; The Slave; They Would Elope; Mrs. Jones’ Burglar; The Mended Lute; The Indian Runner’s Romance; With Her Card; The Better Way; His Wife’s Visitor; The Mills of the Gods; Franks; Oh, Uncle; The Sealed Room; 1776 or Theussian Renegades; The Little Darling; In Old Kentucky; The Children’s Friend; Comata, the Sioux; Getting Even; The Broken Locket; A Fair Exchange; The Awakening; Pippa Passes; Leather Stockings; Fools of Fate; Wanted, a Child; The Little Teacher; A Change of Heart; His Lost Love; Lines of White on the Sullen Sea; The Gibson Goddess; In the Watchers of the Night; The Expiation; What’s Your Hurry; The Restoration; Nursing a Viper; Two Women and a Man; The Light That Came; A Midnight Adventure; The Open Gate; Sweet Revenge; The Mountaineer’s Honor; In the Window Recess; The Trick That Failed; The Death Disc; Through the Breakers; In a Hempen Bag; A Corner in Wheat; The Redman’s View; The Test; A Trap for Santa Claus; In Little Italy; To Save Her Soul; Choosing a Husband; The Rocky Road; The Dancing Girl of Butte; Her Terrible Ordeal; The Call; The Honor of His Family; On the Reef; The Last Deal; One Night, and Then—; The Cloister’s Touch; The Woman from Mellon’s; The Duke’s Plan; The Englishman and the Girl

1910

The Final Settlement; His Last Burglary; Taming a Husband; The Newlyweds; The Thread of Destiny; In Old California; The Man; The Converts; Faithful; The Twisted Trail; Gold Is Not All; As It Is In Life; A Rich Revenge; A Romance of the Western Hills; Thou Shalt Not; The Way of the World; The Unchanging Sea; The Gold Seekers; Love Among the Roses; The Two Brothers; Unexpected Help; An Affair of Hearts; Romona; Over Silent Paths; The Implement; In the Season of Buds; A Child of the Ghetto; In the Border States; A Victim of Jealousy; The Face at the Window; A Child’s Impulse; The Marked Time-Table; Muggsy’s First Sweetheart; The Purjigation; A Midnight Cupid; What the Daisy Said; A Child’s Faith; The Call to Arms; Serious Sixteen; A Flash of Light; As the Bells Rang Out; An Arcadian Maid; The House with the Closed Shutters; Her Father’s Pride; A Salutary Lesson; The Usurer; The Sorrows of the Unfaithful; In Life’s Cycle; Wilful Peggy; A Summer Idol; The Modern Prodigal; Rose o’ Salem Town; Little Angels of Luck; A Mohawk’s Way; The Oath and the Man; The Iconoclast; Examination Day at School; That Chink at Golden Gulch; The Broken Doll; The Banker’s Daughters; The Message of the Violin; Two Little Waifs; Waiter No. Five; The Fugitive; Simple Charity; The Song of the Wildwood Flute; A Child’s Strategem; Sunshine Sue; A Plain Song; His Sister-in-Law; The Golden Supper; The Lesson; When a Man Loves; Winning Back His Love; His Trust; His Trust Fulfilled; A Wreath of Orange Blossoms; The Italian Barber; The Two Paths; Conscience; Three Sisters; A Decree of Destiny; Fate’s Turning; What Shall We Do with Our Old?; The Diamond Star; The Lily of the Tenements; Heart Beats of Long Ago

1911

Fisher Folks; His Daughter; The Lonedale Operator; Was He a Coward?; Teaching Dad to Like Her; The Spanish Gypsy; The Broken Cross; The Chief’s Daughter; A Knight of the Road; Madame Rex; His Mother’s Scarf; How She Triumphed; In the Days of ’49; The Two Sides; The New Dress; Enoch Arden, Part I; Enoch Arden, Part II; The White Rose of the Wilds; The Crooked Road; A Romantry Tragedy; A Smile of a Child; The Primal Call; The Jealous Husband; The Indian Brothers; The Thief and the Girl; Her Sacrifice; The Blind Princess and the Poet; Fighting Blood; The Last Drop of Water; Robby the Coward; A Country Cupid; The Ruling Passion; The Rose of Kentucky; The Sorrowful Example; Swords and Hearts; The Staff Heroes Are Made Of; The Old Confectioner’s Mistake; The Unveiling; The Eternal Mother; Dan the Dandy; The Revue Man and the Girl; The Squaw’s Love; Italian Blood; The Making of a Man; Her Awakening; The Adventures of Billy; The Long Road; The Battle; Love in the Hills; The Trail of the Books; Through Darkened Vales; Saved from Himself; A Woman Scorned; The Miser’s Heart; The Failure; Sunshine through the Dark; As in a Looking Glass; A Terrible Discovery; A Tale of the Wilderness; The Voice of the Child; The Baby and the Stork; The Old Bookkeeper; A Sister’s Love; For His Son; The Transformation of Mike; A Blot on the ‘Scutcheon; Billy’s Strategem; The Sunbeam; A String of Pearls; The Root of Evil

1912

The Mender of the Nets; Under Burning Skies; A Siren of Impulse; Iola’s Promise; The Goddess of Sagebrush Gulch; The Girl and Her Trust; The Punishment; Fate’s Interception; The Female of the Species; Just like a Woman; One Is Business; The Other Crime; The Lesser Evil; The Old Actor; A Lodging for the Night; His Lesson; When Kings Were the Law; A Beast at Bay; An Outcast among Outcasts; Home Folks; A Temporary Trace; The Spirit Awakened; Lena and the Geese; An Indian Summer; The Schoolteacher and the Waf; Man’s Last for Gold; Man’s Genesis; Heaven Avenues; A Pueblo Legend; The Sands of Dece; Black Sheep; The Narrow Road; A Child’s Remorse; The Inner Circle; A Change of Spirit; An Unseen Enemy; Two Daughters of Eve; Friends; So Near, Yet So Far; A Feud in the Kentucky Hills; In the Aisles of the Wild; The One She Loved; The Painted Lady; The Musketeers of Pig Alley; Heredity; Gold and Glitter; My Baby; The Informer; The Unwelcome Guest; Pirate Gold; Brutality; The New York Hat; The Massacre; My Hero; Oil and Water; The Burglar’s Dilemma; A Cry for Help; The God Within; Three Friends; The Telephone Girl and the Lady; Fate; An Adventure in the Autumn Woods; A Chance Deception; The Tender Hearted Boy; A Misappropriated Turkey; Brothers; Drink’s Lure; Love in an Apartment Hotel

1913

Broken Ways; A Girl’s Strategem; Near to Earth; A Welcome Intruder; The Sheriff’s Baby; The Hero of Little Italy; The Perfidy of Mary; A Misunderstood Boy; The Little Tease; The Lady and the Mouse; The Wanderer; The House of Darkness; Olaf—An Atom; Just Gold; His Mother’s Son;
The Yaqui Cur; The Ranchero’s Revenge; A Timely Interception; Death’s Marathon; The Sorrowful Shore; The Mistake; The Mothering Heart; Her Mother’s Oath; During the Round-up; The Coming of Angelou; An Indian’s Loyalty; Two Men of the Desert; The Reformers or The Lost Art of Minding One’s Business; The Battle at Elderbush Gulch (released 1914); In Prehistoric Days (Wars of the Primal Tribes; Brute Force); Judith of Bethulia (+ sc) (released 1914)

Films as Director:

(after quitting Biograph):

1914 The Battle of the Sexes; The Escape; Home, Sweet Home; The Avenging Conscience
1915 The Birth of a Nation (+ co-sc, co-music)
1916 Intolerance (+ co-music)
1918 Hearts of the World (+ sc under pseudonyms, co-music arranger); The Great Love (+ co-sc); The Greatest Thing in Life (+ co-sc)
1919 A Romance of Happy Valley (+ sc); The Girl Who Stayed at Home; True-Heart Susie; Scarlet Days; Broken Blossoms (+ sc, co-music arranger); The Greatest Question
1920 The Idol Dancer; The Love Flower; Way down East
1921 Dream Street (+ sc); Orphans of the Storm
1922 One Exciting Night (+ sc)
1923 The White Rose (+ sc)
1924 America: Isn’t Life Wonderful (+ sc)
1925 Sally of the Sawdust
1926 That Royle Girl; The Sorrows of Satan
1928 Drums of Love; The Battle of the Sexes
1929 Lady of the Pavements
1930 Abraham Lincoln
1931 The Struggle (+ pr, co-music arranger)

Publications

By GRIFFITH: books—

By GRIFFITH: articles—

“What I Demand of Movie Stars,” in Motion Picture Magazine (Los Angeles), February 1917.

On GRIFFITH: books—

Trauberg, Leonid, and Georg Ronen, David Griffith, Moscow, 1926.

Williams, Martin, Griffith: First Artist of the Movies, New York, 1980.
Lang, Robert, American Film Melodrama: Griffith, Vidor, Minnelli, New Jersey, 1989.

On GRIFFITH: articles—

Eisenstein, Sergei, “Dickens, Griffith, and the Film Today,” in Film Form, New York, 1949; also in Sight and Sound (London), June, July, and November 1950.

401

“Birth of a Nation Issue” of Film Culture (New York), Summer 1965.

“Griffith Issue” of Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Lyons), Spring 1972 and Christmas 1975.

“Griffith Issue” of Filmkritik (Berlin), April 1975.

“Griffith Issue” of Filmcritica (Rome), May/June 1975.

“Special Issues” of Griffithiana (Genoa), March/July 1980 and January 1982.

“Griffith Issues” of the Cahiers de la Cinémathèque (Lyons), Spring 1972 and Christmas 1975.

“Griffith Issue” of Filmkritik (Berlin), April 1975.

“Griffith Issue” of Filmcritica (Rome), May/June 1975.

“Special Issues” of Griffithiana (Genoa), March/July 1980 and January 1982.

Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 18, no. 2, 1990.

Perhaps no other director has generated such a broad range of critical reaction as D.W. Griffith. For students of the motion picture, Griffith’s is the most familiar name in film history. Generally acknowledged as America’s most influential director (and certainly one of the most prolific), he is also perceived as being among the most limited. Praise for his mastery of film technique is matched by repeated indictments of his moral, artistic, and intellectual inadequacies. At one extreme, Kevin Brownlow has characterized him as “the only director in America creative enough to be called a genius.” At the other, Paul Rotha calls his contribution to the advance of film “negligible” and Susan Sontag complains of his “supreme vulgarity and even inanity”; his work “reeks of a fervid moralizing about sexuality and violence” and his energy comes “from suppressed voluptuousness.”

Griffith started his directing career in 1908, and in the following five years made some 485 films, almost all of which have been preserved. These films, one or two reels in length, have customarily been regarded as apprentice works, films in which, to quote Stephen Zito, “Griffith borrowed, invented, and perfected the forms and techniques that he later used to such memorable effect in The Birth of a Nation, Intolerance, Broken Blossoms, and Way Down East.” These early “Biographs” (named after the studio at which Griffith worked) have usually been studied for their stylistic features, notably parallel editing, camera placement, and treatment of light and shadow. Their most famous structuring devices are the last-minute rescue and the cross-cut.

In recent years, however, the Biographs have assumed higher status in film history. Many historians and critics rank them with the most accomplished work in Griffith’s career. Vlada Petric, for instance, calls them “masterpieces of early cinema, fascinating lyrical films which can still affect audiences today, conveying the content in a cinematic manner often more powerful than that of Griffith’s later feature films.” Scholars have begun studying them for their characters, images, narrative patterns, themes, and ideological values, finding in them a distinctive signature based on Griffith’s deep-seated faith in the values of the woman-centered home. Certain notable Biographs—The Musketeers of Pig Alley, The Painted Lady, A Corner in Wheat, The Girl and Her Trust, The Battle of Elderbush Gulch, The Unseen Enemy, and A Feud in the Kentucky Hills—have been singled out for individual study.

Griffith reached the peak of his popularity and influence in the five years between 1915 and 1920, when he released The Birth of a Nation, Intolerance, Broken Blossoms, and Way Down East. He also directed Hearts of the World during this period, a film that incorporates newsreel and faked documentary footage into an epic fictional narrative. A First World War propaganda epic, Hearts of the World, alone among his early spectacles, is ignored today. But in 1918 it was the most popular war film of its time, and rivaled The Birth of a Nation as the most profitable of all Griffith’s features. Today, it is usually studied as an example of World War I hysteria or as a pioneering effort at government-sponsored mass entertainment.

Although Griffith’s epics are generally grouped together, Paul Goodman points out that his films are neither so ideologically uniform nor so consistent as recent writers have generally assumed. With equal fervor Griffith could argue white supremacy and make pleas for toleration, play the liberal crusader and the reactionary conservative, appear tradition-bound yet remain open to experimentation, saturate his work in Victorian codes while struggling against a Victorian morality. Frustrated by his inability to find consistent ideological threads in Griffith’s work, Norman Silverstein has called Griffith the father of anarchy in American films because his luminous movements in these epics never appear to sustain a unified whole.

Yet, as Robert Lang observes, the epics do share broad formal characteristics, using history as a chaotic background for a fictional drama that stresses separation and reunification. Whether set in the French Revolution (Orphans of the Storm), the American Revolution (America), the Civil War (Birth of a Nation), or in the various epochs of Intolerance, the Griffith epic is an action-centered spectacle that manipulates viewer curiosity with powerfully propulsive, intrinsically developmental scenes culminating in a sensational denouement.

Griffith also made a much different sort of feature during these years—the pastoral romance. These have only recently received serious critical attention. In these films, which are stripped of spectacle and historical surroundings, the cast of principal characters does not exceed two or three, the action is confined in time and space, and the story is intimate. Here, in films like Romance of Happy Valley, True-Heart Susie, and The Greatest Question, Griffith experiments with alternative narrative possibilities, whereby he extends the techniques of exposition to the length of a feature film. Strictly narrative scenes in these films are suspended or submerged to convey the illusion of near-plotlessness. The main figures, Griffith implied (usually played by Lillian Gish and Bobby Harron), would emerge independent of fable; atmosphere would dominate over story line.

From the start, critics and reviewers found the near absence of action sequences and overt physical struggle noteworthy in the Griffith pastorals, but differed widely in their evaluation of it. Most of the original commentators assumed they had found a critical shortcoming, and complained about the thinness of plot, padded exposition, and frequent repetition of shots. Even Kenneth MacGowan, who alone among his contemporaries preferred Griffith’s pastorals to his epics, scored the empty storyline of The Romance of Happy Valley for its “loose ends and dangling characters.” More recent critics, on the other hand—notably Jean Mitry, John Belton, and Rene Kerdyk—have found transcendental virtues in the forswearing of event-centered plots. Ascribing to Griffith’s technique a liberating moral purpose, Mitry called True-Heart Susie “a narrative which follows characters without entrapping them, allowing them complete freedom of action and event.” For John Belton, True-Heart Susie is one of Griffith’s “purest and most immediate films” because, “lacking a ‘great story’ there is nothing between us and the characters.”

Equating absence of action sequences with the elimination of formal structure, Belton concludes that “it is through the characters not plot that Griffith expresses and defines the nature of the characters’ separation.”

If these judgments appear critically naive (plainly these films have plots and structures even if these are less complex than in Intolerance and Birth), they raise important questions Griffith scholars continue to debate: how does Griffith create the impression that characters exist independent of action, and, in a temporal medium, how does Griffith create the impression of narrative immobility?

By and large, Griffith’s films of the mid- and late 1920s have not fared well critically, although they have their defenders. The customary view—that Griffith’s work became dull and undistinguished when he lost his personal studio at Mamaroneck in 1924—continues to prevail, despite calls from John Dorr, Arthur Lennig, and Richard Roud for re-evaluation. The eight films he made as a contract director for Paramount and United Artists are usually studied (if at all) as examples of late 1920s studio style. What critics find startling about them—particularly the United Artists features—is not the lack of quality, but the absence of any identifiable Griffith traits. Only Abraham Lincoln and The Struggle (Griffith’s two sound films) are recognizable as his work, and they are usually treated as early 1930s oddities.

—Russell Merritt

GUERRA, Ruy

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Role/Note</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1954</td>
<td>Les Hommes et les autres (+ sc) (short, IDHEC diploma work)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>Oros (+ sc) (short, unfinished)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>O cavalao de Oxumaire (The Horse of Oxumaire) (co-d, + co-sc, unfinished)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1962</td>
<td>Os cajafestes (The Unscrupulous Ones) (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Os fazis (The Guns) (+ co-sc, co-ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>“Vocabulaire” episode of Loin du Viêt-nam (not included in released version) (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>Sweet Hunters (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>Os deuses e os mortos (The Gods and the Dead) (+ co-sc, co-ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1978</td>
<td>A queda (The Fall) (co-d, + co-sc, co-music, co-ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1979</td>
<td>Mueda, memória e massacre (Mueda, Memory, and Massacre) (+ co-ph, ed)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Erendira (+ sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>Opera do Malandro</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1988</td>
<td>Fábula de la bella palomera (Fable of the Beautiful Pigeon-Fancier)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Kuarup</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>Me alquilo para sonar</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999</td>
<td>Monsanto (for TV)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2000</td>
<td>Estorvo (+ co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
<th>Role/Note</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>Souvenir de Paris (Théocary) (asst d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>S.O.S. Noronha (Rouquier) (asst d, role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1958</td>
<td>Le Tout pour le tout (Dally) (asst d)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>Os mendigos (role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>Benito Cereno (Roulet) (role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
Ruy Guerra

1970  Le Maître du temps (Pollet) (role); Le Mur (Roullet) (role)
1971  Les Soleils de l’Ile de Pâques (Kast) (role); O homem das estrelas (Man and the Stars) (Barreto) (role)
1972  Aguirre, der Zorn Göttes (Aguirre, the Wrath of God) (Herzog) (role)

Publications

By GUERRA: articles—

Interview with Thomas Elsaesser, in Monogram (London), no. 5, 1974.
Interview with Rui Nogueira, in Image et Son (Paris), December 1974.
“Filmen in Mozambique,” interview with F. Sartor, in Film en Televisie (Brussels), May/June 1981.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), June 1983.
Interview with Serge Toubiana, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1983.
Interview with M. Buruiana, in 24 Images (Montréal), Winter 1987.

On GUERRA: books—

Johnson, Randal, Cinema Novo x 5: Masters of Contemporary Brazilian Film, Austin, Texas, 1984.

On GUERRA: articles—

“Ruy Guerra,” in Film Dope (London), March 1981.

A truly cosmopolitan artist, Ruy Guerra was born in Mozambique of Portuguese settlers, secured his higher education in Lisbon, and studied cinema at the Paris IDHEC. He was one of the leaders of the Brazilian cinema novo with two films that broke new ethical and aesthetic ground, Os cafajestes and Os fuzis. He shot Sweet Hunters in French and in English, and went back to Mozambique after it became independent to organize the newly born cinema industry. After returning he completed a documentary, Mueda, memória e massacre, before going to Mexico to adapt Gabriel García Marquez’s Yol in 1983. Besides writing his own scripts, Guerra is the author of lyrics for Latin American pop songs (sung in particular by Baden Powell), and an actor in his own right (he took on roles in Herzog’s Aguirre and in Serge Rouilet’s adaptation of Benito Cereno).

The product of a cultural melting pot, Guerra’s style is hard to define. Very classical in form (except in the extraordinary Os deuses e os mortes, the epitome of Brazilian tropicalist aesthetics, which featured virtuoso camera movements and sequence shots), his style shows none of the external signs of modernity, such as non-chronological sequences, manipulation of the sound track, or elaborate framing. On the other hand, it displays a very unusual use of rhythm, and makes use of a great variety of tempos in a way that is akin to that found in some Japanese films, such as those of Kurosawa.

Guerra is preoccupied, even obsessed with the theme of frustration and disappointed expectations. Guerra’s interest in social issues was evident in his first film, Os cafajestes, about penniless young loafers in Rio who blackmail a girl after having taken photos of her in the nude. Os fuzis, set in the northeast of Brazil, pits a sergeant and four soldiers guarding a harvest destined for town (to profit the landowner mayor) against the covetous desires of hungry peasants. Thirteen years later Guerra shot a sequel, A queda (The Fall), with the same actors to show what happened to the characters after a decade spent in the big city.

Os deuses e os mortes presents in grand operatic manner a feud between two families of farmers. This film reveals another aspect of Guerra’s personality: a taste for magic and dream, an interest in myths and surrealism. The economic and the psychic are bound together in this difficult and fascinating work. Sweet Hunters, Guerra’s most poetic film (with Sterling Hayden, Susan Strasberg, and Stuart Whitman), is set on an island where the three characters act out their obsessions and frustrated desires. Allan, a keen ornithologist, is waiting for the migration of birds, his wife Clea for the arrival of a man who has escaped from a nearby prison, and his sister for her departure.

Given his interest in dreams and legends, Guerra was a logical choice to adapt García Marquez’ novella Erendira. The film is set in an imaginary country where a mythical and monstrous grandmother (Irene Papas) sells her granddaughter as a prostitute. A picaresque tale of economic exploitation, with ironical characters and nightmarish situations, it offers a good synthesis of Guerra’s style even if the faithfulness of his adaptation does not allow him to give full vent to his ordinarily richer and more personal inspiration.

—Michel Ciment

GÜNEY, Yilmaz

Nationality: Turkish. Born: Yilmaz Putun in village near Adana in southern Turkey, 1937. Education: Educated in law in Ankara; studied economics in Istanbul. Career: Worked for film distribution company, 1952; began working with director Atif Yilmaz, 1958; sentenced to eighteen months in prison and six months exile for publishing “communist” novel Equations with 3 Strangers, 1961; began career in commercial cinema, as writer and actor, known as “Cirkin kral” (“The Ugly King”), 1963; founded Güney-Filmcilik production company, 1968; arrested on charge of sheltering wanted anarchist students, imprisoned without trial for twenty-six months, 1972 (released under general amnesty, 1974); alleged to have shot judge in restaurant, sentenced to twenty-four years hard labor (later commuted to eighteen years); while in prison, allowed to continue scripting films and overseeing productions, 1974–80; films banned following military takeover, 1980; escaped to France, 1981, stripped of Turkish citizenship. Awards: Best Film (co-recipient), Cannes Festival, for Yol, 1982. Died: Of cancer, in Paris, 9 September 1984.
Films as Director:

1966  At avrat silah (The Horse, the Woman, and the Gun) (+ sc, role)
1967  Bana kursun islemez (Bullets Cannot Pierce Me) (+ sc, role); Benim adim Kerim (My Name Is Kerim) (+ sc, role)
1968  Pire Nuri (Nuri the Flea) (co-d, + sc, role); Seytit Han ‘Topragin Gelini’ (Seytit Khan, Bride of the Earth) (+ sc, role as Seytit Han)
1969  Ac kurtlar (The Hungry Wolves) (+ sc, role); Bir cirkin adam (An Ugly Man) (+ sc, role)
1970  Umut (Hope) (+ co-sc, role as Cabaş); Piyade Osman (Osman the Wanderer) (co-d, + sc, role); Yedi belalilar (The Seven No-goods) (co-d, + sc, role)
1971  Kakkalar (The Fugitives) (+ sc, role); Vurguncular (The Wrongdoers) (+ sc, role); İbrei (The Example) (co-d, + sc, role); Yarin son gündür (Tomorrow Is the Final Day) (+ sc, role); Umatsuzlar (The Hopeless Ones) (+ sc, role); Aci (Pain) (+ sc, role); A it (Elegy) (+ sc, role as Copano lu); Baba (The Father) (+ sc, role as Cemal, the Boatman)
1972  Arkadas (The Friend) (+ sc, role as the friend); Endise (Anxiety) (co-d, + sc)
1973  Zavallilar (The Poor Ones) (co-d, + co-sc, role as Abu) (begun 1972)
1975  Le Mur (The Wall) (+ sc, role)

Other Films:

1958  Alageyik (The Hindi) (Yılmaz) (co-sc, role); Bu vataniňcockuları (The Children of This Country) (Yılmaz) (co-sc, role)
1959  Karacao lanın kara sevdası (Karacao lan’s Mad Love) (Yılmaz) (co-sc); Tütün zamani (Arlburnu) (role)
1960  Clum perdesi (The Screen of Death) (Yılmaz) (asst d)
1961  Dolandırıcılardı (The King of Thieves) (Yılmaz) (asst d); Kızıl vazo (The Red Vase) (Yılmaz) (asst d); Seni kaybederesen (If I Lose You) (Yılmaz) (asst d); Yaban güllü (The Desert Laugha) (Uku) (co-sc); Dolandırıcılardı sahı (Yılmaz) (role); Tatli-Bela (Yılmaz) (role)
1962  Ölüme yalnız gidilir (The Dead Only Perish) (Yalınkılık) (sc); Ikisi de cesurdur (Two Brave Men) (co-sc, role)
1964  Hergün oltunlar (Ceylan) (sc, role); Kamali zeybek (Hero with a Knife) (Akinci) (sc, role); Da larin kurdu Kocero (Kocero, Mountain Wolf) (Uku) (sc, role); Halimeden muktur var (Doğan) (role); Kocao lan (Demirel) (role); Kara sahın (Akinci) (role); Mor defter (Ergün) (role); 10 Korkusuz adam (Basaran) (role); Pranagası mahkamlar (Arıburnu) (role); Zimba gibi delikanlı (Jöntürk) (role)
1965  Kasımpasali (Akinci) (sc, role); Kasımpasali recep (Akinci) (sc, role); Konyakvi (The Drunkard) (Basaran) (sc, role); Kirallar kirali (King of Kings) (Olguç) (sc, role); Ben öldükçe yasarım (Sa iro lu) (role); Beyaz atlı adam (Jöntürk) (role); Da larin o lu (Atadeniz) (role); Davudo (Kazankaya) (role); Gönül kusu (Gülnar) (role); Sayılı kabadaylılar (Kazankaya) (role); Kan Gövdeyi gütırirdi (Atadeniz) (role); Kahreden kursun (Atadeniz) (role); Haracima dokunma (Kazankaya) (role); Kandi bu day (Ceylan) (role); Korkusuzlar (Evin) (role); Silaha yeminliyim (İnci) (role); Sokakta kan vardi (Türkali) (role); Telliîeli adam (Kazankaya) (role); Torpido Yılmaz (Okcugil) (role); Üçünişü de mihlarım (Olguç) (role); Yaralı kardal (Dursun) (role)
1966  Barakalar tarlasi (Uku) (sc); Aslanlar dönüsvi (Return of the Heroes) (Atadeniz) (sc, role); Esrefpasali (Tokatlı) (sc, role); Hıdıyların kanunu (The Law of Smuggling) (Akad) (sc, role); Yedi da in aslanı (Seven Wild Lions; The Mountain King) (Atadeniz) (sc, role); Tilki Selim (Crafty Selim) (Hancer) (sc, role); Aanasi yi it do ırmus (Kurthan) (role); Cirkir kiral (Atadeniz) (role); Kovboy Ali (Atadeniz) (role); Silahların kanunu (Atadeniz) (role); . . . Veda silahlara veda . . . (Jöntürk) (role); Yi it yaralı olar (Görec) (role)
1974  At hırsızı banus (Jöntürk) (sc, role); Seytanın o lu (Aslan) (sc, role); Balatlı arif (Yılmaz) (role); Bomba Kemal (Kurthan) (role); Bir için cellatlar (Duru) (role); Cirkir kiral aftermet (Atadeniz) (role); Eskiyya cellati (Jöntürk) (role); Ince cumali (Duru) (role); Kızılrmak-Karakoyun (Akad) (role); Kozano lu (Yılmaz) (role); Kuduz recep (Sa ír) (role); Karbunlk karsi (Akad) (role)
1968  Azrail benim (The Executioner) (sc, role); Kargaci Halil (Halil, the Crow-Man) (Yalınkılık) (sc, role); Aslan bey (Yalınkılık) (role); Beyo la canavari (Görec) (role); Canpazari (Görec) (role); Marmara hasan (Aslan) (role); Öldürmek hakkındır (Ergün) (role)
1969  Belanın yedi türülüşi (Seven Kinds of Trouble) (Ergün) (sc, role); Bin defa ölürüm (Aslan) (role); Cifte tabancalı kadayı (Aslan) (role); Güney ölüm uçaşyor (Aslan) (role); Kan su gibi akacak (Atadeniz) (role); Kursunlar kanunu (Ergün) (role)
1970  İmzam kanda yazılır (I Sign in Blood) (Aslan) (sc, role); Seygili muhabir (My Dear Bodyguard) (Jöntürk) (sc, role); Seytan kayıkları (Devil Crag) (Filmer) (sc, role); Cifte yrekli (Evin) (role); Kanımın son damlasına kadar (Figenli) (role); Onu Allah al fretsin (Elmas) (role); Son kızının adam (Davuto lu) (role); Zeyno (Yılmaz) (role)
1971  Cirkir ve cesur (Ozer) (role); Namus ve silah (Görec) (role)
1972  Sahte yar (Görec) (role)
1975  İzın (Leave) (Gürsü) (sc); Bir gün mutlaka (One Day Certainly) (Olguç) (sc)
1978  Sürü (The Herd) (Ökten) (sc, pr supervision)
1979  Düssman (The Enemy) (Ökten) (sc, pr supervision)
1981  Yol (The Way) (sc, pr supervision, ed)

Publications

By GÜNEY: articles—

On GÜNEY: book—
On GÜNEY: articles—

“Güney Issue” of Positif (Paris), April 1980.
Rayns, Tony, “‘From Isolation,’” in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1983.

On GÜNEY: film—

* * *

Yilmaz Güney’s life was fully as dramatic as any of his films. The son of a rural worker, he supported himself through studies at university in Ankara and Istanbul. Though his career was interrupted by a series of arrests for political activities, he established himself as a scriptwriter and actor in the 1960s and developed a wide popular following. More than a film star in the conventional sense, he became something of a popular myth, a figure in whose sufferings and ruthless quest for vengeance the poor and oppressed could see their lives and aspirations reflected.

When Güney turned to directing in the late 1960s, his first films were in the same commercial tradition as his early hits. But the early 1970s saw a fresh burst of creativity, brought to an end by a new prison sentence of two years. After his release he completed one of his most interesting films, Arkadas (The Friend), in 1974, before finding himself back in prison, this time on a murder charge for which he received a sentence of twenty-four years imprisonment. But even this could not put a stop to his career. He maintained contact with the outside world and continued scripting films, some of which, like Sürü (The Herd), achieved international success. When finally made his escape from Turkey in 1981 he was able to work on yet another film he had scripted, Yol (The Way), which won the Cannes Grand Prix in 1982.

Perhaps Güney’s major achievement as an actor-director in the early 1970s was to make the transition from the heroic superman figure of his early films, such as Ac Kurtlar (The Hungry Wolves), to the vulnerable individual of his later work. In the series of masterly films that begin with the ironically titled Umut (Hope) in 1970, the failure of the isolated individual acting alone becomes the unifying thread of Güney’s work. Already, in The Hungry Wolves, the picture of Turkish society portrayed by Güney is most remarkable for what is lacking: no concerned government to maintain the law, no self-help for the terrorized peasants, no acceptable role for women, no vision beyond instinctive revolt on the part of the bandits. These factors continue to form the background for the series of defeated individuals in both rural settings as in the bandit film A it (Elegy) and the urban environment as in Baba (The Father) and Zavallilar (The Poor Ones).

Perhaps Güney’s major achievement as an actor-director in the early 1970s was to make the transition from the heroic superman figure of his early films, such as Ac Kurtlar (The Hungry Wolves), to the vulnerable individual of his later work. In the series of masterly films that begin with the ironically titled Umut (Hope) in 1970, the failure of the isolated individual acting alone becomes the unifying thread of Güney’s work. Already, in The Hungry Wolves, the picture of Turkish society portrayed by Güney is most remarkable for what is lacking: no concerned government to maintain the law, no self-help for the terrorized peasants, no acceptable role for women, no vision beyond instinctive revolt on the part of the bandits. These factors continue to form the background for the series of defeated individuals in both rural settings as in the bandit film A it (Elegy) and the urban environment as in Baba (The Father) and Zavallilar (The Poor Ones).

The next film Güney began, Endise (Anxiety), was completed by his friend and former assistant Serif Gören following Güney’s arrest. He was to spend eight years in prison, but he continued to write film scripts indefatigably. Among his best films of this period are those which offer a vivid picture of the life of peasants in the still feudal world of his native district, Adana: Anxiety and The Herd, the latter directed by Zeki Ökten. Güney’s final Turkish work, Yol, which he edited himself in exile, is even wider in its scope, offering an image of the whole breadth of Turkey through its intercut stories of five detainees released from prison for a week who travel home to their families. Despite Güney’s strong political commitment, his films are social studies rather than overtly political tracts. He himself never failed to make the distinction between his political activity, which is directed towards revolutionary change in society, and his filmmaking.

For Güney, the fictional feature film remained first and foremost a popular form, a way of communicating with a mass audience, and, as Yol shows, he used in an exemplary way the possibilities it offers for stating and examining the contradictions that underlie modern Turkish society.

—Roy Armes

GUTIÉRREZ ALEA, Tomás

Nationality: Cuban. Born: Havana, 11 December 1928. Education: Studied law at the University of Havana; attended Centro Sperimentale, Rome, 1951–53. Career: Worked with Cine-Revista newsreel organisation, late 1950s; following establishment of Instituto Cubano del Arte e Industria Cinematograficos (ICAIC) by revolutionary government, began making documentaries, 1959; later collaborated with younger filmmakers, in keeping with ICAIC policy. Awards: Union of Writers of the URSS Award, Moscow International Film Festival, for Historias de la revolucion, 1961; Grand Coral—First Prize, for Tiempo de revancha, 1982; Grand Coral—First Prize, for Hasta cierto punto, 1983; Silver Berlin Bear Award and Teddy Award, Berlin International Film Festival, Golden Kikito, Gramado Latin Film Festival, ARCI-NOVA Award, FIPRESCI Award, Grand Coral—First Prize, OCIC Award, and Special Jury Award, Sundance Film Festival, for Strawberry and Chocolate, 1994; Grand Coral—Second Prize, shared with Juan Carlos Tabío, Havana Film Festival,
Tomás Gutiérrez Alea

Films as Director:

1947  La Caperucita roja; El Faquir
1950  Una Confusión cotidiana
1953  Il Sogno de Giovanni Bassain
1955  El Mégano
1959  Esta tierra nuestra (+ sc, ed)
1960  Asamblea general; Historias de la revolución (Stories of the Revolution) (+ sc)
1961  Muerte al invasor
1962  Las Doce sillas (The Twelve Chairs) (+ sc)
1964  Cumbite (+ sc)
1966  La Muerte de un burócrata (Death of a Bureaucrat) (+ sc)
1968  Memorias del subdesarrollo (Historias del subdesarrollo; Inconsolable Memories; Memories of Underdevelopment) (+ sc, ro)
1971  Una Pelea cubana contra los demonios (A Cuban Fight against Demons) (+ sc)
1974  El Arte del tabaco
1975  El Camino de la mirra y el incienso
1976  La Última cena (The Last Supper)
1977  De cierta manera (One Way or Another) (+ sc); La Sexta parte del mundo
1979  Los Sobrevivientes (The Survivors) (+ sc)
1984  Hasta cierto punto (Up to a Certain Point; Up to a Point)
1988  Cartas del parque (Letters from the Park) (+ sc)
1991  Contigo en la distancia (Far Apart)
1993  Fresa y chocolate (Strawberry and Chocolate)
1994  Guantanamera (+ sc)
1998  Memorias del subdesarrollo (Historias del subdesarrollo; Inconsolable Memories; Memories of Underdevelopment) (+ sc, ro)
1971  Una Pelea cubana contra los demonios (A Cuban Fight against Demons) (+ sc)
1974  El Arte del tabaco
1975  El Camino de la mirra y el incienso
1976  La Última cena (The Last Supper)
1977  De cierta manera (One Way or Another) (+ sc); La Sexta parte del mundo
1979  Los Sobrevivientes (The Survivors) (+ sc)
1984  Hasta cierto punto (Up to a Certain Point; Up to a Point)
1988  Cartas del parque (Letters from the Park) (+ sc)
1991  Contigo en la distancia (Far Apart)
1993  Fresa y chocolate (Strawberry and Chocolate)
1994  Guantanamera (+ sc)
1998  Memorias del subdesarrollo (Historias del subdesarrollo; Inconsolable Memories; Memories of Underdevelopment) (+ sc, ro)
1971  Una Pelea cubana contra los demonios (A Cuban Fight against Demons) (+ sc)
1974  El Arte del tabaco
1975  El Camino de la mirra y el incienso
1976  La Última cena (The Last Supper)
1977  De cierta manera (One Way or Another) (+ sc); La Sexta parte del mundo
1979  Los Sobrevivientes (The Survivors) (+ sc)
1984  Hasta cierto punto (Up to a Certain Point; Up to a Point)
1988  Cartas del parque (Letters from the Park) (+ sc)
1991  Contigo en la distancia (Far Apart)
1993  Fresa y chocolate (Strawberry and Chocolate)
1994  Guantanamera (+ sc)

Other Films:

1975  El Otro Francisco (The Other Francisco)
Publications

By GUTIÉRREZ ALEA: book

By GUTIÉRREZ ALEA: articles

Interview with G. Chijona, in Framework (Norwich), Spring 1979.

Interview with M. Ansara, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), May/June 1981.

Interview with E. Colina, in Cine Cubano (Havana), no. 109, 1984.

Interview with J. R. MacBean, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1985.

On GUTIÉRREZ ALEA: books

Burton, Julianne, editor, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, Texas, 1986.

On GUTIÉRREZ ALEA: articles

Sutherland, Elizabeth, “Cinema of Revolution—Ninety Miles from Home,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1961/62.

In 1946, when he was 17 years old, Tomás Gutiérrez Alea came into possession of a 16mm movie camera. As he related later in a Cinéaste essay titled “I Wasn’t Always a Filmmaker,” his first effort was a Kafkaesque comedy called Una confusión cotidiana (An Everyday Confusion). “The film was about ten minutes long. I worked with actors, and the experience was exciting and fun. From then on, I knew what I wanted to be.”

Though he went to law school at the University of Havana (where one of his fellow students was Fidel Castro), he pursued his true interest even there, making two films for the Cuban Communist Party. He wasn’t a party member at that time, but was responding to a culture of student activism that had dominated his campus for the previous three decades.

In 1951 Gutiérrez Alea joined a group making a clandestine, neorealist-inspired film about charcoal burners, intended to expose the conditions imposed on the poor by American neocolonialism. The film, El Megano, which took a year to make, was shown once, at a 1956 screening on the University of Havana campus. It was then seized by the authorities, and the filmmakers were interrogated. That same year Gutiérrez Alea finally found paid work as a filmmaker, making short documentaries and humorous films for a weekly TV series called Cinerevista. He worked for a Mexican producer named Manuel Barbachano Ponce, who two years later would produce Luis Buñuel’s Nazarin.

After Castro came to power on December 31, 1958, Alea was recruited by the Cultural Directorate of the Rebel Army to make a documentary called Esta tierra nuestra (This Land of Ours). Meanwhile, the Revolutionary Government was establishing an official film production house called the Cuban Institute of Cinematographic Art and Industry; its first head was Alfredo Guevara, who had been involved in the making of El Megano. Gutiérrez Alea became one of its founding members.

Over the next eight years, Gutiérrez Alea made another documentary and three feature films, including a satire on revolutionary excess called La muerte de un burócrata (Death of a Bureaucrat). Then in 1968 he began work on what was to become his most influential films, Memorias de subdesarrollo (Memories of Underdevelopment).

Based on a novella by Edmundo Desnoes called Inconsolable Memorias, Gutiérrez Alea’s film combined its fictional elements with documentary footage to create a portrait of a bourgeois intellectual who wants to be a part of the revolutionary ferment going on all around him, but remains disconnected, watching the transformation of Havana society through binoculars from his apartment balcony. This breakdown of the barriers between fiction and reality was widely exploited in the Cuban film industry, and was to have a wide influence on world cinema when it was finally shown in America and France in 1973 and 1974.

In America the National Society of Film Critics honored Memorias de subdesarrollo by inviting its director to a ceremony to accept a plaque and a $2000 award. The U.S. State Department refused to grant Gutiérrez Alea a visa, and threatened the Society with legal action if it delivered the award in any other way. The New York Times editorialized on the situation on January 19, 1974: “The absurdity of such sanctions must be measured against the fact that the USA is nowbusily encouraging trade with the Communist superpowers. But the transmission of a prize for cultural achievement is treated as a subversive act . . . At a time when détente with the Soviet Union and the normalization of relations with Communist China are rightfully considered diplomatic triumphs, the suggestion that Cuban filmmakers might constitute a menace only exposes American officialdom to ridicule.”

While Gutiérrez Alea always defended the Cuban revolution abroad, he also accepted the responsibility of critiquing it at home. This dual response is exemplified by the way he responded to the issues of oppression experienced by gay men and lesbians under the Castro regime. In 1984 the director participated over several issues of the Village Voice in a polemical discussion with Cuban expatriate cinematographer Nestor Almendros. This was in response to Almendros’ documentary about the official anti-gay oppression in Cuba called Improper Conduct.

Gutiérrez Alea forthrightly defended the Cuban regime against what he viewed as Almendros’ “half-truths,” and tried to place the attitudes against homosexuality in a wider context of Cuba’s Catholic and Spanish traditions. Working in Cuba however, Gutiérrez Alea had already made one film, Hasta un cierto punto (Up to a Certain Point), which analyzed the machismo underlying anti-gay prejudice, and in 1993 he would produce a film, Frese y chocolate (Strawberry and Chocolate) which brought the issue to the forefront of political debate in Cuba.

Because of deteriorating health, Gutiérrez Alea had to bring in a frequent collaborator, Juan Carlos Tabío, to co-direct this film. Tabío also served in the same capacity on Gutiérrez Alea’s final project, Guantanamera. The director succumbed to lung cancer on April 16, 1996, at the age of 67. He was widely eulogized as the brightest star of the Cuban cinema, at a time when it was matched in the hemisphere only by Brazil in its artistic excellence and social and political relevance.

—Stephen Brophy
and brief term in Paris; studied stenography. Family: Married Herbert Blaché-Bolton, 1907 (divorced 1922), two children. Career: Secretary to Léon Gaumont, 1895; directed first film, La Fée aux choux, 1896 (some sources give 1900); director of Gaumont film production, 1897–1907; using Gaumont "chronophone," made first sound films, 1900; moved to United States with husband, who was to supervise Gaumont subsidiary Solax, 1907; ceased independent production, lectured on filmmaking at Columbia University, 1917; assistant director to husband, 1919–20; returned to France, 1922; moved to United States, 1964. Awards: Legion of Honor, 1955. Died: In Mahwah, New Jersey, 24 March 1968.

Films as Director and Screenwriter:

1896 La Fée aux choux (The Cabbage Fairy)

1897 Le Pêcheur dans le torrent; Leçon de danse; Baignade dans le torrent; Une nuit agitée; Coucher d’Yvette; Danse fleur de lotus; Ballet Libella; Le Planchon du colonel; Idylle; L’Aveugle

1897/98 L’Arroseur arrosé; Au réfectoire; En classe; Les Cambrioleurs; Le Cocher de fiacre endormi; Idylle interrompue; Chez le magénétiseur; Les Farces de Jocko; Scène d’escamotage; Déménagement à la cloche de bois; Je vous y prrrends!

1898/99 Leçons de boxe; La Vie du Christ (11 tableaux)

1899/1900 Le Tondeur de chiens; Le Déjeuner des enfants; Au cabaret; La Mauvaise Sope; Un Lunch; Erreur judiciaire; L’Aveugle; La Bonne Absinthe; Danse serpentine par Mme Bob Walter; Mésaventure d’un charbonnier; Monnaie de lapin; Les Dangers de l’alcoolisme; Le Tommelier; Transformations; Le Chiffonnier; Retour des champs; Chez le Maréchal-Ferrant; Marché à la volaille; Courte échelle; L’Angélus; Bataille d’oreillers; Bataille de boules de neige; Le marchand de coca

1900 Avenue de l’Opéra; La petite magicienne; Leçon de danse; Chez le photographe; Sidney’s Jouxains series (nine titles); Dans les coulisses; Au Bal de Flore series (three titles); Ballet Japonais series (three titles); Danse serpentine; Danse du pas des fouldars par des alméas; Danse de l’ivresse; Coucher d’une Parisienne; Les Fredaines de Pierrette series (four titles); Vénus et Adonis series (five titles); La Tarantelle; Danse des Saisons series (four titles); La Source; Danse du papillon; La Concierge; Danses series (three titles); chirurgie fin de siècle; Une Rage de dents; Saut humité de M. Plick

1900/01 La Danse du ventre; Lavatory moderne; Lecture quotidienne

1900/07 (Gaumont “Phonoscènes”, i.e., films with synchronized sound recorded on a wax cylinder): Carmen (twelve scenes); Mireille (five scenes); Les Dragons de Villars (nine scenes); Mignon (seven scenes); Faust (twenty-two scenes); Polin series (thirteen titles); Manol series (thirteen titles); Dranem series of comic songs (twelve titles); Series recorded in Spain (eleven titles); La Priére by Gounod

1901 Folies Masquées series (three titles); Frivolité; Les Vagues; Danse basque; Hussards et grisettes; Charmant Frou Frou; Tel est pris qui croyait prendre

1902 La fiole enchantée; L’Equilibriste; En faction; La Première Gamelle; Le Dent récalcitrante; Le Marchand de ballons; Les Chiens savants; Miss Lina Eshard Danseuse Cosmopolite and Serpentine series (four titles); Les Clowns; Sage-femme de première classe; Quadrille réaliste; Une Scène en cabinet particulier vue à travers le trou de la serrure; Farces de cuisinière; Danse mauresque; Le Lion savant; Le Pommier; La Cour des miracles; La Gavotte; Trompé mais content; Fruits de saison; Pour secourir la salade

1903 Potage indigeste; Illusioniste renversant; Le Fiancé ensoirclé; Les Apaches pas veinards; Les Aventures d’un voyageur trop pressé; Ne bougeons plus; Comment monsieur prend son bain; La Main du professeur Hamilton ou Le Roi des dollars; Service précipité; La Poule fantasiste; Modélage express; Faust et Méphistophélès; Lutteurs américains; La Valise enchantée; Compagnons de voyage encombrants; Cake-Walk de la pendule; Répétition dans un cirque; Jocko musicien; Les Braconniers; La Ligueur du couvent; Le Voleur sacrilège; Enlèvement en automobile et mariage précipité

1903/04 Secours aux naufragés; La Mouche; La Chasse au cambrioleur; Nos Bon Enfants; Les Surprises de l’affichage; Comme on fait son lit on se couche; Le Pompon malencontreux 1; Comment on disperse les foules; Les Enfants du miracle; Pierrot assassin; Les Deux Rivaux

1904 L’Assassinat du Courrier de Lyon; Vieilles Estampes series (four titles); Manuau coeur punti; Magie noire; Raffes de chiens; Cambrioleur et agent; Scènes Directoire series (three titles); Duel tragique; L’’Attaque d’un diligence; Culture intuitive ou Le Vieux Mari; Cible humaine; Transformations; Le Jour du terme; Robert Macaire et Bertrand; Electrocutée; La Rêve du chasseur; Le Monoluteur; Les Petits Coupeurs de bois vert; Clown en sac; Triste Fin d’un vieux savant; Le Testament de Pierrot; Les Secrets de la prestidigitation dévoilés; La Faim . . . L’ occasion . . . L’herbe tendre; Militaire et nourrice; La Première Cigarette; Départ pour les vacances; Tentative d’assassinat en chemin de fer; Paris la nuit ou Exploits d’ apaches à Montmartre; Concours de bébés; Erreur de poivrot; Voie by par les bohémiens (Rapt d’enfant par les romanichels); Les Bienfaits du cinématographe; P tisseur et ramoneur; Gage d’amour; L’Assassinat de la rue du Temple (Le Crime de la rue du Temple); Le Réveil du jardinier; Les Cambrioleurs de Paris

1905 Réhabilitation; Douaniers et contrebandiers (La Guérite); Le Bébé embarrassant; Comment on dort à Paris?; Le Lorgnon accusateur; La Charité du prestidigitateur; Une Noce au lac Saint-Fargeau; Le Képi; Le Pantalon coupé; Le Plateau; Roméo pris au piège; Chien jouant à la balle; La Fantassin Guignard; La Statue; Villa dévalisée; Mort de Robert Macaire et Bertrand; Le Pavé; Les Maçons; La Esmeralda; Peintre et ivrogne; On est poivrot, mais on a du cœur; Au Poulailler!

1906 La Fée au printemps; La Vie du marin; La Chaussette; La Messe de minuit; Pauvre pompiers; Le Régiment moderne; Les Druides; Voyage en Espagne series (fifteen titles); La Vie de Christ (25 tableaux); Conscience de prêtre; L’Honneur du Corse; J’ai un hanneton dans mon pantalon; Le Fils du garde-chasse; Course de taureaux à Nîmes; La Pègre de Paris; Lèvres closes (Sealed Lips); La Crinoline; La Voiture cellulaire; La Carrière; Le Matelas alcoolique; A la recherche d’un appartement
1907  La vérité sur l’homme-singe (Ballet de Singe); Déménagement à la cloche de bois; Les Gendarmes; Sur la barricade (L’enfant de la barricade)

1910  A Child’s Sacrifice (The Doll)

1911  Rose of the Circus; Across the Mexican Line; Eclipse; A Daughter of the Navajos; The Silent Signal; The Girl and the Bronco Buster; The Mascot of Troop “C”; An Enlisted Man’s Honor; The Stampede; The Hold-Up; The Altered Message; His Sister’s Sweetheart; His Better Self; A Revolutionary Romance; The Violin Maker of Nuremberg

1912  Mignon or The Child of Fate; A Terrible Lesson; His Lordship’s White Feather; Falling Leaves; The Sewer; In the Year 2000; A Terrible Night; Mickey’s Pal; Fra Diavolo; Hotel Honeymoon; The Equine Spy; Two Little Rangers; The Bloodstain; At the Phone; Flesh and Blood; The Paralytic; The Face at the Window

1913  The Beasts of the Jungle; Dick Whittington and His Cat; Kelly from the Emerald Isle; The Pit and the Pendulum; Western Love; Rogues of Paris; Blood and Water; Ben Bolt; The Shadows of the Moulin Rouge; The Eyes that Could Not Close; The Star of India; The Fortune Hunters

1914  Beneath the Czar; The Monster and the Girl; The Million Dollar Robbery; The Prisoner of the Harem; The Dream Woman; Hook and Hand; The Woman of Mystery; The Yellow Traffic; The Lure; Michael Strogoff; or The Courier to the Czar; The Tigress; The Cricket on the Hearth

1915  The Heart of a Painted Woman; Greater Love Hath No Man; The Vampire; My Madonna; Barbara Frietchie (co-d)

1916  What Will People Say?: The Girl with the Green Eyes; The Ocean Waif; House of Cards

1917  The Empress; The Adventurer; A Man and the Woman; When You and I Were Young; Behind the Mask

1918  The Great Adventure

1920  Tarnished Reputation

Other Films:

1919  The Divorcee (asst d); The Brat (asst d)
1920  Stronger than Death (asst d)

Publications

By GUY: book—

By GUY: articles—

On GUY: books—

On GUY: articles—

Alice Guy was the first person, or among the first, to make a fictional film. The story-film was quite possibly “invented” by her in 1896 when she made La Fée aux choux (The Cabbage Fairy). Certain historians claim that films of Louis Lumière and Georges Méliès preceded Guy’s first film. The question remains debatable; Guy claimed precedence, devoting much effort in her lifetime to correcting recorded errors attributing her films to her male colleagues, and trying to secure her earned niche in film history. There is no debate regarding Guy’s position as the world’s first woman filmmaker.

Between 1896 and 1901 Guy made films averaging just seventy-five feet in length; from 1902 to 1907 she made numerous films of all types and lengths using acrobats, clowns, and opera singers as well as large casts in ambitious productions based on fairy and folk tales, Biblical themes, paintings, and myths. The “tricks” she used—running film in reverse and the use of double exposure—were learned through trial-and-error. In this period she also produced “talking pictures,” in which Gaumont’s Chronophone synchronized a projector with sound recorded on a wax cylinder.

One of these sound films, Mireille, was made by Guy in 1906. Herbert Blaché-Bolton joined the film crew of Mireille to learn directing. Alice Guy and Herbert were married in early 1907. The couple moved to the United States, where they eventually set up a studio in Flushing, New York. The Blachés then established the Solax Company, with a Manhattan office. In its four years of existence, Solax released 325 films, including westerns, military movies, thrillers, and historical romances. Mme. Blaché’s first picture in the United States was A Child’s Sacrifice (in 1910), which centers on a girl’s attempts to earn money for her family. In her Hotel Honeymoon of 1912, the moon comes alive to smile at human lovers, while in The Violin Maker of Nuremberg, two apprentices contend for the affections of their instructor’s daughter.
The Blachés built their own studio at Fort Lee, New Jersey, a facility with a daily printing capacity of 16,000 feet of positive film. For its inauguration in February 1912, Mme. Blaché presented an evening of Solax films at Weber’s Theatre on Broadway. In that year she filmed two movies based on operas: Fra Diavolo and Mignon, each of which were three-reelers that included orchestral accompaniment. Her boldest enterprises were films using animals and autos.

Cataclysmic changes in the film industry finally forced the Blachés out of business. They rented, and later sold, their studio, then directed films for others. In 1922 the Blachés divorced. Herbert directed films until 1930, but Alice could not find film work and never made another film. She returned to France, but without prints of her films she had no evidence of her accomplishments. She could not find work in the French film industry either. She returned to the United States in 1927 to search the Library of Congress and other film depositories for her films, but her efforts in vain: only a half-dozen of her one-reelers survive. In 1953 she returned to Paris, where, at age seventy-eight, she was honored as the first woman filmmaker in the world. Her films, characterized by innovation and novelty, explored all genres and successfully appealed to both French and American audiences. Today she is finally being recognized as a unique pioneer of the film industry.

—Louise Heck-Rabi

GUZMÁN, Patricio

Nationality: Chilean. Born: Santiago de Chile, 11 August 1941.

Education: Escuela oficial de cinematografia (EOC), Madrid, graduated 1969.

Career: After writing novels, joined Filmic Institute, Catholic University in Santiago, 1965; left for Spain, 1967; returned to Chile, joined Chile-Films (national film production company), heading Documentary Film Workshops, 1970; constituted Group of the Third Year to produce The Battle of Chile, imprisoned shortly after September coup d’etat, 1973; moved to Cuba, 1974, completed The Battle of Chile, 1977; moved to Spain, 1980.

Films as Director:

1965 Viva la libertad (Hail to Freedom) (short)
1966 Artesania popular (Popular Crafts) (short); Electroshow (short)
1967 Cien metros con Chaplin (One Hundred Meters with Chaplin); Escuela de sordomudos (School for Deafmutes)
1968 La tortura (Torture); Imposibranque
1969 Opus seis (Opus Six); El Paraiso ortopedico (Orthopedic Paradise)
1970 Elecciones municipales (Municipal Elections); El primer año (The First Year)
1972 La respuesta de Octobre (The Response in October); Comandos comunales (Communal Organization); Manuel Rodriguez (unfinished)
1974 La batalla de Chile: La lucha de un pueblo sin armas (The Battle of Chile: The Struggle of an Unarmed People) Part 1: La insurrección de la burguesia (Insurrection of the Bourgeoisie)
1976 Part 2: El golpe de estado (Coup d’état)
1979 Part 3: El poder popular (The Popular Power)

1983 La rosa de los vientos (Rose of the Winds)
1986 En el Nombre de Dios
1992 La Cruz del Sur
1997 Chile, la memoria obstinada (Chile, the Obstreter Memory)

Publications

By GUZMÁN: books—

La insurrección de la burguesia, edited by Racinatinge, Caracas, 1975.
La batalla de Chile: La lucha de un pueblo sin armas, Madrid, 1977.

By GUZMÁN: articles—

“Chile,” 3: Guzmán,” and “Chile,” in Framework (Norwich), Spring and Autumn 1979.

Interview with Z. M. Pick, in Ciné-Tracts (Montreal), Winter 1980.

On GUZMÁN: books—

Burton, Julianne, editor, Cinema and Social Change in Latin America: Conversations with Filmmakers, Austin, Texas, 1986.

On GUZMÁN: articles—

“La Batalla de Chile Section” of Cine Cubano (Havana), March 1978.

Chilean director Patricio Guzmán studied fiction filmmaking in Spain in the 1960s, but he eventually dropped plans to make fiction features when he returned to Chile during the presidency of the Marxist-socialist Salvador Allende (1970–73). Guzmán is above all a political filmmaker, and the intense everyday political activities in Allende’s Chile stimulated Guzmán to take to the streets and factories in order to make documentary records of those fast-paced events. In all three of his documentaries on Allende’s Chile—El primer año, La respuesta de Octubre, and La batalla de Chile—the director rejected archival footage and the compilation approach in favor of immersing himself in significant political events in order to obtain actuality footage.

Guzmán’s success in obtaining meaningful and abundant actuality footage is due in large part to his (and his colleagues’) marked ability to understand and foresee the flow of political events. Political savvy coupled with rigorous and disciplined production techniques allowed Guzmán and his production groups to overcome formidable obstacles, including financial and technical difficulties. To film the three feature-length parts of the masterwork La batalla de Chile, the director and his collective had access to one 16mm Eclair camera and one Nagra tape recorder; film stock, unavailable in Chile, had been sent from abroad by a European colleague. During his stay in Allende’s Chile, Guzmán successfully combined his personal political militancy with his concept of the role of the filmmaker. Guzmán, a committed Marxist, wished to make films that would help Allende’s leftist Popular Unity coalition take power. Marx and Engels (Manifesto of the Communist Party) viewed classes as the protagonists of history, and conflict as an inherent dimension of class societies; Guzmán follows this Marxist conception in that classes are the protagonists of his films and events are framed in terms of class conflict. In accordance with the Marxist-Leninist revolutionary view that there can be no peaceful transition to socialism before the repressive machinery of the bourgeois state is broken up and replaced, the first two parts of La batalla de Chile follow the military’s drift to the right as well as the anti-Allende activities of the opposition-dominated legislature. Both La respuesta de Octubre and part three of La batalla de Chile center on workers organizing as a class in order to achieve self-emancipation and transform the world created by the bourgeoisie.

The style of the journalistic El primer año is unexceptional, and it was only with La batalla de Chile that Guzmán found a distinctive documentary style. This style is characterized by the frequent use of the sequence shot, which the director prefers because it is a synthetic device allowing spectators to see events unfolding in front of their eyes without breaks in the flow of the images. El primer año and La respuesta de Octubre have not circulated widely outside of Allende’s Chile. Inside Allende’s Chile, these documentaries were well received by working-class audiences. La respuesta de octubre was particularly popular with workers who, heartened to see their efforts to create worker-controlled industrial zones documented on film, facilitated the documentary’s distribution in the country’s factories.

Guzmán’s international reputation as a documentary filmmaker has been secured by La batalla de Chile, hailed by both Marxist and non-Marxist critics in many countries as a landmark in the history of the political documentary.

—Dennis West
HAANSTRA, Bert

Films as Director:

1948 De Muiderkring herleeft (The Muyder Circle Lives Again) (+ sc, ph, ed)
1950 Spiegel van Holland (Mirror of Holland) (+ sc, ph, ed)
1951 Nederlandse beeldhouwkunst tijdens de late Middeleeuwen (Dutch Sculpture) (+ co-ed); Panta Rhei (All Things Flow) (+ sc, ph, ed)
1952 Dijkbouw (Dike Builders) (+ sc, ed)
1954 Ont staan en vergaan (The Changing Earth) (+ sc); De opsporing van aardolie (The Search for Oil) (+ sc); De verkenningsboring (The Wildcat) (+ sc); Het olieveld (The Oilfield) (+ sc)
1955 The Rival World (Strijd zonder einde) (+ ed, sc); God Shiva (+ sc, pr, ed); En de zee was niet meer (And There Was No More Sea) (+ pr, sc, ed)
1957 Rembrandt, schilder van de mens (Rembrandt, Painter of Man) (+ pr, sc, ed)
1958 Over glas gesproken (Speaking of Glass) (+ pr, sc, ed); Glas (Glass) (+ co-ed, pr, sc); Fanfare (+ co-sc, co-ed)
1960 De zaak M.P. (The M.P. Case) (+ co-sc, co-ed, pr)
1962 Zoo (+ pr, sc, ed); Delta Phase I (+ pr, sc, ed)
1963 Alleman (The Human Dutch) (+ co-sc, narration for English and German versions)
1966 De stem van het water (The Voice of the Water) (+ co-sc, pr, ed)
1967 Retour Madrid (Return Ticket to Madrid) (+ co-pr, co-ph)
1972 Bij de beesten af (Ape and Super Ape) (+ pr, sc, ed, co-commentary, co-add’l ph, narration)
1975 Dokter Pulder zaait papavers (Dr. Pulder Sows Poppies, When the Poppies Bloom Again) (+ pr)
1978 Nationale Parken ... noodzaak (National Parks ... a Necessity, National Parks in the Netherlands) (+ pr, sc, ed)
1979 Een pak slaag (Mr. Slotter’s Jubilee) (+ pr)
1983 Vroeger kon je lachen (One Could Laugh in Former Days) (+ pr, sc); Nederland (The Netherlands) (+ pr, sc, ed)
1988 Kinderen van Ghana

Other Films:

1949 Myrte en de demonen (Myrte and the Demons) (Schreiber) (ph); Boer Pietersen schiet in de roos (Bull’s Eye for Farmer Pietersen) (Brusse) (ph)
1955 Belgian Grand Prix (Hughes) (co-ph)
1957 De gouden Ily (The Golden Ilsy) (van der Linden) (ph); Olie op reis (Pattern of Supply) (Pendry) (pr)
1959 Paleontologie (Schakel met het verleden; Story in the Rocks) (van Gelder) (pr, tech advisor)
1960 Lage landen (Hold Back the Sea) (Sluizer) (tech advisor)
1962 De overval (The Silent Raid) (Rotha) (co-sc, uncredited)
1968 Pas assez (Not Enough; Niet genoeg) (van der Velde) (ed)
1970 Trafic (Tati) (collaborator); Summer in the Fields (van der Linden) (ed)
1972 Grierson (Blais) (role as interviewee)
1979 Juliana in zeventig bewogen jaren (Juliana in Seventy Turbulent Years) (Kohlhaas) (advisor)
Publications

By HAANSTRA: articles—

‘‘Geen klachten over hoeveelheid aandacht voor Nederlandse film,’’ in Skoop (Amsterdam), February 1976.

Interview with Freddy Sartor, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), November 1996.

On HAANSTRA: book—

Verdaasdonk, Dorothee, editor, Bert Haanstra, Amsterdam, 1983.

On HAANSTRA: articles—

Cowie, Peter, “Bert Haanstra,’’ in Focus on Film (London), Spring 1972.

‘‘Bert Haanstra,’’ in Film Dope (London), March 1981.

Daems, Jo, “Het beste van Bert Haanstra. Lang verborgen schat (her)ontdekt,’’ in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), May-June 1990.

Bert Haanstra is one of Holland’s most renowned filmmakers. The twenty-eight films he made between 1948 and 1988 belong to various genres. His first films were documentaries. Typical of these, and a hallmark of Haanstra’s personal style, is the frequent use of “rhyming images” and of images blending into each other. Critics responded warmly to the lyrical and pictorial qualities of Haanstra’s early work. In his films about oil drilling, commissioned by Shell, Haanstra showed that instructional films can be of artistic as well as informative value.

Haanstra’s first feature film, Fanfare, was a comedy and a big hit at the box office. The film, however, was also praised for its artistic importance and considered by many as a turning point in Dutch film: “This film should set the tone for the future production of Dutch feature-films,’’ wrote a critic. His second feature film, De zaak M. P., was very coolly received, however, and Haanstra turned again to making documentaries.

Discussions in the 1960s about the establishment of a tradition of Dutch feature films—a tradition lacking at that time—were heavily influenced by the views on film expressed by the French nouvelle vague cineastes. Haanstra’s long documentaries, Alleman, De stiem van het water, and Bij de beesten af, show him perfectly able to catch the peculiarities of human behavior, especially those of the Dutch. These three films still enjoy a firm reputation in Holland and elsewhere. Alleman and Bij de beesten af were nominated for Academy Awards. Although the number of movie-goers in Holland has sharply decreased, Haanstra’s public has remained large and loyal.

In 1975 Haanstra made his first novel-based film. Dokter Pulder zaait papa pers gives a subtle and detailed analysis of a number of fundamental human problems: loss of love, social failure, aging, and addiction to drugs and liquor. The film is psychologically convincing and full of tension. Een pak slaag, again based on a novel by Anton Koolhaas, failed to interest the public. In 1983 Haanstra brought out another feature film with Simon Carmiggelt as the main character listening to the tragicomic monologues of various ordinary people. Carmiggelt’s ability to render this type of monologue had won a wide audience for his daily columns, which have appeared since 1945 in a Dutch newspaper. The film, Vroeger kon je lachen, was well received.

By virtue of Haanstra’s diversity of films and of his great reputation with critics and the public, Haanstra made an invaluable contribution to the establishment of a Dutch film tradition. He remains a very important representative of the Dutch documentary school, which grew to fame in the 1960s and won countless awards at international film festivals. Haanstra’s own films have won over 70 prizes; he received an Academy Award for Glas, a short documentary film. As a director of feature films he convinced a large audience that Dutch films can (and should) be judged according to the same standards as important foreign films.

His films, and also his cooperation with Simon Carmiggelt and Anton Koolhaas, show that Haanstra’s work is firmly rooted in Dutch culture, which, however, he transcended by taking it as an example of more general aspects of human behavior. This is beautifully exemplified in Bij de beesten af. Although his films do not contain explicit political statements, Haanstra was anything but a “neutral observer.” By the art of montage he gave his films a deeper meaning which not infrequently embodied a critical view of human society and poignant tragicomic scenes.

—Dorothee Verdaasdonk

HALLSTROM, Lasse

Nationality: Swedish. Born: Stockholm, Sweden, 1946. Family: Married actress Lena Olin; one daughter, Tora, 1995. Career: Made 16mm film as a teenager that was eventually screened on Swedish TV; filmed and edited inserts for Swedish TV; directed program “Shall We Dance” for Danish TV; director and producer of TV programs and feature films. Awards: Academy Award nominations, director and screenplay, for My Life as a Dog. Agent: International Creative Management, 8942 Wilshire Blvd., Beverly Hills, California, 90211, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1975 A Lover and His Lass
1977 ABBA—The Movie
Lasse Hallstrom's career has been built upon the substantial foundation of a single film, My Life as a Dog, the film that brought him immediate international recognition and achieved (for a film in a foreign language) an appreciable popular success outside Sweden, and on the strength of which he was invited to Hollywood. The lure of Hollywood is obviously very potent—especially if you are a young filmmaker on the threshold of your career. Whether it was wise of Hallstrom to accept the invitation remains, at this point, after three Hollywood movies of varying distinction, open to discussion.

Hallstrom’s is the kind of gentle, somewhat diffident talent that can easily get submerged or misused in the Hollywood machinery, its businessmen’s eyes on box office receipts as production costs (and stars’ salaries) soar into the stratosphere.

My Life as a Dog is a minor masterpiece, and one of the finest films about childhood ever made, sensitive without sentimentality, generous but clear-sighted, disturbing in its full awareness of what W. B. Yeats called “the ignominy of boyhood,” in turns painful, poignant, and hilarious. Essentially, it is a film about survival, celebrating the resilience of its young hero Ingemar while unflinchingly depicting experiences that must leave lifetime scars. One can imagine such a film being made within the Hollywood context only in a much softened, sentimentalized, and bowdlerized form. The early sequences depict Ingemar’s experiences in a family from which the father is completely absent (according to Ingemar, loading bananas somewhere abroad, a task for which the boy tries to convince himself that his father is indispensable—though this may be either pure fantasy or a lie he has been told by adults who lie to him as matter of course), and otherwise consisting of a mother who is dying of (presumably) consumption and an elder brother who has inoculated himself with insensitivity and an assumption of superiority—a “family” in which his only comfort is a dog on which he showers his otherwise unwanted attentions, and which is casually (while Ingemar is away) “put to sleep” as a mere inconvenience. A running theme is Ingemar’s exposure to adult sexuality in its multitudinous variety. Especially problematic in Hollywood would be his relationship with a young girl who wants to be perceived as a boy in order to continue playing on the boys’ football team, and who becomes Ingemar’s sparring partner/opponent in the boxing ring—her ambivalence to her sexuality expressed in her attempts to conceal her developing breasts

---

Publications

By HALLSTROM: articles—

* * *

Lasse Hallstrom’s career has been built upon the substantial foundation of a single film, My Life as a Dog, the film that brought him immediate international recognition and achieved (for a film in a foreign language) an appreciable popular success outside Sweden, and on the strength of which he was invited to Hollywood. The lure of Hollywood is obviously very potent—especially if you are a young filmmaker on the threshold of your career. Whether it was wise of Hallstrom to accept the invitation remains, at this point, after three Hollywood movies of varying distinction, open to discussion.

Hallstrom’s is the kind of gentle, somewhat diffident talent that can easily get submerged or misused in the Hollywood machinery, its businessmen’s eyes on box office receipts as production costs (and stars’ salaries) soar into the stratosphere.

My Life as a Dog is a minor masterpiece, and one of the finest films about childhood ever made, sensitive without sentimentality, generous but clear-sighted, disturbing in its full awareness of what W. B. Yeats called “the ignominy of boyhood,” in turns painful, poignant, and hilarious. Essentially, it is a film about survival, celebrating the resilience of its young hero Ingemar while unflinchingly depicting experiences that must leave lifetime scars. One can imagine such a film being made within the Hollywood context only in a much softened, sentimentalized, and bowdlerized form. The early sequences depict Ingemar’s experiences in a family from which the father is completely absent (according to Ingemar, loading bananas somewhere abroad, a task for which the boy tries to convince himself that his father is indispensable—though this may be either pure fantasy or a lie he has been told by adults who lie to him as matter of course), and otherwise consisting of a mother who is dying of (presumably) consumption and an elder brother who has inoculated himself with insensitivity and an assumption of superiority—a “family” in which his only comfort is a dog on which he showers his otherwise unwanted attentions, and which is casually (while Ingemar is away) “put to sleep” as a mere inconvenience. A running theme is Ingemar’s exposure to adult sexuality in its multitudinous variety. Especially problematic in Hollywood would be his relationship with a young girl who wants to be perceived as a boy in order to continue playing on the boys’ football team, and who becomes Ingemar’s sparring partner/opponent in the boxing ring—her ambivalence to her sexuality expressed in her attempts to conceal her developing breasts

---

Other Films:

1979 Father to Be
1981 The Rooster
1983 Happy We
1985 My Life as a Dog (+ co-sc)
1986 The Children of Bullerby Village
1987 More about the Children of Bullerby Village
1991 Once Around (+ sc)
1993 What’s Eating Gilbert Grape (+ co-exec pr)
1995 Something to Talk About
1996 The Golden Hour
1999 The Cider House Rules
2000 Chocolat
whilst repeatedly attracting Ingemar’s attention to them. The film ends with them huddled up together on a sofa, their complicated sexual/gender problems apparently resolved.

Of Hallstrom’s three Hollywood films the second, What’s Eating Gilbert Grape?, is clearly the most successful; it is also, not coincidentally, the closest to My Life as a Dog, the characters so memorably incarnated by Johnny Depp and Leonardo di Caprio both relating in somewhat different ways to Ingemar, with Juliette Lewis replacing his idiosyncratic and rebellious girlfriend. Far less audacious than the Swedish film, it is nevertheless a very offbeat project for Hollywood, conceived perhaps as much for its variously eccentric stars as for its atypical director. It allows Hallstrom license to develop his favorite themes—the dysfunctional family, survival within conditions so unpromising as to appear to predetermine defeat—and his finest qualities of generosity and emotional delicacy. One might single out (because on paper they would appear particularly hazardous) Depp’s scenes with Mary Steenburgen, the lonely and desperate older woman who uses him as a sexual outlet. Hazardous because such a situation has traditionally (and not only in Hollywood films) been taken as a pretext for the most vindictive and gloating cruelties at the woman’s expense. Here, Hallstrom achieves the perfect balance between conflicting needs, each treated with equal sympathy: Steenburgen’s sense of deprivation, Depp’s need to extricate himself from a situation he has entered into because he is used to being used (everyone in the film has claims on him) and now feels to be false. The least successful seems to me Hallstrom’s Hollywood debut, Once Around, although it contains some wonderful scenes and fine performances; its central premise, that a wealthy and aggressive American businessman, with the kind of energy that goes into the multiplication of dollars, might legitimately incarnate the “life force,” rejuvenating (with occasional setbacks) all the other characters, is quite simply inadmissible, at least as presented here, without apparent irony.

Hallstrom’s film Something to Talk About got a generally bad press (a side-effect, perhaps, of backlash against Julia Roberts, as mindless as the previous adulatation); it seems to me a more interesting, intelligent, and coherent film than it has been given credit for. It does, however, raise a question: a new departure for Hallstrom (one would never, I think, guess it was his film), or evidence of his final adulation? (co-d, co-sc); The Living Sea (+ sc)

1952  Seikatsu to mizu (Water in Our Life) (co-d, co-sc) Yuki matsuri (Snow Festival) (+ sc)
1953  Machi to gesui (The Town and Its Drains) (+ sc)
1954  Anata no biru (Your Beer) (+ sc); Kyoshitsu no kodomotachi (Children in the Classroom) (+ sc)
1955  Eo kaku kodomotachi (Children Who Draw) (+ sc)
1956  Group no shido (Group Instruction) (+ sc); Soseiji gakkyuu (Twin Sisters) (+ sc); Dobutsuen nikki (Zoo Story) (feature) (+ sc)
1958  Shiga Naoya (+ sc); Horyu-ji (Horyu Temple) (+ sc); Um wa ikiteiru (The Living Sea) (feature) (+ sc); Nihon no buyo (Dances in Japan) (+ sc): Tokyo 1958 (co-d, co-sc, co-ed)
1960  Furyo shonen (Bad Boys)
1962  Mitasareta seikatsu (A Full Life) (co-sc); Te o tsunagu kora (Children Hand in Hand)
1963  Kanojo to kare (She and He) (+ co-sc)
1965  Bwana Toshi no uta (The Song of Bwana Toshi) (co-sc)
1966  Andesa no hanayome (Bride of the Andes) (+ sc)
1968  Hatsuoki jig ok uhen (Inferno of First Love); Nanami: Inferno of First Love (+ co-sc)
1969  Aido (Aido, Slave of Love)
1970  Mio (+ sc, co-ed)
1972  Gozenchu no jikanwari (Timetable; Morning Schedule) (co-sc)
1981  Afurika monogatari (A Tale of Africa) (co-d)

Publications

By HANI: books—

Camera to maiku no ronri [Aesthetics of Camera and Microphone], 1960.

—Robin Wood

HANI, Susumu

Nationality: Japanese. Born: Tokyo, 19 October 1926. Education: Graduated from Jiyu Gakuen, Tokyo. Family: Married actress Sachiko Hidari, 1960. Career: Began working for Kyoto News Agency, 1945; joined Iwanami Eiga production company, initially as still photographer, 1950; directed first film, 1952; producer, writer and director for TV, from 1959; formed Hani productions, mid-1960s. Awards: First Prize (educational short), Venice Festival, and First Prize (short film), Cannes Festival, for Children Who Draw, 1955; Special Jury Prize for Best Direction, Moscow festival, for Children Hand in Hand, 1965.
Susumu Hani was born in Tokyo in 1928, the son of a famous liberal family. After schooling, he worked for a while as a journalist at Kyoto Press and entered filmmaking as a documentarist in 1950 when he joined Iwanami Productions. Most of his later dramatic features reflect his early documentary training, relying on authentic locations, amateur actors, hand-held camera techniques, and an emphasis upon contemporary social issues.

His film career comprises three areas: documentary films; narratives relating to social problems, especially among the young; and dramas focusing on the emerging woman. Of the 18 documentaries made between 1952 and 1960, the best known are Children in the Classroom and Children Who Draw Pictures. The latter won the 1957 Robert Flaherty Award.

Hani’s first dramatic feature, Bad Boys, further develops many of his previous concerns. The film, a loose series of situations about reform school, was enacted by former inmates who improvised dialogue. For Hani, truth emerges from the juxtaposition of fiction and fact. He also believes that all people have an innate capacity for acting. Subsequent films, which deal with the effect of post-war urban realities on the lives of the young, include Children Hand in Hand and Inferno of First Love. The former depicts young children in a provincial town and especially one backward child who becomes the butt of the other children’s malicious teasing and pranks; the latter is a story of two adolescents in modern Tokyo, each of whom has been exploited, who find with each other a short-lived refuge.

Like his earlier documentaries, these films explore themes relating to broken homes, the alienation of modern society, the traumatic effects of childhood, the oppressiveness of a feudal value system, and the difficulty of escaping, even in an alternative social structure. To all these films Hani brings a deep psychological understanding of the workings of the human psyche. Finally, each of these films focuses on individual growth and self-awakening, although Hani is clear to indicate that the problems cannot be solved on a personal level. Both topics—growing self-awareness and a critique of the existing social order—connect these works with Hani’s second major theme, the emergence of women.

Hani’s first film on this subject was A Full Life, which deals with the efforts of a young wife, married to a self-involved older man, to forge a life of her own in the competitive world of modern Tokyo. After demeaning work and involvement in the student demonstrations of the early 1960s, the wife returns home, a changed woman.

Hani’s other films on this topic are She and He, the depiction of a middle-class marriage in which the wife gains independence by her kindness to a local ragpicker, and Bride of the Andes, the story of a mail-order Japanese bride in Peru who finds personal growth through her relationship with South American Indians. As in A Full Life, none of these women are able to make a full break with their husbands. However, through personal growth (usually affected by contact with a group or person marginal to society), they are able to challenge the patriarchal values of Japanese society as represented by their husbands and to return to the relationship with new understanding and dignity. Both films starred Sachiko Hidari, who was then his wife.

Contact with a non-Japanese society and challenging Japanese xenophobia also occur in The Song of Bwana Toshi, which was filmed in Kenya and deals with Toshi, an ordinary Japanese man living in Central Africa. Here he cooperates with natives and rises above his isolation to establish brotherhood with foreigners.

Hani’s subsequent work, Timetable, combines his interest in contemporary youth with his continued interest in modern women. The story deals with two high school girls who decide to take a trip together. The fiction feature, which is narrated, was filmed in 8mm and each of the major actors was allowed to shoot part of the film. Further, the audience is informed of who is shooting, thereby acknowledging the filmmaker within the context of the work. The use of 8mm is not new for Hani. More than half of his fourth film was originally shot in 8mm. Likewise, the use of a narrator dates back to A Full Life. Throughout his career, Hani has concerned himself with people who have difficulty in communicating with one another. His documentaries, narratives on social problems, and dramas on emerging women have established his reputation as one of the foremost psychologists of the Japanese cinema.

—Patricia Erens

---

HARTLEY, Hal

Nationality: American. Born: Lindenhurst, New York, 3 November 1959. Education: Attended Massachusetts College of Art, late 1970s; State University of New York at Purchase Film School, graduated with honors, 1984. Family: Married to actress Miho Nikaido. Career: Freelance production assistant, mid-1980s; worked for Action Productions (public service announcements), whose president sponsored Harty’s first feature, The Unbelievable Truth, 1989; this film’s success at the Toronto Film Festival led to its commercial release by Miramax, 1990. Awards: Deauville and Sao Palo International Film Festivals, Audience Awards, for Trust, 1990; Tokyo International Film Festival, Silver Award, for Amateur, 1994; Cannes Film Festival, Best Screenplay, for Henry Fool, 1998. Address: c/o True Fiction Pictures, 12 W. 27th St., New York, NY 10001, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

- 1984 Kid (short, student thesis film) (+ sc, ed, pr)
- 1988 Dogs (short) (+ pr, co-sc)
- 1990 The Unbelievable Truth (+ sc, ed, pr)
- 1991 Trust (+ sc); Theory of Achievement (short, for TV) (+ sc, mus); Surviving Desire (for TV) (+ sc, ed); Ambition (short, for TV) (+ sc)
- 1992 Simple Men (+ sc, co-pr, mus)
HARTLEY

1994 Amateur (+ sc, pr, mus); NYC 3/94 (short) (+ pr, sc); Opera No. 1 (short) (+ sc, mu)
1995 Flirt (+ sc, mus, role)
1997 Henry Fool (+ pr, sc, mu)
1998 The Book of Life (for TV) (+ sc)
2000 Kimono (+ sc)

Publications

By HARTLEY: books—

Simple Men and Trust (screenplays), London and Boston, 1992.
Amateur (screenplay), London and Boston, 1994.
Flirt (screenplay), London and Boston, 1996.
Henry Fool (screenplay), London and Boston, 1998.

By HARTLEY: articles—

On HARTLEY: articles—

Well known in Europe, but more of a cult favorite than a box-office draw in his native United States, Hal Hartley has been held in high critical esteem for his quirky feature films and shorts and, incidentally, for putting Long Island on the map of famed cinematic locales. Writing his own screenplays, punctuating the dramas with his own sparse music, and working often with the same actors and technicians, Hartley is a model of the resolutely independent film artist. His 1997 Henry Fool, given wider distribution and greater media coverage than any of his previous works, is still far from mainstream American fare.

Hartley’s screenplays are among the most distinctive features of his cinema. Reminiscent of both David Mamet (perhaps the film House of Games as well as certain plays) and Harold Pinter (chiefly the period of The Homecoming), Hartley’s dialogue tends toward the laconic and the absurd: occasionally downright hilarious and almost always droll, especially when spoken by mostly humorless characters. Of the actors whom Hartley has used a number of times, Martin Donovan is supreme in his deadpan delivery of lines, with exactly the right amount of dry irony, anger, or cluelessness, as the moment calls for—though stage actor Thomas Jay Ryan, making his film debut as Henry Fool, speaks as if born to the Hartley world.

Of cinematic influences, Jean-Luc Godard has constantly been singled out. Occasionally Hartley appears to be doing a conscious homage, as in the sudden burst into dance in Surviving Desire, a nod to Bande à part (Band of Outsiders)—but a dance scene in Simple Men, similarly unexpected but more elaborately choreographed and integrated into the story, seems altogether original. The stylization of violence in Amateur also recalls Godard, though the shaving matches of most of the earlier films are pure Hartley. Perhaps more subtly Godardian, Weekend vintage, are the vacant landscapes of “Long Island” (actually Texas, for the most part) in Simple Men, where characters more or less stumble through their peculiar lives.

The Unbelievable Truth displays Hartley’s unmistakable style and tone. With a plot suited for either soap opera or film noir in its melodrama and romantic entanglements—an ex-con returns to the town where he caused the deaths of two people, and where he is shunned by most but loved by a rebellious young woman—the film is instead a black comedy with a bent toward real romance, all centered around the question of trusting people enough to accept their versions of “the true story.” Hartley’s hometown of Lindenhurst, a rather ramshackle-looking small town half metamorphosed into a commuter suburb, seems the perfect pale backdrop for his oddball characters.

Trust superficially resembles The Unbelievable Truth, with Adrienne Shelley again as a rebellious youth, Lindenhurst as locus of American family dysfunction, and some of the same droll comedy. Yet it has a considerably darker tone overall, with its brutal parents, severely asocial hero (Martin Donovan), and unexpected violence—as in the liquor store clerk’s attack upon the Shelley character. In its confident handling of mixed moods it foreshadows the emotional complexities of Henry Fool. Simple Men, set on a more rural Long Island after a brief stop in Lindenhurst, has a wilder plot than Trust and if anything more outrageous comedy, as two sons—a criminal and a college student—follow clues in search of their long-missing father, a reputed terrorist bomber. The cynical Bill, who notes that “you don’t need an ideology to knock over a liquor store,” has been betrayed in love, and so is determined to seduce women by appearing to be “mysterious, thoughtful, deep, but modest” and then “throw them away.” Of course he falls for a woman who claims to find him all of those things (she manages to use all four adjectives in a short conversation), although the words seem to apply much more to her. The less-experienced Dennis falls for an eccentric Rumanian who turns out to be his father’s new girlfriend. When he points out that his father is so is determined to seduce women by appearing to be “mysterious, thoughtful, deep, but modest” and then “throw them away.” Of course he falls for a woman who claims to find him all of those things (she manages to use all four adjectives in a short conversation), although the words seem to apply much more to her. The less-experienced Dennis falls for an eccentric Rumanian who turns out to be his father’s new girlfriend. When he points out that his father is of the others. The story is almost always focused upon the two brothers and their attitudes toward their father, or their confusion about women; the women are rarely seen apart from men observing them; the talk is very often macho, though at one point the two couples and another would-be lover preposterously launch into a discourse about Madonna and modern women’s “control over the exploitation of their own bodies.”

Amateur, more or less commissioned by Isabel Huppert, who stars in it, is yet more melodramatic, featuring an amnesiac (Donovan again), evidently a sadistic criminal in his “former life,” who is befriended by an ex-nun who wants to write pornography—the pair of them having to flee various crazed and criminal types. Here the themes of trust and the knowability of a mysterious person’s past are developed through the most lurid situations. Flirt is equally about love and betrayal, but is also an experiment in structure: Hartley’s fifth feature is actually a trilogy of short films, each using some of the same dialogue and following the same dramatic trajectory, but with different settings (New York, Berlin and Tokyo) and gender relations, according to whether the character accused of flirting—i.e., being unwilling to commit—is straight or gay, male or female. Some critics found the film boring and pretentious because of its schematic nature and extreme self-reflexivity (in the Tokyo segment the director himself plays a character named “Hal” who carries around a can of a film called “Flirt”). However, those content to enjoy some very witty variations on the first segment’s patterns, and to savor contrasts of locale—e.g., the Tokyo is unexpectedly in a dance-studio with performers in white makeup and gauzy outfits—may find Flirt delightful (though with the usual disturbing edge of violence), even if lacking “profundity.”

Henry Fool features the Hartley style on what he himself has called a more “epic” scale, beginning with length (it’s more than a half hour longer than any of his other features). Once again we have a man with a mysterious criminal past (“An honest man is always in trouble, Simon. Remember that . . . I’ve been bad. Repeatedly. But why brag?”), dead-end blue-collar lives, a contrasting pair of pals (like the brothers in Simple Men), sudden violence (more vicious, less stylized than usual), themes of trust and betrayal, and splendidly non-sequitur dialogue from characters who take themselves very seriously. (Henry looking through a book of Life: “I refuse to discriminate between modes of knowing.”) A parable with an ambiguous message, the film is initially less focused upon Henry than upon Simon Grim, a despairing garbage man whom Henry encourages to write down his thoughts. The poem Simon comes up with has profound but unpredictable effects on everyone who reads it: a mute Asian clerk at World of Donuts begins to sing; his mother commits suicide; many find it obscene, but Camille Paglia (as herself) loves its “pungent, squalid element . . . the authentically trashy voice of American culture”; Sweden gives him the Nobel Prize for Literature, while Henry’s much talked about “confessions” are rejected as bad writing by Simon and his publisher. Henry Fool must have more moments than any film in history in which people read intently, their lives changed by words on a page. Hartley could be accused of descending to his often pathetic Queens characters, but the film is more shocking than and certainly as funny as any of his previous work.

All of Hartley’s films call attention to their own artifice, most typically through their stylized dialogue and distinctive manner of acting. The Book of Life, an hour-long work commissioned by French television for an end-of-the-millennium series, pursues some new directions, experimenting with digital video and a prominent musical score for a Second-Coming tale of Jesus in Manhattan (with Martin Donovan in the lead role and singer P.J. Harvey as Mary Magdalene). But whatever directions Hartley pursues, one may expect his work still to feature a curious balance of artifice and passion, melodrama and cool wit.

—Joseph Milicia

HAWKS, Howard

Nationality: American. Born: Howard Winchester Hawks in Goshen, Indiana, 30 May 1896. Education: Pasadena High School, California, 1908–13; Phillips Exeter Academy, New Hampshire, 1914–16; Cornell University, New York, degree in mechanical engineering, 1917. Military Service: Served in U.S. Army Air Corps, 1917–19. Family: Married 1) Athole (Hawks), 1924 (divorced 1941); 2) Nancy Raye Gross, 1941 (divorced), one daughter; 3) Mary (Dee) Hartford (divorced), two sons, two daughters. Career: Worked in property dept. of Famous Players-Lasky during vacations, Hollywood, 1916–17; designer in airplane factory, 1919–22; worked in independent production as editor, writer, and assistant director, from 1922; in charge of story dept. at Paramount, 1924–25; signed as director for Fox, 1925–29; directed first feature, Road to Glory, 1926; formed Motion Picture Alliance for the Preservation of American Ideals, with Borden Chase, 1944. Awards: Quarterly Award, Directors Guild of America, for Red River, 1948/49; Honorary Oscar for “A master American filmmaker whose creative efforts hold a distinguished place in world cinema.”

Howard Hawks (center), John Wayne, and Joanne Dru on the set of Red River

Films as Director:

1926  The Road to Glory (+ story); Fig Leaves (+ story)
1927  The Cradle Snatchers; Paid to Love; Fazil
1928  A Girl in Every Port (+ co-sc); The Air Circus (co-d)
1929  Trent’s Last Case
1930  The Dawn Patrol
1931  The Criminal Code
1932  The Crowd Roars (+ story); Tiger Shark; Scarface: The Shame of a Nation (+ pr, bit role as man on bed)
1933  Today We Live, The Prizefighter and the Lady (Everywoman’s Man) (Van Dyke; d parts of film, claim disputed)
1934  Viva Villa! (Conway; d begun by Hawks); Twentieth Century
1935  Barbary Coast; Ceiling Zero
1936  The Road to Glory; Come and Get It (co-d)
1938  Bringing up Baby
1939  Only Angels Have Wings
1940  His Girl Friday
1941  The Outlaw (Hughes; d begun by Hawks); Sergeant York; Ball of Fire
1943  Air Force
1944  To Have and Have Not
1946  The Big Sleep
1947  A Song Is Born (remake of Ball of Fire)
1948  Red River (+ pr)
1949  I Was a Male War Bride (You Can’t Sleep Here)
1952  The Big Sky (+ pr); ‘‘The Ransom of Red Chief’’ episode of O. Henry’s Full House (episode cut from some copies) (+ pr); Monkey Business
1953  Gentlemen Prefer Blondes
1955  Land of the Pharaohs (+ pr)
1959  Rio Bravo (+ pr)
1962  Hatari! (+ pr)
1963  Man’s Favorite Sport (+ pr)
1965  Red Line 7000 (+ story, pr)
1966  El Dorado (+ pr)
1970  Rio Lobo (+ pr)

Other Films:

1917  A Little Princess (Neilan) (d some scenes, uncredited; prop boy)
1923  Quicksands (Conway) (story, sc, pr)
1924  Tiger Love (Melford) (sc)
1925  The Dressmaker from Paris (Bern) (co-story, sc)
1926  Honesty—the Best Policy (Bennett and Neill) (story, sc); Underworld (von Sternberg) (co-sc, uncredited)
1932  Red Dust (Fleming) (co-sc, uncredited)
1936  Sutter’s Gold (Cruze) (co-sc, uncredited)
1937  Captain Courageous (Fleming) (co-sc, uncredited)
1938  Test Pilot (Fleming) (co-sc, uncredited)
1939  Gone with the Wind (Fleming) (add’l dialogue, uncredited); Gunga Din (Stevens) (co-sc, uncredited)
1943  Corvette K-225 (The Nelson Touch) (Rosson) (pr)
1951  The Thing (The Thing from Another World) (Nybey) (pr)

Publications

By HAWKS: book—

By HAWKS: articles—

Interview in Movie (London), 5 November 1962.
‘‘Man’s Favorite Director, Howard Hawks,’’ interview in Cinema (Beverly Hills), November/December 1963.
Interview, in Interviews with Film Directors, by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1967.
Interview with Jean-Louis Comolli, Jean Narboni, and Bertrand Tavernier, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), July/August 1967.
‘‘Gunplay and Horses,’’ with David Austen, in Films and Filming (London), October 1968.
‘‘Do I Get to Play the Drunk This Time,’’ an interview in Sight and Sound (London), Spring 1971.
‘‘Hawks Talks,’’ interview with J. McBride, in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1974.
‘‘Hawks on Film, Politics, and Childreaming,’’ interview with C. Penley and others, in Jump Cut (Berkeley), January/February 1975.

On HAWKS: books—

Belton, John, Cinema Stylists, Metuchen, New Jersey, 1983.

On HAWKS: articles—

Perez, Michel, ‘‘Howard Hawks et le western,’’ in Présence du Cinéma (Paris), July/September 1959.
Dyer, John Peter, ‘‘Sling the Lamps Low,’’ in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1962.

Wood, Robin, “To Have (Written) and Have Not (Directed),” in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1973.

Richards, Jeffrey, “The Silent Films of Howard Hawks,” in Focus on Film (London), Summer/Autumn 1976.

Durgnat, Raymond, “Hawks Isn’t Good Enough,” in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1977; see also February and March/April 1978.

“Hawks Section” of Positif (Paris), July/August 1977.

On HAWKS: films—

* * *

Howard Hawks was perhaps the greatest director of American genre films. Hawks made films in almost every American genre, and each of these films could well serve as one of the very best examples and artistic embodiments of the type: gangster (Scarface), private eye (The Big Sleep), western (Red River, Rio Bravo), screwball comedy (Bringing up Baby), newspaper reporter (His Girl Friday), prison picture (The Criminal Code), science fiction (The Thing), musical (Gentlemen Prefer Blondes), race-car drivers (The Crowd Roars, Red Line 7000), and air pilots (Only Angels Have Wings). But into each of these narratives of generic expectations Hawks infused his particular themes, motifs, and techniques.

Born in the Midwest at almost the same time that the movies themselves were born in America, Hawks migrated with his family to southern California when the movies did; he spent his formative years working on films, learning to fly, and studying engineering at Cornell University. His initial work in silent films as a writer and producer would serve him well in his later years as a director, when he would produce and, if not write, then control the writing of his films as well. Although Hawks’ work has been consistently discussed as exemplary of the Hollywood studio style, Hawks himself did not work for a single studio on a long-term contract. Instead, he was an independent producer who sold his projects to every Hollywood studio.

Whatever the genre of a Hawks film, it bore traits that made it unmistakably a Hawks film. The narrative was always elegantly and symmetrically structured and patterned. This quality was a sign of Hawks’ sharp sense of storytelling as well as his sensible efforts to work closely with very talented writers: Ben Hecht, William Faulkner, and Jules Furthman being the most notable among them. Hawks’ films were devoted to characters who were professionals with fervent vocational commitments. The men in Hawks’ films were good at what they did, whether flying the mail, driving race cars, driving cattle, or reporting the news. These vocational commitments were usually fulfilled by the union of two apparently opposite physical types who were spiritually one: either the union of the harder, tougher, older male and a softer, younger, prettier male (John Wayne and Montgomery Clift in Red River, Wayne and Ricky Nelson in Rio Bravo), or by a sharp, tough male and an equally sharp, tough female (Cary Grant and Rosalind Russell in His Girl Friday, Bogart and Bacall in To Have and Have Not and The Big Sleep, John Barrymore and Carole Lombard in Twentieth Century). This spiritual alliance of physical opposites revealed Hawks’ unwillingness to accept the cultural stereotype that those who are able to accomplish difficult tasks are those who appear able to accomplish them.

This tension between appearance and ability, surface and essence in Hawks’ films led to several other themes and techniques. Characters talk very tersely in Hawks’ films, refusing to put their thoughts and feelings into explicit speeches which would either sentimentalize or vulgarize those internal abstractions. Instead, Hawks’ characters reveal their feelings through their actions, not by what they say. Hawks deflected his portrayal of the inner life from explicit speeches to symbolic physical objects—concrete visual images of things that convey the intentions of the person who handles, uses, or controls the piece of physical matter. One of those physical objects—the coin which George Raft nervously flips in Scarface—has become a mythic icon of American culture itself, symbolic in itself of American gangsters and American gangster movies (and used as such in both Singin’ in the Rain and Some Like It Hot). Another of Hawks’ favorite actions, the lighting of cigarettes, became his subtextual way of showing who cares about whom without recourse to dialogue.

Consistent with his narratives, Hawks’ visual style was one of dead-pan understatement, never proclaiming its trickiness or brilliance but effortlessly communicating the values of the stories and the characters. Hawks was a master of point-of-view, knowledgeable about which camera perspective would precisely convey the necessary psychological and moral information. That point of view could either confine us to the perceptions of a single character (Marlowe in The Big Sleep), ally us with the more vital of two competing life styles (with the vitality of Oscar Jaffe in Twentieth Century, Susan Vance in Bringing up Baby, Walter Burns in His Girl Friday), or withdraw to a scientific detachment that allows the viewer to weigh the paradoxes and ironies of a love battle between two equals (between the two army partners in I Was a Male War Bride, the husband and wife in Monkey Business, or the older and younger cowboy in Red River). Hawks’ films are also masterful in their atmospheric lighting; the hanging electric or kerosene lamp that dangles into the top of a Hawks frame became almost as much his signature as the lighting of cigarettes.

Hawks’ view of character in film narrative was that actor and character were inseparable. As a result, his films were very improvisatory. He allowed actors to add, interpret, or alter lines as they wished, rather than force them to stick to the script. This trait not only led to the energetic spontaneity of many Hawks films, but also contributed to the creation or shaping of the human archetypes that several stars came to represent in our culture. John Barrymore, John Wayne, Humphrey Bogart, and Cary Grant all refined or established their essential personae under Hawks’ direction, while many actors who would become stars were either discovered by Hawks or given their first chance to play a major role in one of his films. Among Hawks’ most important discoveries were Paul Muni, George Raft, Carole Lombard, Angi Dickinson, Montgomery Clift, and his Galatea, Lauren Bacall.

Although Hawks continued to make films until he was almost seventy-five, there is disagreement about the artistic energy and cinematic value of the films he made after 1950. For some, Hawks’ artistic decline in the 1950s and 1960s was both a symptom and an effect of the overall decline of the movie industry and the studio system itself. For others, Hawks’ later films—slower, longer, less energetically brilliant than his studio-era films—were more probing and personal explorations of the themes and genres he had charted for the three previous decades.

—Gerald Mast

HAYNES, Todd

Nationality: American. Born: Los Angeles, California, 2 January 1961. Education: Received a Bachelor of Arts degree, with honors, from Brown University, where he majored in semiotics and art. Career: Founded Apparatus Productions, a non-profit organization that funds and produces short films, 1987; directed first feature, Poison, 1991. Awards: Golden Gate Award, for Superstar: The Karen Carpenter Story, 1987; Special Jury Prize Sundance Festival, Teddy Award Best Feature, Berlin Festival, Critics Award, Locarno Festival, Special Prize of the Jury, Catalanion International Film Festival, and Best Director nomination and Best Screenplay nomination, Independent Spirit Award, for Safe, 1995; Best Artistic Contribution, Cannes Film Festival, Channel 4 Director’s Award, Edinburgh International Film Festival, and Best Director nomination, Independent Spirit Award, for Velvet Goldmine, 1998. Office: Bronze Eye Productions, 525 Broadway, Room 701, New York, NY 10012–4015.

Films as Director:

1978 The Suicide (short) (+ pr)
1982 Letter from a Friend (short)
1983 Sex Shop (short)
1985 Assassins: A Film concerning Rimbaud (short) (+ pr)
1987 Superstar: The Karen Carpenter Story (short)
1991 Poison (+ sc)
1993 Dottie Gets Spanked (short) (for TV)
1995 Safe (+ sc)
1998 Velvet Goldmine (+ sc, co-story)

Other Films:

1988 Muddy Hands (pr); Cause and Effect (pr)
1989 La Divina (pr); He Was Once (pr, role)
1990 Anemone Me (pr); Oreos with Attitude (pr)
1992 Swoon (Kalin) (role as Phrenology Head)

Publications

By HAYNES: articles—

“We Can’t Get There from Here,” in Nation (New York), 5 July 1993.

On HAYNES: articles—

Todd Haynes is no stranger to controversy. He began his career making outrageously personal short films that comment on the manner in which pop culture impacts on the individual. One of them—Superstar: The Karen Carpenter Story, featuring an all-doll cast—had to be yanked from distribution because of legal complications, and now is considered an underground classic. Poison, Haynes’s initial, equally incendiary feature, was financed in part by the New York State Council on the Arts and the National Endowment for the Arts. Because of its subject matter, this support resulted in cries of outrage from those who prefer that publicly funded art be as inoffensive as a painting of a bowl of fruit. Whether Poison is or is not to one’s individual taste, it is a film of high artistic aspiration. Poison is inspired by the writings of Jean Genet, and consists of a trio of skillfully interwoven stories. The first is a mockumentary about a seven-year-old boy who shot and killed his father and then summarily disappeared. How did this happen? Who was the boy, and why was he driven to such an act? A number of clues are offered by his mother. “I mean, I punished him,” she matter-of-factly tells the camera. “His father beat him, just like any kid.” Later, she observes, “He was a meek soul. People pick on meek souls.”

The second story is a 1950s science-fiction movie parody, in which a brilliant scientist ingests some serum and becomes disfigured. People stare at him wherever he goes, and little girls spit at him. Eventually, he becomes the infamous “leper sex killer.” In the third

---

Mazierska, E., “Przeczucie apokalipsy,” in Kino (Warsaw), September 1996.
Reid, R., “UnSafe at Any Distance: Todd Haynes’ Visual Culture of Health and Risk,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1998.
story, a man arrives at a prison. He is an orphan and a thief, and he is gay. In jail, which he describes as ‘‘the counterfeit world of men among men,’’ he has found his true identity—as well as what he calls ‘‘the violence of love.’’ Poison is a jarring film about what it means to be different, what it is like to be so alienated from the mainstream that you feel more at home in a prison than in the outside world. Haynes shows how you are different and victimized if you are gay, physically deformed, or a sensitive child in a dysfunctional family. Poison is a disturbing film. It will make you uncomfortable, but it also will make you think.

In Safe, Haynes’s equally strong follow-up feature, he for the first time tells one story through the course of an almost-two-hour film. His heroine is Carol White (Julianne Moore), an emotionally disconnected, squeaky-clean San Fernando Valley housewife. Lately, she has been feeling run down, which she at first attributes to stress. But her body, and soon her mind, begin to deteriorate. Her doctor cannot diagnose her infirmity, instead suggesting that she see a psychiatrist. She eventually becomes convinced that the cause of her malady is environmental pollution, that she is “chemically sensitive” and “allergic to the twentieth century.” In a more conventional film, Carol not only would find a cure for her illness but would enter into an emotionally fulfilling romance with the agreeable guy (James LeGros) she meets at a New Age retreat. But Haynes had no intention of making a conventional film. He offers no easy answers to his heroine’s predicament, as she declines into a frail apparition of her former self. Hovering unquestionably over her deterioration is the harsh reality of AIDS and the New Age psychobabble that the individual is responsible for his own plight, regardless of the outside forces that one cannot control but that irrevocably impact on one’s physical and mental well-being. In Safe, Haynes has made a scary film without ghouls and gushing blood, a highly politicized story that does not overtly refer to political concerns. He subtly but chillingly captures Carol’s isolation by constantly posing her alone, sitting on a couch, or standing by her pool or looking in a mirror.

After Poison and Safe, two films of depth and texture, Haynes faltered with the fascinating yet frustrating Velvet Goldmine, a portrait of the glam rock era in Great Britain. The film is set during two time periods: the early 1970s, the heyday of a bisexual David Bowie-like glam rocker who stages his own murder; and a decade later, when a journalist sets out to write a piece commemorating the tenth anniversary of the rocker’s death. In depicting the writer’s exploration of his subject, Haynes employs a Citizen Kane-like framing contrivance.

What Velvet Goldmine has in common with Haynes’s earlier work is thematic, in that he offers a portrait of outcasts who are misunderstood and shunned by society and who end up acting out their sexual urges. Yet too much of the film is little more than an extended music video, with sequences featuring the glam rocker and others in performance. Haynes has created intriguing characters, to be sure. However, they are given short shrift. What is desperately missing from Velvet Goldmine is more characterization and depth in storytelling.

Meanwhile, Haynes has not abandoned the short-film form. Between Poison and Safe he made Dottie Gets Spanked, a twenty-seven-minute examination of the carnal fantasies of a young, highly imaginative boy who is obsessed with watching television sit-coms.

—Rob Edelman

HEIFITZ, Iosif

Films as Director:
1928 Pesn o metallye (A Song of Steel) (co-d, + co-sc, co-ed)
1930 Veter v lito (Facing the Wind) (co-d)
1931 Polden (Noon) (co-d, + co-sc)
1933 Moya rodina (My Fatherland, My Country) (co-d, + co-sc)
1935 Goryachie dyenechki (Hectic Days) (co-d, + co-sc)
1936 Deputat Baltiki (Baltic Deputy) (co-d, + co-sc)
1940 Chlen pravitelstva (The Great Beginning; Member of the Government) (co-d, + co-sc)
1942 Yevo zovut Sukhe-Bator (His Name Is Sukhe-Bator) (co-d, + co-sc)
1944 Malakhov Kurgan (co-d, + co-sc)
1945 Razgrom Japonii (The Defeat of Japan) (co-d, + co-sc, co-ed)
1946 Vo imya zhizni (In the Name of Life) (co-d, + co-sc)
1948 Dragotsennyye zerna (The Precious Grain) (co-d)
1950 Ogni Baku (Flames over Baku; Fires of Baku) (co-d) (re-released 1958)
1953 Vesna v Moskve (Spring in Moscow) (co-d)
1954 Bolshaya semya (The Big Family)
1956 Dyelo Rumyantseva (The Rumyantsev Case) (+ co-sc)
1958 Dorogoi moi chelovak (My Dear Fellow; My Dear Man) (+ co-sc)
1960 Dana s sobachkoi (The Lady with the Little Dog) (+ sc)
1962 Gorizont (Horizon)
1964 Dyen schastya (In the Town of S) (+ sc)
1970 Saliut Maria! (Salute, Maria) (+ co-sc)
1973 Plokhy khoroshiy chelovak (The Duet; The Bad Good Man) (+ sc)
1976 Edinstvennaia (The Only One; The One and Only) (+ co-sc)
1977 Asya (Love Should Be Guarded) (+ sc)
1979 Vperyje zamuchem (Married for the First Time) (+ co-sc)
1982 Shurochka
1985 Podzadiny (The Accused) (+ co-sc)
1987 Vspomnim, Tovarisc
1989 Vy chyo, starichyo (Who Are You, Old People?) (+ co-sc)
1989 Brodychiit avitobus (Nomad Bus) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:
1928 Luna sleva (The Moon Is to the Left) (Ivanov) (co-sc, asst-d)
1930 Transport ognya (Transport of Fire) (Ivanov) (co-sc, asst-d)
Publications

By HEIFITZ: articles—

“Director’s Notes,” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 1, 1966.
Interview in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), no. 2, 1971.
Interview in Soviet Film (Moscow), no. 9, 1976.
Article in Soviet Film (Moscow), no. 11, 1978.

On HEIFITZ: books—

On HEIFITZ: articles—

Panorama, no. 4, 1976.
“Iosif Kheifits,” in Film Dope (London), September 1984.
Dobrotvorsky, S., “Father and Sons,” in Soviet Film (Moscow), April 1987.

* * *

It is impossible to discuss the career of Iosif Heifitz without also paying tribute to Alexander Zarkhi, with whom he worked for over twenty years after they both left the Leningrad Technicum of Cinema Art in 1927. The first film they made together was A Head Wind, but their first collaboration to gain prominence was Baltic Deputy, a landmark film of “socialist” or “historic” realism that transcends the genre’s usual bombastic propaganda, moral and political schematism, and impossibly perfect and idealised heroes and heroines. This film concerns an elderly professor who, despite the disapproval of his stuffy academic colleagues, joins the forces of revolution in 1917 and is eventually elected to the Petrograd Soviet by the sailors of the Baltic fleet. It contains both humour and humanistic values, and is particularly distinguished by an excellent central performance from Nikolai Cherkasov. Equally impressive, for the same reasons, is Member of the Government. Set during the rural collectivisation period and focusing on a young farm worker who rises to a government position despite the opposition of her husband, this film concerns the improved status of women in the USSR after 1917. A similar concentration on the social position of women can be seen in his later film, Married for the First Time. Vera Maretsskaya is superb throughout Member of the Government, the first of several memorable female leading roles in Heifitz’s films.

Both Zarkhi and Heifitz benefited creatively from their split in 1950, although Heifitz has undoubtedly become better known. His impressive second film on his own, The Big Family, is recognised as one of the forerunners of the post-Stalin rejuvenation of the Soviet cinema. This film presents the lives of a family of shipbuilders with a feeling for everyday realities, a lively, detailed texture, a concern with the problems of the individual as opposed to the masses, and generally tries to avoid producing neat, formulaic, ideologically “sound” solutions.

In 1960 Heifitz made the film for which he is probably best known, The Lady with the Little Dog, the first of a Chekhov trilogy including In the Town of S and The Bad Good Man. It is hardly surprising that the director should have been drawn to Chekhov, nor that his Chekhov adaptations are among his finest works, for both share an understanding of the complexity of human beings, a feeling for the minute, telling detail, and a remarkable ability to conjure an almost tangible sense of atmosphere. Indeed, in the trilogy some of the most “Chekhovian” moments are not in the original stories at all! Thus, it is hardly surprising to find Heifitz admitting (in an interview in Soviet Film) that “much as I love Dostoevsky I regard Chekhov as my teacher.” Stressing Chekhov’s concern with the importance of clear and legible writing (in both senses of the word), he adds: “I try to apply the laws of Chekhovian prose, with due adjustments to suit our time, in my films about the present. I have always considered Chekhov to be among the most modern of writers, and have never treated him as a venerable, ‘moth-eaten’ classic. To me Chekhov has always been an example of a social-minded writer... The hallmark of Chekhov’s approach is that, while describing these small, weak people living in an atmosphere of triviality and inaction, he preserved his faith in a better future and in the power of the human spirit. So he imparted to them an important quality—the capacity to make a critical judgment of the surrounding world and of oneself. This is the quality that I prize most highly.”

Thus, in spite of his obvious relish for period feel in Chekhov (and Turgenev, in the beautiful Aya), Heifitz was obviously a great deal more than a “period” director. Claiming that modern Soviet filmmakers are “heirs to the humanistic tradition of Russian literature...” he once said that his films are “a panorama of the better part of a century.” Looking at the remarkable gallery of characters he presented with his mix of everyday heroism and humanity, it is hard to disagree. Heifitz was not a stylistic innovator, but his films, whether set in the past or present, all exhibit an equally strong feeling for the minutiae of daily life and the humanity of their characters. In this last respect it should be pointed out that Heifitz was a masterly director of actors, and that he largely “discovered” Nikolai Cherkasov, Vera Maretsskaya, Iya Savvina and Alexei Batalov, all of whom gave some of their finest performances in his films. As he himself stated, “many directors today strive for documentary realism and naturalness of tone. But in that case individuality disappears, and the human voice with its infinite inflections gives way to banality.” Heifitz added: “Directing in the cinema means above all directing the actor. The actor is the focal point of the director’s efforts and experience.”

—Julian Petley
HENNING-JENSEN, Astrid and Bjarne

Films as Directors:

1940 Cykledrengene i Tørvegraven (Bjarne only)
1941 Hesten paa Kongens Nytorv (Bjarne only); Brunkul (Bjarne only); Arbejdet kaldet (Bjarne only); Chr. IV som Bygherre (Christian IV: Master Builder) (Bjarne only)
1942 Sukker (Sugar) (Bjarne only)
1943 Korn (Corn) (Bjarne only); Hesten (Horses) (Bjarne only); Follet (Bjarne only); Papir (Paper) (Bjarne only); Naar man kun er ung (To Be Young) (Bjarne only); S.O.S. Kindtand (S.O.S. Molars)
1944 De danske Sydhavssøer (Danish Island) (Bjarne only)
1945 Flyktningar fineren en hann (Fugitives Find Shelter); Dansk politi i Sverige (Astrid only); Folketingsvalg 1945; Brigaden i Sverige (Danish Brigade in Sweden) (Bjarne only); Frihedsfonden (Freedom Committee) (Bjarne only)
1946 Ditte Menneskebarn (Ditte: Child of Man) (Bjarne d, Astrid asst)
1947 Stemning i April; De pokers unger (Those Blasted Kids); Denmark Grows Up (Astrid co-d only)
1948 Kristinus Bergman
1949 Palle alene i Verden (Palle Alone in the World) (Astrid only)
1950 Vesterhavsendrege (Boys from the West Coast)
1951 Kranes Konditori (Krane’s Bakery Shop) (Astrid only)
1952 Ukjent mann (Unknown Man) (Astrid only)
1953 Solskib
1954 Tivoligarden spiller (Tivoli Garden Games); Ballettens børn (Ballet Girl) (Astrid only)
1955 Kærlighed pa kredit (Love on Credit) (Astrid only, + sc); En saelfangst i Nordgrønland (Bjarne only); Hvor bjergene sejler (Where Mountains Float) (Bjarne only)
1959 Hest på sommerferie (Astrid only); Paw (Boy of Two Worlds, The Lure of the Jungle) (Astrid only)
1961 Een blandt mange (Astrid only)
1962 Kort är sommaren (Short Is the Summer) (Bjarne only)
1965 De blå undalater (Astrid only)
1966 Utro (Unfaithful) (Astrid only)
1967 Min bedstefar er en stok (Astrid only)
1968 Nille (Astrid only)
1969 Mig og dig (Me and You) (Astrid only)
1974 Skipper & Co. (Bjarne only)
1978 Vinterbørn (Winter Children) (Astrid only, + sc, ed)
1980 Øjeblikket (The Moment) (Astrid only)
1986 Barndommens gade (Street of Childhood) (Astrid only)
1991 In Spite Of 1995 Bella, My Bella

Other Films:

1937 Cocktail (Astrid: role)
1938 Kongen bød (Bjarne: role)
1939 Genboerne (Bjarne: role)
1940 Jens Langkniv (Bjarne: role)
1942 Damen med de lyse Handsker (Christensen) (Bjarne: role)

Astrid and Bjarne Henning-Jensen started as stage actors, but shortly after they married in 1938 they began working in films. Bjarne Henning-Jensen directed several government documentaries beginning in 1940 and he was joined by Astrid in 1943. At that time the Danish documentary film, strongly influenced by the British documentary of the 1930s, was blooming, and Bjarne Henning-Jensen played an important part in this. In 1943 he made his first feature film, with Astrid serving as assistant director. Naar man kun er ung was a light, everyday comedy, striving for a relaxed and charming style, but it was too cute, and it was politely received. Their next film, Ditte Menneskebarn, was their breakthrough, and the two were instantly considered as the most promising directors in the postwar Danish cinema. The film was an adaptation of a neoclassical novel by Martin Andersen Nexø. It was a realistic story of a young country girl and her tragic destiny as a victim of social conditions. The novel, published between 1917 and 1921, was in five volumes, but the Henning-Jensens used only parts of the novel. The sentimentality of the book was, happily, subdued in the film, and it is a sensitive study of a young girl in her milieu. The film was the first example of a more realistic and serious Danish film and it paralleled similar trends in contemporary European cinema, even if one would refrain from calling the film neorealist. It was a tremendous success in Denmark and it also won a certain international recognition.

Astrid and Bjarne Henning-Jensen’s film was a sincere attempt to introduce reality and authentic people to the Danish film. They continued this effort in their subsequent films, but a certain facile approach, a weakness for cute effects, and a sensibility on the verge of sentimentality made their films less and less interesting. In the 1950s Bjarne Henning-Jensen returned to documentaries. In 1955 he made the pictorially beautiful Hvor bjergene sejler, about Greenland. He attempted a comeback to features in 1962 with a rather pedestrian adaptation of Knut Hamsun’s novel Pan called Kort är sommaren. His last film, in 1974, was a failure. Astrid Henning-Jensen continued making films on her own. She made two carefully directed and attractive films in Norway, and in the 1960s she tried to keep up with the changing times in a couple of films. But it was not until the last few years that she regained her old position. In Vinterbørn, about women and their problems in a maternity ward, and in Øjeblikket, treating the problems of a young couple when it is discovered that the woman is dying of cancer, she worked competently within an old established genre in Danish films, the problem-oriented popular drama.

—Ib Monty

HEPWORTH, Cecil

Films as Director:

1898 Oxford and Cambridge Boat Race (short); The Interrupted Picnic (short); Exchange Is No Robbery (short); The Immature Punter (short); The Quarrelsome Anglers (short); Two Fools in a Canoe (short)
1899 Express Train in a Railway Cutting (short)
1900 Wiping Something off the Slate (short); The Conjurer and the Boer (short); The Punter’s Mishap (short); The Gunpowder Plot (short); Explosion of a Motor Car (short); The Egg-Laying Man (short); Clown and Policeman (short); Leapfrog as Seen by the Frog (short); How It Feels to Be Run Over (short); The Eccentric Dancer (short); The Bathers (short); The Sluggard’s Surprise (short); The Electricity Cure (short); The Beggar’s Deceit (short); The Burning Stable (short); Topsy Turvy Villa (short); The Kiss (short)
1901 How the Burglar Tricked the Bobby (short); The Indian Chief and the Seidlitz Powder (short); Comic Grimacer (short); Interior of a Railway Carriage (short); Funeral of Queen Victoria (short); Coronation of King Edward VII (short); The Glutton’s Nightmare (short)
1902 The Call to Arms (short); How to Stop a Motor Car (short)
1903 The Absent-minded Bootblack (short); Alice in Wonderland (short); Firemen to the Rescue (short); Saturday’s Shopping (short)
1904 The Jonah Man (short)
1905 Rescued by Rover (short); Falsely Accused (short); The Alien’s Invasion (short); A Den of Thieves (short)
1907 A Seaside Girl (short)
1908 John Gilpin’s Ride (short)
1909 Tilly the Tomboy (short)
1911 Rachel’s Sin (short)
1914 Blind Fate (short); Unfit or The Strength of the Weak (short); The Hills Are Calling (short); The Basilisk; His Country’s Bidding (short); The Quarry Mystery (short); Time the Great Healer; Morphia the Death Drag (short); Oh My Aunt (short)
1915 The Cancer of Jealousy; A Moment of Darkness (short); Court-Martialled; The Passing of a Soul (short); The Bottle; The Baby on the Barge; The Man Who Stayed at Home; Sweet Lavender; The Golden Pavement; The Outrage; Iris
1916 Trelawney of the Wells; A Fallen Star; Sowing the Wind; Annie Laurie; Comin’ thro’ the Rye; The Marriage of William Ashe; Molly Bawn; The Cobweb
1917 The American Heiress; Nearer My God to Thee
1918 The Refugee; Taras; Broken in the Wars; The Blindness of Fortune; The Touch of a Child; Boundary House
1919 The Nature of the Beast; Sunken Rocks; Sheba; The Forest on the Hill
1920 Anna the Adventuress; Alf’s Button; Helen of Four Gates; Mrs. Erricker’s Reputation
1921 Tinted Venus; Narrow Valley; Wild Heather; Tansy
1922 The Pipes of Pan; Mist in the Valley; Strangling Threads; Comin’ Thro’ the Rye (second version)
1927 The House of Marney
1929 Royal Remembrances

Publications

By HEWORTH: books—

Came the Dawn: Memories of a Film Pioneer, New York, 1951.

By HEWORTH: articles—

On HEWORTH: books—

On HEWORTH: articles—

* * *

The son of a famous magic lanternist and photographer named T.C. Hepworth (who authored an important early volume titled The Book of the Lantern), Cecil Hepworth was—along with Robert W. Paul—the best known and most important of early British film pioneers. In the first twenty years of British cinema, Hepworth’s place is easy to determine. He was a major figure who wrote the first British book on cinematography, Animated Photography, the A.B.C. of the Cinematograph (published in 1897) and who produced Rescued by Rover, which is to British cinema what D.W. Griffith’s The Adventures of Dollie is to the American film industry. But as the industry grew, Cecil Hepworth failed to grow along with it, and as the English critic and historian Ernest Betts has written, “although a craftsman and a man of warm sympathies, an examination of his career shows an extremely limited outlook compared with Americans or his contemporaries.”

A cameraman before turning to production in the late 1890s, ‘’Heppy,’’ as he was known to his friends and colleagues, founded the first major British studio at Walton-on-Thames (which was later to become Nettlefold Studios). He experimented with sound films before 1910 and was also one of the few British pioneers to build up his own stable of stars, not borrowed from the stage, but brought to fame through the cinema. Alma Taylor, Chrissie White, Stewart Rome, and Violet Hopson were his best known ‘’discoveries.’’ So omnipotent was Hepworth in British cinema prior to the First World War that major American filmmakers such as Larry Trimble and Florence Turner were eager to associate with him when they journeyed to England from the United States to produce films.

Hepworth’s problem and the cause of his downfall was shared with many other pioneers. He did not move with the times. His films were always exquisitely photographed and beautiful to look at, but with many other pioneers. He did not move with the times. His films were always exquisitely photographed and beautiful to look at, but with many other pioneers. He did not move with the times. His films were always exquisitely photographed and beautiful to look at, but with many other pioneers. He did not move with the times. His films were always exquisitely photographed and beautiful to look at, but

—Anthony Slide

HERZOG, Werner

Nationality: German. Born: Werner Stipetic in Sachrang, 5 September 1942. Education: Classical Gymnasium, Munich, until 1961; University of Munich, early 1960s. Family: Married journalist Martje Grohmann, one son. Career: Worked as a welder in a steel factory for U.S. National Aeronautics and Space Administration; founded Werner Herzog Filmproduktion, 1966; walked from Munich to Paris to visit film historian Lotte Eisner, 1974. Awards: Bundesfilmpreis, and Silver Bear, Berlinale, for Signs of Life, 1968; Bundespreis, and Special Jury Prize, Cannes Festival, for Every Man for Himself and God against All, 1975; Best Director, Cannes Festival, for Fitzcarraldo, 1982. Address: Turkenstr. 91, D-80799 Münich, Germany.

Films as Director (beginning 1966, films are produced or co-produced by Werner Herzog Filmproduktion)

1962 Herkules (+ pr, sc)
1964 Spiel im Sand (Game in the Sand) (unreleased) (+ pr, sc)
1966 Die beispiellose Verteidigung der Festung Deutschkreuz (The Unprecedented Defense of the Fortress of Deutschkreuz) (+ pr, sc)
1967 Lebenszeichen (Signs of Life) (+ sc, pr)
1968 Letzte Worte (Last Words) (+ pr, sc); Massnahmen gegen Fanatiker (Precautions against Fanatics) (+ pr, sc)
1969 Die fliegenden Ärzte von Ostafrika (The Flying Doctors of East Africa) (+ pr, sc); Fata Morgana (Mirage) (+ sc, pr)
1970 Auch Zwerge haben klein angefangen (Even Dwarfs Started Small) (+ pr, sc, mu arrangements); Behinderte Zukunft (Handicapped Future) (+ pr, sc)
1971 Land des Schweigens und der Dunkelheit (Land of Silence and Darkness) (+ pr, sc)
1972 Aguirre, der Zorn Göttes (Aguirre, the Wrath of God) (+ pr, sc)
1974 Die grosse Ekstase des Bildschmieds Steiner (The Great Ecstasy of the Sculptor Steiner) (+ pr, sc); Jeder für sich und Gott gegen alle (Every Man for Himself and God against All; The Enigma of Kaspar Hauser) (+ pr, sc)
1976 How Much Wood Would a Woodchuck Chuck (+ pr, sc); Mit mir will keiner spielen (No One Will Play with Me) (+ pr, sc); Herz aus Glas (Heart of Glass) (+ pr, co-sc, bit role as glass carrier)
1977 La Souffrière (+ pr, sc, narration, appearance)
1978 Stroszek (+ pr, sc)
1979 Nosferatu—Phantom der Nacht (Nosferatu, the Vampire) (+ pr, sc, bit role as monk); Woyzeck (+ pr, sc)
1980 Woyzeck; Glaube und Währung (Creed and Currency)
1981 Fitzcarraldo (+ pr, sc)
1983 Where the Green Ants Dream (Wo Die Grünen Ameisen Traänen)
1984 Ballade vom Kleinen Soldaten (Ballad of the Little Soldier); Gasherbrum—Der leuchtende Berg (Gasherbrum—The Dark Glow of the Mountains)
1987 Cobra Verde (+ sc)
1988 Wodaabe—Die Hirten der Sonne (Herders of the Sun); Les Gaulois (The French)
1989 Es ist nicht leicht ein Gott zu sein (It Isn’t Easy Being God)
1990 Echoes aus Einem Duster Reich (Echoes from a Somber Kingdom)
1991 Schrie aus Stein (Scream of Stone); Jag Mandir (The Eccentric Private Theatre of the Maharajah of Udaipur)
1992 Lektionen in Finsternis (Lessons of Darkness)
1993 Bells from the Deep (Glocken aus der Tiefe)
Publications

By HERZOG: books—

_Werner Herzog: Drehbücher II_, Munich 1977.
_Werner Herzog: Stroszek, Nosferatu: Zwei Filmerzählungen_,
Munich, 1979.
_Fitzcarraldo: The Original Story_, Seattle, 1983.

By HERZOG: articles—

“Rebellen in Amerika,” in _Filmstudio_ (Frankfurt), May 1964.
“Neun Tage eines Jahres,” in _Filmstudio_ (Frankfurt), September 1964.
“Mit den Wölfen heulen,” in _Filmkritik_ (Munich), July 1968.
Interview with S. Murray, in _Cinema Papers_ (Melbourne), December 1974.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in _Positif_ (Paris), May 1975.
_Aguirre, la colère de Dieu_, on cutting continuity and dialogue, in _Avant-Scène du Cinéma_ (Paris), 15 June 1978.
“I Feel That I’m Close to the Center of Things,” interview with L. O’Toole, in Film Comment (New York), November/December 1979.

Interview with B. Steinborn and R. von Naso, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), February/March 1982.

Interview with G. Bechtold and G. Gritschi, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), October/November 1984.

“‘Io e il mio cinema,’” in Filmcritica (Siena), March 1990.

Interview with Bion Steinborn, in Filmfaust (Frankfurt am Main), July-October 1990.

On HERZOG: books—

On HERZOG: articles—

“Herzog Issue” of Cinema (Zurich), vol. 18, no. 1, 1972.

Wetzel, Kraft, “‘Werner Herzog,’” in Kino (West Berlin), April/May 1973.

“Werner Herzog,” in Film Dope (London), March 1982.

Kennedy, Harlan, “‘Amazon Grace,’” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1986.

“Herzog Issue” of Post Script (Jacksonville, Florida), Summer 1988.

Pezzotta, Alberto, “‘La realtà e il mito,’” in Filmcritica (Siena), May 1992.

Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), November 1993.

Andrew, Geoff, “‘Pliight Relief,’” in Time Out (London), 17 April 1996.

On HERZOG: films—

Werner Herzog, more than any director of his generation, has through his films embodied German history, character, and cultural richness. While references to verbal and other visual arts would be out of place in treating most film directors, they are key to understanding Herzog. For his techniques he reaches back into the early part of the twentieth century to the Expressionist painters and filmmakers; back to the Romantic painters and writers for the luminance and allegorization of landscape and the human figure; even further beyond into sixteenth-century Mannerist extremes of Mathias Günwald; and through-out his nation’s heritage for that peculiarly Germanic grotesque. In all these technical and expressive veins, one finds the qualities of exaggeration, distortion, and the sublimation of the ugly.

More than any, “grotesque” presents itself as a useful term to define Herzog’s work. His use of an actor like Klaus Kinski, whose singularly ugly face is sublimated by Herzog’s camera, can best be described by such a term. Persons with physical defects like deafness and blindness, and dwarfs, are given a type of grandeur in Herzog’s artistic vision. Herzog, as a contemporary German living in the shadow of remembered Nazi atrocities, demonstrates a penchant for probing the darker aspects of human behavior. Herzog’s vision renders the ugly and horrible sublime, while the beautiful is omitted and, when included, destroyed or made to vanish (like the beautiful Spanish noblewoman in Aguirre).

Closely related to the grotesque in Herzog’s films is the influence of German expressionism on him. Two of Herzog’s favorite actors, Klaus Kinski and Bruno S., have been compared to Conrad Veidt and Fritz Kortner, prototypical actors of German expressionistic dramas and films during the teens and 1920s. Herzog’s actors make highly stylized, indeed often stock, gestures; in close-ups, their faces are set in exaggerated grimaces.

The characters of Herzog’s films often seem deprived of free will, merely reacting to an absurd universe. Any exertion of free will in action leads ineluctably to destruction, death, or at best frustration by the unexpected. The director is a satirist who demonstrates what is wrong with the world but, as yet, seems unable or unwilling to articulate the ways to make it right; indeed, one is at a loss to find in his world view any hope, let alone prescription, for improvement.

Herzog’s mode of presentation has been termed by some critics as romantic and by others as realistic. This seeming contradiction can be resolved by an approach that compares him with those Romantic artists who first articulated elements of the later realistic approach. Critics have found in the quasi-photographic paintings of Caspar David Friedrich an analogue for Herzog’s super-realism. As with these artists, there is an aura of unreality in Herzog’s realism. Everything is seen through a camera that rarely goes out of intense, hard focus. Often it is as if his camera is deprived of the normal range of human vision, able only to perceive part of the whole through a telescope or a microscope.

In this strange blend of romanticism and realism lies the paradoxical quality of Herzog’s talent: he, unlike Godard, Resnais, or Altman, has not made great innovations in film language; if his style is to be defined at all it is as an eclectic one; and yet, his films do have a distinctive stylistic quality. He renders the surface reality of things with such an intensity that the viewer has an uncanny sense of seeing the essence beyond. Aguirre, for example, is unrelenting in its concentration on filth, disease, and brutality; and yet it is also an allegory which can be read on several levels: in terms of Germany under the Nazis, America in Vietnam, and more generally on the bestiality that lingers beneath the facade of civilized conventions. In one of Herzog’s romantic tricks within his otherwise realistic vision, he shows a young Spanish noblewoman wearing an ever-pristine velvet dress amid mud and squallor; further, only she of all the rest is not shown dying through violence and is allowed to disappear almost mysteriously into the dense vegetation of the forest: clearly, she represents that transcendent quality in human nature that incorruptibly endures. This figure is dropped like a hint to remind us to look beyond mere surface.

One finds, however, in Fitzcarraldo, Herzog’s supreme apotheosis of the spiritual dimensions of the rain forest. As much in the production as in the substance of the film, the Western Imperialist will to reshape the wilderness is again and again met with reversals that render that will meaningless. The protagonist’s titanic effort to get a riverboat over a hill from one river to another is achieved only to be thwarted by the natives who cut the ropes, sending it careening downstream through the rapids in a sacrifice to their river deity. The boat ends up uselessly back where it began: a massive symbol of human futility. Only the old gramophone shown playing records of Caruso throughout the jungle voyage offers—like the Spanish noblewoman in Aguirre—Herzog’s vision of beauty that rarely escapes being rendered meaningless by an otherwise absurd universe.

Herzog’s Australian film Where Green Ants Dream does penance for any taint of Western Imperialism that Fitzcarraldo might have given him. The director comes down hard against the modern way of life. This film is saved from tendentiousness by movements of human comedy through which a very sympathetic hero learns from the Native Australians, and by Herzog’s much-loved 360-degree pans over the flatness of the Outback. This technique is also used by Herzog to convey the sense of flat immensity of sub-Saharan Africa in Herdsmen of the Sun, a lyrical celebration of the Wodaabe tribesmen, who bend Western gender expectations by having the men and women reverse roles in courtship. Here, too, Herzog evidences his German heritage by following in the African footsteps of his greatest—if most problematic—filmmaking compatriot: Leni Riefenstahl, whose last work was a documentary of a sub-Saharan tribe to the east of the Wodaabe.

—Rodney Farnsworth

HILL, Walter

Films as Director:

1975 Hard Times (The Streetfighter) (+ co-sc)
1978 The Driver (+ sc)
1979 The Warriors (co-sc)
1980 The Long Riders
1981 Southern Comfort (co-sc)
1982 48 Hrs. (+ sc)
1984 Streets of Fire (+ sc, pr)
1985 Brewer’s Millions
1986 Crossroads
1987 Extreme Prejudice
1988 Red Heat (+ sc, pr)
1989 Johnny Handsome; Tales from the Crypt (TV series) (+ co-exec pr)
1990 Another 48 Hrs.
1992 Trespass
1993 Geronimo: An American Legend (+ pr)
1995 Wild Bill (+ sc)
1996 Last Man Standing (+ sc)
2000 Supernova
Established in the early 1970s as a writer of action movies (earlier he had ambitions to illustrate comic books), Walter Hill went almost unnoticed for his first two directorial ventures. Not so with his third. The Warriors reportedly occasioned gang fights in the United States, while one British newspaper dubbed it “the film they mustn’t show here.” Replete with highly stylized violence, The Warriors has been described by Hill as “a comic book rock ’n’ roll version of the Xenophon story.” It is a precise description: the movie takes the Anabasis and adapts it to an appropriately mythical setting among the street gangs of modern New York. The stranded Warriors fight their way home through the subways and streets of an extraordinary fantasy city. This world, as so often in Hill’s movies, is evacuated of any sense of the everyday, and is rendered with the use of the strong reds, yellows, and blues of comic book design. In its subway scenes especially, colors leap from the screen much as, say, a Roy Lichtenstein picture leaps from the canvas, its direct assault on our vision as basic as that of a comic strip.

The pleasure of the movie lies in that style, transforming its much-maligned violence into a kind of ritual dance. Given this transformation, you could as well accuse Hill of celebrating gang warfare as you could accuse Lichtenstein of condoning aerial combat in his painting Whaam! The fascination of Hill’s cinema is that it evokes and elaborates upon mythical worlds, in the case of The Warriors grounded in ancient Greece and in comics, though in his other movies more often based in the cinema itself. Thus Driver eliminates orthodox characterisation in favour of thriller archetypes: the Driver, the Detective, and the Girl, as the credits list them. They revolve around each other in a world of formally defined roles, roles made archetypal by movies themselves. The Long Riders, in presenting a version of the

By HILL: articles—

Interview with M. Greco, in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1980.
“Dead End Streets,” an interview with D. Chute, in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1984.
Jesse James story, traps its characters in their own movie mythology so that they even seem to be aware that they are playing out a sort of destiny born of the Western genre, a sense of fate which also imbues Hill’s other outstanding Western, Geronimo: An American Legend. Southern Comfort manipulates and undermines the war-movie ideology of the small military group, while 48 Hrs. pursues its unstoppable and richly entertaining action in precisely the fashion of a Don Siegel cop movie—Madigan, say, or Dirty Harry. It is as if Hill’s project is to tour the popular genres, and although he made a sequence of poor films in the latter half of the 1980s, in 1993 Geronimo triumphantly demonstrated that he remains one of the most intelligent genre directors in the modern cinema. This heralded something of a resurgence in the quality of his work, if not in commercial success, with Wild Bill and Last Man Standing (a version of Kurosawa’s Yojimbo) demonstrating his continuing grasp of genre conventions and narrative technique. He remains highly skilled in the use of chase and confrontation, adept at the montage methods so central to action-movie tension, while offering us not a “reality” but a distillation of the rules of the genre game. In his films we are witness to the enmything of characters, if that neologism is not too pompous for so pleasurable an experience, a self-conscious evocation of genre but without the knowing, postmodern wink which often attends such exercises. Hill manages to take the genre seriously and to reflect upon it, in Wild Bill even to the reflexive point at which Bill Hickock is represented as both victim and product of his own enmything.

Inevitably such immersion in popular genre conventions, however skilled, risks critical opprobrium. Although Geronimo has deservedly received its share of positive comment—in part, of course, because it treats its Native Americans with more sensitivity than has generally been the case in genre cinema—The Warriors, Southern Comfort, 48 Hrs., and Last Man Standing, have all been dismissed as shallow and morally suspect, lacking in the “seriousness” considered necessary to redeem their almost exclusive focus upon action. This, however, is to miss the real pleasures of Hill’s cinema, its visual power, its narrative force, and its absorbing concern with myth-making and myth-breaking. These, too, are qualities to which the label “serious” may properly be applied.

—Andrew Tudor

HITCHCOCK, Alfred

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1922</td>
<td>Number Thirteen (or Mrs. Peabody) (incomplete)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1923</td>
<td>Always Tell Your Wife (Crisce; completed d)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1926</td>
<td>The Pleasure Garden (Irrgarten der Leidenschaft); The Mountain Eagle (Der Bergadler, Fear o’ God); The Lodger; A Story of the London Fog (The Case of Jonathan Drew) (+ co-sc, bit role as man in newsroom, and onlooker during Novello’s arrest)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1927</td>
<td>Downhill (When Boys Leave Home); Easy Virtue; The Ring (+ sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1928</td>
<td>The Farmer’s Wife (+ sc); Champagne (+ adapt); The Manxman</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1929</td>
<td>Blackmail (+ adapt, bit role as passenger on “tube”) (silent version also made); Juno and the Paycock (The Shame of Mary Boyle)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
| 1930 | Elstree Calling (Brunel; d after Brunel dismissed, credit for “sketches and other interpolated items”); Murder (Mary,
Sir John greift ein! (+ co-adapt, bit role as passerby) An Elastic Affair (short)
1931 The Skin Game (+ co-sc)
1932 Rich and Strange (East of Shanghai) (+ co-sc; Number Seventeen (+ co-sc)
1933 Waltzes from Vienna (Strauss’s Great Waltz; The Great Waltz)
1934 The Man Who Knew Too Much
1935 The Thirty-nine Steps (+ bit role as passerby)
1936 Secret Agent; Sabotage (The Woman Alone)
1937 Young and Innocent (The Girl Was Young) (+ bit as photographer outside courthouse)
1938 The Lady Vanishes (+ bit role as man at railway station)
1939 Jamaica Inn
1940 Rebecca (+ bit role as man outside phone booth; Foreign Correspondent (+ bit role as man reading newspaper)
1941 Mr. and Mrs. Smith (+ bit role as passerby); Suspicion
1942 Saboteur (+ bit role as man by newsstand)
1943 Shadow of a Doubt (+ bit role as man playing cards on train)
1944 Life Boat (+ bit role as man in ‘Reduco’ advertisement; Bon Voyage (short); Aventure Malgache (The Malgache Adventure) (short)
1945 Spellbound (+ bit role as man in elevator)
1946 Notorious (+ story, bit role as man drinking champagne)
1947 The Paradine Case (+ bit role as man with cello)
1948 Rope (+ bit role as man crossing street)
1949 Under Capricorn; Stage Fright (+ bit role as passerby)
1950 Strangers on a Train (+ bit role as man boarding train with cello)
1951 I Confess (+ bit role as man crossing top of flight of steps)
1952 Dial M for Murder (+ bit role as man in school reunion dinner photo; Rear Window (+ bit role as man winding clock); To Catch a Thief (+ bit role as man at back of bus; The Trouble with Harry (+ bit role as man walking past exhibition)
1953 The Man Who Knew Too Much (+ bit role as man watching acrobats); The Wrong Man (+ intro appearance)
1954 Vertigo (+ bit role as passerby)
1955 North by Northwest (+ bit role as man who misses bus)
1956 Psycho (+ bit role as man outside realtor’s office)
1957 The Birds (+ bit role as man with two terriers)
1958 Marnie (+ bit role as man in hotel corridor)
1959 Torn Curtain (+ bit role as man in hotel lounge with infant)
1960 Topaz (+ bit role as man getting out of wheelchair)
1961 Frenzy (+ bit role as man in crowd listening to speech)
1962 Family Plot (+ bit role as silhouette on office window)

Other Films:
1920 The Great Day (Ford) (inter-titles des); The Call of Youth (Ford) (inter-titles des)
1921 The Princess of New York (Crisp) (inter-titles des); Appearances (Crisp) (inter-titles des); Dangerous Lies (Powell) (inter-titles des); The Mystery Road (Powell) (inter-titles des); Beside the Bonnie Brier Bush (The Bonnie Brier Bush) (Crisp) (inter-titles des)
1922 Three Live Ghosts (Fitzmaurice) (inter-titles des); Perpetua (Love’s Boomerang) (Robertson and Geraghty) (inter-titles des); The Man from Home (Fitzmaurice) (inter-titles des); Spanish Jade (Robertson and Geraghty) (inter-titles des); Tell Your Children (Crisp) (inter-titles des)
1923 Woman to Woman (Cutts) (co-sc, asst-d, art-d, ed); The White Shadow (White Shadows) (Cutts) (art-d, ed)
1924 The Passionate Adventure (Cutts) (co-sc, asst-d, art-d); The Prude’s Fall (Cutts) (asst-d, art-d)
1925 The Blackguard (Die Prinzessin und der Geiger) (Cutts) (asst-d, art-d)
1932 Lord Camber’s Ladies (Levy) (pr)
1940 The House across the Bay (Mayo) (d add’l scenes; Men of the Lightship (MacDonald, short) (reediting, dubbing of U.S. version)
1941 Target for Tonight (Watt) (supervised reediting of U.S. version)
1960 The Gazebo (Marshall) (voice on telephone telling Glenn Ford how to dispose of corpse)
1963 The Directors (pr: Greenblatt) (appearance)
1970 Makin’ It (Hartog) (documentary appearance from early thirties)
1977 Once upon a Time . . . Is Now (Billington, for TV) (role as interviewee)

Publications
By HITCHCOCK: book—

By HITCHCOCK: articles—
Interview with Claude Chabrol, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1955.
Interview with Catherine de la Roche, in Sight and Sound (London), Winter 1955/56.
Interview with Ian Cameron and V.F. Perkins, in Movie (London), 6 January 1963.
“Rear Window,” in Take One (Montreal), November/December 1968.
“Hitchcock,” transcript of address to Film Society of Lincoln Center, 29 April 1974, in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1974.

On HITCHCOCK: books—
May, Derwent, in Sight and Sound (London), October/December 1954.
Sarris, Andrew, “The Trouble with Hitchcock,” in Film Culture (New York), Winter 1955.
Sarris, Andrew, “Alfred Hitchcock, Prankster of Paradox,” in Film Comment (New York), March/April 1974.
Simer, D., “Hitchcock and the Well-Wrought Effect,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), Summer 1975.
Bellour, Raymond, “Hitchcock, the Enunciator,” in Camera Obscura (Berkeley), Fall 1977.
“Hitchcock Section” of Wide Angle (Athens, Ohio), vol. 4, no. 1, 1980.
Rossi, J., “Hitchcock’s Foreign Correspondent,” in Film and History (Newark, New Jersey), May 1982.
Kehr, Dave, “Hitch’s Riddle,” in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1984.
Zirnite, D., “Hitchcock, on the Level: The Heights of Spatial Tension,” in Film Criticism (Meadville, Pennsylvania), Spring 1986.
American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), January 1990.
Salt, Barry, “… Film in a Lifeboat?” in Film History (London), vol. 6, no. 1, Spring 1994.
Hemmeter, Thomas, “Hitchcock’s Melodramatic Silence,” in Journal of Film and Video (Atlanta), vol. 48, nos. 1–2, Spring-Summer 1996.
Perry, Dennis R., “Imps of the Perverse: Discovering the Poe/Hitchcock Connection,” in Literature/Film Quarterly, vol. 24, no. 4, October 1996.

On HITCHCOCK: films—

In a career spanning just over fifty years (1925–1976), Hitchcock completed fifty-three feature films, twenty-three in the British period, thirty in the American. Through the early British films we can trace the evolution of his professional/artistic image, the development of both the Hitchcock style and the Hitchcock thematic. His third film (and first big commercial success), The Lodger, was crucial in establishing him as a maker of thrillers, but it was not until the mid-1930s that his name became consistently identified with that genre. In the meantime, he assimilated the two aesthetic influences that were major determinants in the formation of his mature style: German Expressionism and Soviet montage theory. The former, with its aim of expressing emotional states through a deformation of external reality, is discernible in his work from the beginning (not surprisingly, as he has acknowledged Lang’s Die mude Tod as his first important cinematic experience, and as some of his earliest films were shot in German studios). Out of his later contact with the Soviet films of the 1920s evolved his elaborate editing techniques: he particularly acknowledged the significance for him of the Kuleshov experiment, from which he derived his fondness for the point-of-view shot and for building sequences by cross-cutting between person seeing/thing seen.

The extreme peculiarity of Hitchcock’s art (if his films do not seem very odd it is only because they are so familiar) can be partly accounted for by the way in which these aesthetic influences from high art and revolutionary socialism were pressed into the service of British middle-class popular entertainment. Combined with Hitchcock’s all-pervasive scepticism (“Everything’s perverted in a different way, isn’t it?”), this process resulted in an art that at once endorsed (superficially) and undermined (profoundly) the value system of the culture within which it was produced, be that culture British or American.

During the British period the characteristic plot structures that recur throughout Hitchcock’s work are also established. I want here to single out three examples of his work, not because they account for all of the films, but because they link the British to the American period, because their recurrence is particularly obstinate, and because they seem, taken in conjunction, central to the thematic complex of Hitchcock’s total oeuvre. The first Hitchcock theme is the story about the accused man: this is already established in The Lodger (in which the male protagonist is suspected of being Jack the Ripper); it often takes the form of the “double chase,” in which the hero is pursued by the police and in turn pursues (or seeks to unmask) the actual villains. Examples in the British period are The 39 Steps and Young and Innocent. In the American period it becomes the commonest of all Hitchcock plot structures: Saboteur, Spellbound, Strangers on a Train, I Confess, To Catch a Thief, The Wrong Man, North by Northwest, and Frenzy are all based on it.

A second Hitchcock plot device is the story about the guilty woman: although there are guilty women in earlier films, the structure is definitively established in Blackmail, Hitchcock’s (and Britain’s) first sound film. We may also add Sabotage from the British period, but it is in the American period that examples proliferate: Rebecca (Hitchcock’s first Hollywood film), Notorious, Under Capricorn, The Paradine Case, Vertigo, Psycho (the first third), The Birds, and Marnie are all variations on the original structure.

It is striking to observe that the opposition of the two themes discussed above is almost complete; there are very few Hitchcock films in which the accused man turns out to be guilty after all (Shadow of a Doubt and Stage Fright are the obvious exceptions; Suspicion would have been a third if Hitchcock had been permitted to carry out his original intentions), and no Hitchcock film features an accused woman who turns out to be innocent (Dial M for Murder comes closest, but even there, although the heroine is innocent of murder, she is guilty of adultery). Second, it should be noticed that while the falsely accused man is usually (not quite always) the central consciousness of type one, it is less habitually the case that the guilty woman is the central consciousness of type two: frequently, she is the object of the male protagonist’s investigation. Third, the outcome of the guilty woman films (and this may be dictated as much by the Motion Picture Production Code as by Hitchcock’s personal morality) is dependent upon the degree of guilt: the woman can sometimes be “saved” by the male protagonist (Blackmail, Notorious, Marnie), but not if she is guilty of murder or an accomplice to it (The Paradine Case, Vertigo).

Other differences between the two types of films are also evident. One should note the function of the opposite sex in the two types, for example. The heroine of the falsely accused man films is, typically, hostile to the hero at first, believing him guilty; she subsequently learns to trust him, and takes his side in establishing his innocence. The function of the male protagonist in the guilty woman films, on the other hand, is either to save the heroine or to be destroyed (at least morally and spiritually) by her. It is important to recognize that the true nature of the guilt is always sexual, and that the falsely accused man is usually seen to be contaminated by this (though innocent of the specific crime, typically murder, of which he is accused). Richard Hannay in The 39 Steps can stand as the prototype of this: when he allows himself to be picked up by the woman in the music hall, it is in expectation of a sexual encounter, the notion of sexual disorder being displaced on to “espionage,” and the film systematically moves from this towards the construction of the “good” (i.e., socially approved) couple. The very title of Young and Innocent, with its play on the connotations of the last word, exemplifies the same point, and it is noteworthy that in that film the hero’s sexual innocence remains in doubt (we only have his own word for it that he was not the murdered woman’s gigolo). Finally, the essential Hitchcockian dialectic can be read from the alternation, throughout his career, of these two series. On the whole, it is the guilty woman films that are the more disturbing, that leave the most jarring dissonances: here, the potentially threatening and subversive female sexuality, precariously contained within social norms in the falsely accused man films, erupts to demand recognition and is answered by an appalling violence (both emotional and physical); the cost of its destruction or containment leaves that “nasty taste” often noted as the dominant characteristic of Hitchcock’s work.

It is within this context that the third plot structure takes on its full significance: the story about the psychopath. Frequently, this structure occurs in combination with the falsely accused man plot (see, for example, Young and Innocent, Strangers on a Train, Frenzy) with a parallel established between the hero and his perverse and sinister adversary, who becomes a kind of shadowy alter ego. Only two Hitchcock films have the psychopath as their indisputably central figure, but they (Shadow of a Doubt, Psycho) are among his most famous and disturbing. The Hitchcock villain has a number of characteristics which are not necessarily common to all but unite in various combinations: a) Sexual “perversity” or ambiguity: a number are more or less explicitly coded as gay (the transvestite killer in Murder!), Philip in Rope, Bruno Anthony in Strangers on a Train; others have marked mother-fixations (Uncle Charlie in Shadow of a Doubt, Anthony Perkins in Psycho, Bob Rusk in Frenzy), seen as a source of their psychic disorder; (b) Fascist connotations: this becomes politically explicit in the U-boat commander of Lifeboat, but is plain enough in, for example, Shadow of a Doubt and Rope; (c) The subtle associations of the villain with the devil: Uncle Charlie and Smoke in Shadow of a Doubt, Bruno Anthony in the paddle-boat named Pluto in Strangers on a Train, Norman Bates’ remark to Marion Crane that “‘no one ever comes here unless they’ve gotten off the main highway’” in Psycho; (d) Closely connected with these characteristics is a striking and ambiguous fusion of power and impotence operating on both the sexual and non-sexual levels. What is crucially significant here is that this feature is by no means restricted to the villains. It is shared, strikingly, by the male protagonists of what are perhaps Hitchcock’s two supreme masterpieces, Rear Window and Vertigo. The latter aspect of Hitchcockworks also relates closely to the obsession with control (and the fear of losing it) that characterized Hitchcock’s own methods of filmmaking: his preoccupation with a totally finalized and story-boarded shooting script, his domination of actors and shooting conditions. Finally, it’s notable that the psychopath/villain is invariably the most fascinating and seductive character of the film, and its chief source of energy. His inevitable destruction leaves behind an essentially empty world.

If one adds together all these factors, one readily sees why Hitchcock is so much more than the skillful entertainer and master craftsman he was once taken for. His films represent an incomparable exposure of the sexual tensions and anxieties (especially male anxieties) that characterize a culture built upon repression, sexual inequality, and the drive to domination.

—Robin Wood

HOLGER-MADSEN

Nationality: Danish. Born: Holger Madsen, 11 April 1878, began spelling name with hyphen, 1911. Career: Actor in Danish provinces, 1896–1904, and in Copenhagen, 1904; actor in films, from 1907; directed first film, 1912; director for Nordisk Films Kompani, 1913–20; worked in Germany, from 1920; returned to Denmark, 1930; manager of small Copenhagen cinema, 1938–43. Died: 30 November 1943.

Films as Director:

1912 Kun en Tigger (+ role)
1913 Under Savlingens Taender (The Usurer’s Son) (+ role); Under Mindernes Træ (Dengamle Baenkt, Left Alone); Skaebnens Veje (Under Kaelrelheds Aag; In the Bonds of Passion); Det mørke; Punkt (Staalkogens Vifte; The Steel King’s Last Wish); Mens Pesten raser (Laegens Hustra; During the Plague); Ballettens Datter (Danserinden; Unjustly Accused); Elskovsleg (Love’s Devotee); Prinsesse Elena (The Princess’s Dilemma); Den hvide Dame (The White Ghost); Fra Fyrste til Knejpevaert (The Gambler’s Wife); Millionaerdrømmer (The Adventures of a Millionaire’s Son); Guldet og vort Hjerte (Elskovsleg)

1914 Tempeldanserindens Elskov (Bajaderens Haevn; The Bayadere’s Revenge); Brnevennerne; A Marriage of Convenience; En Opstandelse (Genopstandelse; A Reurrection); Huaassistenten (Naar Fren skifter Pige; The New Cook); Sanggaegersken; The Somnambulist; Opiumsmørmen; The Opium Smoker’s Dream; Den mystiske Fremmede (A Deal with the Devil); Endelig Alene (Alone at Last); Min Ven Levy (My Friend Levy); Ned med Vaadne (Lay Down Your Arms); Trolde kan taemmes (The Taming of the Shrew); De Forviste (Uden Faedreland; Without a Country); Et Huskors (Lysten styret; Enough of It); Barnets Magt (The Child); Haremseven (An Adventure in a Harem); Evangeliekaydonens Liv (The Candle and the Moth); Kaelrelheds Triumph (Testamentet; The Romance of a Will); Krig og Kærlighed (Love and War); Spiritisten (A Voice from the Past); Det stjælde Ansigt (The Missing Admiralty Plans); En Aeresoprejning (Misunderstood); Lykken draelbeer

1915 Cigaretteigen (The Cigarette Maker); Hvem er Gentlemantvæn (Strakoff the Adventurer); En Ildpræv; (A Terrible Ordeal); Danserindens Haevn (Circus Arrives; The Dancer’s Revenge); Danserindens Kærlighedsdrøm; (Den Dødsdrøm); A Dancer’s Strange Dream; The Condemned; Den frelsende Film (The Woman Tempted Me); Grevinde Hjertels; (The Beggar Princess); Guldets Gift (The Tempting of Mrs. Chestney); Den hvide Djaevl (Caught in the Toils; The Devil’s Protege); Hvem som elsker sin Fader eller Fakken (Who So Loveth His Father’s Honor); I Livets Braending (The Crossroads of Life); Manden uden Fremtid (The Man without a Future); Den omstridte Jord (Jordens Haevn; The Earth’s Revenge); Sjælevetyen (The Unwilling Sinner; His Innocent Dupe); Det unge Blod (The Buried Secret); Krigens Fjende (Acostates fritse; Offer; The Munition Conspiracy); En Kunstners Gennembrud (Den Ddes; Sjael; The Soul of the Violin)

1916 For sin Faders Skald (The Veiled Lady; False Evidence); Maaneprinsessen (Kamæleon; The Mysterious Lady; The May-Flay); Brnenes; Synd (The Sins of the Children); Fange no. 113 (Convict No. 113); Hans rigtige Kone (Which Is Which); Hendes Moderns Defe; (Den Dødsdrøm); A Super Shylock; Hitebarnet (The Foundling of Fate); Hvor Sorgerne glemmes (Sister; Cecilie Offer; Sister Cecilia); Livets Gglespie; An Impossible Marriage; Manden uden Smil; Nattens Mysterium (Who Killed Barno O’Neal); Nattevandreren (Edison Maes Dagbog; Out of the Underworld); Pax Aeterna; Lykken (The Music Hall Star); Lykken (The Road to Happiness; Guiding Conscience); Praestens Datter; Testamentets Hemmelighed (Den Ddes); Rat; The Voice of the Dead; Nancy Keith; Den Aereelse; (The Infamous; The Prison Taint); Smil (Far’s Sorg; Father Sorrow; The Beggar Man of Paris)

1917 Himmelskibet (A Trip to Mars); Retten sejrer (Justice Victorious); Hendes Helt Helt (Vogt dig for dine Venner)

1918 Folkets Ven (A Friend of the People); Mod Lyset (Toward the Light); Manden, der sejrede (The Man Who Tamed the Victors; Fighting Instinct)

1919 Guadernes Yndling (Digterkongen; Trials of Celebrity; The Penalty of Fame); Hvem jeg Ret til at tage mit eget Liv (Who Killed Barno O’Neal); Nattevandreren (Edison Maes Dagbog; Out of the Underworld); Pax Aeterna; Lykken (The Music Hall Star); Lykken (The Road to Happiness; Guiding Conscience); Praestens Datter; Testamentets Hemmelighed (Den Ddes); Rat; The Voice of the Dead; Nancy Keith; Den Aereelse; (The Infamous; The Prison Taint); Smil (Far’s Sorg; Father Sorrow; The Beggar Man of Paris)

1921 Am Webstuhl der Zeit; Tobias Buntshu (++; Role); Den dvende Stad (Die sterbende Stadt)

1922 Pømperly’s Kampf mit dem Schneeschuh (co-d)

1923 Das Evangelium; Zaida, die Tragödie eines Modells

1924 Der Mann um Mitternacht

1925 Ein Lebenskünstler

1926 Die seltsame Nacht; Die Sporck’schen Jäger; Spitten

1927 Die heilige Lüge
Holger-Madsen’s reputation as an idealistic director led him to direct the big prestige films with pacifist themes which Ole Olsen, the head of Nordisk Films Kompagni, wanted to make in the naive hope that he could influence the fighting powers in the First World War. The films were often absurdly simple, but Holger-Madsen brought his artistic sense to the visual design of these sentimental stories. One of his most famous films is Himmelskibet from 1917, a work about a scientist who flies to Mars in a rocket ship. There he is confronted with a peaceful civilization. The film has obtained a position as one of the first science-fiction films.

When the Danish cinema declined, Holger-Madsen went to Germany. Returning to Denmark after the 1920s, he was offered the opportunity of directing during the early sound film period, but his productions were insignificant. He was a silent film director; the image was his domain, and he was one of the craftsmen who molded and refined the visual language of film.

—Ib Monty

HOLLAND, Agnieszka

Nationality: Polish. Born: Warsaw, Poland, 28 November 1948.
Education: Graduated from the Filmova Akademie Muzickych Umeni (FAMU) film school in Prague, where she studied directing.
Career: Maintained her studies in Prague even after the Soviet invasion; was jailed by the authorities after months of harassment by the authorities.

The two leading directors at Nordisk Films Kompagni in the Golden Age of the Danish cinema from 1910 to 1914 were August Blom and Holger-Madsen. They were similar in many respects. They both started as actors, but unlike Blom, Holger-Madsen began as a director with companies other than Nordisk. When he came to Nordisk he worked in almost all of the genres of the period—sensational films, comedies, farces, dramas, and tragedies. Gradually, though, Holger-Madsen developed his own personality, both in content and style.

Holger-Madsen specialized in films with spiritual topics. His main film in this genre was Evangelie mandens Liv, in which Valdemar Psilander plays the leading part of a dissolute young man of good family who suddenly realizes how empty and pointless his life is. He becomes a Christian and starts working as a preacher among the poor and the social outcasts of the big city. He succeeds in rescuing a young man from the path of sin. Several of the clichés of the period are featured in this tale, but the characterization of the hero is largely free of sentimentality, and Holger-Madsen coached Psilander into playing the role with a mature calm, and genuine strength of feeling. Formally the film is exquisite. The sets, the camerawork, and the lighting are executed with great care, and the film is rich in striking pictorial compositions, which was the director’s forte.

Holger-Madsen had a predilection for extraordinary, often bizarre images and picturesque surroundings. With his cameraman, Marius Clausen, he emphasized the visual look of his films. His use of side light, inventive camera angles, and close-ups, combined with unusual sets, made him an original stylist. He was not very effective in his cutting technique, but he could establish marvelously choreographed scenes in which people moved in elegant patterns within the frame.

---

---

---

---
police, 1970; returned to Poland and became member of film collective “X,” headed by Andrzej Wajda, 1972; began career as a production assistant to director Krzysztof Zanussi on Illumination, 1973; worked in Polish theatre and television, 1970s; began authoring scripts of films directed by Wajda, 1979; directed first feature, Provincial Actors, 1979; moved to Paris after the declaration of martial law in Poland, and began making documentaries for French television, 1981; earned first major international acclaim for Angry Harvest, 1985; member of board of directors of Zespolu Filmowne; member of board of directors of Polish Filmmakers Association.

Awards: Award at TV Films and Plays Festival, Olsztyn, 1976; Prize at San Remo Festival, and MIFED, Milan, 1976, for Sunday Children; Grand Prix, Koszalin Festival, 1979, for Provincial Actors; Co-winner, International Critics Prize, Cannes Festival, 1980, for Provincial Actors; Grand Prize, Gdansk Festival, 1981, for The Fever; New Cinema Grand Prize, Montreal Festival, 1981, for A Woman Alone; Oscar nomination, Best Foreign Language Film, 1985, for Angry Harvest; Golden Globe Award, Best Foreign Language Film, National Board of Review, Best Foreign Language Film, and Oscar nomination, Best Screenplay, 1990, for Europa, Europa. Agent: William Morris, 151 E. Camino Drive, Beverly Hills, CA 90212.

Films as Director/Screenwriter:

1973 Le Complot (co-d only)
1974 Evening at Abdon’s (An Evening at Abdon) (for TV)
1976 Niedzielnie Dzieci (Sunday Children) (for TV)
1977 Something for Something (for TV); Screen Tests (episode in sketch film)
1979 Aktorzy prowincjonalni (Provincial Actors)
1981 Fever (The Fever; The Story of the Bomb)
1982 A Woman Alone (A Lonely Woman) (co-dir)
1984 Bittere ernte (Angry Harvest)
1988 To Kill a Priest (Le complot) (co-sc)
1990 Europa, Europa
1991 Olivier, Olivier
1993 The Secret Garden (d only)
1995 Total Eclipse (d only)
1997 Washington Square
1999 The Third Miracle
2001 Golden Dreams; Julia Walking Home (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1976 Bliżna (The Scar) (Kieslowski) (ro as Secretary)
1978 Dead Case (sc); Bez niewyrażenia (Without Anesthesia; Rough Treatment) (Wajda) (sc)
1981 Czowiek z zelaza (Man of Iron) (Wajda) (sc)
1982 Przesłuchanie (role as Witowska)
1983 Danton (Wajda) (sc)
1984 Ein Liebe en Deutschland (A Love in Germany) (Wajda) (sc)
1987 Anna (Bogayevicz) (sc); Les Possedes (sc)
1988 La Amiga (sc)
1990 Korczak (Wajda) (sc)
1993 Trois Couleurs: Bleu (Kieslowski) (additional dialogue)
1994 Trois Couleurs: Rouge (Kieslowski) (script consultant)

Publications

By HOLLAND: book—

Olivier, Olivier (Script and Director Series), with Regis Debray, Yves Lapointe, Gaile Sarma, Leon Steinmetz, Anga Karetnikova and Inga Karetnikova, Westport, Connecticut, 1996.

By HOLLAND: articles—

“Agnieszka Holland: le cinema polonais continue d’exister mais un lui a coupé le souffle,” interview by P. Li in Avant-Scene Cinéma (Paris), December 1983.

Interview, in Kino (Warsaw), November 1993.

On HOLLAND: articles—

Quart, Barbara, “‘The Secret Garden of Agnieszka Holland,’” in Ms. (New York), September/October 1993.
Possu, T., in Filmthullu (Helsinki), no. 5, 1995.
Lally, K., “‘Holland’s America,’” in Film Journal (New York), October 1997.

* * * *

The death camps were liberated decades ago. Auschwitz and Birkenau, Chelmno and Dachau—the ABCD’s of the Final Solution—have long been silent memorials to the mass murder of millions. Despite this passage of time—and despite the media-induced impression that Steven Spielberg’s Schindler’s List is the only movie ever made that confronts the extermination of a people during the Second World War—the Holocaust was and is a fertile subject for cinematic exploration. One filmmaker whose body of work has been profoundly affected by the events of the era is director-screenwriter Agnieszka Holland.

Holland is a Polish Jew who was born scant years after the end of the war. She is not so much interested in the politics of the era, in how and why the German people allowed Hitler to come to power. Rather, a common theme in her films is the manner in which individuals responded to Hitler and the Nazi scourge. This concern is most perfectly exemplified in what is perhaps her most distinguished film to date: Europa, Europa, a German-made feature based on the memoirs of Salomon Perel, who as a teenage German Jew survived World War II by passing for Aryan in a Hitler Youth academy. This thoughtful, tremendously moving film was the source of controversy on two accounts: it depicts a Jew who compromises himself in order to insure his survival; and it was not named as Germany’s official Best Foreign Language Film Academy Award entry, making it ineligible in that category for an Oscar. However, it did earn Holland a nomination for Best Adapted Screenplay.

Even though Holland only wrote the script for Korczak—the film was directed by her mentor, Andrzej Wajda—it too is one of her most impassioned works. Her simple, poignant screenplay chronicles the real-life story of a truly gentle, remarkable man: Janusz Korczak (Wojtek Psoniak), a respected doctor, writer, and children’s rights advocate who operated a home for Jewish orphans in Warsaw during the 1930s. Korczak’s concerns are people and not politics. “I love children,” he states, simply and matter-of-factly. “I fight for years for the dignity of children.” In his school, he offers his charges a humanist education. And then the Nazis invade his homeland. Given his station in life, Korczak easily could arrange his escape to freedom. But he chooses to remain with his children and do whatever he must to keep his orphanage running and his children alive, even after they all have been imprisoned in the Warsaw Ghetto.

After directing several theatrical and made-for-television features in Poland, Holland came to international attention in 1985 with Angry Harvest, a superb drama about a wealthy farmer who offers to shelter a Jewish woman in his cellar in World War II Poland. His repressed sexuality transforms this act of kindness into one of hypocrisy, as he attempts to abuse his guest. Films like Angry Harvest, Korczak, and Europa, Europa serve an essential purpose: they are tools that can be used to educate young people, Jew and non-Jew alike, about the exploitation and extermination of a race. They are monuments, as much to the memory of generations past as to the survival of generations to come.

Another of Holland’s themes—which by its very nature also may be linked to the Holocaust—is the loss of innocence among children that occurs by odd, jarring circumstances, rather than the natural progression of growing into adulthood. Olivier, Olivier, like Europa, Europa and Korczak, also is a based-on-fact narrative. It is the intricate account of a country couple whose youngest offspring, Olivier, mysteriously disappears. Six years later he “reappears,” but is no longer the special child who was a joy to his family. Instead, he is a Parisian street hustler who claims to have forgotten his childhood. One also can understand Holland’s attraction to The Secret Garden, an adaptation of the Frances Hodgson Burnett children’s story about a ten-year-old orphan who revitalizes a neglected garden in her uncle’s Victorian mansion. And one can see how she would be drawn to Washington Square, Henry James’s story of an awkward, unattractive young woman, the daughter of a well-heeled, domineering doctor, who is wooed by a poor-but-handsome fortune hunter. The characters in Washington Square, The Secret Garden, and Olivier, Olivier are further linked in that they share complex familial bonds.

Religion has had a significant presence in Holland’s films. In Europa, Europa, the young hero chooses to disavow his Judaism in order to insure his survival. To Kill a Priest is the story of an ill-fated activist priest in Poland, while The Third Miracle deals with a self-doubting clergyman whose job is to scrutinize the lives of potential saints. In these films, Holland is concerned with various aspects of theology, including religious identity, the manner in which religion affects the individual’s worldview, and how the religious establishment deals with the passions and politics of its adherents.

Most of Holland’s films have been artistically successful. Two exceptions have been To Kill a Priest, an ambitious but ultimately clumsy drama; and Total Eclipse, about the relationship between French poets Arthur Rimbaud and Paul Verlaine (and based on a play by Christopher Hampton). Total Eclipse was a fiasco—one of the more eagerly anticipated yet disappointing films of 1995. Thankfully, however, these failures comprise the minority of Holland’s filmic output.

—Rob Edelman

HOOPER, Tobe

Films as Director:

1963 The Heisters
1969 Eggshells
1974 The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (+ sc, pr, composer)
1976 Eaten Alive (+ composer)
1979 Salem’s Lot: The Movie; Salem’s Lot (TV miniseries); The Dark (replaced by John Cardos)
Tobe Hooper’s career as a director began at the ripe old age of three, when he went around shooting footage with his family’s 8mm camera. While growing up, Hooper continued to make films, and spent as much time as he could watching movies in the Austin, Texas, theatre managed by his father. “My entire filmic vocabulary came from those days,” he once noted. “It became a way of life, a way of looking at things.” Hooper’s first production, Eggshells (1969), took place in a haunted commune toward the end of the Vietnam conflict, and garnered very little attention. “There was a poltergeist in the house, but it was treated subly. The effects got lost in the statement of the film, so it primarily played at art houses. It only got about fifty play dates.” Judging from Eggshells and another early effort, The Heisters (1963), no one could have predicted the attention and storm of controversy that would accompany Hooper’s next effort, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre (1974).

Inspired by the real-life story of Wisconsin serial killer Ed Gein (as was Psycho before it, and The Silence of the Lambs years later), The Texas Chainsaw Massacre—co-written by Hooper and Kim Henkel, and made on a budget of only $140,000—generated heated debate over the aesthetic merits and potentially negative social effects of modern horror cinema. The story, which begins with some voice-over by a young (and then unknown) John Larroquette, tells of five teenagers on a road trip who have the misfortune of bunking down next to an all-male family of cannibalistic ex-slaughterhouse workers. Without a doubt, the most memorable baddie is Leatherface (Gunnar Hansen in the role of a lifetime), he of the eponymous chainsaw and gruesome visage. Upon viewing this intense film, with its relentless pace and documentary pretensions, critic Rex Reed declared it one of the most frightening movies ever made. Immediately, the Museum of Modern Art purchased a print for its permanent collection, and the film was honored in the “Director’s Fortnight” at Cannes. The accolades continued to pour in—the prestigious London Film Festival went so far as to name The Texas Chainsaw Massacre Outstanding Film of the Year in 1974. Eventually grossing close to $31 million at U.S. box offices, and spawning three sequels, Hooper’s labor of love stood for a time as one of the most profitable independent films in motion picture history.

Having earned name recognition and a bevy of devoted fans, Hooper’s next effort, Eaten Alive (1976; also co-written by Henkel) was a disappointment, despite its promising cast. Known by turns as Death Trap, Horror Hotel, Starlight Slaughter, and Murder on the Bayou, the film stars Neville Brand (Al Capone in the original Untouchables television series) as a psychotic innkeeper with a penchant for murdering guests and feeding them to his pet alligator. Robert Englund, who would go on to make it big as Freddy Krueger in Wes Craven’s immensely popular Nightmare on Elm Street series, had a bit part. On the one hand, Eaten Alive seemed too much like Texas Chainsaw Massacre for its own good, with its showcasing of random acts of gratuitous violence; on the other hand, it lacked all of the former movie’s grim humor and agonizing tension.

Three years later, Hooper had his second success, this time on television, with Salem’s Lot—a faithful, albeit understated, rendition of Stephen King’s atmospheric vampire novel (James Mason co-stars). The most uncanny scene has infected youngster Danny Glick (Brad Savage) floating outside a friend’s window, tapping on the pane and pleading with him to open it. Returning to the big screen in 1981, Hooper directed The Funhouse, an underrated horror tale about four adolescents who spend the night at a carnival funhouse, only to be stalked by a disfigured killer. Based on an early novel by Dean Koontz (who wrote it under a pseudonym), the film was quickly dismissed by both reviewers and fans of the genre, though in retrospect, its self-reflexivity makes it years ahead of its time.

1982 saw Hooper’s biggest commercial success, the Steven Spielberg-penned and -produced haunted house film, Poltergeist. Made on a budget that dwarfed anything he had worked with before (approximately $11 million), Hooper did an excellent job of evoking a creepy atmosphere and utilizing cutting-edge special effects technology. Although criticized for being a little too polished (quite a change from Hooper’s Texas Chainsaw Massacre days!), Poltergeist was a huge hit, grossing upwards of $76 million, and spawning two sequels plus a network television show. Sadly, the original film’s notoriety has increased since its release, due to the deaths of co-stars...
Dominique Dunne (murdered by her boyfriend shortly after it opened) and Heather O’Rourke, the little girl with the phone (from intestinal steriosis) six years later.

An inexplicable unevenness has plagued Hooper throughout his career, as is testified to by his work in the 1980s. After Poltergeist came the science fiction-horror hybrid Lifeforce—a thoroughly average effort at combining vampires, aliens, and female nudity. Next came the very dark, very gory, and surprisingly intelligent horror comedy, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Part 2 (1986), starring Dennis Hopper as a former Texas Ranger seeking revenge for the chainsaw murder of his brother. A disappointing big-budget remake of the 1953 sci-fi classic Invaders from Mars followed. Since then, Hooper has moved back and forth between the big and small screen; highlights include the pilot for a popular television series, Nowhere Man (1995), starring Bruce Greenwood as a documentary photographer whose whole life is seemingly erased in the course of one evening. An original, talented, and unpredictable director, Tobe Hooper’s contributions to the horror genre are many, and his developing projects are eagerly anticipated.

—Steven Schneider

HOU Hsiao-Hsien

Nationality: Taiwanese. Born: Hour Shia-shyan (name in pinyin, Hou Xiaoshian) in Meixian, Guangtung (Canton) province, 8 April 1947; moved to Hualien, Taiwan, 1948. Education: Attended the film program of the Taiwan National Academy of the Arts, 1969–72. Career: Electronic calculator salesman, 1972–73; script boy, then assistant director, from 1974; scriptwriter, from 1975; directed first career, as is testified to by his work in the 1980s. After Poltergeist came the science fiction-horror hybrid Lifeforce—a thoroughly average effort at combining vampires, aliens, and female nudity. Next came the very dark, very gory, and surprisingly intelligent horror comedy, The Texas Chainsaw Massacre, Part 2 (1986), starring Dennis Hopper as a former Texas Ranger seeking revenge for the chainsaw murder of his brother. A disappointing big-budget remake of the 1953 sci-fi classic Invaders from Mars followed. Since then, Hooper has moved back and forth between the big and small screen; highlights include the pilot for a popular television series, Nowhere Man (1995), starring Bruce Greenwood as a documentary photographer whose whole life is seemingly erased in the course of one evening. An original, talented, and unpredictable director, Tobe Hooper’s contributions to the horror genre are many, and his developing projects are eagerly anticipated.

—Steven Schneider

Other Films:

1974 Yun shen Pu Chih Ch’u (Lost in the Deep Cloud) (asst-d); Chin shui Lou Tai (A Better Chance) (asst-d)
1975 Tao Hua Neu Tou Chao Kung (The Beauty and the Old Man) (sc, asst-d); Yeuh Hsia Lao Jen (The Matchmaker) (sc, asst-d)
1976 Ai Yu Ming T’ien (Love Has Tomorrow) (asst-d); Yen Shuo Han (The Glory of the Sunset) (asst-d); Nan Hai Yu Ni Hai Tê Chan Chêng (The War between Boys and Girls) (asst-d)
1977 Ts’ui Hu Han (The Chilly Green Lake) (asst-d); Yen P’o Chiang Shang (On the Foggy River) (sc, asst-d); Tsao an Taipei (Good Morning, Taipei) (sc); Pei Chih Ch’iu (Sadness of Autumn) (sc)
1978 Tslo Yeh Yu Hsiao Hsiao (The Rushing Rain of Last Night) (sc, asst-d); Wo T’a Laong Erh Lai (I Come with the Wave) (sc, asst-d)
1979 T’ien Liang Hsiao Ke Ch’iu (What a Cold but Wonderful Autumn) (sc, asst-d); Ch’iu Lien (Autumn Lotus) (sc)
1980 P’eng P’eng I Ch’u’an Hsin (Pounding Hearts) (sc, asst-d)
1981 Ch’iao Ju Ts’ai T’ieh Wei Fei Fei (A Butterfly Girl) (sc, asst-d)
1982 Hsiao Pi Te Ku Shih (Growing Up) (co-pr, co-sc, asst-d)
1984 Yu Ma Ts’ai Tzu (Ah Fei) (co-sc); Hsiaoa Pa Te T’ien K’ung (Out of the Blue) (co-sc); Ch’ing Mei Chu Ma (Taipei Story) (role); Tsai Hsiang Nien Tê Chi Chieh (sc)
1995 Quanian dongtian (Heartbreak Island) (co-sc, exec pr)
1999 Borderline (pr)

Publications

By HOU: articles—

Interview with Olivier Assayas, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), December 1984.
“‘Not the Best Possible Face,’” an interview with Tony Rayns, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), June 1990.
“‘City of Sadness,’” an interview in Film, March 1990.
“‘History’s Subtle Shadows,’” an interview with P. H. P. Chiao, in Cinemaya, Autumn 1993.

Interview with M. Ciment, in Positif, December 1993.
“‘Good Men, Good Women,’” an interview with Alain Masson and Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), May 1996.

On HOU: articles—

“A Taiwan Tale,” in Film, April 1989.

1974 Chiu Shih Liu Liu Tê T’a (Cute Girls) (+ sc)
1980 Feng Erh T’i T’a Ts’ai (Cheerful Wind) (+ sc)
1982 Tsai Nei Ho P’an Ch’ing Ts’ao Ch’ing (The Green, Green Grass of Home) (+ sc)
1983 Episode of Erh Tsu Tê Ta Wan Ou (The Sandwich Man; Son’s Big Doll)
1984 Fêng Kuei Lai Tê Jen (The Boys from Fengkuei) (+ co-sc); Tung Tung Te Chia Ch’u (A Summer at Grandpa’s)
1985 T’ung Nein Wang Shih (A Time to Live and a Time to Die)
1986 Lien Lien Feng Ch’eng (Dust in the Wind) (+ role)
1987 Ni Luo Ho Ni Erh (Daughter of the Nile) (+ role)
1989 Pei Ch’ing Ch’êng Shih (A City of Sadness) (+ role)
1993 The Puppetmaster
1995 Haonan Hsiao (Good Men, Good Women)
1996 Nanguo qianian, nanguo (Goodbye South, Goodbye)
1998 Hai shang hua (Flowers of Shanghai)
Hou Hsiao-hsien is the most internationally renowned of the filmmakers associated with Taiwan’s “New Cinema” movement. The “New Cinema” was forged out of the country’s aging industry in the early 1980s by a group of emerging filmmakers, most of whom were in their early thirties at the time. The members of this cohesive group helped each other make films, and were strongly supported in turn by a group of film critics belonging to the same generation. Their works diverged from mainstream films of the time both in style and in content; instead of the escapist romances and propaganda films in melodramatic form that dominated Taiwan’s film market in the 1970s, this new wave of filmmakers used a realistic style to convey their socially concerned themes.

The experiences of life in Taiwan figure prominently in Hou’s work, due to his personal background: Hou, who has lived in Taiwan for most of his life, was a year old in 1948 when he and his family, on a visit from the mainland, were forced to remain more or less permanently as a result of the Civil War. Unlike the previous generation of filmmakers, who were brought up and educated in mainland China and who hired professionals to dub all the dialogue with standard Mandarin, the official language of both Taiwan and mainland China, Hou began using large amounts of the Taiwanese dialect spoken by most of the island’s inhabitants. Following The Sandwhich Man, Hou also mixed in the dialect of the ancient Hakkas ethnic group, as well as Japanese. (Japan had occupied Taiwan for almost fifty years, previous to the Nationalist takeover.) While the previous generation of filmmakers identified with or bowed to the Nationalist strategy of mandating exclusive use of the Mandarin language to “Chinacize” the people of Taiwan, Hou and his peers, whether mainlander or islander, recognized the fact that Taiwan was not synonymous with China. Due to this break from the state-enforced ideology, the New Cinema practitioners were able to begin to face and examine the sources and manifestations of their society’s problems.

Perhaps most dynamic in this rapidly industrializing country was the emotional as well as physical dislocation resulting from the urbanization of Taiwan’s traditionally rural culture. The conflict between urban and rural values is a recurring theme in Hou’s films. Hou, who grew up in the countryside and moved to Taipei at the beginning of his college studies, retains a strong attachment to traditional Taiwanese values. On the screen, he uses country living and sentiments in the idyllic scene structure of his films. In A Summer at Grandpa’s, the protagonist Tung Tung, a young boy who grew up in Taipei but stayed at his grandfather’s in the country while his mother was hospitalized, gained “real” childhood experiences—playing in the river and exchanging his toy car with another child’s live turtle, as well as more gritty life experiences—learning of the complexities of social relationships through the rape of an insane woman and her subsequent unsuccessful pregnancy. Contrasted with the positive influences one can gain from country life in most of Hou’s films are the attractions of the city, with its opportunities for a living wage and concomitant confusion of an alien social structure, and its dissimilar types of human relationships.

In The Boys from Fengkuei, when three young men arrive at Kaohsiung, they find that their friend’s sister, who has moved to the city from their hometown, has somehow become “morally corrupted.” While they wander around on the streets of the city, a stranger on a motorcycle collects their money to see an underground porn film, sending them into an empty building still under construction. Instead of a movie screen, they view the city landscape from huge holes awaiting windows. A silent long take and a long shot shows the three naive boys staring at the city—the farce turning out to be their first taste of the bitterness of the city—without anger but with a deep sense of helplessness.

That the urban experience can prove damaging to one’s physical as well as mental health is illustrated in Dust in the Wind. The protagonist Ah-Yuan is beaten up by his boss’s wife for failing to deliver a lunch box to her son, and some friends of Ah-Yuan, including his girlfriend, are injured during their work. While these country children are wounded by the city, they can always go back to their rural homes to recuperate from their mental and physical injuries. However, in Daughter of the Nile, when the teenaged girl Shao Yang and her brother Shao Fang settle in the city of Taipei, they become the orphans of the world. Daughter of the Nile is Hou’s first and thus far only film that takes place entirely in Taipei. Hou’s shots of the dark city illuminated by the colorful neon signs eerily demonstrate the materialism that dislocates the youths, and finally takes Shao Fang’s life.

The uneasiness and the difficulties of adjusting to social changes was the other theme in almost all of Hou’s directorial works. In The Sandwhich Man, Hou used a clown costume as the symbol of this discomfort. In Dust in the Wind, this discomfort is transformed into physical suffering when the rural teenagers are beaten and otherwise abused by their working environment. Death also played the main metaphoric role of the transition in A Time to Live and a Time to Die: the deaths of protagonist Ah-ha’s father, mother, and grandmother punctuate his stages of growing up as well as his ideological divergence from the Nationalist party between the years 1958 and 1966. Similarly, in A City of Sadness, each of the four brothers of the Lin family was killed either physically or mentally in differing political climates and social circumstances during the 1940s, their deaths indicating their failure in adjusting to the new eras.

Hou’s achievement is not only in his cinematic sensitivities but also in his social consciousness. As much as he is a filmmaker, Hou is a historical and social commentator of the first order.

In May 2000, Hou’s position in the West was curiously anomalous: the majority of serious critics regarded him as among the three or four most important living filmmakers, yet his films remained inaccessible to the great majority of filmgoers, shown only in film festivals and occasional Cinematheque retrospectives. None had been granted a wide release; a very few hovered in the dim hinterlands of availability on obscure videos—poor color, wrong format, inadequate subtitles. There were no clear indications that this situation would change in the foreseeable future.

It must be admitted that Hou’s films—especially the later ones—present the viewer with certain problems, and not only because they demand some awareness of Taiwanese political and cultural history during the second half of the last century. From City of Sadness on, their treatment of narrative structure has become increasingly challenging and unorthodox. One feels at times that Hou shoots only the sequences that really engage him, leaving the audience to fill in narrative hiatuses with a combination of common sense and imagination. The many characters are seldom given the careful, emphatic introductions to which Hollywood has accustomed us, and closeups are rare, point-of-view shots non-existent; sequences are often entirely in long-shot. In short, Hou expects us to work, concentrate, be vigilant; the films construct a spectator who is at once detached but sympathetic.

Each of the recent works requires detailed treatment to do it justice; City of Sadness is discussed in the companion volume on Films. The Puppetmaster is a complex study of the relationship of the artist to the social and political vicissitudes of history, raising central questions of responsibility, of the essentially political nature of all art (conscious or not). Good Men, Good Women pursues these themes in different ways, focussing now on actors; it is built upon an intricate double narrative and a complicated time-scheme. Criminality has played a significant thematic role in a number of Hou’s films (Daughter of the Nile, City of Sadness); it becomes central to Goodbye South, Goodbye, which one might describe as Hou’s first gangster thriller, though a characteristically idiosyncratic and off-beat one.

Most recently, we have had the extraordinary Flowers of Shanghai, in some ways the most readily accessible of this group of films. Set entirely inside an expensive Shanghai brothel, it follows the complex lives and interactions of the courtesans and their clients, their stories told mainly in sequence-shots, with a more mobile camera than we are accustomed to in Hou’s films, where static long takes have generally predominated. The film’s great visual beauty and grace are matched by the delicacy of its insights, the respect with which Hou treats both his characters and his audiences. Not surprisingly, it headed many critics’ lists of the “best films of the ’90s.”

—Vivian Huang, updated by Robin Wood

HOWARD, Ron

Films as Director:

1969 Deed of Derring-Do
1977 Grand Theft Auto (+ sc)
1978 Cotton Candy (+ sc)
1980 Skyward (for TV) (+ exec pr)
1981 Through the Magic Pyramid (Tut and Tuttle) (for TV)
1982 Night Shift
1984 Splash
1985 Cocoon
1986 Gang Ho (Working–Class Man) (+ exec pr)
1988 Willow
1989 Parenthood (+ sc)
1991 Backdraft
1992 Far and Away (+ sc, pr)
1994 The Paper
1995 Apollo 13 (+ music exec pr)
1996 Ransom
1999 Ed TV (+ pr)
2000 How the Grinch Stole Christmas

Films as Actor:

1955 Frontier Woman (uncredited bit part)
1959 The Journey (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Billy Rhinelander)
1961 Door-to-Door Maniac (Five Minutes to Live) (as Bobby)
1962 The Music Man (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Winthrop Paroo)
1963 The Courtship of Eddie’s Father (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Eddie)
1965 Village of the Giants (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Genius)
1967 A Boy Called Nuthin’ (for TV) (as Richie “Nuthin’” Caldwell)
1970 Smoke (for TV) (as Chris)
1971 The Wild Country (The Newcomers) (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Virgil)
1973 Happy Mother’s Day, Love George (as Johnny); American Graffiti (billed as Ronny Howard) (as Steve Bolander)
1974 The Spikes Gang (as Les Richter); Locusts (for TV) (as Donny Fletcher); The Migrants (for TV) (as Lyle Barlow)
1975 Huckleberry Finn (for TV) (as Huckleberry Finn)
1976 The Shootist (as Gillooly Rogers); The First Nude Musical (for TV) (as Actor at Audition); I’m a Fool; Eat My Dust! (as Hoover Niebold)
1977 Grand Theft Auto (as Sam Freeman)
1979 More American Graffiti (as Steve Bolander)
1980 Act of Love (for TV) (as Leon Cybulkowski)
1981 Bitter Harvest (for TV) (as Ned De Vries); Fire on the Mountain (for TV) (as Lee Mackie)
1983 When Your Lover Leaves (for TV)
1986 Return to Mayberry (for TV) (as Opie Taylor)
1992 The Magical World of Chuck Jones (for TV) (as himself)
1997 Frank Capra’s American Dream (for TV) (as Host/Narrator)
1999 From Star Wars to Star Wars: The Story of Industrial Light & Magic (doc) (as himself/interviewee)
2000 The Independent (as himself); Chuck Jones: Extremes and In-Betweens, A Life in Animation (as himself)
2001 Osmosis Jones

Films as Executive Producer:

1980 Leo and Loree
1983 When Your Lover Leaves (for TV)
1985 No Greater Gift (for TV); Into Thin Air (for TV)
1987 Take Five (for TV); No Man’s Land
1988 Clean and Sober; Lone Star Kid; Vibes
1991 Closet Land

Films as Producer:

1996 The Chamber
1997 Inventing the Abbotts
1998 From the Earth to the Moon (mini, for TV)
1999 Student Affairs (for TV); Beyond the Mat
2001 Eye See You; How to Eat Fried Worms

Publications

By HOWARD: articles—

Interview in Playboy (Chicago), May 1994.

Ron Howard is the rare Hollywood success story—a child star who became one of the film industry’s most successful and prolific directors. As little Ronny Howard, the sweet-faced redhead spent the better part of his childhood in front of the cameras playing easygoing fathers’ sons. In The Music Man, he made his musical debut singing “Gary, Indiana”; in Vincente Minelli’s The Courtship of Eddie’s Father, Howard starred as another sweet son of a widower opposite Glenn Ford.

After graduating from high school and attending the University of Southern California, Howard returned to acting in George Lucas’s milestone 1950s film, American Graffiti, playing Steve, the clean-cut, All-American boy about to leave for college. The film spawned the TV sitcom Happy Days, in which Howard played the lead role of the straight arrow, good-natured Richie Cunningham for six seasons. It was time put to good use as Howard learned everything he could about the business.

Howard directed his first film while still acting on Happy Days. Like so many first–time directors, Howard received an early break from the low-budget, independent film king Roger Corman. Howard’s Grand Theft Auto (1977) is rather unsophisticated car crash-filled action fare. His next film, however, made much more of an impression. Night Shift is a wacky but endearing comedy about two morgue attendants who double as pimps. The unlikely premise succeeded due as much to Howard’s brisk direction as to Michael Keaton’s effective acting in his screen debut.

Howard’s next film catapulted the young director to the Hollywood A-list. Splash, a romantic fantasy about a man and a mermaid starring Tom Hanks and Darryl Hannah, proved a hit with 1980s audiences, who welcomed Howard’s wholesome values. Howard brought the same feel-good ethos to 1985’s Cocoon, a sci-fi fantasy about senior citizens who discover the fountain of youth. The respect accorded Howard by the film community gave him the ability to attract some of Hollywood’s best veteran performers, such as Jessica Tandy, Don Ameche, Hume Cronyn, Wilford Brimley, and Maureen Stapleton, bringing the film a heavy dose of class. Although the film was a huge hit with audiences, some critics, such as Pauline Kael, felt that Howard “overwork[ed] his ecumenical niceness—his attempt to provide something for all age groups and all faiths.” But Hollywood and American audiences couldn’t get enough of Howard’s family values, and he followed up with Cocoon II as well as Willow, another lavish but far less successful fantasy.

In 1985 Howard joined forces with producer Brian Grazer to form Imagine Films Entertainment. Their company, with Howard as executive producer, oversaw such popular 1980s fare as Clean and Sober and The ‘Burbs. But whenever Howard took the helm as director, audiences came to expect comforting, sweet, and often humorous films such as Parenthood (1991).

In the early 1990s Howard began to expand his vision, bringing more ambitious fare to the screen—from the firefighting romance-adventure Backdraft (1992); to the Tom Cruise-Nicole Kidman Irish-American epic Far and Away (1992); to the comedy-drama about tabloid journalism, The Paper (1994). But Howard’s somewhat sentimental, all-American values continued to permeate his cinematic vision.

In 1995 Howard assembled an all-star cast led by Tom Hanks to take on his most challenging film to date. Apollo 13 depicts the near-disastrous lunar mission in April 1970. But the film is as much about the heroism of the men and women of NASA, and about America’s space program in general. Roger Ebert wrote, “Ron Howard’s film of this mission is directed with a single-mindedness and attention to detail that makes it riveting. . . . He knows he has a great story, and he tells it in a docudrama that feels like it was filmed on location in outer space.” Hailed by critics and audiences alike as one of the year’s best films, Apollo 13 earned Howard the Directors Guild Award for 1995.

Howard followed up his success on Apollo 13 with the rather mindless Mel Gibson adventure Ransom. But his next film, Inventing the Abbotts, brought Howard back to more familiar territory—the 1950s. This time the mature Howard delved beneath the happy veneer of small-town America. Blessed with what one critic called “the most beautiful cast in the world,” Howard examined repressed teenage angst and explored crises of sex, love, and identity at the intersection of rich and poor in Middle America. Though the fresh, crisp, and pretty feel of the film was very Howardesque, the themes ran deeper than many of his previous efforts.

The same held true of his 1999 comedy, Ed TV, a satire about late twentieth-century celebrity. Starring Matthew McConaughey and Jenna Elfman, Howard tried to use humor to skewer America’s obsession with fame. Though the picture was moderately well received, it demonstrated the increasing depth of Howard’s thematic interests.

Ron Howard once remarked that he became a director in order to avoid being typecast as an actor. He has also refused to be typecast as a director. Although all of his films are explorations of the human experience, he has ventured into many genres—science fiction, fantasy, epic adventure, romance, comedy, drama, satire—as well as into countless worlds. Ultimately, Howard sees himself and his directorial career as a work in progress. He has said, “One of the great things about being a director as life choice is that it can never be mastered. Every story is its own kind of expedition, with its own set of challenges.”

It would be impossible to guess what the future will hold for Howard, other than that he will undoubtedly continue to make films at the brisk pace of roughly one a year, and he will explore the human condition with the all-American values and respect for Hollywood tradition inculcated as a child playing all-American boys beloved by all-American audiences.

—Victoria Price

HUILLET, Danièle

See STRAUB, Jean-Marie, and Danièle HULLET

HUSTON, John

Films as Director:

1941 The Maltese Falcon (+ sc)
1942 In This Our Life (+ co-sc, uncredited); Across the Pacific (co-d)
1943 Report from the Aleutians (+ sc); Tunisian Victory (Capra and Bouling; d some replacement scenes when footage lost, + co-commentary)
1945 San Pietro (The Battle of San Pietro) (+ sc, co-ph, narration)
1946 Let There Be Light (unreleased) (+ co-sc, co-ph); A Miracle Can Happen (On Our Merry Way) (King Vidor and Fenton; d some Henry Fonda and James Stewart sequences, uncredited)
1948 The Treasure of the Sierra Madre (+ sc, bit role as man in white suit); Key Largo (+ co-sc)
1949 We Were Strangers (+ co-sc, bit role as bank clerk)
1950 The Asphalt Jungle (+ co-sc)
1951 The Red Badge of Courage (+ sc)
1952 The African Queen (+ sc)
1953 Moulin Rouge (+ pr, co-sc)
1954 Beat the Devil (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1956 Moby Dick (+ pr, co-sc)
1957 Heaven Knows, Mr. Allison (+ co-sc); A Farewell to Arms (Charles Vidor; d begun by Huston)
1958 The Barbarian and the Geisha; The Roots of Heaven
1960  The Unforgiven
1961  The Misfits
1963  Freud (Freud: The Secret Passion) (+ narration); The List of Adrian Messenger (+ bit role as Lord Ashton)
1964  The Night of the Iguana (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1965  La bibbia (The Bible) (+ role, narration)
1967  Casino Royale (co-d, role); Reflections in a Golden Eye (+ voice heard at film’s beginning)
1969  Sinful Davey; A Walk with Love and Death (+ role); De Sade (Enfield; d uncredited) (+ role as the Abbe)
1970  The Kremlin Letter (+ co-sc, role)
1971  The Last Run (Fleischer; d begun by Huston)
1972  Fat City (+ co-pr); The Life and Times of Judge Roy Bean (+ role as Grizzly Adams)
1973  The Mackintosh Man
1975  The Man Who Would Be King (+ co-sc)
1976  Independence (short)
1979  Shenzhen (+ role)
1980  Phobia
1981  Drive (Escape to Victory)
1982  Annie
1984  Under the Volcano
1985  Rizzi’s Honor
1987  The Dead

Other Films:

1929  The Shakedown (Wyler) (small role); Hell’s Heroes (Wyler) (small role)
1930  The Storm (Wyler) (small role)
1931  A House Divided (Wyler) (dialogue, sc)
1932  Murders in the Rue Morgue (Flory) (dialogue, sc)
1935  It Started in Paris (Robert Wyler) (co-adapt, sc); Death Drives Through (Cahn) (co-story, sc)
1938  Jezebel (Wyler) (co-sc); The Amazing Dr. Clitterhouse (Litvak) (co-sc)
1939  Juarez (Dieterle) (co-sc)
1940  The Story of Dr. Ehrlich’s Magic Bullet (Dr. Ehrlich’s Magic Bullet) (Dieterle) (co-sc)
1941  High Sierra (Walsh) (co-sc); Sergeant York (Hawks) (co-sc)
1946  The Killers (Siodmak) (sc, uncredited); The Stranger (Welles) (co-sc, uncredited); Three Strangers (Negulesco) (co-sc)
1951  Quo Vadis (LeRoy) (pre-production work)
1963  The Cardinal (Preminger) (role as Cardinal Glennon); The Directors (pre: Greenblatt, short) (appearance)
1968  Candy (Marquand) (role as Dr. Dunlap); The Rocky Road to Dublin (Lennon) (role as interviewee)
1970  Myra Breckenridge (Sarne) (role as Buck Loner)
1971  The Bridge in the Jungle (Kohner) (role as Sleigh); The Deserter (Kennedy) (role as General Miles); Man in the Wilderness (Sarafian) (role as Captain Henry)
1974  Battle for the Planet of the Apes (Thompson) (role as Lawgiver); Chinatown (Polanski) (role as Noah Cross)
1975  Breakout (Greis) (role as Harris); The Wind and the Lion (Milius) (role as John Hay)
1976  Sherlock Holmes in New York (Sagal) (role as Professor Moriarty)
1977  Tentacles (Hellman) (role as Ned Turner); Il grande attacco (La battaglia di Mareth; The Biggest Battle) (Lenzi) (role);

El triangolo diabolico de la Bermudas (Triangle: The Bermuda Mystery; The Mystery of the Bermuda Triangle) (Cardona) (role); Angela (Sagal) (role)

1978  Il visitatore (The Visitor) (Paradisi) (role)
1979  Jaguar Lives (Pintoff) (role); Winter Kills (Richert) (role)
1980  Head On (Grant) (role); Agee (Spears) (role as interviewee)
1981  To the Western World (Kinmonth) (narrator)
1982  Cannery Row (Ward) (narrator)
1983  Lovesick (Brickman) (role as psychiatrist)

Publications

By HUSTON: books—

Frankie and Johnny, New York, 1930.

By HUSTON: articles—

Interview with Karel Reisz, in Sight and Sound (London), January/March 1952.

“How I Make Films,” interview with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1965.

On HUSTON: books—

On HUSTON: articles—

Köningsberger, Hans, “From Book to Film—via John Huston,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Spring 1969.
“Huston Issue” of Film Comment (New York), May/June 1973.

Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 17, nos. 2 and 4, 1989.
Richards, Peter, “‘Huston’s Killer Comedy,’” in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1991.
Hagen, W.M., “‘Under Huston’s ‘Volcano,’” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 19, no. 3, 1991.

On HUSTON: films—

* * *

Few directors have been as interested in the relationship of film to painting as has John Huston and, perhaps, none has been given as little credit for this interest. This lack of recognition is not completely surprising. Criticism of film, despite the form’s visual nature, has tended to be derived primarily from literature and not from painting or, as might be more reasonable, a combination of the traditions of literature, painting, theater, and the unique forms of film itself.

In a 1931 profile in The American Mercury that accompanied a short story by John Huston, the future director said that he wanted to write a book on the lives of French painters. The following year, unable to or dissatisfied with work as a film writer in London, Huston moved to Paris to become a painter. He studied for a year and a half, making money by painting portraits on street corners and singing for pennies. Even after he became an established film director, Huston continued to indulge his interest in painting, “retracing” from filmmaking from time to time to concentrate on his painting.

Each of Huston’s films has reflected this prime interest in the image, the moving portrait, and the use of color—as well as the poetic possibilities of natural dialogue. Each film has been a moving canvas on which Huston explores his main subject: the effect of the individual ego on the group and the possibility of the individual’s survival.

Huston began exploring his style of framing in his first film, The Maltese Falcon. Following his sketches, he set up shots like the canvases of paintings he had studied. Specifically, Huston showed an interest in characters appearing in the foreground of a shot, with their faces often covering half the screen. Frequently, too, the person whose face half fills the screen is not talking, but listening. The person reacting thus becomes more important than the one speaking or moving.
Huston’s first film as a director presented situations he would return to again and again. Sam Spade is the obsessed professional, a man who will adhere to pride and dedication, to principle unto death. Women are a threat, temptations that can only sway the hero from his professional commitment. They may be willfully trying to deceive, as with Brigid and Iva, or they may, as in later Huston films, be the unwitting cause of the protagonist’s defeat or near-defeat. In The Asphalt Jungle, for example, the women in the film are not evil; it is the men’s obsession with them that causes disaster.

Even with changes and cuts, a film like The Red Badge of Courage reflects Huston’s thematic and visual interests. Again, the film features a group with a quest that may result in death. These soldiers argue, support each other, pretend they are not frightened, brag, and, in some cases, die. In the course of the action, both the youth and the audience discover that the taking of an isolated field is not as important as the ability of the young men to face death without fear. Also, as in other Huston films, the two central figures in The Red Badge of Courage, the youth and Wilson, lie about their attitudes. Their friendship solidifies only when both confess that they have been afraid during the battle and have fled.

Visually, Huston continued to explore an important aspect of his style: the placement of characters in a frame so that their size and position reflect what they are saying and doing. He developed this technique with Bogart, Holt, and Walter Huston in The Treasure of the Sierra Madre and Audie Murphy and Bill Mauldin in The Red Badge of Courage. Early in The African Queen, for instance, after Rosie’s brother dies, there is a scene in which Rosie is seated on the front porch of the mission. Charlie, in the foreground, dominates the screen while Rosie, in the background, is small. As Charlie takes control of the situation and tells Rosie what must be done, he raises his hand to the rail and his arm covers our view of her. Charlie is in command.

Thematically, Moulin Rouge was a return to Huston’s pessimism and exploration of futility. The director identified with the character of Lautrec who, like Huston, was given to late hours, ironic views of himself, performing for others, sardonic wit, and a frequent bitterness toward women. Lautrec, like Huston, loved horses, and frequently painted pictures of them.

The narrative as developed by Huston and Ray Bradbury in Moby Dick is in keeping with the director’s preoccupation with failed quests. Only one man, Ishmael, survives. All the other men of the Pequod go down in Ahab’s futile attempt to destroy the whale. But Huston sees Ahab in his actions and his final gesture as a noble creature who has chosen to go down fighting.

The Roots of Heaven is yet another example of Huston’s exploration of an apparently doomed quest by a group of vastly different people, led by a man obsessed. In spite of the odds, the group persists in its mission and some of its members die. As in many Huston films, the quest is not a total failure; there is the likelihood of continuation, if not success, but the price that must be paid in human lives is high.

Huston’s The Misfits again featured a group on a sad and fruitless quest. The group, on a search for horses, find far fewer than they had expected. The expedition becomes a bust and the trio of friends are at odds over a woman, Roslyn (Marilyn Monroe), who opposes the killing and capturing of the horses.

With the exception of Guido, the characters represent the least masked or disguised group in Huston’s films. Perhaps it is this very element of never-penetrated disguise in Guido that upset Huston and drove him to push for a motivation scene, an emotional unmasking of the character.

As a Huston film, Freud has some particular interests: Huston serves as a narrator, displaying an omnipotence and almost Biblical detachment that establishes Freud as a kind of savior and messiah. The film opens with Huston’s description of Freud as a kind of hero or God on a quest for mankind. ‘‘This is the story of Freud’s descent into a region as black as hell, man’s unconscious, and how he let in the light,’’ Huston says in his narration. The bearded, thin look of Freud, who stands alone, denounced before the tribunal of his own people, also suggests a parallel with Christ. Freud brings a message of salvation which is rejected, and he is reluctantly denounced by his chief defender, Breuer.

Of all Huston’s films, The List of Adrian Messenger is the one that deals most literally with people in disguise. George, who describes himself as unexcused evil, hides behind a romantic or heroic mask that falls away when he is forced to face the detective, who functions very much like Freud. The detective penetrates the masks, revealing the evil, and the evil is destroyed.

Huston’s touch was evident in The Night of the Iguana in a variety of ways. First, he again took a group of losers and put them together in an isolated location. The protagonist, Shannon, once a minister, has been reduced to guiding tourists in Mexico. At the furthest reaches of despair and far from civilization, the quest for meaning ends and the protagonist is forced to face himself. Religion is an important theme. The film opens with Richard Burton preaching a sermon to his congregation. It is a startling contrast to Father Mapple’s sermon in Moby Dick. Shannon is lost, confused, his speech is gibberish, an almost nonsensical confession about being unable to control his appetites and emotions. The congregation turns away from him.

This choice between the practical and the fantastic is a constant theme in Huston’s life and films. There is also a choice between illusion and reality, a choice Huston finds difficult to make. Religion is seen as part of the fantasy world, a dangerous fantasy that his characters must overcome if they are not to be destroyed or absorbed by it. This theme is present in The Bible, Wise Blood, and Night of the Iguana. Huston’s negative religious attitude is also strong in A Walk with Love and Death, which includes three encounters with the clergy. In the first, Heron is almost killed by a group of ascetic monks who demand that he renounce the memory of Claudia and ‘‘repent his knowledge of women.’’ The young man barely escapes with his life. These religious zealots counsel a move away from the pleasure of the world and human love, a world that Huston believes in.

There are clearly constants in Huston’s works—man’s ability to find solace in animals and nature, the need to challenge oneself—but his world is unpredictable, governed by a whimsical God or no God at all. Each of Huston’s characters seeks a way of coming to terms with that unpredictability, establishing rules of behavior by which he can live.

The Huston character, like Cain or Adam, is often weak, and frequently his best intentions are not sufficient to carry him through to success or even survival. The more a man thinks in a Huston film, the more dangerous it is for his survival. Conversely, however, his films suggest that those who are carried away by emotion, or too much introspection, are doomed. Since the line between loss of control and rigidity is difficult to walk, many Huston protagonists do not survive. It takes a Sam Spade, Sergeant Allison, or Abraham, very rare men indeed, to remain alive in this director’s world.

Reflections in a Golden Eye raised many questions about the sexuality inherent in many of the themes that most attracted Huston: riding horses, hunting, boxing, and militarism. The honesty with which the director handles homosexuality is characteristic of his willingness to face what he finds antithetical to his own nature. In the film, the equation of Leonora and her horse is presented as definitely sexual, and at one point Penderton actually beats the horse in a fury because he himself is impotent. Huston also includes a boxing match in the film which is not in the novel. The immorally provocative Leonora watches the match, but Penderton watches another spectator, Williams. Reflections becomes an almost comic labyrinth of voyeurism, with characters spying on other characters.

Huston’s protagonists often represent extremes. They are either ignorant, pathetic, and doomed by their lack of self-understanding (Tully and Ernie in Fat City, Dobbs in The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, Peachy and Danny in The Man Who Would Be King) or intelligent, arrogant, but equally doomed by their lack of self-understanding (Penderton in Reflections in a Golden Eye and Ahab in Moby Dick). Between these extremes is the cool, intelligent protagonist who will sacrifice everything for self-understanding and independence (Sam Spade in The Maltese Falcon, and Freud). Huston always finds the first group pathetic, the second tragic, and the third heroic. He reserves his greatest respect for the man who retains his dignity in spite of pain and disaster.

Many of Huston’s films can be divided between those involving group quests that fail and those involving a pair of potential lovers who must face a hostile world. Generally, Huston’s films about such lovers end in the union of the couple or, at least, their survival. In that sense, A Walk with Love and Death, starring his own daughter, proved to be the most pessimistic of his love stories, and Annie, his most commercial venture, proved to be his most optimistic.

—Stuart M. Kaminsky
ICHIKAWA, Kon

Nationality: Japanese. Born: Uji Yamada in Ise, Mie Prefecture, 20 November 1915. Education: Ichioka Commercial School, Osaka. Career: Worked in animation dept. of J.O. Studios, Kyoto, from 1933; assistant director on feature-filmmaking staff, late 1930s; transferred to Tokyo when J.O. became part of Toho company, early 1940s; collaborated on scripts with wife, 1948–56; used pen name “Shitei Kuri” (after J.O. became part of Toho company, early 1940s; collaborated on feature-filmmaking staff, late 1930s; transferred to Tokyo when animation dept. of J.O. Studios, Kyoto, from 1933; assistant director for TV, 1958–66. Awards: San Giorgio Prize, Venice Festival, for director for TV, 1958–66.

Films as Director:

1946 Musume Dojoji (A Girl at Dojo Temple) (+ co-sc)
1947 Toho senichi-ya (1001 Nights with Toho) (responsible for some footage only)
1948 Hana hiraku (A Flower Blooms); Sanbyaku rokujugo-ya (365 Nights)
1949 Ningen moyo (Human Patterns; Design of a Human Being); Hateshinaki jonetsu (Passion without End; The Endless Passion)
1950 Ginza Sanshiro (Sanshiro of Ginza); Netsudeichi (Heat and Mud; The Hot Marshland) (+ co-sc); Akatsuki no tsuiseki (Pursuit at Dawn)
1951 Ierashan (Nightshade Flower) (+ co-sc); Koibito (The Lover) (+ co-sc); Mukokuseki-sha (The Man without a Nationality); Nusumaretoko (Stolen Love) (+ co-sc); Bungawan Solo (River Solo Flows) (+ co-sc); Kekkon koshinkyoku (Wedding March) (+ co-sc)
1952 Rakkii-san (Mr. Lucky); Wakai hito (Young People; Young Generation) (+ co-sc); Ashi ni sawatta onna (The Woman Who Touched Legs) (+ co-sc); Ano te kono te (This Way, That Way) (+ co-sc)
1953 Puu-san (Mr. Pu) (+ co-sc); Aoiro kakumei (The Blue Revolution); Seishun Zenigata Heiji (The Youth of Heiji Zenigata) (+ co-sc); Ai-jin (The Lover)
1954 Watashi no subete o (All of Myself) (+ co-sc); Okuman choja (A Billionaire) (+ co-sc); Josei ni kansuru juni-sho (Twelve Chapters on Women)
1955 Seishun kaidan (Ghost Story of Youth); Kokoro (The Heart)
1956 Biruma no tategoto (The Burmese Harp; Harp of Burma); Shokei no heya (Punishment Room); Nihonbashi (Bridge of Japan)
1957 Manin densha (The Crowded Streetcar) (+ co-sc); Tohoku no zummu-tachi (The Men of Tohoku) (+ sc); Ana (The Pit; The Hole) (+ sc)
1958 Enjo (Conflagration)
1959 Sayonara, konnichiwa (Goodbye, Hello) (+ co-sc); Kagi (The Key; Odd Obsession) (+ co-sc); Nobi (Fires on the Plain); Yokyo II: Mono o takaku uritsukeru onna (A Woman’s Testament, Part 2: Women Who Sell Things at High Prices)
1960 Bonchi (+ co-sc); Ototo (Her Brother)
1961 Kurojumun no onna (Ten Dark Women)
1962 Hakai (The Outcast; The Broken Commandment); Watashi wa nisai (I Am Two; Being Two Isn’t Easy)
1963 Yukinojo henge (An Actor’s Revenge; The Revenge of Yukinojo); Taiheiyo hitoribotchi (My Enemy, the Sea; Alone on the Pacific)
1964 Zeni no odorii (The Money Dance; Money Talk) (+ sc)
1965 Tokyo Orimpikku (Tokyo Olympiad) (+ co-sc)
1967 Toppo Jiijo no botan senso (Toppo Gigio and the Missile War) (+ co-sc)
1969 Kyoto (+ sc)
1970 Nihon to Nihonjin (Japan and the Japanese) (+ sc)
1972 Ai futatabi (To Love Again)
1973 Matatabi (The Wanderers) (+ pr, co-sc); “The Fastest” episode of Visions of Eight
1975 Wagahai wa neko de aru (I Am a Cat)
1976 Tsuma to onna no aida (Between Women and Wives) (co-d);
Inugami-ke no ichizoku (The Inugami Family) (+ co-sc)
1977 Akuma no temari-uta (A Rhyme of Vengeance; The Devil’s Bouncing Ball Song) (+ sc);
Gokumonto (The Devil’s Island; Island of Horrors) (+ co-sc)
1978 Jo-bachi (Queen Bee) (+ co-sc)
1980 Koto (Ancient City) (+ co-sc); Hi no tori (The Phoenix) (+ co-sc)
1982 Kofuku (Lonely Hearts, Happiness) (+ co-sc)
1983 Sasame Yuki (The Makioka sisters; Fine Snow)
1985 Ohan; Biruma no tategoto (The Burmese Harp)
1987 Eiga Joyu (The Actress); Taketori Monogatari (Princess from the Moon)
1991 Tenkawa Densetsu Satsujin Jiken
1993 Fusa (+ sc)
1994 47 Ronin
1996 Yatsuhaka-mura (The 8-Tomb Village) (+ sc)
1999 Dora-hetta

Other Film:
1970 Dodes’ka-den (Kurosawa) (pr)

Publications

By ICHIKAWA: books—
Seijocho 271 Banchi, with Natto Wada, Tokyo, 1961.
Kon, with Shuntaro Tanikawa, Kyoto, 1999.

By ICHIKAWA: articles—
“Kon Ichikawa at the Olympic Games,” an interview in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), November 1972.

On ICHIKAWA: books—
Soumi, Angelo, Kon Ichikawa, Florence, 1975.

On ICHIKAWA: articles—
Oliva, Ljubomir, in Film a Doba (Prague), December 1985.

* * *

Kon Ichikawa is noted for a wry humor that often resembles black comedy, for his grim psychological studies—often of misfits and outsiders—and for the visual beauty of his films. He is noted as one of Japan’s foremost cinematic stylists, and has commented, “I began as a painter and I think like one.”

His early films show a perverse sense of humor as they reveal human foibles and present an objective view of corruption. In Mr. Pu, a projector breaks down while showing scenes of an atomic explosion. In A Billionaire, a family dies from eating radioactive tuna, leaving only a lazy elder son and a sympathetic tax collector. In The Key, a group of rather selfish, despicable people are poisoned inadvertently by a senile old maid, who becomes the only survivor. The film is a study of an old man who becomes obsessed with sex to compensate for his fears of impotency. He becomes a voyeur, and through the manipulation of the camera, we come to share in this activity. Slowly, however, he emerges as being sympathetic while the other characters are revealed in their true light.

Throughout his career Ichikawa has proven himself a consistent critic of Japanese society, treating such themes as the rebirth of militarism (Mr. Pu), the harshness and inhumanity of military feudalism (Fires on the Plain), the abuse of the individual within the family (Bonchi and Her Brother), as well as familial claustrophobia and the tendency of repression to result in perversion and outbreaks of violence (The Key). His films usually refuse a happy ending, and Ichikawa has been frequently criticized for an unabashed pessimism, bordering on nihilism.

Two of his most important films, Harp of Burma and Fires on the Plain, deal with the tragedies of war. The former concerns a soldier who adopts Buddhist robes and dedicates himself to burying the countless Japanese dead on Burma; the latter is about a group of demoralized soldiers who turn to cannibalism. A third work, Tokyo Olympiad, provided a new approach to sports films, giving as much attention to human emotions and spectator reactions as to athletic feats. Ichikawa is a master of the wide screen and possesses a strong sense of composition, creating enormous depth with his use of diagonal and overhead shots. Often he utilizes black backgrounds to isolate images within the frame, or a form of theatrical lighting, or he blocks out portions of the screen to alter the format and ratio.

Ichikawa remains fascinated with experimental techniques. His excellent use of the freeze frame in Kagi reflects his case study approach to characterization. He has also done much in the way of color experimentation. Kagi is bathed in blues, which bleach skin tones to white, thus creating corpse-like subjects. Her Brother is so filtered that it resembles a black and white print with dull pinks and reds. On most of his films, Ichikawa has used cameramen Kazuo Miyagawa or Setsuo Kobayashi.

After Tokyo Olympiad Ichikawa encountered many studio difficulties. His projects since then include a twenty-six-part serialization of The Tale of Genji and The Wanderers, a parody of gangster films with a nod to Easy Rider, plus a dozen documentaries and fiction features, among which The Inugami Family, a suspense thriller, proved to be the biggest box office success in Japanese film history.

—Patricia Erens

IMAI, Tadashi

Films as Director:

1939 Numazu Hei-gakko (Numazu Military Academy); Waga kyokan (Our Teacher)
1940 Tajiko mura (The Village of Tajiko); Onna no machi (Women's Town); Kakka (Your Highness)
1943 Kekkon no seita (Married Life)
1945 Borono kesshita (The Suicide Troops of the Watch Tower; The Death Command of the Tower)
1944 Ikari no umi (Angry Sea)
1945 Ai to chikai (Love and Pledge)
1946 Minshu no teki (An Enemy of the People; The People's Enemy); Jinsei tonbo-gaeri (Life Is like a Somersault)
1947 Chikagai nijuyo-jikan (The Village of Tajiko); Kiku to Isamu (A Woman's Face)
1949 Aoi sanmyaku (Green Mountains) parts I and II; Onna no kao (A Woman's Face)
1951 Mata au hi made (Until We Meet Again)
1951 Dokkoi ikiteiru (Still We Live)
1952 Yamabiko gakko (School of Echoes)
1953 Himeyuri no to (The Tower of Lilies; Himeyuri Lily Tower); Nigori-e (Muddy Water)
1955 Asureba koso (Because I Love), episode; Koko ni izumi ari (Here Is a Fountain); Yukiko
1956 Mahiru no ankoku (Darkness at Noon)
1957 Kome (Rice); Junai monogatari (The Story of Pure Love)
1958 Yora no tsuzumi (The Adulteress; Night Drum); Kika to Isamu (Kika and Isamu)
1960 Shtroi gake (The Cliff, White Cliff)
1961 Are ga minato no hikari da (That Is the Port Light)
1962 Nippon no obachan (Japanese Grandmothers; The Old Women of Japan)
1963 Bushido zankoku monogatari (Bushido: Samurai Saga; The Cruel Story of the Samurai's Way)
1964 Echigo tsutsuishi oyashirazu (Death in the Snow); Adauchi (Revenge)
1967 Sato-gashi ga kazureru toki (When the Cookie Crumbles)
1968 Fushin no toki (The Time of Reckoning)
1969 Hashi no nai kawa (River without Bridges)
1970 Hashi no nai kawa (River without Bridges) Part II
1971 En to ia onna (A Woman Named En)
1972 Aa koe naki tomo (Ah! My Friends without Voice); Kaigun tokubetsu shonen hei (Special Boy Soldiers of the Navy)
1974 Kobayashiti Kajiki (The Life of a Communist Writer)
1976 Ani imoto (Mon and Ino; Older Brother and Younger Sister); Yoba (The Old Woman Ghost)
1982 Himeyuri no to (Himeyuri Lily Tower) (remake)
1991 Senso to Seishun (War and Youth)

Publications

On IMAI: books—

On IMAI: articles—

Obituary, in EPD Film (Frankfurt), January 1992.

* * *

After displaying early Marxist commitment, Tadashi Imai was forced to give up politics under Japan's World War II military regime. Because of the regime's ideological restriction, Imai's first works were so-called "war-collaboration" films. Some of them are nevertheless valued for Western-style action sequence technique (for example, The Death Command of the Tower) and for the successful depiction of the personality of an army officer (Our Teacher).

Imai's postwar return to Marxism surprised his audience. As early as 1946, he made a film that severely attacked corruption among the wartime rulers, and he preached on behalf of postwar democracy in The People's Enemy. Imai's real fame came with his record-breaking commercial success, Green Mountains, which became legendary for its reflection of the almost revolutionary excitement of the postwar. period. The film depicts, in a light, humorous style, the struggle at a small town high school against the established institutions and values.

Until We Meet Again became another legendary film for its romantic, lyrical treatment of tragic wartime love. In particular, the scene of the young lovers kissing through the window glass became famous. The Red Purge at the time of the Korean War drove Imai out of the organized film industry. He then became one of the most active filmmakers, initiating the postwar leftist independent film production movement.

His successive films fall into two main categories—films analyzing social injustice and oppression from the communist point of view, and meticulously made literary adaptations. The films of the first category outnumber the second. Imai was much influenced by Italian neorealism in his themes and semi-documentary method based on location shooting. The hardship and tribulations of the proletariat are depicted in Still We Live (about day-laborers), Rice (concerning farmers), and That Is the Port Light (about fishermen and problems between Japan and Korea). Social problems are treated in School of Echoes (concerning the progressive education movement in a poor mountain village), Kiku and Isamu, which deals with Japanese-black mixed-blood children, Japanese Grandmother (on the aged), and River without Bridges I and II, about discrimination against the outcast class. The mistaken verdict in a murder case is the subject of Darkness at Noon, which condemns the police and the public prosecutor. Himeyuri Lily Tower, another commercial hit, depicts tragic fighting on Okinawa toward the end of the war, showing the cruelty of both the Japanese and the American forces. Night Drum, The Cruel Story of the Samurai’s Way, Revenge, and A Woman Named En focus on feudalism and its oppression from the viewpoint of its victims.

These films all embody an explicit and rather crude leftist point-of-view. However, Imai’s talent at entertaining the audience with deft storytelling and comfortable pacing attracted popular and critical support for his work. Imai is especially skillful in powerful appeals to the audience’s sentimentalism. His distinctive lyrical and humanistic style is valued and helps us to differentiate Imai from other more dogmatic leftist directors.

Imai is also appreciated for his depiction of details. This trait helped make his literary adaptations (e.g., Muddy Water) so successful that every ambitious actress was said to want to appear in Imai’s films to obtain prizes. His collaboration with the excellent scenario writer, Yoko Mizuki, is indispensable to Imai’s success.

Imai’s unchanged formula of the poor being oppressed by the authorities became increasingly out-of-date through the 1960s and 1970s. However, his lyricism still proved to be attractive in more recent works, such as Older Brother and Younger Sister.

—Kyoko Hirano

IMAMURA, Shohei

Films as Director:

1958 Nusumareta yokuj (Stolen Desire); Nishi Ginza eki mae (Lights of Night; Nishi Ginza Station) (+ co-sc); Hateshinaki yokubo (Endless Desire) (+ co-sc)
1959 Nianchan (My Second Brother; The Diary of Sueko) (+ co-sc)
1961 Bata to gunkan (The Flesh Is Hot; Hogs and Warships) (+ co-sc)
1963 Nippon konchuki (The Insect Woman) (+ co-sc)
1964 Akai satsui (Unholy Desire; Intentions of Murder) (+ co-sc)
1966 Jinruigaku nyumon (The Pornographers: Introduction to Anthropology) (+ co-sc, pr)
1967 Ningen johatsu (A Man Vanishes) (+ sc, role, pr)
1968 Kamigami no fuku (The Profound Desire of the Gods; Kuragejima: Tales from a Southern Island) (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1970 Nippon sengoshi: Madamu Omboro no seikatsu (History of Postwar Japan as Told by a Bar Hostess) (+ co-pr, planning, role as interviewee)
1975 Karayuki-san (Karyaki-san, the Making of a prostitute) (for TV) (+ co-pr, planning)
1979 Fukushu suru wa ni ari (Vengeance Is Mine)
1980 Eijanaika (Why Not?) (+ co-sc)
1983 Narayama bushi-ko (The Ballad of Narayama)
1987 Zegen (The Pimp)
1988 Kuroi Ame (Black Rain)
1997 Unagi (The Eel) (+ co-sc)
1998 Kanzo Sensei (Dr. Akagi) (+ co-sc)

Other Films:

1951 Bakushu (Early Summer) (Ozu) (asst d)
1952 Ochazuke no aji (The Flavor of Green Tea over Rice) (Ozu) (asst d)
1953 Tokyo monogatari (Tokyo Story) (Ozu) (asst d)
1954 Kuroi ushio (Black Tide) (Yamamura) (asst d)
1955 Tsukiwa noroboru (Moonrise) (Tanaka) (asst d)
1956 Fusen (The Balloon) (Kawashima) (co-sc)
1958 Bakumatsu Taiyoden (Son of a Samurai; The Young Samurai) (Wakasugi) (co-sc)
1962 Kyupora no aru machi (Cupola Where the Furnaces Glow) (Urayama) (sc)
1963 Samurai no ko (Son of a Samurai; The Young Samurai) (Wakasugi) (co-sc)
1964 Keirin shonin gyokai (Nishimira) (co-sc)
1967 Neon taiheiki-keieigaku nyumon (Neon Jungle) (Isomi) (co-sc)
1968 Higashi Shiniku (East China Sea) (Isomi) (story, co-sc)
Publications

By IMAMURA: book—

Sayonara dake ga jinsei-da [Life Is Only Goodbye: Biography of Director Yuzo Kawashima], Tokyo, 1969.

By IMAMURA: articles—

Interview with S. Hoass, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September/October 1981.

Interview with Yann Tobin and Hubert Niogret, in Positif (Paris), October 1997.

On IMAMURA: books—

Imamura Shohei no eiga [The Films of Shohei Imamura], Tokyo, 1971.

Sugiyama, Heiichi, Sekai no eiga sakka 8: Imamura Shohei [Film Directors of the World 8: Shohei Imamura], Tokyo, 1975.

On IMAMURA: articles—

Kehr, Dave, “The Last Rising Sun,” in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1983.
“Imamura Section” of Positif (Paris), May 1985.

* * *

Outrageous, insightful, sensuous, and great fun to watch, the films of Shohei Imamura are among the greatest glories of postwar Japanese cinema, yet Imamura remains largely unknown outside of Japan. Part of the reason, to be sure, lies in the fact that Imamura has until recently worked for small studios such as Nikkatsu or on his own independently financed productions. But it may also be because Imamura’s films fly so furiously in the face of what most Westerners have come to expect of Japanese films.

After some amateur experience as a theater actor and director, Imamura joined Shochiku Studios in 1951 as an assistant director, where he worked under, among others, Yasujiro Ozu. His first important work, My Second Brother, an uncharacteristically gentle tale set among Korean orphans living in postwar Japan, earned him third place in the annual Kinema Junpo “Best Japanese Film of the Year” poll, and from then on Imamura’s place within the Japanese industry was established. Between 1970 and 1978, Imamura “retired” from feature filmmaking, concentrating his efforts instead on a series of remarkable television documentaries that explored little-known sides of postwar Japan. In 1978, Imamura returned to features with his greatest commercial and critical success, Vengeance Is Mine, a complex, absorbing study of a cold-blooded killer. In 1983, his film The Ballad of Narayama was awarded the Gold Palm at the Cannes Film Festival, symbolizing Imamura’s belated discovery by the international film community.

Imamura has stated that he likes to make “messy films,” and it is the explosive, at times anarchic quality of his work that makes him appear “uncharacteristically Japanese” when seen in the context of Ozu, Mizoguchi, or Kurosawa. Perhaps no other filmmaker anywhere has taken up Jean-Luc Godard’s challenge to end the distinction between “documentary” and “fiction” films. In preparation for filming, Imamura will conduct exhaustive research on the people whose story he will tell, holding long interviews to extract information and to become familiar with different regional vocabularies and accents (many of his films are set in remote regions of Japan). Insisting always on location shooting and direct sound, Imamura has been referred to as the “cultural anthropologist” of the Japanese cinema. Even the titles of some of his films—The Pornographers: Introduction to Anthropology and The Insect Woman (whose Japanese title literally translates to “Chronicle of a Japanese Insect”)—seem to reinforce the “scientific” spirit of these works. Yet, if anything, Imamura’s films argue against an overly clinical approach to understanding Japan, as they often celebrate the irrational and instinctual aspects of Japanese culture.

Strong female protagonists are usually at the center of Imamura’s films, yet it would be difficult to read these films as “women’s films” in the way that critics describe works by Mizoguchi or Naruse. Rather, women in Imamura’s films are always the ones more directly linked to “ur-Japan,”—a kind of primordial fantasy of Japan not only preceding “westernization” but before any contact with the outside world. In The Profound Desire of the Gods, a brother and sister on a small southern island fall in love and unconsciously attempt to recreate the myth of Izanagi and Izanami, sibling gods whose union founded the Japanese race. Incest, a subject which might usually be seen as shocking, is treated as a perfectly natural expression, becoming a crime only due to the influence of “westernized” Japanese who have come to civilize the island. Imamura’s characters indulge freely and frequently in sexual activity, and sexual relations tend to act as a kind of barometer for larger, unseen social forces. The lurid, erotic spectacles in Eijanaika, for example, are the clearest indication of growing frustrations that finally explode in massive riots in the film’s conclusion.

—Richard Peña

---

INGRAM, Rex

_Nationality: _Irish/American. _Born:_ Reginald Ingram Montgomery Hitchcock in Dublin, 15 January 1893. _Education:_ Saint Columbus’s College, Dublin; studied sculpture at Yale, 1911. _Military Service:_ Served in Canadian Air Force (wounded in action), 1918. _Family:_ Married 1) actress Doris Pawn, 1917 (divorced 1920); 2) Alice Terry, 1921. _Career:_ Immigrated to United States, 1911; actor in England, 1912; assistant for Edison Co., New York, also scenario writer for Stuart Blackton and screen actor, 1913; moved to Vitagraph, 1914; hired by Fox, changed name to Rex Ingram, 1915; director for Universal, 1916; contracted by Paralta-W.W. Hodkinson Corp., 1918; joined Metro Pictures, 1920; moved to France, 1923; modernized Studios de la Victorine de Saint-Augustin, Nice, 1924; established Ingram Hamilton Syndicated Ltd. production company, London, 1928; moved to Egypt, 1934; returned to Hollywood, 1936. _Awards:_ Honorary degree, Yale University; Légion d’honneur française. _Died:_ In California, 1950.
Films as Director:

1916  The Great Problem (Truth) (+ sc); Broken Fetters (A Human Pawn) (+ sc); Chalice of Sorrow (The Fatal Promise) (+ sc); Black Orchids (The Fatal Orchids) (+ sc)
1917  The Reward of the Faithless (The Ruling Passion) (+ sc); The Pulse of Life (+ sc); The Flower of Doom (+ sc); Little Terror (+ sc)
1918  His Robe of Honor; Humdrum Brown
1919  The Day She Paid
1920  Under Crimson Skies (The Beach Comber); Shore Acres; Hearts Are Trumps
1921  The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse (+ pr); The Conquering Power (Eugenie Grandet); Turn to the Right
1922  The Prisoner of Zenda; Trifling Women (+ sc) (remake of Black Orchids); Where the Pavement Ends (+ sc)
1923  Scaramouche (+ pr)
1924  The Arab (L’Arabe) (+ sc)
1925  Mare Nostrum (+ co-pr)
1926  The Magician (+ co-pr, sc)
1927  The Garden of Allah

1929  The Three Passions (Les Trois Passions) (+ sc)
1931  Baroud (Love in Morocco; Passion in the Desert) (+ pr, co-sc)

Other Films:

1913  Hard Cash (Reid) (role, sc); The Family’s Honor (Ridgely) (sc); Beau Brummel (Young) (role); The Artist’s Great Madonna (Young) (role); A Tudor Princess (Dawley) (role)
1914  Witness to the Will (Lessey) (role); The Necklace of Ramses (Brabin) (role); The Price of the Necklace (Brabin) (role); The Borrowed Finery (role); Her Great Scoop (Costello and Gaillord) (role); The Spirit and the Clay (Lambart) (role); The Southerners (Ridgely and Collins) (role); Eve’s Daughter (North) (role); The Crime of Cain (Marston) (role); The Circus and the Boy (Johnson) (role); David Garrick (Young) (role); The Upper Hand (Humphrey) (role); Fine Feathers Make Fine Birds (Humphrey) (role); His Wedded Wife (Humphrey) (role); Goodbye, Summer (Brooke) (role); The Moonshine Maid and the Man (Gaskill) (role)
1915

Should a Mother Tell? (Edwards) (sc); The Song of Hate (Edwards) (sc, role); The Wonderful Adventure (Thompson) (sc); The Blindness of Devotion (Edwards) (sc); A Woman’s Past (Powell) (sc); The Galley Slave (Edwards) (co-sc, uncredited); The Evil Men Do (Costello and Gaillard) (role); Snatched from a Burning Death (Gaskill) (role)

1916

The Cup of Bitterness (sc)

1923

Mary of the Movies (McDermot) (role as a guest)

1925

Greed (von Stroheim) (co-ed 2nd cut)

Publications

By INGRAM: articles—

Interview with L. Montanye, in Motion Picture Classic (Brooklyn), July 1921.

Interview with J. Robinson, in Photoplay (New York), August 1921.

Article in Motion Picture Directing, by Peter Milne, New York, 1922.

On INGRAM: books—

On INGRAM: articles—

O’Leary, Liam, “Rex Ingram,” in Film Dope (London), July 1983.

On INGRAM: film—

* * *

Rex Ingram’s work has tended to be overlooked and forgotten as a result of his retirement from films in the early 1930s, an era when sound had taken over the world of cinema. He began his career in films in 1913, working as designer, scriptwriter, and actor for Edison, Vitagraph, and Fox. In 1916 he directed his own story, The Great Problem, for Universal at the age of only twenty-three. His educational background was that of an Irish country rectory and the Yale School of Fine Arts, where he studied sculpture under Lee Lawrie and developed an aesthetic sense which informed all his films.

The early films Ingram made for Universal have disappeared. His version of La Tosca, transferred to a Mexican setting as Chalice of Sorrow, and a 1922 remake of Black Orchids titled Trifling Women, earned critical attention for the quality of the acting and their visual beauty. Cleo Madison starred in both these films. The fragment that exists of The Reward of the Faithless shows a realism that is reminiscent of von Stroheim, who was later to acknowledge his indebtedness by allowing Ingram to do the second cutting on Greed. It may be noted also that greed was the theme of The Conquering Power. A characteristic element of Ingram’s work was the use of grotesque figures like dwarfs and hunchbacks to offset the glamour of his heroes. After a period of ups and downs, he made another film for Universal in 1920, Under Crimson Skies, which won critical acclaim.

With the release of The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse in 1921 Ingram achieved top status in his profession. Ordinarily, Valentino dominates discussion of this film, but Ingram’s work on the feature is of the highest quality. Armed with his team of cameraman John Seitz and editor Grant Whytock, Ingram went on to make a dazzlingly successful series of films for Metro. His financial and artistic success gave him carte blanche and his name became a box-office draw. The Conquering Power, The Prisoner of Zenda, and Scaramouche featured his wife, the beautiful and talented Alice Terry, and the latter two films introduced a new star, Ramon Novarro, who also played with Alice Terry in the South Seas romance Where the Pavement Ends. Ingram made stars and knew how to get the best out of players. He came to be considered the equal of Griffith, von Stroheim, and DeMille.

In 1924 the formation of Metro-Goldwyn-Mayer saw a tightening up of front office control over the creative director and Ingram sought fresh fields to conquer. He made The Arab with Terry and Novarro in North Africa, a region that he fell in love with. He next moved to Nice, where he founded the Rex Ingram Studios and released his masterpiece Mare Nostrum in 1926 for “Metro-Goldwyn.” (He would never allow his arch-enemy Louis B. Mayer to have a credit.) In this work Alice Terry gave her best performance as the Mata Hari-like heroine. This film as well as The Four Horsemen, both of which were authored by Blasco Ibañez, were later suppressed because of its anti-German sentiments.

The German-inspired The Magician featured Paul Wegener (the original Golem) and was based on a Somerset Maugham story. After The Garden of Allah Ingram broke with MGM in 1926. The Three Passions, with an industrial background, followed in 1929. His last film, Baroud, a sound film in which he himself played the lead, completed a distinguished career.

Ingram sold his studios in Nice, where he had reigned as an uncrowned king; as the Victorine Studios they were to become an important element in French film production. Ingram retired to North Africa and later rejoined his wife Alice Terry in Hollywood. He indulged his hobbies of sculpture, writing, and travel.

Ingram was the supreme pictorialist of the screen, a great director of actors, a perfectionist whose influence was felt not least in the films of David Lean and Michael Powell. The themes of his films ranged over many locations but his careful research gave them a realism and authenticity that balanced the essential romanticism of his work.

—Liam O’Leary
IOSELIANI, Otar

Films as Director:

1958 Akvarel (Watercolor) (short, for TV)
1959 Sapovnela (The Song about Flowers) (short)
1961 April (Stories about Things) (not released) (+ sc)
1964 Tuzi (Cast-Iron) (+ sc) (short)
1966 Listopad (When Leaves Fall; Falling Leaves)
1969 Starinnaja grajinskaja pesnja (Old Georgian Song (short)
1972 Zil pevcij Drozd (There Was a Singing Blackbird; There Lived a Thrush) (+ co-sc)
1976 Pastoral (The Summer in the Country) (+ co-sc)
1982 Sept pieces pour cinema noir et blanc (Seven Pieces for Black and White Cinema)
1984 Les Favoris de la Lune
1988 Un petit monastère en Toscane (A Little Monastery in Tuscany)
1989 Et la lumière fut (And Then There Was Light)
1992 La Chasse aux papillons (Chasing Butterflies) (+ sc, ed)
1994 Seule, Georjia
1996 Brigands, chapitre VII (+ sc, ed)
1997 Adieu, plancher des vaches! (Farewell, Home Sweet Home) (+ sc, ed, ro as Father)

Publications

By IOSELIANI: articles—

Interview with G. Kopanevová, in Film a Doba (Prague), May 1974.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), May 1978.
Interview with A. Gerber, in Film a Doba (Prague), February 1981.
Interview with Serge Toubiana and Alain Bergala, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), February 1985.
Interview with Michel Ciment, in Positif (Paris), November 1992.
Interview with Jacques Kermabon and Marcel Jean, in 24 Images (Montreal), Summer 1993.
Interview with Iskra Bočinova, in Kino (Sophia), no. 1, 1996.

On IOSELIANI: articles—

“Il était une fois un merle chanteur de O. Iosseliani,” in Revue Belge du Cinéma (Brussels), vol. 13, no. 1–2, 1975/76.
Fell, H., “Wenn alles gut geht,” in EPD Film (Frankfurt), June 1990.
Bogomolov, Ju., and others, “U vremeni v gostjah?” in Iskusstvo Kino (Moscow), April 1993.

* * *

The Georgian cinema, which has a history dating back to the 1920s, experienced a renaissance in the 1960s with Otar Ioseliani as its most remarkable representative. Together with Tarkovsky (but in a very different way) he is the Soviet director who has been the most uncompromising and the most consistent in his aesthetic approach. Born in 1934, he studied music as well as graphic art at the Tbilisi Conservatory, and graduated from Moscow University in mathematics. But finally he chose cinema as his favorite field and graduated from VGIK after attending Alexander Dovzhenko’s class. His first film, April, of which little is known, was not released. His second, When Leaves Fall, shows the characteristic elements of his style. Ioseliani, like many of his contemporaries, is hostile to the cinema of Eisenstein—to his intellectual montage and to the theoretical aspect of his work. In presenting Jean Vigo as his master, Ioseliani insists... that he tries ‘‘to capture moments of passing life,’’ and in doing so wants to reach the ultimate goal of art. In a way, his films are close to the Czech new wave (Forman, Passer, Menzel), but realism is counterbalanced by a more formal treatment, particularly in the use of sound and off-screen space.

His films also show a disregard for conventional ways of life. Ioseliani’s nonconformity, stubbornness, and frankness have alienated authorities. When Leaves Fall takes place in a wine factory and shows an innocent and honest young man trying to live in a bureaucratic universe. He does not wear a moustache, that Georgian symbol of bourgeois respectability.

There Was a Singing Blackbird, Ioseliani’s third film, portrays the life of a musician in the Tbilisi orchestra who always arrives at the last minute to perform, being busy enjoying his life, drinking and courting girls. His behavior is an insult to an official morality based on work and duty. Ioseliani’s fancifulness and sense of humor are shown at their best in this sprightly comedy that ends tragically with the hero’s death. Pastoral, which had problems with the Moscow authorities (though the film was shown regularly in Georgia), is about a group of five musicians from the city who come to live with a peasant family. Ioseliani observes the opposition of city and country, and makes a young peasant girl the observer of this delightful conflict of manners and morals. Using many non-professionals—as in his earlier films—the director manages to show us poetically and with truthfulness the life of the Georgian people. Discarding any kind of plot, observing his characters with affection and irony, he is faithful to his anti-dogmatic stance: ‘‘Everyone is born to drink the glass of his life.’’ Ioseliani’s limited output is of a very high level indeed.

—Michel Ciment

ITAMI, Juzo

Nationality: Japanese. Born: Yoshihiro Ikeuchi in Kyoto, May 15, 1933; the son of film director Mansaku Itami. Education: High school. Family: Married actress Nobuko Miyamoto, two children. Career: Amateur boxer and commercial designer; became film actor, 1960 (sometimes billed as Ichizo Itami); subsequently worked as a stage actor, TV actor and director, TV chat-show host, author, translator, and chef; also edited magazine on psychoanalysis; began directing films at age 50, 1984; earned international acclaim with Tampopo, 1986; stabbed gangland-style in his home, allegedly in retaliation for his depiction of Japanese mobsters in Minbo No Onna (Minbo, or the Gentle Art of Japanese Extortion/The Gangster’s Moll/The Anti-Extortion Woman), 1992. Died: Committed suicide by leaping from the roof of the Tokyo condominium in which he resided and worked, 20 December 1997.

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Ososhiki (The Funeral)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>Tampopo (Dandelion)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Marusa no onna (A Taxiing Woman)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1988</td>
<td>Marusa no onna II (A Taxiing Woman Returns)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1991</td>
<td>Minbo No Onna (Minbo, Or the Gentle Art of Japanese Extortion; The Gangster’s Moll; The Anti-Extortion Woman)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1995</td>
<td>Daibyonin (The Last Dance; The Seriously Ill); Shizukana seikatsu (A Quiet Life)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>Sapa no onna (Supermarket Woman)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1997</td>
<td>Marutai no onna</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Films as Actor:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1960</td>
<td>Kirai Kirai Kirai (Dislike) (Edagawa); Nise Daigakusei (The Phony University Student) (Masamura); Ototo (Her Brother) (Ichikawa)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1961</td>
<td>Kuroi junin no onna (The Ten Dark Women) (Ichikawa)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1963</td>
<td>55 Days at Peking (Ray)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Lord Jim (Brooks)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1966</td>
<td>Otoko no kao wa rirekisho (A Man’s Face Is His History) (Kato)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>Nihon Shunko ko (A Treatise on Japanese Bawdy Songs) (Oshima)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1974</td>
<td>Imoto (My Sister, My Love) (Fujita)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Wagahai wa noko dearu (I Am a Cat) (Ichikawa)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1980</td>
<td>Kusa Meikyu (Labyrinth in the Field) (Terayama); Yugure made (Until Dusk) (Kuroki)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1983</td>
<td>Sasameyuki (The Makioka Sisters) (Ichikawa); Kazoku genn (The Family Game) (Morita)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1985</td>
<td>Setouchi shonen yaku dan (MacArthur’s Children) (Shinoda)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Saito homu (Sweet Home) (Kurosawa)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By ITAMI: books—

By ITAMI: articles—

Interview in Cinéma (Paris), June 1985.
Interview with Tony Rayns, in Monthly Film Bulletin (London), April 1988.
Interview with Alan Stanbrook, in Films and Filming (London), April 1988.
Interview in Films and Filming (London), April 1988.

‘‘Death & Taxes,’’ an interview with Jeff Sipe, in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1989.

On ITAMI: articles—

It is probable that Juzo Itami’s films convey meanings to Japanese audiences that are not readily accessible to Westerners: they are pervasively concerned with rituals, customs, and practices that go back through centuries, and their interaction with contemporary economic and socio-political actualities. On the other hand, Itami is clearly aware of international cinematic practice, and his films seem made partly with an international audience in mind. Offered here is a westerner’s assessment of the films: incomplete, but nonetheless valid.

A Westerner, then, would situate Itami somewhere between Buñuel and Almodóvar, The Funeral leaning toward the former, Tampopo toward the latter (the two Taxing Woman movies, though not at all inconsistent with these in tone and attitude, stand apart from them because of their general irreverence and skepticism). Itami has not achieved the extraordinary distinction of Buñuel at his best (but neither did Buñuel until he was very old, and then in only a very few films). On the other hand, if Tampopo, in its comic-erotic audacities and its seemingly free and inconsequential handling of narrative, evokes a heterosexual Almodóvar, the comparison works very much in Itami’s favour, underlining his greater maturity, discipline, and powers of self-criticism: casual divertissements as it may seem, Tampopo manifests a security of taste, tone, and attitude to which Almodóvar, with his apparently uncritical faith in the sanctity of his own impulses, cannot yet lay claim.

The Funeral can be at once “placed” and done justice to by being juxtaposed with, on the one hand, Buñuel’s late films, and, on the other, Altman’s A Wedding. Superficially, it has far more in common. with the latter: a satirical view of ritualized social performances and their emptiness, exposing the manifold hypocrisies they generate. Yet the complexity of attitude—the disturbing fusion of critical rigour and emotional generosity—is closer to Buñuel. A Wedding, among the worst films of one of the most uneven of directors, is more complicated than complex, its proliferation of characters and incident encompassed by Altman’s contempt for all of it and his desire to assert his superiority: the simplicity and unpleasantness of the attitude precludes any possibility of genuine disturbance.

A Funeral analyses the traditional elaborate rites in documentary detail and precision, while simultaneously undercutting the reverence they are supposed to express with a pervasive sense of absurdity: the old man whose death necessitates all this ceremony, expenditure, and hypocrisy was an unlovable egoist for whom no one felt any particular affection or respect while he was alive. Yet Itami, unlike Altman, never presents his characters as merely stupid, and shows no inclination to demonstrate his superiority to them. If the tone is never not satirical, it is also never only satirical. One might single out as an example the disturbing interplay of conflicting responses generated by the scene where the son-in-law has sex in the bushes with his mistress while his wife (the dead man’s daughter), fully aware of what is going on, quietly distracts herself on a swing. The juxtaposition of the seduction (treated as broad comedy) and the wife’s sense of troubled hurt, which takes place in the context of death that encloses the whole action, creates a complex effect capped by the abrupt appearance of Chishu Ryu as the officiating priest, and the accumulated resonances he brings with him from so many Ozu movies. If this is not exactly the tone of Viridiana, we are at least not far from that of The Discreet Charm of the Bourgeoisie, though the comparison brings with it the reflection that Itami’s film has no equivalent for the three ‘‘insert narratives’’ of the Buñuel and the dimension of radical pain and disturbance they introduce.

A Taxing Woman and A Taxing Woman’s Return represent a remarkably successful attempt to appropriate a popular genre (criminal investigation) for purposes of radical social criticism. For the westerner, at least, they relate interestingly to the recent wave of feminist detective fiction centered on female investigators, of which Sara Paretsky’s series of novels remains the most impressive example. There is a crucial difference between Paretsky’s V.I. Warshawski and the heroine of Itami’s movies: the former is a ‘‘private eye,’’ a lone operator, the latter the leader of a government-employed team. Yet the parallel is strong: in both cases the woman becomes committed not simply to the solution of a specific ‘‘case’’ but to the exposure of the corruption and inherent criminality of the patriarchal-capitalist power structure. The radicalism has its limitations. The fact that the ‘‘taxing woman’’ (Itami’s wife Nobuko Miyamoto) works for the government prohibits—for all the force of her personal crusade against corporate corruption—the raising of a key question: To what ends are taxes actually used within a capitalist state? The films attack the corruption but are unable to challenge the system that produces it. Itami’s commitment to feminism is also somewhat dubious: one suspects that it is more an incidental offshoot of his desire to work with his extremely talented wife (a brilliant comedienne who commands rapid and subtle shifts of tone) rather than being rooted in any firm theoretical basis.

Despite these limitations, the films (together with their wide and international commercial success) are, like Paretsky’s novels, sufficient proof that popular genres can be used to dramatize radical positions, and for once the sequel actually improves on the original: tougher, darker, with an altogether bleaker ending, its powerful and disturbing rigour was doubtless made possible by the success of its more lightweight predecessor.

As Itami’s career progressed, his films did not lose their bite. A-Ge-Man (A-Ge-Man—Tales of a Golden Geisha) is a discerning examination of conventional male-female associations, depicted via the perceptions of a modern-era geisha. Minbo no onna (Minbo, or the Gentle Art of Japanese Extortion/The Gangster’s Moll/The Anti-Extortion Woman), a rapier-witted satire of Japanese organized crime, follows a gritty lawyer who takes on a blackmailing band of yakuza. Several days after the Japanese premiere of Minbo no onna, Itami was severely injured when his neck and face were slashed, allegedly by members of the yakuza. The incident served as sobering proof that Itami’s brand of controversial, radical filmmaking, however high-spirited, can indeed be a dangerous business.

This tragedy, however, did not alter his cinematic style. In the aftermath of the stabbing, Itami commenced pondering the insincere, impersonal manner in which hospital patients in Japan are treated. The result was Daihyo-yin (The Last Dance/The Seriously Ill), a black comedy about a second-rate film director who is diagnosed with cancer.

Itami lampooned consumerism in Supa no onna (Supermarket Woman), in which supermarkets compete to lure customers. In Marutai no onna (Woman of the Police Protection Program), he told the story of an actress who finds herself in the title program after witnessing a killing and being threatened by the perpetrators, members of a religious cult. Itami stated that the concept of Marutai no onna evolved from his attack by the yakuza.

One of Itami’s late-career films is a departure from the tone of his other work: Shizukana seikatsu (A Quiet Life), based on the novel by Nobel laureate Kenzaburo Oe which spotlights the writer’s concerns about his disabled son. Primarily, though, Itami’s films maintained their satiric edge. While they are universal in that their lampoonery extends beyond cultural boundaries, they specifically ridicule the hypocrisies of contemporary Japanese society.

In late 1997, Itami learned that Flash, a weekly magazine, was about to print an allegation that the filmmaker—who still was married to Nobuko Miyamoto—had an affair with an unidentified 26-year-old woman. Two days before the magazine was to hit newsstands, Itami commenced pondering the insincere, impersonal manner in which hospital patients in Japan are treated. The result was Daihyo-yin (The Last Dance/The Seriously Ill). In a note explaining his action, he vociferously denied the relationship, declaring, ‘‘My death is the only way to prove my innocence.’’

—Robin Wood
—Updated by Rob Edelman

IVENS, Joris

Films as Director:

1911 De brandende straal or Wigwam (Flaming Arrow) (+ ed, ph)
1927 Zeedijk-Filmsstudie (Filmsstudie—Zeedijk) (+ ed, ph)
1928 Études de mouvements (+ ed, ph); De Brug (The Bridge) (+ ed, ph)
1929 Branding (The Breakers) (co-d, ed, ph); Regen (Rain) (+ ed, ph) (sound version prepared 1932 by Helen van Dongen); Ik-Film (“I” Film) (co-d, ed, ph) (unfinished); Schaatsenrijden (Skating; The Skaters) (+ ed, ph) (unfinished); Wij Bouwen (We Are Building) (+ co-sc, ed, ph) (footage shot for but not used in Wij Bouwen used for following films: Heien (Pile Driving) (+ co-sc, ed, ph); Nieuwe architectur (New Architecture) (+ co-sc, ed, ph); Caissounbouw Rotterdam (+ co-sc, ed, ph); Zuid Limburg (South Limburg) (+ co-sc, ed, ph))

1929/30 N.V.V. Congres (Congres der Vakvereenigingen) (+ ed, ph); Arm Dreunthe (+ ed, ph)
1930 De Tribune film: Breken en bouwen (The Tribune Film: Break and Build) (+ ed, ph); Timmerfabriek (Timber Industry) (+ co-ph, co-ed); Film-notities uit de Sojjet-Unie (News from the Soviet Union) (+ ed); Demonstration van proletarische solidariteit (Demonstration of Proletarian Solidarity) (+ ed)
1931 Philips-Radio (Symphonie industrielle, Industrial Symphony) (+ co-ph, co-ed); Crescots (Crescote) (+ sc, ph, ed)
1932 Pen o Gerojach (Youth Speaks; Song of Heroes) (+ ed)
1933 Zaarderzees (+ sc, co-ph)
1934 Misère au Borinage (Borinage) (co-d, co-sc, co-ed, co-ph); Nieuwe Gronden (New Earth) (+ sc, co-ph, co-ed, narration)
1937 The Spanish Earth (+ sc, co-ph)
1939 The Four Hundred Million (China’s Four Hundred Million) (co-d, sc)
1940 Power and the Land (+ co-sc): New Frontiers (unfinished)
1941 Bip Goes to Town; Our Russian Front (co-d); Worst of Farm Disasters
1942 Oil for Aladdin’s Lamp
1943 Alarms! or Branle-Bas de combat (Action Stations!) (+ sc, ed) (released in shorter version Corvette Port Arthur)
1946 Indonesia Calling (+ sc, ed)
1949 Pierwsze lata (The First Years) (+ co-ed, produced 1947)
1951 Pokoje swietych (Peace Will Win) (co-d)
1952 Naprozod młodzieży (Freundschaft siegt; Friendship Triumphs) (co-d); Wyscig pokoju Warszawa-Berlin-Praga (Friedensfahrt; Peace Tour) (+ sc)
1954 Das Lied der Ströme (Song of the Rivers) (+ co-sc)
1957 La Seine a rencontré Paris (+ co-sc); Die Abenteuer des Till Eulenspiegel (The Adventures of Till Eulenspiegel) (co-d)
1958 Before Spring (Early Spring; Letters from China) (+ sc, ed); Six Hundred Million People Are with You (+ ed)
1960 L’ Italia non e un paese povero (Italy Is Not a Poor Country) (+ co-sc, co-ed); Demain à Nanguila (Nanguila Tomorrow)
1962 Carnet de voyage (+ sc); Pueblo en armas (Cuba, pueblo armado; An Armed Nation) (+ sc)

. . . à Valparaiso (+ sc); El circo mas pequeno (Le Petit Chapiteau)
1964 El tren de la victoria (Le Train de la victoire)
1966 Pour le mistral (+ co-sc); Le Ciel, la terre (The Sky, the Earth) (+ narration, appearance); Rotterdam-Europoort (Rotterdam-Europoort; The Flying Dutchman)
1967 Hanoi footage in Loin du Viêt-nam (Far from Vietnam) (co-d)
1968 Le Dix-septième parallèle (The Seventeenth Parallel) (co-d, co-sc); Agrippès à la terre (co-d); Déterminés à vaincre (co-d)
1969 Rencontre avec le Président Ho Chi Minh (co-d); next 7 titles made as part of collective including Marceline Loridan, Jean-Pierre Sergent, Emmanuelle Castro, Suzanne Fen, Antoine Bonfanti, Bernard Ortion, and Anne Rullier: Le Peuple et ses fusils (The People and Their Guns); L’ Armée populaire arme le peuple; La Guerre populaire au Laos; Le Peuple peut tout; Qui commande aux fusils; Le Peuple est invincible; Le Peuple ne peut rien sans ses fusils
1976 Comment Yukong déplaça les montagnes (in 12 parts totalling 718 minutes) (co-d)
1977 Les Kazaks—Minorité nationale—Sinkiang (co-d); Les Outougui—Minorité nationale—Sinkiang (co-d)
1988 Une Histoire de vent (co-d)

Other Films:

1929/30 Jeugd-dag (Days of Youth) (co-ed)
1931 Short film in VVVC Journal series (ed)
1956 Mein Kind (My Child) (Pozner and MachalZ) (artistic supervisor)
1957 Die Windrose (The Wind Rose) (Bellon and others) (co-supervisor)
1972 Grierson (Blais) (role as interviewee)
1981 Conversations with Willard Van Dyke (Rothschild) (role as interviewee)

Publications

By IVENS: books—

Lied der Ströme, with Valdimir Pozner, Berlin, 1957.
By IVENS: articles—

Numerous articles in Filmliga (Amsterdam), 1928–32.
‘‘Collaboration in Documentary,’’ in Film (New York), 1940.
‘‘Apprentice to Film,’’ in Theatre Arts (New York), March and April 1946.
‘‘Borinage—A Documentary Experience,’’ in Film Culture (New York), no. 1, 1956.
‘‘Ik-Film,’’ in Skrien (Amsterdam), no. 2, 1964.
‘‘Ivens Issue’’ of Film Culture (New York), Spring 1972.
Interview with E. Naaikens and others, in Skrien (Amsterdam), October 1977.
Interview with P. van Bueren, in Skoop (Amsterdam), February/March 1984.

On IVENS: books—

Hemingway, Ernest, The Spanish Earth, Cleveland, 1938.
Meyer, Han, Joris Ivens, de weg naar Vietnam, Utrecht, 1970.
Kremeier, Klaus, Joris Ivens, ein Film an den Fronten der Weltrevolution, Berlin, 1976.
Cavatorta, Silvano, and Daniele Maggioni, Joris Ivens, Firenze, 1979.

On IVENS: articles—

van Dongen, Helen, “‘Ik kwam Joris Ivens tegen’: waarom ben je bij de film gegaan?,” in Skoop (Amsterdam), November 1978.
“Joris Ivens,” in Film Dope (London), July 1983.
“Special Section,” in Film und Fernsehen (Potsdam), vol. 14, no. 7, July 1986.
Groenewout, E. van’t, “‘Ich Hasse Stillstand,’” in Film und Fernsehen (Potsdam), vol. 18, no. 1, January 1990.
Schulz, D., “Hommage fuer Joris Ivens,” in Film und Fernsehen (Potsdam), vol. 21, no. 4, 1993.

On IVENS: film—

From his debut with The Bridge in 1928, Joris Ivens made over 50 documentary films. A staunch advocate of a socialist society, Ivens consistently attacked fascism and colonialism in his films made after 1930. His first two films, The Bridge and Rain, are rather abstract. Here Ivens’s main concern is the elaboration of a varied, often breathtaking, rhythm of images. In this, he appears to be indebted to the French and German avant-garde films, notably those by Ruttman and Man Ray.

In 1930 Ivens visited the USSR at the invitation of Pudovkin. The compelling expressiveness of Russian agit-prop films had a deep influence upon Ivens in shaping his unique and powerful style. According to Ivens, films should convey social and political insights by confronting the public directly with reality. This analytical and didactic viewpoint was exemplified in Komsonol, the first film Ivens made in Russia. His 1934 film Misère au Borinage not only shows in pitiful and often violent images the miserable conditions under which the Belgian coalminers lived and worked; the film also indicates that the desperate situation of the workers follows necessarily from a specific social order. To deepen his analysis and to strengthen the urgency of his message, Ivens reconstructed a number of scenes, such as the May Day celebration. This procedure also reflects Ivens’s conviction that a documentary film is an emotional presentation of facts. Ivens has said that the maker of a documentary film should be in search of truth. To attain truth, one must have solidarity with the people whose situation is depicted. Mutual confidence and understanding are essential to a good documentary film.

Ivens’s techniques bear the mark of such filmmakers as Eisenstein and Pudovkin. In addition to developing specific ways of shooting and styles of montage, Ivens has always attached great importance to spoken commentary. In Spanish Earth, a film about the Spanish civil war, Ernest Hemingway speaks the commentary; Jacques Prévert does so in La Seine a rencontré Paris. Commentary plays a secondary role in the films Ivens made during the 1970s, notably in How Yukong Moved the Mountains. In this documentary epos about daily life in China after the cultural revolution, people tell about their own situation. Ivens’s style here is descriptive, with many long sequences and with less dramatic montage.

Ivens was one of the founders in 1926 of the Dutch Film League, which united a number of intellectuals and Dutch filmmakers. Their efforts to promote quality films included publishing a review, organizing film screenings, and inviting important foreign avant-garde filmmakers to give talks. Among these were René Clair and Man Ray; Ivens’s contacts with Pudovkin and Eisenstein also date to this period. Ivens’s contributions to Dutch film culture are immense, although he remained a controversial figure. His manifest sympathy for the struggle of the Indonesian people against colonialism (Indonesia Calling) brought him into conflict with the Dutch government, and until 1956 Ivens was deprived of his Dutch passport.

His films have examined important social and political issues. From 1938 till 1945 he lived in the United States. Power and the Land is about the improvements in farming brought about by the use of electricity. With Our Russian Front Ivens intended to urge the Americans to enter World War II and to support the Russians. The film was financed by Ivens himself and some of his New York Russian friends. He hoped to make more films of this kind, but the project titled Letters to the President was coolly received. It led to only one film, A Sailor on Convoy Duty to England, which was financed by the National Film Board of Canada. In the 1950s Ivens worked in Eastern Europe and The First Years shows the transformation of a capitalist society into a socialist one; the film concentrates on episodes from postwar life in Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, and Poland.

In 1956 the Dutch government returned Ivens’s passport; he then took up residence in Paris. After that he worked in Latin America (Cuba, Chile) and even more extensively in Asia (Vietnam, Laos, and China). Travel Notebook is about daily life in Cuba; An Armed People shows how the militia of the Cuban people captures a small group of counter-revolutionaries. Le Trains de la victoire is a report on the election campaign of Salvador Allende, later president of Chile. Ivens also taught Vietnamese filmmakers, and engagement with the cause of the Vietnamese people manifests itself in such films as The Threatening Sky and The 17th Parallel. Ivens always had great influence on new technical developments in the domain of film equipment. He hailed the professionalization of the 16mm camera as a big step forward, since it enabled the camera to take part in the action. He taught at numerous film schools and advised many colleagues. In the 1950s he was an advisor to the Defa Studios (GDR) and collaborated on many films there. Together with a number of leftist French filmmakers (Jean-Luc Godard, Alain Resnais, Agnès Varda, and others), Ivens made the filmic pamphlet of solidarity Loin du Viêt-nam. For Ivens the documentary film provided the only possibility of surviving as an artist outside the field of commercial films. He always succeeded in financing his projects on such terms that he conserved maximum artistic freedom and full responsibility for the final product. This even holds for the two films which he made at an early stage in his career and which were commissioned by commercial firms (Creosoot and Philips-Radio).

Within his lifetime Ivens became a legend. His films comment on many events which shaped the modern world. His art, his intelligence, his sophisticated political views, and his deep sincerity account for the unique position Joris Ivens holds among documentary filmmakers.

—Dorothy Verdaasdonk

IVORY, James

Nationality: American. Born: Berkeley, California, 7 June 1928. Education: Educated in architecture and fine arts, University of Oregon; studied filmmaking at University of Southern California, M.A. 1956. Family: Life companion of the producer Ismail Merchant. Military Service: Corporal in U.S. Army Special Services, 1953–55. Career: Founder and partner, Merchant-Ivory Productions, New York, 1961; directed his first feature, The Householder, and also began his collaboration with writer Ruth Prawer Jhabvala, 1963. Awards: Best Foreign Film French Académie du Cinema, and prize at Berlin Festival, for Shakespeare Wallah, 1968; Guggenheim Fellow, 1973; Best Film British Academy Award, for A Room with a View, 1987; Silver Lion, Venice Festival, for Maurice, 1987; Best Film British Academy Award, National Board of Review Best Director, Cannes Film Festival 45th Anniversary Prize, Bodil Festival Best European Film, for Howards End, 1992; John Cassavetes Award Independent Spirit Award, 1993; London Critics Circle Director of the Year, Italian National Syndicate of Film Journalists Best Director-Foreign Film, Robert Festival Best Foreign Film, for The Remains of the Day, 1993; Directors Guild of America Lifetime Achievement Award, 1995. Address: c/o Merchant-Ivory Productions, Ltd., 250 W. 57th St., Suite 1913-A, New York, NY 10017, U.S.A.
James Ivory (left) on the set of Slaves of New York

Films as Director:

1957  Venice: Themes and Variations (doc) (+ sc, ph)
1959  The Sword and the Flute (doc) (+ sc, ph, ed)
1963  The Householder
1964  The Delhi Way (doc) (+ sc)
1965  Shakespeare Wallah (+ co-sc)
1968  The Guru (+ co-sc)
1970  Bombay Talkie (+ co-sc)
1972  Savages (+ pr, sc)
1974  The Wild Party
1975  Autobiography of a Princess
1977  Roseland
1979  Hullabaloo over Georgie and Bonnie’s Pictures; The Europeans (+ pr, co-sc, role as man in warehouse)
1980  Jane Austen in Manhattan
1981  Quartet (+ co-sc)
1982  Courtesans of Bombay (doc) (+ co-sc)
1983  Heat and Dust
1984  The Bostonians
1986  A Room with a View
1987  Maurice (+ co-sc)
1989  Slaves of New York
1990  Mr. and Mrs. Bridge
1992  Howards End
1993  The Remains of the Day
1995  Jefferson in Paris; Lumiere and Company (co-d)
1996  Surviving Picasso
1998  A Soldier’s Daughter Never Cries (+ co-sc)
2000  The Golden Bowl

Other Films:

1985  Noon Wine (Fields) (co-exec pr)

Publications

By IVORY: books—

By IVORY: articles—

Interviews with Judith Trojan, in Take One (Montreal), January/February 1974 and May 1975.
Interview with D. Eisenberg, in Inter/View (New York), January 1975.
Interview with G. Fuller in Interview (New York), November 1990.

On IVORY: books—

On IVORY: articles—

Dudar, Helen, “In the Beginning, the Word; At the End, the Movie,” in New York Times, 8 March 1992.

* * *

The work of James Ivory was a fixture in independent filmmaking of the late 1960s and 1970s, Roseland, for example, Ivory’s omnibus film about the habitus of a decaying New York dance palace, garnered a standing ovation at its New York Film Festival premiere in 1977, and received much critical attention afterward. However, it was not until A Room with a View, Ivory’s stately adaptation of E. M. Forster’s novel, that the filmmaker gained full international recognition. The name-making films he directed earlier in the 1980s—which included adaptations of two Forster works and two Henry James novels—inextricably linked Ivory with the contemporary British cinema’s tradition of urbane, even ultra-genteel, costume dramas.

Ivory’s independence, his influential involvement with English film, and his sustained collaborative partnership with producer Ismail Merchant invite comparisons with an earlier pairing in British cinema, Michael Powell and Emeric Pressburger. Both teams have found themselves attracted to material dealing with the effects of sexual repression or with the clash of differing cultures, as in, for example, Black Narcissus (Powell/Pressburger, 1947), The Europeans (Ivory/Merchant, 1979), and A Soldier’s Daughter Never Cries (Ivory/Merchant, 1998). While Powell and Pressburger worked with various forms of visual experimentation, employing heightened colors, frequently moving cameras, and cinematographic juxtaposition to achieve an opulent, metaphorical visual texture, Ivory’s work represents a distinct retrenchment, a withdrawal from visual hyperbole, a comparative conservatism of visual style. An example of one of Ivory’s few attempts at visual expressionism (a moment in his work that seems directly inspired by Powell, in fact) illustrates this point. In The Bostonians, Ivory attempts to express Olive Chancellor’s hysteria by using stylized colors and superimposition in isolated dream sequences. Because the film’s style is deeply rooted in naturalism, unlike that of Powell, the sequences look stilted and awkward, remarkably out of place in the context of the film.

The naturalism of Ivory’s style often perfectly complements the director’s interest in the dynamics of isolated communities: the drama troupe in Shakespeare Wallah, for example, or the dancers in Roseland, or the members of the New York downtown-punk scene in Slaves of New York. Ivory’s films characteristically trace the formation of community around a common interest—or, more often, a common flaw or a shared loss—and his powers of observation are enlivened by attention to minute details of gesture and a keen sympathy for marginal characters. It is this sympathy that attracts him to works such as Evan Connell’s novels Mrs. Bridge and Mr. Bridge. Ivory thus provides a densely ironic but ultimately sympathetic portrait of the quiet dignity of middle-class lives of the Bridges in Kansas City. This sympathy accounts as well for Ivory’s handling of characters such as Charlotte Bartlett in A Room with a View. In Forster’s novel, Miss Bartlett is lampooned tirelessly, emerging as one of the novel’s chief examples of English hypocrisy and Forster’s conception of high culture as the poison of the spirit—this is in spite of a half-hearted reprieve for the character in the novel’s last pages. In the film, Maggie Smith’s agile, witty performance makes the character far more appealing, and Ivory’s treatment of the character (he cuts from the lovers’ final union to shots of Miss Bartlett’s soundless, unbending loneliness) shows that he clearly interprets her as a fully sympathetic character of great pathos.

Ivory’s two Forster adaptations, A Room with a View and Maurice, are among the high-water marks of his career through the 1980s. These two films do more than demonstrate Ivory’s often bracingly literary sensibility (most of Ivory’s films are adaptations that doggedly strive for extreme “faithfulness” to their source material): In the Forster adaptations, this “faithfulness” co-exists with crucial shifts of emphasis that provide, simultaneously, modern interpretations of the texts.

An example of this occurs in the scene of the murder in the square in A Room with a View. In its use of hand-held cameras, graphic matches, and rhythmic editing, which provides mercurial shifts in the tone of the sequence from gravity to exultation, the sequence becomes one of the film’s set-pieces, supplying the complexities that Forster largely avoids in his comparatively laconic treatment of the scene.

Upon its release in 1992, Howards End was justifiably hailed as the best film ever in the long and distinguished collaboration of Ivory, Merchant, and screenwriter Ruth Prawer Jhabvala. This stylish work is yet another adaptation of an E. M. Forster novel. Its scenario examines a popular Ivory theme, as it explores the repercussions of social classes coming together at a specific point in recent history (in this case, at the close of the Edwardian era in England). Emma Thompson is altogether brilliant in the role that solidified her career. She plays a cheeky and individualistic young woman who does not come from a monied background, and who is shyly charmed by a prosperous gentleman (Anthony Hopkins) whose upper-class facade hides a deceitful and heartless disposition.

The Remains of the Day is nearly as fine a film as Howards End. Based on the acclaimed novel by Kazuo Ishiguro, the scenario dissects the personality of an ideal servant: Stevens (Hopkins), a reserved British butler who is singlemindedly dedicated to his employer, Lord Darlington (James Fox). The time is between the World Wars—and no matter that the misguided Darlington is perilously flirting with Nazism, and that Miss Kenton (Thompson), the new housekeeper, might be a potential romantic partner for Stevens. The servant is steadfastly absorbed in his professional role, to the exclusion of all else. He knows only to suppress his needs, feelings, and desires, all in the name of service to his master. The Remains of the Day essentially is a character study of Stevens, who is superbly played by the ever-reliable Hopkins. It is yet one more in a line of Ivory’s meticulous period dramas.

The mid-to-late 1990s found Ivory exploring the lives of revered historical figures. Jefferson in Paris concerns the American Thomas Jefferson, one of the nation’s founding fathers, shown here as the U.S. Ambassador to France. However, the film is several shades below the best of the previous Ivory-Merchant-Jhabvala collaborations. While Jefferson in Paris exquisitely captures a time and place, the level of detail in the film renders the narrative all too episodic. Still, Ivory offers a full-bodied portrayal of Jefferson (Nick Nolte), while depicting a range of his personal and political involvements. Most intriguing of all is the paradox of Jefferson’s disgust with the overindulgences of the French aristocracy combined with his agonized collusion in keeping the status quo with regard to the maintenance of slavery as an American “institution.” In Jefferson in Paris, Ivory yet again examines the theme of class differences, exploring the invisible walls that separate those classes. Only here, class is measured by the color of one’s skin. Even though individuals share the same bloodlines because of sexual liaisons between master and slave, those with black skin are enslaved by those with white skin. Ivory portrays the widowed Jefferson falling in love with a married woman (Greta Scacchi) and having a sexual tryst with Sally Hemings (Thandie Newton), an adolescent slave. It remains uncertain if the latter affair ever happened. For this reason, Jefferson in Paris was the subject of debate and controversy among Jeffersonian scholars.

Ivory’s next film, Surviving Picasso, charts the relationship between Pablo Picasso (Anthony Hopkins) and Francoise Gilot (Natascha McElhone), a young artist who is several decades his junior. Here, the genius of Picasso is obscured by his all-encompassing cruelty and misogyny. Gilot believes she has the backbone to maintain her individuality while sharing Picasso’s bed, and for ten years she gives it the old college try before finally leaving him. Although vividly played by Hopkins, Picasso is never more than a womanizing caricature; there is little insight into why he is who he is, let alone what made him one of the giants of 20th-century art.

Ivory fared somewhat better with A Soldier’s Daughter Never Cries, based on the autobiographical novel by Kaylie (the daughter of James) Jones. A Soldier’s Daughter is the story of an internationally acclaimed expatriate novelist (Kris Kristofferson) and his familial bonds, with the scenario emphasizing his relationship with his daughter (Leelee Sobieski) as she matures from girlhood to young womanhood. At the outset, the family resides in Paris, with a spotlight on the impact of American pop culture on post-war Europe. Then the clan resettles in the United States, where the children are viewed by their schoolmates as “frogs” and are alienated from their surroundings.

The opening section of A Soldier’s Daughter Never Cries is slight and episodic; however, its finale, which centers on the writer’s death, is a knowing exploration of what it means to love, and then lose, a husband and a father. One of the dramatic highlights occurs after the writer’s demise, when his widow (Barbara Hershey) recalls their courting and mourns her loss.

Despite its flaws, A Soldier’s Daughter Never Cries is a heartfelt portrait of a loving, non-dysfunctional family—a rarity in contemporary cinema.

—James Morrison, updated by Rob Edelman
JACKSON, Peter

Nationality: New Zealander. Born: Wellington, New Zealand, 30 October 1961. Family: Unmarried; current partner co-screenwriter Fran Walsh. Career: Started making films when given Super 8-millimeter camera by parents at age eight; made amateur fiction shorts, including The Dwarf Patrol, Curse of the Gravewalker, The Valley; left school at age seventeen, failed to get job in film industry, joined local newspaper as photo-engraving apprentice; named top New Zealand photo-engraving apprentice three years running; bought 16-millimeter Bolex, 1983; started making feature film Roast of the Day on weekends with friends and colleagues; renamed Bad Taste, film took four years to shoot; finally completed after funding received from New Zealand Film Commission, 1986, enabling Jackson to quit newspaper job for full-time filmmaking; set up own studio, Wingnut Films, in Wellington, with computer-driven special effects division, WETA; after three low-budget features, international acclaim for Heavenly Creatures led to deal with Universal to make next project in New Zealand with U.S. funding. Awards: Metro Media Award, Toronto, and Silver Lion, Venice, both 1994, and Oscar nomination, Best Screenplay, 1995, all for Heavenly Creatures. Agent: UTA, 9560 Wilshire Blvd., Suite 500, Beverly Hills, CA 90212, U.S.A.

Films as Director and Co-Screenwriter:

1987  Bad Taste (+pr, ph, ed, multiple roles)
1989  Meet the Feebles (+pr)
1992  Braindead
1994  Heavenly Creatures
1995  Frighteners (+pr)
1996  Forgotten Silver (+co-sc)
2001  Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring (+co-sc, pr)
2002  Lord of the Rings: The Two Towers (+co-sc)
2003  Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King (+co-sc)

Other Films:

1995  Jack Brown, Genius (Hiles) (sc, 2nd unit d, exec pr); Good Taste (interviewee)

Publications

By JACKSON: articles—

“Heavenly Creatures: Writing and Directing Heavenly Creatures,” an interview with Frances Walsh, Peter Jackson, and Tod Lippy, in Scenario, Fall 1995.
“Cryptically Acclaimed,” an interview with Michael Helms, in Cinema Papers (Fitzroy), December 1996.
“Pure fantasie,” an interview with Ronnie Pede and Piet Goethals, in Film en Televisie + Video (Brussels), February 1997.

On JACKSON: articles—

McDonald, Lawrence, “‘A Critique of the Judgement of Bad Taste or beyond Braindead Criticism: The Films of Peter Jackson,’” in Illusions (Wellington, NZ), Winter 1993.
Salisbury, Mark, “‘Peter Jackson, Gore Hound,’” in Empire (London), June 1993.
Cameron-Wilson, James, “‘Natural-born Culler,’” in Times (London), 8 February 1995.
Cameron-Wilson, James, “‘The Frightener,’” in What’s on in London, 8 February 1995.
Atkinson, Michael, “‘Earthly Creatures,’” in Film Comment (New York), May/June 1995.
Filmography, in Segnocinema (Vicenza), January/February 1997.

* * *
After his first three features, most critics thought they had Peter Jackson neatly pegged: an antipodean maverick whose films made up for their zero-budget limitations with comic gusto and creative ingenuity; films whose gross-out excesses of spurting bodily fluids and splattered guts made George Romero and Sam Raimi look like models of genteel restraint. Jackson’s work, in short, seemed to be comprehensively summed up by the blithely upfront title of his debut film, Bad Taste. And then came his fourth film, the award-winning Heavenly Creatures, and suddenly all the assumptions had to be revised. Jackson himself, noting a hint of surprise behind the acclaim, pointed out that like all his work the film stemmed from his ‘‘unhealthy interest in the grotesque.’’ But if there was continuity in terms of themes and preoccupations, Heavenly Creatures showed Jackson was also capable of emotional complexity, subtlety, and sophistication—qualities no one would have suspected from his previous films.

Far from striving to disguise the ramshackle, garden-shed genesis of his early work, Jackson gloried in it, making an amateurish, peculiarly New Zealander domesticity central to his humour. The Astral Investigation and Defence Service team (‘‘I wish they’d do something about those initials’’) who foil predatory aliens in Bad Taste are as far from their jut-jawed Hollywood counterparts as could be imagined; inept, nerdish, and post-adolescent, they shamble around bickering over trivialities or moaning about filling in time-sheets. In Braindead, whose showdown erupts in a bland suburban home, the hero demolishes a horde of flesh-eating zombies, not with flamethrower or pump-action shotgun, but with a rotary lawnmower—‘‘a Kiwi icon,’’ according to the director. It comes as no surprise to read, in the end-titles for Bad Taste, a credit to ‘‘Special Assistants to the Producer (Mum and Dad).’’

Both Bad Taste and Braindead (whose farcical brand of ultra-physical violence Jackson dubs ‘‘splatstick’’) spoof well-established and much-parodied formulas within the horror genre, respectively the space-invaders movie and the zombie movie. Meet the Feebles is more audacious in its choice of target: the hitherto sacrosanct world of Jim Henson’s Muppets. Hijacking the standard Muppet narrative framework of backstage shenanigans, Jackson gleefully subverts the perky ethos of the puppet troupe with lavish helpings of booze, filth, sex, and drugs, culminating in one of his trademark bloodbaths. He also pushes the unstated logic of Muppetry to ends that Henson would shudder to confront; if Miss Piggy can get the hots for Kermit, why shouldn’t an elephant have sex with a chicken? (The resultant outlandish hybrid is wheeled on—literally—for our delectation.) Jackson further outrages Muppet conventions by making the frog character in his film a Vietnam vet with a heroin habit, while Kermit’s counterpart as stage director is an effete, English-accented fox who mounts a big production number in praise of sodomy.

This fascination with outrage, with the consequences of pushing beyond the bounds of convention, carries through into Heavenly Creatures, Jackson’s finest film to date. Based on an actual New Zealand cause célèbre of the 1950s, the Parker-Hulme case, the film traces the progress of two fifteen-year-old schoolgirls into an increasingly unhinged world of ritual and fantasy. Instinctive loners, Pauline and Juliet bond together to turn their outsider status into an exclusive, hermetic society tinged with lesbianism and peopled by personal icons—Mario Lanza, James Mason—along with figures from their medieval fantasy kingdom of Borovnia. Drawing on real documents (Pauline’s diaries and the girls’ own Borovnian ‘‘novels’’), Jackson creates a mood of intense pubescent obsession sliding steadily out of control until—as the borders between the two worlds elide—it culminates in brutal murder.

Determined not to present his heroines as the ‘‘evil lesbian killers’’ they were branded by contemporary press accounts, Jackson not only portrays them with sympathy and insight, but captures the richly creative energy of their shared fantasies. Their behaviour is seen as a reaction to the imagination-starved society around them, since 1950s Christchurch, all garish pastels and agonised gentility, appears no less bizarre and unbalanced a world (and a whole lot less fun) than the one the girls create for themselves. Yet the killing—of Pauline’s uncomprehending, well-meaning mother—shares none of the sick-joke relish of Jackson’s previous films; it is shown as clumsy, painful, and distressing.

Jackson firmly denies that Heavenly Creatures represents a bid to be seen as a ‘‘serious filmmaker’’ who wants to do ‘‘arty mainstream films.’’ ‘‘People immediately assume that filmmakers do things because of a grand plan. . . . I do intend to do other splatter films,’’ he told Cinema Papers. ‘‘I have intentions of doing all sorts of films. I have no interest in a ‘career’ as such.’’ As if to prove it, he reverted to splatstick mode with The Frighteners, an Evil-Dead-style horror-comedy made (thanks to backing from Universal) on a less shoestring basis than his earlier films.

Jackson’s achievement in staying put at home and persuading the Hollywood money to come to him bodes well for his country’s film industry. Most successful New Zealand directors (Roger Donaldson, Geoff Murphy, Jane Campion, Lee Tamahori) have used their first major hit as a springboard for Hollywood. Jackson, remaining true to his roots, has set up his own production base (Wingnut Films) in his home town of Wellington. ‘‘I choose to stay in New Zealand earning a fraction of what I could make in Los Angeles because I want to do whatever I feel like doing. . . . The freedom that I have in New Zealand is worth millions of dollars to me.’’ So far, the tactic has worked. By 2000 Jackson was working on his huge, three-part adaptation of Lord of the Rings, with a possible remake of King Kong next in line—all in his native country. The $260 million budget for the Tolkien trilogy is a far cry from the small change it cost to make Bad Taste. But the spirit isn’t perhaps so different: armor for the 15,000 extras is being knitted out of string—by the septuagenarian ladies of the Wellington Knitting Club.

—Philip Kemp

JANCSÓ, Miklós

Nationality: Hungarian. Born: Vác, Hungary, 27 September 1921. Education: Educated in law at Kolozsvár University, Romania, doctorate 1944; Budapest Academy of Dramatic and Film Art, graduated 1950. Family: Married director Márta Mészáros (divorced); son Miklos Jr. is cameraman. Career: Newsreel director, early 1950’s; shot documentaries in China, 1957; directed first feature, A harangok Römába mentek, 1958; director at ‘‘25th’’ theatre, Budapest, 1960’s. Awards: Hungarian Critics’ Prize, for Cantata, 1963; Best Director Award, Cannes Festival, for Red Psalm, 1972; Special Prize, Cannes Festival, 1979.

Films as Director:

(of short films and documentaries):

1950 Kedzunbe vettak a béke ugyét (We Took over the Cause of Peace) (co-d)
1951 Szojvet mezőgazdasági küldíttek tanításai (The Teachings of a Soviet Agricultural Deputation) (co-d)
1952 1952 Május 1 (May 1st 1952)
1953 Választás előtt (Before Election); Arat az Orosházi Dőzsza (Harvest in the Cooperative ‘‘Dosza’’); Közös ittan (Ordinary Ways; On a Common Path) (co-d)
1954 Galgapenten (Along the Galgu River); Ősz Badacsonyban (Autumn in Badacsony); Életét Tisza-víz (The Health-giving Waters of Tisza; Life-bringing Water); Emberek! Ne engedjétek! (Comrades! Don’t Put up with It) (co-d, co-sc); Egy kiállítás képei (Pictures at an Exhibition)
1956 Móricz Zsigmond (Zsigmond Moricz 1879–1942)
1957 A város peremén (In the Outskirts of the City); Dél-Kína tájain (The Landscapes of Southern China); Sznífoltok Kinabóból (Colorful China; Colors of China); Pekingi palotái (Palaces of Peking); Kína vendégei voltunk (Our Visit to China)
1958 Derkovitz Gyula 1894–1934; A harangok Römába mentek (The Bells Have Gone to Rome) (feature)
1959 Halhatalanság (Immortality) (+ sc, ph); Izotopok a gyögyászatban (Isotopes in Medical Science)
1960 First episode of Három csillág (Three Stars); Az eladás művészete (The Art of Revival; The Art of Salesmanship) (co-d); Szerkezettervezés (Construction Design) (+ sc)
1961 Az idő kereke (The Wheels of Time) (+ sc); Alkonyok és hajnalok (Twilight and Dawn) (+ sc); Indiántörténet (Indian Story) (+ sc)
1963 Oldás és kötés (Cantata) (+ co-sc); Hej, te eleven Fa . . . (Living Tree . . . An Old Folk Song) (+ sc)
Miklós Jancsó (left)

(of feature films):

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1964</td>
<td>Igyjöttem (My Way Home)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1965</td>
<td>Szegénylegények (The Round-up); Jelenlét (The Presence) (short) (sc); Közelrölia: a vér (Close-up: The Blood) (short)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1967</td>
<td>Csillagosok, katonák (The Red and the White) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>Csend és kiáltás (Silence and cry) (co-sc); Vörös Május (Red May) (short)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1969</td>
<td>Fényes szelek (The Confrontation); Sirokkó (Teli sirokkó lek; Winter Wind) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1970</td>
<td>Égi bárany (Agnus Dei) (co-sc); La pacifista (The Pacifist) (co-sc); Füst (Smoke) (short)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1972</td>
<td>Még kér a nép (Red Psalm)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1975</td>
<td>Szerelemem, Elektra (Elektreia)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1976</td>
<td>Vici privati, pubbliche virtù (Vices and Pleasures)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>Eletünk és vérunkét: Magyar rapszódia 1 (Hungarian Rhapsody) (co-sc); Allegro barbaro: Magyar rapszódia 2 (Allegro barbaro) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1981</td>
<td>A zsránok szíve avagy Boccaccio Magyarszágon (The Tyrant’s Heart; Boccaccio in Hungary) (co-sc)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1984</td>
<td>Omega, Omega . . . ; Muzsika (Music)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1986</td>
<td>L’Aube (Dawn)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1987</td>
<td>Szörnyek Evadja</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1989</td>
<td>Jézus Krisztus Horoszkója</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1990</td>
<td>Isten hátrafelé megy (God Runs Backwards)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1992</td>
<td>Kék Dunabercső (Blue Danube Waltz)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1996</td>
<td>Szeressük egymást gyerekek!</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1999</td>
<td>Anyád! A szúnyogok; Pesten Niemis lámpást adott kezembe az Úr (Lord’s Lantern in Budapest) (role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Film Title</th>
<th>Notes</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>A Maksimenko brigád (The Maximenko Brigade) (Koza) (story)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1968</td>
<td>A Pál utcai fiúk (The Boys of Paul Street) (Fabri) (role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1977</td>
<td>Difficile morire (Silva) (role)</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Publications

By JANCŐ: articles—

“L’Idéologie, la technique et le rite,” interview with Claude Beylie, in Ecran (Paris), December 1972.

“I Have Played Christ Long Enough: A Conversation with Miklós Jancsó,” with Gideon Bachmann, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1974.

“Level-lefe a drehbuchrol,” in Filmvilág (Budapest), no. 12, 1996.

On JANCSÓ: books—

Taylor, John, Directors and Directions, New York, 1975.

On JANCSÓ: articles—

Houston, Penelope, “The Horizontal Man,” in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1969.

“Special Section” of Filmfaust (Frankfurt), March/April 1984.

Pošová, Kateosía, “Milenky Miklőse Jancsóa,” in Film a Doba (Prague), Spring 1994.

On JANCSÓ: films—

Comolli, Jean-Louis, Miklós Jancsó, for TV, France, 1969.

Miklós Jancsó is probably the best internationally known of the directors to emerge from the new wave Hungarian cinema of the 1960s. With his hypnotic, circling camera, the recurrent—some critics say obsessive—exploration of Hungary’s past, and his evocative use of the broad plains of his countries’ Puszta, Jancsó fashioned a highly individual cinema within the confines of a state operated film industry. Although a prolific director of short films during the 1950s and an equally prolific director of feature films since the early 1970s, it is for his work during the middle and late 1960s that Jancsó is best known outside his own country.

Beginning with My Way Home, which dealt with a young Hungarian soldier caught up in the German retreat and Soviet advance during the Second World War, Jancsó discovered both a set of themes and a style which helped him to fashion his own voice. My Way Home, unlike most of Jancsó’s films, has a hero, but this hero often behaves in a most unheroic way as he makes his way home. Set free by the chaos of the war’s end, he is fired upon both by the Russians and the Germans and finally dons a Russian uniform as a protective disguise. Although clearly focused on individual figures, Jancsó’s movie does contain an interesting allegory of the fate of his native country as, freed from Nazi oppression, the soldier only reluctantly dons the Russian uniform.

Szegénylegények (The Round-up, literally The Hopeless) established Jancsó as a filmmaker of international importance. The film set in the Hungarian plain in a fort that houses a group of peasants under surveillance following the Kossuth rebellion of 1848, and focuses on the ritual quality of the games played as tormentors and informers and rebels interchange in a mysterious, elliptical dance of human passions. Shot in black and white, the film also revealed Jancsó’s preoccupation with humans dislodged from convention and a purity of style as each meticulously composed shot conveys human passions. Shot in black and white, the film also revealed Jancsó’s preoccupation with humans dislodged from convention andVictima de Maszturbación desolación de la etapa más importante, but this hero often behaves in a most unheroic way as he makes his way home. Set free by the chaos of the war’s end, he is fired upon both by the Russians and the Germans and finally dons a Russian uniform as a protective disguise. Although clearly focused on individual figures, Jancsó’s movie does contain an interesting allegory of the fate of his native country as, freed from Nazi oppression, the soldier only reluctantly dons the Russian uniform.

Szegénylegények (The Round-up, literally The Hopeless) established Jancsó as a filmmaker of international importance. The film set in the Hungarian plain in a fort that houses a group of peasants under surveillance following the Kossuth rebellion of 1848, and focuses on the ritual quality of the games played as tormentors and informers and rebels interchange in a mysterious, elliptical dance of human passions. Shot in black and white, the film also revealed Jancsó’s preoccupation with humans dislodged from convention and a purity of style as each meticulously composed shot conveys human passions. Shot in black and white, the film also revealed Jancsó’s preoccupation with humans dislodged from convention and a purity of style as each meticulously composed shot conveys human passions. very little in his plot, leaving the viewer to wrestle with its obscurities and ellipses.

The claustrophobic qualities of Silence and Cry prepared his audience for Fényes Székék (The Confrontation), set in the immediate post-war world and dealing with students, both Catholic and Communist, who square off in a quadrille interweaving accusation and intimidation. Clearly the film was occasioned by the student riots and sit-ins in 1968–69 in Budapest. It pits the Marxist students as the voice of change and revolution against the conventions of the Catholic students. The plot is minimal and Jancsó’s camera at its most vertiginous, hardly ever stopping in its unceasing search for the truth. The truth, of course, as it so often does, eludes us, as the confrontation finally has more to do with temporary power games than it does with ultimate reality.

In Sirokkó (Winter Wind), made in Yugoslavia as a Franco-Hungarian co-production, he returned to the use of color (as in The Confrontation) and photographed, like Silence and Cry, with a minimum of shots, twelve in this case. The story deals with the historical and political irony of a Croatian anarchist leader of the 1930s who is destroyed by his own forces, only later to be resurrected as a hero. Égi Bárány (Agnus Dei), a favorite film of Jancsó’s and regarded by many Hungarians as his most nationalistic, is once again set in the broad Hungarian plain during the period of civil war, but it is far more symbolic and anticipates the new ground he would explore in his next film.

With Még Kér a Nép (Red Psalm), Jancsó returned to the Puszta and to the end of the last century during a period of peasant unrest. A confrontation between workers and their landowners is interrupted by the army. The subsequent action follows patterns established earlier in Jancsó’s other films. But there is a difference in Red Psalm—the symbolic elements always present in the earlier films become foregrounded: a dead soldier is resurrected by a kiss from a young girl; the soldiers join the peasants in a Maypole dance but eventually surround the rebellious farmers and shoot them down; a girl outside the circle using a gun tied with a red ribbon guns down all of the soldiers. The mannerisms noted by a number of critics are missing here, and Jancsó seems to have found a new direction amidst old material: the symbolism of the film elevates it beyond Jancsó’s usual concerns. Red Psalm exemplifies what is often hidden in his other films: the totality of the film, and the celebration of life in the revolution which will bring joy in the renewed possibilities for human expression and freedom.

Although Miklós Jancsó has gone on to make other films, many of them outside Hungary itself, his body of work from My Way Home to Red Psalm seems to best exemplify his unique contribution to world cinema. Like many of the other new Hungarian filmmakers, Jancsó rejected the traditions of the conservative and classic bound national cinema he inherited, turning to a more liberating and avant-garde style that allowed him not only greater artistic expression but also increased freedom from state censorship. By adopting a more modernist approach, most notably evident in his use of a minimal plot and in the dialectical tensions between the images, he has urged his audiences out of their complacency by challenging the status quo through his questioning of the uses and abuses of state power wielded in the name of the people. This has made his films truly revolutionary.

—Charles L.P. Silet

JARMAN, Derek

Films as Director (short Super-8 Films unless stated otherwise):

1971 Studio Bankside; Miss Gaby; A Journey to Avebury
1972 Garden of Luxor (Burning the Pyramids); Andrew Logan Kisses the Glitterati; Tarot (The Magician)
1973 The Art of Mirrors (Salphur); Building the Pyramids
1974 The Devils at the Elgin (Reworking the Devils); Fire Island; Duggie Fields
1975 Ula’s Fête (Ula’s Chandelier); Picnic at Ray’s; Sebastiane Wrap 1976 Gerald’s Film; Sloane Square, A Room of One’s Own (Removal Party); Houston Texas; Sebastiane (16mm feature)
1977 Jordan's Dance; Every Woman for Herself and All for Art Jubilee (16mm feature)
1979 Broken English (short, Super-8 and 16mm); The Tempest (16mm feature)
1980 In the Shadow of the Sun (includes re-edited versions of earlier 8mm films)
1981 TG Psychic Rally in Heaven
1982 Diese Machine ist mein antihumanistisches Kunstwerk; Pirate Tape (W.S. Burroughs); Pontormo and Punks at Santa Croce
1983 Waiting for Godot (short, Super-8 and video); B2 Tape/Film: The Dream Machine
1984 Catalán (for TV); Imagining October
1985 The Angelic Conversation (Super-8 and video)
1986 The Queen Is Dead (promo videos on Super-8); Caravaggio (35mm feature)
1987 ‘Depuis le jour’ episode of Aria (Super-8 and 35mm); The Last of England (Super-8 feature)
1988 L'Ispirazione; War Requiem (35mm feature)
1990 The Garden (Super-8 and 16mm feature)
1991 Edward II (35mm feature)
1993 Wittgenstein (35mm feature); Blue (35mm feature); Glitterbug (video)

Other Films:

1971 The Devils (Russell) (designs)
1972 Savage Messiah (Russell) (designs)
1975 The Bible (Russell) (sc)
1979 Nighthawks (Peck, Hallam) (role)
1986 Ostia (role)
1987 Prick up Your Ears (Fears) (role)
1988 Behind Closed Doors (role); Derek Jarman: You Know What I Mean; Cactus Land (narration)
1993 There We Are John (role); Love Undefeated: Conversations with Derek Jarman

Publications

By JARMAN: books—

Dancing Ledge, London, 1993
Blue: Text of a Film, New York, 1994.

By JARMAN: articles—

Interview in Film Directions (Belfast), vol. 2, no. 8, 1979.
Interview in American Film (Washington, D.C.), September 1986.
Interview in Filmfaust (Frankfurt), September/October 1986.
Interview with Anne-Marie Hewitt, in Cinema Papers (Melbourne), September 1987.
Interview with D. Heinrich, in Cinéma (Paris), 16 December 1987.
Interview in City Limits (London), 6 July 1989.
Interview in Listener (London), 16 August 1990.

On JARMAN: books—

On JARMAN: articles—

Derek Jarman became one of Britain’s most original and highly controversial filmmakers. Vilified by the self-appointed guardians of the nation’s morals, he has been hailed as a genius by others. It was Jarman’s uncompromising and direct approach to cinema which resulted in such extreme and polarized evaluations of his work. Like Ken Russell, who introduced him to filmmaking by inviting him to design The Devils and Savage Messiah, Jarman consistently assaulted comfortable, conservative assumptions of “good taste.” The powerful and explicit treatment of homo-erotic passion in his work has generated the greatest hostility, with Sebastiane, one of the most erotic and uninhibited British films ever made, the target of a particularly nasty anti-homosexual campaign generated by the tabloid press.

Drawing on personal experience to a greater degree than most British filmmakers, Jarman’s sexuality and his public school/military background profoundly influenced his cinema. He paid tribute to other gay artists such as Caravaggio, deducing his tragic love affair with Ranuccio/Thomasoni from clues in his paintings, and Benjamin Britten, creating stunning images for his War Requiem. He also interpreted the island in Shakespeare’s The Tempest as a metaphor for homosexuality and read his sonnets as homo-erotic love poems, incorporating them into the soundtrack of The Angelic Conversation. Jarman’s films also abound with militaristic images, particularly uniformed authority figures. Such images are often ambivalent, an echo of Jarman’s own relationship with his father, who was a wing commander in the RAF.

Jarman’s later work is more explicitly autobiographical. The Last of England, for example, is constructed around the presence of the artist: the fictional elements of the film are integrated with sequences featuring Jarman working at home and wandering around the streets with a camera. There are also fragments of old home movie footage shot by Jarman’s father and grandfather, including images of the filmmaker as a child playing with his mother and sister. Despite being regarded as subversive by many, Jarman is paradoxically a traditionalist. He is nostalgic for a world uncorrupted by the bourgeois bureaucrats and advertising executives whom he regards as forces controlling our culture. The motif of the garden, that very English symbol of personal spaces, a haven to be cherished and protected, occurs time and time again, particularly in his later work such as The Angelic Conversation, his section for Aria, and The Garden, the title of which relates to Jarman’s own garden at Dungeness on the Kent coast.

Trained as a painter, Jarman’s cinema betrays a diversity of aesthetic influences. In contrast to the dominant literary/theatrical tradition in British cinema, he draws heavily on painting and poetry. He consistently experimented with narrative, from the cut-up collage approach of Jubilee to the poetic open narrative style of his Super-8 work from Imagining October to The Last of England. Such an approach requires an active participation on the part of the audience, often forcing them to impose their own coherence and meaning on the visual and aural collage. This aesthetic eclecticism is reflected in the design of Jarman’s productions, which frequently eschew realism by mixing period costumes and props with modern elements, part of the director’s effort to generate and communicate living ideas and concepts rather than attempt to excavate a dead past. In contrast to the clutter that characterizes much British realist cinema, the interior designs in Jarman’s films are often rather austere, drawing attention to the significance of objects.

Derek Jarman sought to preserve his independence from the aesthetic and ideological compromises inherent in mainstream commercial cinema. This made the task of financing his projects extremely difficult, and he was forced to make his films on shoestring budgets. No other major British filmmaker has consistently worked with such meager resources. The seven-year struggle to raise money for Caravaggio prompted Jarman to return to the Super-8 filmmaking of his pre-Sebastiane days.

By the mid-1980s it was possible to make technically sophisticated experimental films by generating images on Super-8, then transferring this material to video tape for editing and post-production while maintaining the texture and quality of the Super-8 film image in the process. The results have been extremely interesting, culminating in the production of The Last of England, the first full-length British feature film to be made in this way. These experiments confirmed Jarman’s status as a genuine innovator who constantly challenged orthodox approaches to filmmaking. His refusal to be absorbed into the mainstream ensured his integrity as an artist but kept him on the margins of a rather conservative British film culture.

Jarman’s premature death—he was yet another casualty to the scourge of AIDS—robbed the film world of one of its most daring and controversial talents. Among his last films were Wittgenstein and Edward II, both pointed, characteristically outlandish Jarman concoctions which deal with the lives of famous homosexuals. The former charts the life of the influential Viennese philosopher Ludwig Wittgenstein, depicting everything from his family background to his association with Bertrand Russell and John Maynard Keynes, examining the evolution of his ideas as well as his gay relationships with younger men. The latter, detailing the undoing of the title monarch and his lover, serves as an expose of gay oppression throughout the ages. Meanwhile, The Garden is yet another of Jarman’s jarring examinations/condemnations of homophobia. Via striking imagery, he offers comparison between the persecution of gays and the crucifixion of Christ.

Blue (not to be confused with the Krzysztof Kieslowski film of the same title) is a fitting close to Jarman’s career. It is a deeply personal meditation on the artist’s life in the face of his impending demise. The screen is entirely blue, and via narration Jarman exposes his soul as he considers his existence and his struggle with disease.

—Duncan J. Petrie, updated by Rob Edelman

JARMUSCH, Jim

Nationality: American.
Born: Akron, Ohio, 22 January 1953.
Education: Graduated from Columbia University with a Bachelor’s degree in English, 1975; attended New York University Graduate Film School, 1976–79, where he worked as a teaching assistant to his mentor, Nicholas Ray.
Career: With the help of Ray, completed first film, Permanent Vacation, for $10,000, 1980; made The New World with 30 minutes of leftover film, 1982; added another hour’s worth of film to it to make Stranger than Paradise, 1984; directed music videos for the Talking Heads, Big Audio Dynamite, Tom Waits, and Neil Young & Crazy Horse, 1985–96; also recording artist with “The Del-Byzanteens.” Awards: Locarno International Film Festival Golden Leopard, National Society of Film Critics Best Film Award, Cannes Film Festival Camera d’Or, for Stranger than Paradise, 1984; Bodil Festival Best American Film, Robert Festival Best Foreign Film, for Down by Law, 1986; Cannes Film Festival Best Artistic Contribution, for Mystery Train, 1989; Cannes Film Festival Palme d’Or, for Coffee and Cigarettes III (Somewhere in California), 1993; European Film Awards Five Continents Award, for Dead Man, 1995; Camerimage Special Award (shared with Robby Muller) as Best Independent Duo: Director-Cinematographer, 1998; FilmFest Hamburg Douglas Sirk Award, 1999. Address: Lives in a loft in the East Bowery, New York.
Jim Jarmusch

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1980 Permanent Vacation (+ sc, pr, ed, mus)
1982 The New World (Stranger than Paradise, Part One) (short)
1984 Stranger than Paradise (+ ed)
1986 Down by Law
1987 Coffee and Cigarettes (short)
1989 Mystery Train
1989 Coffee and Cigarettes II (Memphis Version) (short) (+ ed)
1992 Night on Earth (+ pr)
1993 Coffee and Cigarettes III (Somewhere in California) (short) (+ ed)
1995 Dead Man

1997 Year of the Horse (doc) (d only, + pr, ph, ro as himself)
1999 Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai (+ pr)

Other Films:

1979 Red Italy (Mitchell) (ro)
1980 Lightning over Water (Nick’s Movie) (Wenders, Ray) (prod asst); Underground U.S.A. (Mitchell) (sound recordist)
1981 Only You (Vogel) (ro); You Are Not I (Driver) (ph, co-sc)
1982 Burroughs (Brookner) (sound recordist); The State of Things (Wenders) (featured songs by The Del-Byzanteens)
1983 Fraulein Berlin (Lambert) (ro); American Autobahn (Degas) (ro)
1984 Sleepwalk (Driver) (ph); American Autobahn (Degas) (ro, ph)
1986 Straight to Hell (Cox) (ro)
1987 Candy Mountain (Wurlitzer, Frank) (ro)
1988 Helsinki Napoli All Night Long (M. Kaurismaki) (ro)
1989 Leningrad Cowboys Go America (A. Kaurismaki) (ro)
1990 Golden Boat (Ruiz) (ro)
1992 In the Soup (Rockwell) (ro)
1993 When Pigs Fly (Driver) (co-exec pr)
1994 Tigrero: A Film That Was Never Made (M. Kaurismaki) (ro); Iron Horsemen (Bad Trip) (Charmant) (ro)
1995 Blue in the Face (Wang, Auster) (ro)
1996 The Typewriter, the Rifle & the Movie Camera (Simon) (ro); Cannes Man (Martini, Shapiro) (ro); Sling Blade (Thornton) (ro)
1997 R.I.P., Rest in Pieces (Pejo) (ro)
1998 Divine Trash (Yeager) (doc) (interviewee)

Publications

By JARMUSCH: articles—

Interview (on Nicholas Ray) with F. Vega, in Casablanca (Madrid), February 1983.
Interview with Harlan Jacobson, in Film Comment (New York), January/February 1985.
Interview in American Cinematographer (Los Angeles), March 1985.
Interview in American Film (Washington, D.C.), October 1986.
Interview with Saskia Baron, in Stills (London), February 1987.
Interview in Cineforum (Bergamo), December 1989.
Interview in Films and Filming (London), December 1989.
Interview with N. Saada, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), January 1996.

On JARMUSCH: articles—

Pally, Marcia, article in Film Comment (New York), July/August 1989.

Fabricius, S., “It’s a Sad and Beautiful World,” in Kosmorama (Copenhagen), Summer 1992.

* * *

In the 1980s, Jim Jarmusch quickly rose to the forefront of young, independent American filmmakers. Recognition has been his from the very beginning with the release of Stranger than Paradise, a work that won a Camera d’Or at the 1984 Cannes Film Festival (for best “first film”) and “Best Picture” from the National Society of Film Critics. The key to Jarmusch’s success is a well-defined and thoughtfully conceived stylistic approach and a coherent circle of interests.

The focal point of all Jarmusch’s work is the apparent contradiction that exists between the popular perception of the American Dream and what that dream actually holds for the individual who doesn’t quite fit in. This contradiction is explored through the interaction of a characteristic ensemble of characters. Each of Jarmusch’s early films is built around a trio of characters, although Mystery Train varies that slightly by using three separate stories to explore this central theme. The characters are all decidedly off-beat, but all seem to have a vision or aspiration which echoes a popular perception of America. The central characters—Tom Waits’ down and out disc jockey in Down by Law, or John Lurie’s small-time pimp in the same film—are forced to confront their misconceptions and misguided dreams when they are thrown together by fate with a foreigner who views this dream as an observer. In Down by Law, for example, the two central characters find themselves in jail with an Italian immigrant who has murdered someone for cheating at cards. The character carries a small notebook of American slang expressions from which he quotes dutifully and incorrectly. He refers to this notebook as “everything I know about America.” It is this kind of character situation that Jarmusch uses to scoff at America he sees as misguided and woefully out of touch with itself.

Stylistically, Jarmusch’s films echo the work of the French “New Wave” directors, in particular the Godard of Breathless and Weekend. Jump-cuts are frequently used to disconnect characters from sublime and rational passages of time and space. A sense of disenfranchisement is created in this way, separating characters from the contingency of space and time which surrounds them. In Down by Law, for example, Tom Waits sits in his cell, then lays on the floor, then lays across his bed, but what seems like “a day in the life” editing approach actually concludes with days having passed, not hours. Jarmusch also uses moving-camera a great deal, but unlike his predecessors in other traditions, his fluid camera style is not functional. Camera movements in films like Down by Law and Mystery Train create a visual world that is always in transition. Down by Law opens with camera movement first right to left down a street in a small town, then left to right. As a result, the audience is introduced, through a visual metaphor, to the collision course that is central to the film’s themes.

Jarmusch capped his early period with Night on Earth, an exhilarating five-part slice-of-life, each of which unravels at the same point in time in Los Angeles, New York, Paris, Rome, and Helsinki. All are set in taxis, and spotlight brief but poignant exchanges between cab driver and passenger. The best of many highlights: the sequence in which a black Brooklynite (Giancarlo Esposito) and an East German refugee (Armin Mueller-Stahl) reveal their names to each other. Jarmusch’s point is that people are people, whether black or white, American or French or Finnish.

The filmmaker then disappointed with Dead Man, a well-intentioned but annoyingly obvious allegorical Western. Dead Man charts the experiences of a young man named William Blake (Johnny Depp), a bespeckled Cleveland accountant who arrives in a grubby, mud-soaked Western town and promptly finds himself accused of murder and wanted by the law. Jarmusch’s point of view is without argument: America is a violent country, founded on bloodletting and bloodletting alone. But the problem with the film is that his portrait of America-the-violent is all-too-obvious, and anything but subtle. One of the film’s few female characters keeps a gun in her bed. “This is America,” is her reason for doing so. Blake eventually crosses paths with an Indian who is symbolically named Nobody; after all, in the quest to achieve “manifest destiny,” did not the white man render the American Indian anonymous? (In the film’s cleverest touch, Nobody mistakes Blake for the poet-painter of the same name returned to life.) Eventually, and predictably, William Blake becomes a for-real killer—but just as predictably, Nobody is the far more interesting character. He is a spiritual man, the lone one in the story. Even Blake, whom he befriends, is too dense to comprehend the Indian’s worldview. Meanwhile, all the white men endlessly shoot at each other, often with fatal results. One of them, a celebrated bounty hunter, even has a sideline as a cannibal. In one scene, he dines by a campfire on what clearly are the remains of a severed hand. It is here where you will be thankful that Jarmusch has chosen to shoot the film in beautiful black and white. In Dead Man, Jarmusch casts screen veteran Robert Mitchum as the semi-demented industrialist who is the town’s key powerbroker. Mitchum is on-screen ever so briefly, but his presence is one of the film’s few highlights.
After directing Year of the Horse, an affectionate documentary chronicling Neil Young & Crazy Horse’s 1996 concert tour, Jarmusch ended the 1990s with Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai. The film is thematically linked to Dead Man in that it contrasts a knowing, spiritual racial minority and mindlessly violent white men. But the difference between the two is that Ghost Dog is a compelling film, a thoughtful and multi-leveled rumination on age-old enlightenment pitted against modern-era dysfunction. Ghost Dog is a portrait of the title character (Forest Whitaker), an African-American contract killer who is a loner, alienated and cut off from the American mainstream. In a classic Jarmusch touch, his one friend, an ice cream vendor, speaks only French; Ghost Dog does not understand that language, yet the two men somehow communicate clearly and understand each other perfectly.

Ghost Dog has earned his nickname because, professionally speaking, he is “like a ghost,” and is “totally untraceable.” He also is fascinated by the disciplines and philosophy of the samurai, and lives by the codes of the 18th-century Japanese text The Hagakure: The Way of the Samurai. This allows him to understand the meaning of loyalty, and so he remains faithful to his boss, a small-time hood who once saved his life. During the course of the film, Ghost Dog is pitted against a gang of Italian mobsters; he is shown to be their superior because he is philosophical—he has firm, grounded beliefs—while they are fallible because they are mindless. The Italians casually whack each other, or any innocent citizen who happens to be in their way, and they order Ghost Dog killed because he has the temerity to spare the life of a young girl who is present during one of his hits. But Ghost Dog will persevere, because the wisdom that permeates his soul is pure and true. Conversely, the Italians are doomed because they are as dysfunctional as they are amoral.

Ghost Dog: The Way of the Samurai is loaded with the ironic, caustic humor that is so typically Jarmusch: the Italian gangsters are disbelieving when they learn that the hit man is called Ghost Dog, yet they remain oblivious to their own ludicrous nicknames (such as Sammy the Snake). Also throughout the film, Jarmusch employs the image of birds as a metaphor for independence; Ghost Dog communicates with his boss via carrier pigeon, and there are recurring shots of birds flying in the sky.

Jarmusch also is not averse to working in the short film format. In 1987 he made Coffee and Cigarettes, in which an American (Steven Wright) and an Italian (Roberto Benigni) meet in a cafe and converse over coffee and cigarettes. Jarmusch reworked the film’s concept and structure twice more: Coffee and Cigarettes II (Memphis Version), made two years later, in which an argument between twins Joie and Cinque Lee is intruded on by an overly earnest waiter (Steve Buscemi); and Coffee and Cigarettes III (Somewhere in California), made four years after that, this time featuring a barroom conversation between Iggy Pop and Tom Waits.

Jarmusch’s cool style and strangers-in-a-strange-land subject matter have influenced other filmmakers. Cold Fever, a likable 1995 Icelandic feature co-produced and co-scripted by Jarmusch colleague Jim Stark and directed by Fridrik Thor Fridriksson, chronicles a Japanese businessman’s odyssey across Iceland to perform a memorial ritual at the spot where his parents had died seven years earlier.

Like other emerging filmmakers of his generation, such as Spike Lee, Jim Jarmusch approaches the American way of life with a sense of hip cynicism. A product of contemporary American film school savvy, Jarmusch incorporates a sense of film history, style, and awareness in his filmmaking approach. The tradition which he has chosen to follow, the one which offers him the most freedom, is that established by filmmakers such as Chabrol, Godard, and Truffaut in the 1950s and 1960s.

—Rob Winning, updated by Rob Edelman

JENNINGS, Humphrey

Films as Director:

1938 Penny Journey
1939 Spare Time (+ sc); Speaking from America; SS Ionian (Her Last Trip); The First Days (A City Prepares) (co-d)
1940 London Can Take It (co-d); Spring Offensive (An Unrecorded Victory); Welfare of the Workers (co-d)
1941 Heart of Britain (This Is England); Words for Battle (+ sc)
1942 Listen to Britain (co-d, co-sc, co-ed)
1943 Fires Were Started (I Was a Fireman) (+ sc); The Silent Village (+ pr, sc)
1944 The Eighty Days (+ pr); The True Story of Lilli Marlene (+ sc); VI (+ pr)
1945 A Diary for Timothy (+ sc)
1946 A Defeated People
1947 The Cumberland Story (+ sc)
1949 Dim Little Island (+ pr)
1950 Family Portrait (+ sc)

Other Films:

1934 Post-Haste (ed); Pett and Pott (Cavalcanti) (sets ed, role as grocer); Glorious Sixth of June (Cavalcanti) (role as telegraph boy); The Story of the Wheel (ed)
1935 Locomotives (ed)
1936 The Birth of a Robot (Lye) (color direction and production)

Publications

By JENNINGS: books—

The Humphrey Jennings Film Reader, edited by Kevin Jackson, Manchester, 1993.
On JENNINGS: books—

On JENNINGS: articles—

Wright, Basil, “‘Humphrey Jennings,’” in Sight and Sound (London), December 1950.
Lambert, Gavin, “‘Jennings’ Britain,’” in Sight and Sound (London), May 1951.

‘‘Jennings Issue’’ of Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Winter 1961/62.

Sharatsky, R.E., “‘Humphrey Jennings: Artist of the British Documentary,’” special issue of Film Library Quarterly (New York), vol. 8, no. 3–4, 1975.
Zaniello, T.A., ‘‘Humphrey Jennings’ Film Family Portrait: The Velocity of Imagistic Change,’’ in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), no. 1, 1979.

‘‘Humphrey Jennings,’’ in Film Dope (London), December 1983.

Britton, A., “‘Their Finest Hour: Humphrey Jennings and the British Imperial Myth of WWII,’” in Cineaction (Toronto), no. 18, Fall 1989.

* * *

Though Jennings was (from 1934 on) part of the Grierson documentary group, he was never fully part of it. Grierson regarded him as something of a dilettante; Jennings’ tastes and interests were subtler and gentler than Grierson’s. It wasn’t until Grierson had left England to become wartime head of the National Film Board of Canada that Jennings gained creative control over the films on which he worked. The outbreak of World War II seemed to let loose in Jennings a special poetic eloquence, and his finest work was done at the Crown Film Unit during the war years. Listen to Britain, Fires Were Started, and A Diary for Timothey are generally regarded as his masterpieces.

Jennings was part of the English intellectual aristocracy. Extremely well educated, he had done a good deal of research into English literature and cultural history. He was also a surrealist painter and poet. In his wartime films his deep-felt affection for English tradition mingles with impressionist observations of the English people under the stress of war. Rather than following the sociological line of the Griersonian documentaries of the 1930s, Jennings offered a set of cultural notations—sights and sounds, people and places—illuminated by his very special aesthetic sensibility and complete mastery of the technique of the black and white sound film. His films present an idealized English tradition in which class tensions do not appear. They record and celebrate contemporary achievement in preserving a historical heritage, along with commonplace decencies and humor in the face of an enemy threat. They also are experiments with form, of such breathtaking distinctiveness that they never really have been imitated. (Though Lindsay Anderson and other Free Cinema filmmakers would later acknowledge the importance of Jennings’s work to them as inspiration, the Free Cinema films are radically different from Jennings’s films in what they say about England, and are also much simpler in form.)

Listen to Britain, a short, is a unique impressionistic mosaic of images and sounds, including much music (as is usual in Jennings’ work)—a sort of free-association portrait of a nation at a particular historical moment. The feature-length Fires Were Started carries the understated emotionality of the British wartime semi-documentary form to a kind of perfection: a very great deal about heroic effort and quiet courage is suggested through an austere yet deeply moving presentation of character and simple narrative. In A Diary for Timothey, which runs about forty minutes, Jennings attempted to fuse the impressionism of Listen to Britain with the narrativity of Fires Were Started. In its formal experimentation it is the most complex and intricate of all Jennings’s films.

With the Germans massed across the Channel, and bombs and then rockets being dropped on Britain, the British people needed a kind of emotional support different from the wartime psychological needs in other countries. In rising to this particular occasion Jennings became one of the few British filmmakers whose work might be called poetic. He is also one of a small international company of film artists whose propaganda for the state resulted in lasting works of art.

484

—Jack C. Ellis

JEWISON, Norman

Nationality: Canadian. Born: Toronto, Ontario, 21 July 1926. Education: Malvern Collegiate Institute; Victoria College, University of Toronto, B.A., 1945; studied piano and music theory at the Royal Conservatory. Military Service: Served in the Royal Canadian Navy. Family: Married Margaret Ann Dixon, 1953; two sons, one daughter. Career: Actor and scriptwriter in London, 1950–52; producer and director, Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, 1953–58; director for CBS, New York, won several Emmy awards, 1958–61; moved to Hollywood, 1961; after directing first feature, 40 Pounds of Trouble, signed a seven-picture contract with Universal, 1963; executive producer, The Judy Garland Show, for television, 1963–64; moved to MGM for The Cincinnati Kid, 1965; moved to the top rank of Hollywood directors with the award-winning In the Heat of the Night, 1968; maintains an office in London and a residence in Malibu, but primarily works out of his native Toronto, where he is the founder and co-chairman of the Canadian Center for Advanced Film Studies. Awards: Best Picture Academy Award, Best Picture Golden Globe, British Academy Award UN Award, for In the Heat of the Night, 1968; Officer, Order of Canada, 1982; honored by the American Civil Liberties Union, 1984; Berlin Film Festival Silver Bear, for Moonstruck, 1988; Hollywood Film Festival Hollywood Discovery Award for Outstanding Achievement in Directing, 1998; Irving G. Thalberg Memorial Award, 1999; Berlin Film Festival Prize of the Guild of German Art House Cinemas, for The Hurricane, 1999; Camerimage Lifetime Achievement Award, 1999; Honorary LL.D, University of Western Ontario. Address: Yorktown Productions Ltd., 18 Glouster Lane, 4th Floor, Toronto, Ontario M4X IL5, Canada.

Films as Director:

1962 40 Pounds of Trouble
1963 The Thrill of It All
1964 Send Me No Flowers
1965 The Art of Love; The Cincinnati Kid
1966 The Russians Are Coming, the Russians Are Coming (+ pr)
1967 In the Heat of the Night
1968 The Thomas Crown Affair (+ pr)
1969 Gaily, Gaily (Chicago, Chicago) (+ pr)
1971 Fiddler on the Roof (+ pr)
1973 Jesus Christ Superstar (+ co-pr, co-sc)
1975 Rollerball (+ pr)
1978 F.I.S.T. (+ pr)
1979 . . . And Justice for All (+ co-pr)
1982 Best Friends (+ co-pr)
1984 A Soldier’s Story (+ co-pr)
1985 Agnes of God (+ co-pr)
1988 Moonstruck (+ co-pr)
1989 In Country (+ co-pr)
1991 Other People’s Money (+ pr)
1994 Only You (+ pr)
1995 Bogus (+ pr)
1999 The Hurricane (+ pr)

Other Films:

1949 Canadian Pacific (Marin) (uncredited ro)
1970 The Landlord (Ashby) (pr)
1973 Billy Two Hats (Kotcheff) (co-pr)
1980 The Dogs of War (Irvin) (exec pr)
1984 Iceman (Schepisi) (co-pr)
1989 January Man (O’Connor) (pr)
1994 Dance Me Outside (McDonald) (co-exec pr); A Century of Cinema (Thomas) (doc) (interviewee)
1996 The Stupids (Landis) (ro)
1997 An Alan Smithee Film: Burn Hollywood Burn (Smithee, Hiller) (ro)
1998 Steve McQueen: The King of Cool (Katz—for TV) (doc) (interviewee)
2000 The Incredible Mr. Limpet (pr)

Publications

By JEWISON: articles—

Interview in Directors at Work, edited by Bernard Kantor and others, New York, 1970.
Interview with C. Tadros, in Cinema Canada (Montreal), September 1985.

On JEWISON: articles—

Article in American Film (New York), July 1990.
“Filmmografie,” in Segnocinema (Vicenza, Italy), March/April 1992.

* * *

The very model of the modern up-market commercial director, Norman Jewison seems cut out to make the kind of prestige pictures once handled at MGM by Clarence Brown and Victor Fleming. No theme is so trashy or threadbare that he cannot elevate it by stylish technique and apt casting into a work of merit, even on occasion art. Early work with an aging and cantankerous Judy Garland marked him as a man at ease with the cinema’s sacred monsters; in the indifferent sex comedies of the early 1960s, he acquired equal skill with the pastels of Hollywood color and the demands of widescreen. A recognizable Jewison style was first evident in The Cincinnati Kid. Its elements—rich crimsons; the sheen of faces, tanned or sweating, in shadowed rooms; an edgy passion in performance—reappeared in In the Heat of the Night and The Thomas Crown Affair, novelettes redeemed by their visual flair and a sensual relish, not for sex, but for the appurtenances of power.

Not at home in domestic or comic realms, Jewison brought little to Ben Hecht’s film memoir Gaity, Gaity, the literary episodess of The Landlord, or comedies like Best Friends. Two musicals, Fiddler on the Roof and Jesus Christ, Superstar, did, however, offer an invitation to location-shooting and unconventional staging which Jewison confidently accepted. Though little liked on release, the latter shows a typical imagination and sensuality applied to the subject, which Jewison relocated in contemporary Israel to spectacular effect. Rollerball, his sole essay in science fiction, belongs with Thomas Crown in its relish for high life. The film’s strength lies not in its portrayal of the eponymous gladiatorial game but its depiction of the dark glamour of life among the future power elite.

A pattern of one step forward, two steps backward, dominated Jewison’s career into the 1980s. The Israel-shot western Billy Two Hats was a notable miscalculation, as was the Sylvester Stallone union melodrama F.I.S.T., a program picture that needed to be an epic to survive. He was on surer ground in . . . And Justice for All, a dark and sarcastic comedy/drama about the idiocy of the law, with a credible Al Pacino in command. But films like the post-Vietnam melodrama In Country did little to enhance his reputation. It is a cause for concern that he could never put together his projected musical remake of Grand Hotel, whose elements seem precisely those with which he works most surely. A taint of the high-class advertising lay-out characterizes Jewison’s best work, just as the style and technique of that field rescues his often banal material.

Among Jewison’s 1990s films are Other People’s Money (about an all-consumingly greedy Wall Street type, a role tailor-made for Danny De Vito) and Only You (the story of an incurable romantic and her quest for true love)—both well-crafted and likeable but never truly memorable. The same might be said for 1988’s Moonstruck, among the biggest hits of the latter stages of his career, a popular comedy of life among New York City’s ethnic Italians. The film was a box-office smash and earned Cher an Academy Award. Yet while entertaining, on closer examination the film is all Hollywood gloss. It fails to authentically capture a true sense of its characters and their down-home ethnicity in a way that independent director Nancy Savoca, working on a minuscule budget compared to Jewison’s, succeeds so brilliantly in doing in True Love and Household Saints.

Another project that Jewison had an interest in never came to fruition. The director originally had wanted to film an account of the life of Malcolm X, but he gave up the project upon Spike Lee’s protestations that only a black filmmaker could do justice to the story. But Jewison did complete his trio of heartfelt, humanistic treatises on racism (following In the Heat of the Night and A Soldier’s Story). At the tail end of the 1990s he made The Hurricane, the story of real-life middleweight boxing contender Rubin “Hurricane” Carter, who was falsely convicted of committing a triple murder and spent years in prison before being exonerated. The film was well crafted and impeccably acted (particularly by Denzel Washington, playing Carter), but no sooner did it open theatrically than it earned condemnation for allegedly toying with the facts in the case. In The Hurricane, three Canadians are portrayed as being responsible for uncovering the evidence that cleared Carter, yet the real heroes actually were the boxer’s lawyers. Former middleweight champ Joey Giardello sued the film’s producers, claiming that his 1964 title bout with Carter was inaccurately portrayed on screen; according to the suit, the implication that Carter lost because of racial prejudice on the part of the judges was erroneous. These allegations led New York Daily News film critic Jack Mathews to remove The Hurricane from his 1999 Top Ten films list. Without doubt, the controversy obscured the film’s high artistic merit—and may have prevented it from earning Best Picture and Best Director Academy Award nominations.

Beyond the contention surrounding The Hurricane, a cynic might condemn Jewison for the idealistic liberalism on view in In the Heat of the Night, A Soldier’s Story, and The Hurricane. Yet it must be remembered that In the Heat of the Night, and its portrait of the professional respect that evolves between Rod Steiger’s red-necked, small-town Southern sheriff and Sidney Poitier’s Northern urban policeman, was made at a key juncture in the then-evolving civil rights movement. It is a courageous film for its time. And A Soldier’s Story, a vivid adaptation of Charles Fuller’s Pulitzer Prize-winning play about the murder of a black military officer in the 1940s, was made pre-Spike Lee, in the early 1980s, when precious few serious-minded films about the black-American experience were being produced in Hollywood.

—John Baxter, updated by Rob Edelman

JIREŠ, Jaromil

Nationality: Czech. Born: Bratislava, 10 December 1935. Education: Film technical school, Cmelice; the FAMU Film Faculty, Prague, graduate in photography, 1958, and direction, 1960. Family: Married Hana Jirešová. Career: Worked with Polycran and the Magic Lantern, 1960–62; director of feature films, Barrandov Film Studio, from 1963; director of documentary films at Short Film Studio, from 1963; director of feature films at Barrandov Film, 1961; also TV director, from 1974, specialising in opera and ballet, late 1980s; president of Association of Czech Film Directors, from 1992. Awards: Great Prize, Oberhausen, for The Romance, 1966; Prize San Sebastian, for The Joke, 1969; Grand Premio, Bergamo, 1970, and Silver Hugo, Chicago, 1973, for Valerie and the Week of Wonders; Silver Prize, Berlin, 1982, and Best Director, Calcutta, 1992; Great Prize, Harare, for Helimadoe, 1994. Address: Na ostrohu 42, Praha 6, 160 00, Czech Republic.

Films as Director:

1958 Horečka (Fever) (doc) (+ sc)

1959 Strojda (Uncle) (+ sc)

1960 Sál ztracených kroků (The Hall of Lost Steps) (+ sc, ph); Stopky (Footprints); Polycran pro BVV (Polycran for the Brno Industrial Fair) (co-d); La salle des pas perdus (The Waiting Room) (doc)

1961 Polycran pro Mezinárodní výstavu práce Turín (Polycran for International Exposition of Labor Turin) (co-d)

1962 Houslový koncert (The Violin Concert) (co-d, Magic Lantern program)

1963 Krik (The Cry) (+ co-sc)

1964 “Romance” episode of Perličky na dně (Pearls in the Deep) (+ sc)

1965 Srub (The Log Cabin) (+ sc); Fuga (for TV)

1966 Občan Karel Havlíček (Citizen Karel Havlíček) (doc) (+ co-sc)

1967 Hra na krále (The King Game) (+ sc)

1968 Zert (The Joke) (+ sc); Don Juan 68 (doc) (+ sc); Dédaček (Granpa) (doc) (+ sc)

1969 Cesta do Prahy Vincente Mošteka a Simona Pešla z Včnova l.p. The Journey of Vincenc Moštek and Simon Pešl of Včnov to Prague, 1969 A.D. (doc) (co-d, co-sc); Tribunal (doc)

1970 Valerie a týden diva (Valerie and a Week of Wonders) (+ sc); Il Divino Boemo (doc) (+ sc)

1972 . . . a pozdravují vlašovky (My Love to the Swallows) (+ sc)

1973 Kasař (The Safe Cracker) (doc) (+ sc)

1974 Lidé z metra (The People from the Metro) (+ co-sc); Leoš Janáček (+ sc, for TV)

1976 Ostrov stříbrných volavek (The Island of Silver Herons)

1977 Talife nad Velkým Malíkovem (Flying Saucers over the Great Littletown) (+ sc)

1978 Mladý muž a bílá velryba (The Young Man and the White Whale) (+ sc); Diary of One Who’s Disappeared (for TV)

1979 Causa králik (The Rabbit Case) (+ sc)

1980 Svět Alfonso Muchy (The World of Alphonse Mucha) (doc) (+ sc); Věky domů (Escapes Home) (+ co-sc); Bohuslav Martinů (for TV)

1981 Opera ve vinici (Opera in the Vineyard) (+ sc)

1982 Kouzelna Praha Rudolfa II (The Magic Prague of Rudolph II) (doc) (+ sc); Nejplné zatmění (Partial Eclipse) (co=sc)

1983 Katapult (Catapult)

1984 Prodloužený č (Partial Eclipse for TV)

1985 Bambini di Praga (doc)

1986 Dialogue of Forms (ballet, for TV)

1987 Lev s bílou hřívou (The Lion with the White Mane); I Love NY: Sidney Lumet (doc); F. Murray Abraham: Man and Actor (doc)

1988 Dialogue with Conscience of the Past (for TV)

1989 Memento Mori (for TV); Vive la musique et la liberté (for TV)

1990 Antonín Dvořák (for TV)

1991 The Labyrinth (+ co-sc)

1992 Requiem for Those Who Overlived (doc); . . . About Jaroslav Havlíček (doc); Mimikry (ballet, for TV); Music and Faith (for TV)

1993 Helimadoe; New York Diary—Alexander Hackenschmied (doc); GEN—Jiří Anderle (doc); GEN—Josef Skvorecký (doc); Music and Pain (for TV); Bambini di Praga (for TV)

1994 Teacher of Dance

1995 GEN—Miloš Kopecký (doc); Rodin (doc)

1999 Dvojrole

Publications

By JIREŠ: articles—

Interview with E. Zaoralová, in Film a Doba (Prague), February 1981.

Interview in Czechoslovak Film, no. 1, 1982.
JOFFÉ, Roland

Nationality: English. Born: London, 17 November 1945. Education: Attended Manchester University. Career: Co-founder of the Young Vic and former member of the National Theater under Laurence Olivier; moved into television and made various documentaries as well as dramatic series; started big-screen production in mid-1980s with emphases on both the grandeur of the visual and the complexity of politics and religion. Awards: Golden Palm, Cannes International Film Festival, for The Mission, 1986.

Films as Director:

1978 The Legend Hall Bombing (for TV); The Spongers (for TV)
1979 No, Mama, No (for TV)
1981 United Kingdom (for TV)
1984 The Killing Fields
1986 The Mission
1989 Fat Man and Little Boy (+ co-sc)
1992 City of Joy (+ co-pr)
1995 The Scarlet Letter (+ co-pr)
Roland Joffé

1999
Goodbye Lover

2000
Vatel

Other Films:

1991
Made in Bangkok (pr)

1999
Waterproof (Berman) (pr); Undressed (series for TV) (exec pr)

Publications

By JOFFÉ: book—

City of Joy: The Illustrated Story of the Film (A Newmarket Pictorial Moviebook), with Mark Medoff, Jake Eberts, and Dominique Lapierre, New York, 1992.

By JOFFÉ: articles—

On JOFFÉ: articles—

Filmmography, in Segnocinema (Vicenza), March/April 1996.

Dunne, Michael, “The Scarlet Letter on Screen: Ninety Years of Revisioning,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), January 1997.
Often compared with that of David Lean, the famed epic master of a generation ago, Roland Joffé’s filmic career to date has proven to be an uneven one. Despite several noble attempts to render the grandeur of idealism and the complexity of politics, religions, and history, Joffé often falls short of the truly large-scale perspectives and touches of genuine humanity that underline Lean’s masterpieces, such as The Bridge on the River Kwai and Lawrence of Arabia. Having worked quite extensively in both theater and television, Joffé made his big-screen debut with 1984’s The Killing Fields, produced by arguably the most influential British producer of the 1980s, David Puttnam. A story about an interracial friendship set in the time of the genocide in Cambodia during the mid-1970s, The Killing Fields strives to capture the universal spirit of humanity that binds people, despite their differences. A group of Western reporters are rescued by Dith Pran (played by Dr. Haing S. Ngor). The high drama unfolds when those Westerners realize that they are not capable of rescuing their Cambodian friend, their life saver, in return. The beautifully done cinematography and excellent soundtrack of “Nessun Dorma” from Puccini’s Turandot nonetheless fail to save the feeble (when stripped of all its flamboyant superficiality) narrative in its attempt to document one of the most monstrous tragedies in human history.

The highly problematic, revisionist portrayal of South American history during the mid-eighteenth century in The Mission calls for even more scrutiny. Two Jesuit missionaries, played by high-profile Jeremy Irons and Robert De Niro, participate in the resistance against the intermingled conflicts with Spain, Portugal, the Pope, and many a merchant whose monetary concerns dictate their actions. The end result is “calamitous . . . : the Battle of Caibale (1756), during which [the two Jesuit leaders], several other Jesuits, and some 1500 Indians die,” according to Michael Dempsey. Speaking of the seemingly licensed fictionality of the two key Jesuit characters, Joffé refers to “liberation theology” in saying that “The film in that sense is intimately concerned with the struggle for liberation in liberation theology, and that’s why the historical perspective is very important, because what it’s actually saying is that these people haven’t come out of nowhere” [emphasis mine]. It is then Joffé and his team’s historical perspectives that enable them, as Dempsey aptly puts it, to “re-oppress the people with overhearing film technology and appropriate their story for a grandiose prestige spectacle.”

The little-noticed Fat Man and Little Boy, a story about the creation of the atom bomb, failed even with the star power of Paul Newman. Following that was City of Joy, a story celebrating spirituality as the link that crosses all boundaries. Set in Calcutta, City of Joy seems to be over-fascinated with the city itself. As Joffé himself enthusiastically confessed in a publicity essay, Calcutta “taught me, in its complexity, its passion, anger and pettiness, that our individual failings are no more or less than the failings of the species; as there are no perfect individuals, there are no perfect races.” In this spirit, what is being presented in this movie are two individuals, one American (Max, played by Patrick Swayze) and the other Indian (Hasari Pal, played by Om Puri). What they have in common is that they both are not perfect. The problematized narrative falls into an almost stereotypical treatment of interracial relationships. Max’s spiritual fulfillment comes with the ability to help with Hasari’s material needs (for example, the medallion which provides for her daughter’s dowry), while Hasari, though sometimes distrustful and even jealous, is nonetheless a rescuer for the American, who is easily beaten by and lost in the immense (both human—the oppressive ganglord’s son—and natural—the monsoon season) primitiveness of Calcutta.

After tracing Roland Joffé filmic career to date, Steven Jenkins’s astute observation particularly rings true. “One has the feeling that in his striving for epic, the ‘big picture’ indeed, Joffé would like to be David Lean . . . But the interrelationship between character and backdrop in The Bridge on the River Kwai and Lawrence of Arabia seems ideologically more complex and rigorously scrutinized than anything here.” Despite the consistently stunning visuals in Joffé’s films, one cannot help but feel an imbalance, one that tilts between an historical and ideological monstrosity gotten out of hand and a simple-minded heroism blown out of proportion.

—Guo-Juin Hong

---

JORDAN, Neil

Nationality: Irish. Born: Sligo County, Ireland, 25 February 1950. Education: Read History and literature at University College, Dublin. Career: Formed Irish Writers’ Co-op, 1974; had his first collection of short stories, Night in Tunisia, published, 1976; worked as a “creative associate” on John Boorman’s Excalibur, in fringe theatre, and as a writer, before making his directorial debut with Angel, 1982; made his first American film, High Spirits, 1988; directed music videos for The Pogues and Kirsty MacColl. Awards: Guardian Prize for fiction, for A Night in Tunisia, 1979; London Critics Circle Best Film and Best Director, Fantasporto Critics Award and Audience Jury Award and International Fantasy Film Award, for The Company of Wolves, 1984; Palme d’Or, Cannes Festival, and De Sica Award, Sorrento Festival, for Mona Lisa, 1986; Best Screenplay Academy Award, Alexander Korda Award for Best British Film British Academy Award, Writers Guild of America Best Screenplay Written Directly for the Screen, Best Foreign Film Independent Spirit Award, New York Film Critics Circle Best Screenplay, for The Crying Game, 1992; Venice Film Festival Golden Lion, for Michael Collins, 1996; Berlin Film Festival Silver Berlin Bear, for The Butcher Boy, 1997; Brussels International Film Festival Crystal Iris, 1998; Brussels International Film Festival Silver Raven for In Dreams, 1999; Best Adapted Screenplay British Academy Award, for The End of the Affair, 1999. Address: 6 Sorrento Terrace, Dalkey County, Dublin, Ireland

Films as Director:

- 1982 Angel (Danny Boy) (+ sc)
- 1984 The Company of Wolves (+ sc)
- 1986 Mona Lisa (+ co-sc)
- 1988 High Spirits (+ sc)
- 1989 We’re No Angels
- 1991 The Miracle (+ sc)
- 1992 The Crying Game (+ sc)
- 1994 Interview with the Vampire
- 1996 Michael Collins (+ sc)
Neil Jordan

1997  The Butcher Boy (+ co-sc, exec pr)
1999  In Dreams (+ co-sc); The End of the Affair (+ sc, pr)

Other Films:

1981  Excalibur (Boorman) (creative associate); Traveller (Comerford) (sc)
1999  The Last September (Warner) (co-exec pr)

Publications

By JORDAN: books—

By JORDAN: articles—

Interview with M. Open, in Film Directions (Belfast), vol. 5, no. 17, 1982.
Interview in City Limits (London), 8 December 1988.

‘‘Irish Eyes,’’ interview with M. Glicksman in Film Comment (New York), January/February 1990.

On JORDAN: articles—

Barra, Alan, ‘‘Here Comes Mr. Jordan,’’ in American Film (Los Angeles), January 1990.

McDonagh, M., ‘‘Sex, Politics, and Identity Clash in Neil Jordan’s Crying Game,’’ in Film Journal, December 1992.

Conant, J. ‘‘Lestat, c’est moi,’’ in Esquire (New York), March 1994.

* * *

The film career of Neil Jordan could be said to parallel the fortunes of the British film industry during the 1980s. He made a stunning impact with his first two films. Angel was arguably the most accomplished film-making debut sponsored by Channel 4, while The Company of Wolves was the first feature to be produced by Palace, one of the more exciting film companies to emerge in the decade. Mona Lisa consolidated his reputation as a distinctive and visionary filmmaker. However, by the end of the decade both Jordan and the British film industry seemed to have run out of steam. In comparison with his earlier work, the more overtly commercial High Spirits and We’re No Angels can only be described as mediocre and sadly lacking in ideas. While the director recovered in the early 1990s with The Crying Game, a film that rode a wave of publicity to an unlikely level of financial success, his subsequent features have been astoundingly uneven. While always expertly crafted, his more mainstream projects generally have been disappointing; meanwhile, his more personal ones have been consistently outstanding.

At its most successful, Jordan’s cinema demonstrates his ability to make the familiar seem strange and in doing so to question our assumptions about the nature of the world. All his films revolve to some extent around the idea that reality is complex and multi-faceted. Jordan’s characters often encounter nightmare worlds that they must negotiate rather than push aside precisely because they are unacknowledged dimensions of reality. Angel and Mona Lisa, for instance, are similar in structure; each deals with individuals who become inadvertently caught up in personal nightmares which threaten to destroy them: Danny with sectarian violence and bloody revenge and George with the hellish underworld of teenage prostitution and drug addiction.

The idea of the nightmare world is given a more literal rendition in The Company of Wolves. Based on a short story by Angela Carter, the film is a reworking of the Little Red Riding Hood story, a bizarre and sumptuous mixture of fairy tale, gothic horror, and Freudian psychosanalysis which betrays a rich variety of cinematic influences, from Cocteau through Michael Powell and Hammer horror to Laughton’s Night of the Hunter. The film explicitly challenges the spurious division between reality and fantasy by setting up two distinct worlds: the ‘‘real’’ world of the girl asleep in bed, suffering from the onset of her first menstrual period, and the ‘‘dream world’’ of Rosaleane and her granny, set in a magical forest which was entirely constructed in a studio. At the film’s conclusion, the barrier between these two worlds is broken down; the wolves from the dream invade the sleeping girl’s bedroom by smashing through a picture and the window.

It follows that symbolism is extremely important in Jordan’s work. The Company of Wolves is rife with symbolic images relating to sexuality and procreation. Mona Lisa employs such devices to explore the film’s central thematic concern with innocence and corruption. Images relating to childhood, and by extension innocence—the white rabbit, the silly glasses, the old woman’s shoe, the dwarves—are juxtaposed with scenes of degradation, depravity, and violence. In Angel lost innocence is again explored. Danny’s decision to swap his saxophone for a gun effectively symbolizes the idea of the heavenly musician turned avenging angel. It is precisely the ambiguity of Danny—a figure who straddles the divine/demonic divide—which gives the film its power. Initially repulsed by the violence that claims an angelic deaf-mute girl, Danny becomes a cold-blooded killer himself in his pursuit of the perpetrators. In comparison, the religious symbolism in We’re No Angels seems rather clumsy and sentimental.

Despite being a powerful piece of cinema, there were indications in Mona Lisa that Jordan had begun to lose his sense of direction. The film lacks the moral ambiguity that made Angel so challenging. George remains a rather naive and socially inept character, his uncomplicated and thoroughly ‘‘decent’’ moral code at odds with the world in which he becomes involved, a world he cannot begin to understand. But his naivete is too overwhelming to be credible, and his social ineptitude borders on cliché. Unlike Angel and The Company of Wolves, the resolution of Mona Lisa is rather cozy and contrived; George returns to ‘‘normality,’’ apparently none the worse for his traumatic experience.

Significantly, Jordan also attempted to lighten Mona Lisa by introducing comic elements, courtesy of the eccentric character Thomas, played by Robbie Coltrane. This familiar strategy in British cinema more often than not serves to blunt a film’s cutting edge. High Spirits and We’re No Angels demonstrate rather painfully that Jordan does not have a feel for comedy. The former relies on unimaginative stereotypes and comic cliché, while the latter descends at times into messy slapstick reminiscent of Abbott and Costello or the Three Stooges. Indeed, apart from the odd visual touch it is virtually impossible to recognize the latter film as the work of the person who made Angel or The Company of Wolves. After the debacle of We’re No Angels, Jordan sensibly returned to Ireland. There he directed The Miracle, an atmospheric, subtly sensuous coming-of-age drama. The scenario’s focus is on James and Rose, alienated adolescents who perceive the world with the type of poetic cynicism that is the license of bright, bored teens. James’s father is introduced as a widower who drinks too much and plays bad music in a ten-cent dance hall. One day a pretty mystery woman (Beverly D’Angelo) comes to town. James and Rose are fascinated by her, and he soon begins wooing her. But he is unaware of her true identity, and Jordan proceeds to throw a curve ball at his audience that rivals the one thrown in Jordan’s next film, The Crying Game. It turns out that the woman is none other than James’s mother.

The Crying Game was a sensation, a feature which the film media extolled as a ‘must-see.’ The praise was warranted, for The Crying Game is inventive and entertaining, and it spotlights what was to become one of the most talked-about celluloid plot twists in screen history. It begins as a bleak political drama in which a kidnapped black British soldier (Forest Whitaker) is held hostage by an Irish Republican Army militant (Stephen Rea). Eventually, the latter sets out to locate the former’s sweetheart (Jaye Davidson), who proves to have some interesting secrets. The Crying Game is at once a political drama, a thriller, and a love story. It became one of the rare ‘art house’ films to make its way into mall theaters.

Jordan’s follow-up to The Crying Game was the much anticipated but overproduced and ultimately tedious adaptation of Anne Rice’s Interview with the Vampire. Despite the presence of some of Hollywood’s hottest actors, including Tom Cruise, Brad Pitt, Antonio Banderas, and Christian Slater, the best thing about the film was the provocative performance of young Kirsten Dunst in the role of Claudia, the child vampire. Equally unsatisfactory was In Dreams, a disagreeable thriller about a woman whose dreams are taken over by the thoughts of a psychic child killer. Despite winning acclaim in some quarters, Jordan’s adaptation of Graham Greene’s The End of the Affair was, in its pace and performances, an unsuccessful throw-back to an earlier era of staid British filmmaking.

Happily, not all of the filmmaker’s post-Crying Game projects have been disappointments. Michael Collins was a project close to Jordan’s heart. It is a stirring biography of one of the central figures of 20th-century Irish history: a leader of the failed 1916 rebellion who went on to mastermind the guerilla war against the British, and who was just 31-years-old when he was assassinated. To be sure, Michael Collins is stunning filmmaking, but what makes it most provocative is its take on history. Its central character (Liam Neeson) is portrayed as a combination rabble rouser/rebel leader/reluctant terrorist who declares that he despises himself for the mayhem he spreads. He simply has no choice in the matter, and this assertion is meant to humanize him. Meanwhile, the British are portrayed as barbarous imperialists, and so Collins and his compatriots have no recourse but to battle them with equal doses of venom. The difference is that the British indiscriminately brutalize, while the Irish kill out of patriotism. Collins is depicted as a single-minded rebel who puts his country over his ego; his opposite from within the dissident ranks, Eamon de Valera (Alan Rickman), with whom he has political and strategic differences, is portrayed as a back-stabbing schemer. Michael Collins presents itself as a slice of Irish history, yet it should be left for the historians to determine the accuracy of its characterizations, along with the facts as presented—beginning with the assertion that de Valera was responsible for luring Collins to his death.

Finally, The Butcher Boy is one of the sleeper films of the late 1990s: an uncompromising and boldly filmed portrait of a hellish childhood. The title character, Francie Brady (Eammon Owens), is a pre-teen who is coming of age in a small Irish village in the early 1960s. This luckless lad is saddled with an ineffectual, alcoholic father and a loony mother. Adding to his plight is his rough treatment by a stern, humorless adult who lives in his town, and his betrayal by his best friend and ‘bloodbrother.’ On the outside Francie is ever-smiling, and blessed with personality to spare. Yet his bravado only hides his heartbreak, and his increasingly disturbing fantasies are running wild in his subconscious. At such a tender age, he is faced with more than his share of rejection and, as a result, he descends into madness. Jordan does a superb job of visualizing the goings-on in Francie’s mind, and the manner in which his youthful fantasies, coupled with the anti-communist paranoia of the times, mix with his reality in the most incendiary manner.

Perhaps because it is such a completely unidealized portrait of childhood, The Butcher Boy failed to earn the publicity won by The Crying Game. Yet it is just as fine a film—and it may be linked to Jordan’s most successful earlier work as an exploration of the complex link between brutal reality and nightmarish fantasy.

—Duncan J. Petrie, updated by Rob Edelman
KABORÉ, Jean-Marie Gaston

Films as Director:

1977  Je reviens de Bokin (I Come from Bokin)
1978  Stockez et conservez les grains (Store and Conserve the Grain)
1979  Regard sur le Vème FESPACO (A Look at the 6th FESPACO)
1980  Utilisation des énergies nouvelles en milieu rural (The Use of New Energy in Rural Areas)
1982  Wend Kuuni (God’s Gift)
1986  Propos sur le cinéma (Reflections on Cinema)
1988  Zan Boko (Homeland)
1992  Rabi (Rabi)
1995  Lumiere et Compagnie (Lumiere and Company) (co-d)
1997  Buud Yam

Publications:

By KABORÉ: articles—

On KABORÉ: books—

On KABORÉ: articles—

*  *  *

Gaston Kaboré is one of the leaders of a movement in African cinema which aims, in his words, “to root African cinema in African soil.” Kaboré uses indigenous language as a medium of expression, and borrows techniques from Africa’s heritage of oral storytelling to craft his narratives. Like his compatriot Idrissa Ouedraogo, Kaboré focuses on the concerns of men and women in rural Burkina Faso. His most celebrated works to date are Wend Kuuni, Zan Boko, and Buud Yam. Wend Kuuni (God’s Gift) takes place in pre-colonial Africa, during the reign of the Mossi Empire. At the beginning of the film, a woman is told that her husband, a hunter, is missing and presumed dead. According to tradition, she must remarry. Instead, she chooses to escape with her son. Her fate is left a mystery until her son, Wend Kuuni, regains his speech, which he loses after witnessing his mother’s tragic death. A story punctuated by silence, Wend Kuuni emphasizes images over words. Until the moment when Wend Kuuni speaks, the viewer observes the daily routines and rhythms of the family who has adopted him. Kaboré’s depiction of the beauty and tranquility of a village before the arrival of Europeans is stunning. He does not, however, glorify tradition. Although Wend Kuuni’s new sister, Pongneré, prefers to follow him into the fields, women are relegated to the domestic sphere. Villagers shun Wend Kuuni’s mother because she refuses to remarry. Kaboré beautifully and delicately provides the viewer with an African perspective on the intricacies of rural life in Burkina Faso. Wend Kuuni’s story is continued in Buud Yam. Here, Kaboré artfully expresses his affection for his thoughtful, complex characters.

Kaboré’s Zan Boko (Homeland) also focuses on the plight of village dwellers in Burkina Faso. In this case, he reveals how contemporary government policies privilege the city’s economy over the rural population’s concerns. As the urban space constantly expands, villages are wiped out. Tinga, a farmer for whom the land is linked to his ancestral heritage, refuses to sell his property to urban developers. His new urban neighbor, an upper class, French-speaking businessman, trumpets city development and disdains tradition. The camera concentrates on the border between Tinga’s land and the growing city sprawl, and lingers on an object or scene, provoking aesthetic and intellectual contemplation. For example, the craftsmanship needed to construct Tinga’s traditional roof, depicted in a series of long takes, gathers relevance in later scenes in which Tinga’s urban neighbors remark that the home would be “a good place for a pool.” The neighbors, who consume European beer and American soda, do not appreciate Tinga’s art, nor his right to develop according to his own convictions. This story parallels the predicament of a city journalist, Yabre, who is suspended for independently investigating the government’s misappropriation of national food subsidies. At the film’s culmination, a village musician laments, “Our land is dead, killed by the big city. Our ancestors are without a home. The monster has triumphed.” The audience is left to contemplate societies whose intimate connections to the land are destroyed by ambitious, Westernized urban developers.

—Ellie Higgins

KACHYŇA, Karel

Films as Director:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Year</th>
<th>Title</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1950</td>
<td>Není stále zamrženo (The Clouds Will Roll Away) (co-d, co-sc with Vojtěch Jasny, ph); Vedeli si rady (They Know What To Do) (co-d, co-sc, ph)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1951</td>
<td>Za život radostný (For a Joyful Life) (co-d, co-sc with Jasny)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1952</td>
<td>Neobyvějná léta (Extraordinary Years) (co-d, co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1953</td>
<td>Lidé jednoho srdece (People of One Heart) (co-d, co-sc, co-ph)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1954</td>
<td>Stará čínská opera (Old Chinese Opera) (co-d, co-sc, ph); Z čínského zápisku (From a Chinese Notebook) (co-d, co-sc, ph)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1955</td>
<td>Dnes večer všechno skončí (Everything Ends Tonight) (co-d, co-sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1956</td>
<td>Ztracená stopa (The Lost Track) (sc); Křivé zrcadlo (Crooked Mirror) (sc)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1957</td>
<td>Mistrovství světa leteckých modelářů (World Championship of Air Models) (sc); Pokušení (Temptation) (sc, ph)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Other Films:

- 1958 Tenkrát o vánočích (That Christmas) (co-sc); Ctyřikrát o Bulharsku (Four Times about Bulgaria) (sc); Městomá svou tvář (The City Has Your Face) (sc)
- 1959 Král Sumavy (The King of the Sumava) (co-sc)
- 1960 Práče (The Slinger) (co-sc)
- 1961 Pouta (The Country Doctor; Fetters) (co-sc); Trápeni (Stress of Youth) (co-sc)
- 1962 Závrat (Vertigo) (co-sc)
- 1963 Nadeje (Hope) (co-sc)
- 1964 Vysoká zed (The High Wall) (co-sc)
- 1965 At žije republika (Long Live the Republic) (co-sc)
- 1966 Kočár do Vídně (Carriage to Vienna) (co-sc)
- 1967 Noc nevěsty (Night of the Bride) (co-sc)
- 1968 Vánoce s Alžbětou (Christmas with Elizabeth) (co-sc)
- 1969 Směšný pán (Funny Old Man) (co-sc); Ucho (The Ear)
- 1970 U7zcaron: zase skáču přes kaluže (Jumping the Puddles Again) (co-sc)
- 1972 Vlak do stanice nebe (Train to Heaven) (co-sc); Láska (Love) (co-sc); Horká zima (Hot Winter) (co-sc)
- 1973 Pavlínka; Robinsonska (Robinson Girl)
- 1975 Skaredá dědina (The Ugly Village); Smrt mouchy (The Death of a Fly)
- 1976 Malá mořská víla (The Little Mermaid) (co-sc)
- 1977 Setkání v červenci (Meeting in July)
- 1978 Cekání na dešt (Waiting for the Rain)
- 1979 Láska mezi kapkami dešt (Love between the Raindrops)
- 1980 Cukrová bouda (Sugar Cottage; The Little Sugar House)
- 1981 Pozor víza! (Watch Out; The Round1s!)
- 1983 Sestrický (Nurses)
- 1985 Dobré svetlo (Good Light)
- 1988 Oznamuje se láskam vašim (Let It Be Known to All Your Loves)
- 1992 Ucho (The Ear)
- 1998 By KACHYŇA: articles—

Publications

By KACHYŇA: articles—

Interview with E. Hepnerová, in Film a Doba (Prague), February 1976.

Interview in Film a Doba (Prague), January 1982.

Interview with L. Hofmanova, in Film a Doba (Prague), November 1986.

“And What Now, Gentlemen?”, an interview with Alexandra Prosnicová, in Czechoslovak Film, no. 4, 1987.
On KACHYŇA: books—

Bocek, Jaroslav, Modern Czechoslovak Film 1945–65, Prague, 1965.
Bartoskovi, Sárka and Lubos, Filmové profily, Prague, 1966.
CSF—Czechoslovak Cinema, Czechoslovak Film Institute, Prague, 1982.

On KACHYŇA: articles—

Melounek, P., in Film a Doba (Prague), May 1984.
Dossier, in Filmany Servis Prahasovy (Warsaw), 16 July 1987.
Kudriavtsev, S., in Iskusstvo Kino, no. 4, 1992.
Wellner-Pospisil, Michael, in Film a Doba (Prague), Autumn 1996.

* * *

Karel Kachyňa is an artist with a broad range of ideas which constitute the starting point for his thinking in images. Despite their formal variety, his works bear an individual creative stamp characterized by a play of poetic images precisely tailored to the dramatic structure of the story. Like any original artist who continuously seeks new paths of self-expression, Kachyňa has brief periods which seem to be at odds with the rest of his work. These are the exceptions, the experiments, the preparations for great artistic work to come.

At first it seemed that Kachyňa’s main calling would be making documentary films. He has gone beyond these; they served as a point of departure for his dramatic films. His first creative period is characterized by innovatively conceived documentaries which not only captured the facts but also expressed the view of the filmmaker. His attempts to combine elements of fantasy, story, and style led him to the dramatic film, where he concentrated on films of wartime adventure and suspense. In so doing he did not forget what he had learned in making documentaries: to capture reality and transform it into a new artistic image in a carefully conceived story. The culmination of this period is Král Sumavy (The King of the Sumava). Gradually other elements asserted themselves in his films: detailed psychological characterization and a precise portrayal of relationships against the backdrop of a given historical situation. Since he was never an independent writer of his own films, he was able to detach himself from the given material and consider it from a unique viewpoint. He was most interested in the contradiction-fraught relationships of people taking their first steps into adulthood, or the world of children on the verge of some kind of awakening, a discovery of life in the brief interval in which reality stimulates the world of thoughts, dreams, and memories and becomes itself only a framework to the dramatic film, where he concentrated on films of wartime adventure and suspense.

Awards: Oscar for Best Foreign Language Film, for The Shop on Main Street, 1965; National Artist of Czechoslovakia, 1969. Died: In Los Angeles, 1 June 1979.

KADÁR, Ján

Films as Director:

1945 Life Is Rising from the Ruins
1950 Katka (Kitty) (+ co-sc)
1952 Unos (Kidnapped) (co-d, co-sc with Elmar Klos)
1954 Hudba z Marsu (Music from Mars) (co-d, co-sc with Klos)
1957 Tam na konecné (The House at the Terminus) (co-d with Klos)
1958 Tři přání (Three Wishes) (co-d, co-sc with Klos)
1963 Smrt si řiká Engelchen (Death Is Called Engelchen) (co-d, co-sc with Klos)
1964 Obžalovaný (The Accused; The Defendant) (co-d, co-sc with Klos)
1965 Obchod na korze (The Shop on Main Street; The Shop on the High Street) (co-d, co-sc with Klos)
1970 The Angel Levine
1971 Touha zvaná Anada (Adrift), Something Is Drifting on the Water) (completed 1969; co-d with Klos)
1975 Lies My Father Told Me
1978 Freedom Road
Other Films:

1947 Nevité o byte? (Looking for a Flat) (sc)

Publications

By KADÁR: book—

By KADÁR: articles—

‘‘Elmar Klos and Jan Kadár,’’ interview with Jules Cohen, in Film Culture (New York), Fall/Winter 1967.
Interview with Robert Haller, in Film Heritage (Dayton, Ohio), Spring 1973.

On KADÁR: books—

Bocek, Jaroslav, Modern Czechoslovak Film 1945–1965, Prague, 1965.

On KADÁR: articles—

‘‘Director,’’ in the New Yorker, 12 February 1966.
Keenan, Richard C., ‘‘The Sense of an Ending: Jan Kadár’s Distortion of Stephen Crane’s The Blue Hotel,’’ in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury, Maryland), vol. 16, no. 4, 1988.

Ján Kadár is undoubtedly best known for his film The Shop on the High Street, made with his long–time collaborator, Elmar Klos. This was the first Czechoslovak film to win an Academy Award and was heralded as the beginning of the Czech film renaissance of the 1960s. In fact, Kadár made his first feature, Katka, in 1950, and Klos was one of those who helped to draw up the plans for the nationalisation of the film industry in that decade. This, of course, was a mixed blessing, as Kadár himself pointed out: ‘‘to innovative filmmakers this was a dream—it would liberate them from commercial pressures. Instead, there was political pressure. This was the disadvantage of subsidised art.’’

Katka itself ran into political difficulties. Made in Kadár’s native Slovakia, it tells the story of a village girl who becomes a factory worker. However, as the director points out, at about this time ‘‘it had been decided that it was no longer necessary to urge people to leave their homes for industry. But above all, the film wasn’t ‘national’ enough, it wasn’t sufficiently steeped in folklore and Slovakism. And that was referred to as ‘the bourgeois point of view.’’” Expelled from the Slovak film industry, Kadár “became Czech” and began his partnership with Klos. Their first collaboration was Kidnapped, which Kadár later described as “an extremely naive, dogmatic, cold-war type of film” but which was nonetheless criticised at the time for “bourgeois objectivism.” Saved by the intervention of V. I. Pudovkin, they went on to make Music from Marx, a musical satire on bureaucracy, which gave rise to complaints that they had slandered public figures.

Their next film cleared all of trouble. This was House at the Terminus, which posed the question of whether it is right to bring children into the world in its present state. Given the country’s low and falling birth rate this was more than simply a philosophical question. By avoiding explicitly “public” problems and issues and concentrating instead on the private sphere, the film managed to avoid censure for drawing what is surely a rather depressing picture of Czech society. Peter Hames in The Czechoslovak New Wave speaks of its air of “gloomy desolation” and remarks that although “there is little overt political criticism, the implicit criticism is considerable, and the problems with which it deals take place in a social context. Hence loneliness, cynicism, personal and professional failure, compromise, wrongful imprisonment, and lack of faith are shown as generalised characteristics of a supposedly socialist society,” one in which, that is, such problems have supposedly been eliminated.

Three Wishes, a modern version of the old fairy tale in which a character is granted his heart’s desire only to find that the dream turns sour, was banned until 1963 (that is, once the process of de-Stalinization had got under way). Again, the problem seems to have been that it painted a less than ideal view of society, since it shows the central character realising his wishes by exploiting the corruption and hypocrisy he finds around him in society.

After this film, Kadár and Klos were unable to work again for two years, but during the ensuing “thaw” period they produced their most famous work, The Shop on the High Street. This is set in Slovakia during the period of the independent fascist state, described by one Czechoslovak critic as “a gruesomely grotesque miniature of the apocalypse of the Third Reich” and by Klos as representing “a special kind of national fascism.” The story concerns an old, deaf Jewish woman and her relationship with the Slovak who is assigned to her shop as an “Aryan controller.” An extremely effective picture of everyday fascism in an ordinary small community, the film may revolve around a grim and tragic theme but it is actually played largely as a gentle comedy. Kadár once claimed that his favourite directors were Chaplin, Truffaut, and Fellini, and their presence can all be felt here in the quirky, offbeat humour, the mingling of the comic and tragic, and the gentle observation of its characters’ failures and all-too-human shortcomings. One is also, of course, put in mind of the early works of Passer, Forman and Menzel. Like the old lady at the centre of the film, Kadár was himself Jewish, and although by his own account he never encountered anti-Semitism, The Shop later attracted charges of Zionism from certain quarters, particularly after Kadár’s departure for the States.

With the end of the “Prague Spring,” Kadár left Czechoslovakia for Vienna and from there went to America. At the time of the invasion he and Klos were working on a Czech-American co-production titled Adrift, which was made in collaboration with the Hungarian writer Imre Gyöngyössy, who later went on to become a director himself. On his arrival in the States, Kadár was fortunate enough to be offered the direction of The Angel Levine, based on a Bernard Malamud story. He then returned to Czechoslovakia to complete Adrift. This is an atypical Kadár film, clearly influenced by Resnais and Robbe-Grillet, about a girl who may or may not have been saved from drowning in the Danube.

In the States and Canada (where he also found work) Jewish themes in his films clearly came to the fore—hence The Angel Levine, Lies My Father Told Me, and Mendelstam’s Witness. Other works which must surely have had a strong personal resonance for the director were the TV movies The Case against Milligan, which examines the theme of freedom of conscience, and The Other Side of Hell, which looks at the plight of the sane person in an insane society. While none of his later films attain the level of The Shop on the High Street, they nonetheless attest to the warmth and generosity of spirit that is the hallmark of Kadár’s best and most typical work.

—Julian Petley

KAPLAN, Nelly

Films as Director:

1961 Gustave Moreau
1963 Abel Gance et Son Domrain
1966 Les Années 25
1966 La Nouvelle Orangerie
1967 Le Regard Picasso
1969 La Fiancée du Pirate (A Very Curious Girl, The Pirate’s fiancée, Dirty Mary) (+ sc)
1971 Papa les Petsits Bateaux
1976 Néa: A New Woman (A Young Emmanuelle) (+ sc)
1979 Charles et Lucie (+ sc)
1983 Abel Gance et son Napoleon (+ sc)
1994 Plaisir d’Amour (The Pleasure of Love) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1954 La Tour de Nesle (La Torre del Piacere) (Gance) (ro as Alice)
1960 Austerlitz (The Battle of Austerlitz, Napoleon ad Austerlitz) (Gance) (asst d, + sc)
1963 Cyrano et d’Artagnan (Gance) (ph)
1974 Il Faut Vivre Dangereusement (You’ve Got to Live Dangerously) (Makovsky) (pr + sc)
1994 Les Mouettes (Chapot) (for TV) (sc)
1995 Honorin et l’Enfant Prodigue (Chapot) (for TV) (sc + ro as Dora)
1996 Polly West est de Retour (Chapot) (for TV) (sc + ro as Salomé von Jung)

Publications

By KAPLAN: books—

Abel Gance’s Napoleon (film history), British Film Institute Classics, 1994.

By KAPLAN: article—

On KAPLAN: books—

On KAPLAN: articles—

Nelly Kaplan’s work has been marketed and promoted frequently as soft-core pornography, but that perhaps only illustrates the scarcity of strong women’s voices in world cinema. That scarcity, extreme when Kaplan first began creating films, still exists at the beginning of the new millennium to an astonishing degree. Apprenticed to such dynamic and sensually open French filmmakers as Gance, Resnais, and Truffaut, Kaplan began her work as a director when the first stirrings of second-wave feminism were beginning to be felt. Her films, though often marketed under lurid advertisements, and given leeringly suggestive foreign titles, were most definitely a part of that movement.

That Kaplan’s films are erotic is beyond question, but they are much more than pornography, and to dismiss them as such is to deny the woman’s voice that speaks through her work. Kaplan’s films are radical precisely because they are erotic and that eroticism is presented from the female point of view and speaks to the female audience. Though some have called her films anti-feminist because they are often blatantly sexual, many feminists have claimed her as a powerful spokesperson because she gives women a sexual voice.

Her first internationally famous film, A Very Curious Girl, tells the story of a town slut, victimized by the appetites of the local men, who claims control of her sexuality by becoming a prostitute. She not only begins to profit from what she once gave away for free, but begins use the power of her new position to exact revenge on those who humiliated her, turning her staid, patriarchial village upside down. Néa: A New Woman, sometimes more suggestively titled A Young Emmanuelle, tells the story of another empowered victim, this time a young girl whose hypocritical father governs her life with an iron hand. To escape, she begins to experiment with the idea of sexuality, finally writing an erotic novel under a pseudonym. Kaplan, who wrote short fiction and erotica under the pseudonym of Belen, might have tucked some of her own history into the story of Néa’s reinvention of herself. Charles et Lucie, about a couple who rediscover love after they have lost everything else, and The Pleasure of Love, about the lives and loves of three generations of women, continue Kaplan’s trend of highlighting the female experience.

The tone of most of Kaplan’s films is comic and positive, and the transformation of her female protagonists comes when they claim and control their own sexuality. This fact alone made Kaplan’s work notorious in the 1960s and 1970s, and she continues to hold that control of their sexuality. This fact alone made Kaplan’s work famous for My Name Is Joker, 1970. Died: Of complications from asthma attack, in New Delhi, 2 June 1988.

Films as Director:

1948 Aag (Fire) (+ pr, role)
1949 Barsaat (+ role)
1951 Awara (The Vagabond) (+ role)
1955 Shri 420 (Mister 420) (+ role)
1964 Sangam (+ role, pr)
1970 Mera Naam Joker (My Name Is Joker) (+ role, pr)
1974 Bobby (+ pr)
1978 Satyam Shivam Sundaram (+ pr)
1982 Prem Rog (+ pr)

Other Films:

1935 Inquilab (role)
1943 Hamari Baat (role); Gowri (role)
1946 Valmiki (role)
1947 Neel Kamal (role); Chitlod Vijay (role); Jail Yaatra (role); Dil Ki Raami (role)
1948 Gopinath (role)
1949 Andaz (role); Parivar (role); Sanjhe Dhani (role)
1950 Banwara (role); Banwara Nayan (role); Dastaan (role); Jaan Pecham (role); Pyar (role); Sargam (role)
1952 Ambar (role); Arnhonee (role); Aashiyana (role); Bewafa (role)
1953 Dhoom (role); Paapi (role); Aah (pr, role)
1954 Boot Polish (pr)
1956 Jagte Raho (pr, role); Chori Chori (role)
1957 Ab Dilli Dur Nahan (pr)
1958 Sharada (role); Parvarish (role); Phir Subah Hogi (role)
1959 Anadi (role); Char Dil Char Rahen (role); Do Ustad (role); Kanhuaiya (role); Main Nashe Me Hoon (role)
1960 Jis Desh Me Ganga Behti Hai (Where the Ganges Flows) (pr, role); Chhdiya (role); Shriman Satyavadi (role)
1961 Nazrana (role)
1962 Aashik (role)
1963 Dil Hi To Hai (role); Ek Dil Sou Afsane (role)
1964 Dulha Dullan (role)
1966 Teesri Kasam (role)
1967 Around the World (role); Diwana (role)
1968 Sapnon Ka Saudagar (role)
1972 Kal, Aaj Aur Kal (pr, role)
1975 Dharam Karam (pr); Do Jasoos (role)
1976 Khaan Dost (role)
1977 Chandi Sona (role)
1981 Bivi O Biwi (pr); Abdullah (role)
1982 Gopichand Jasoos (role)

KAPOOR, Raj

Publications

On KAPOOR: books—

On KAPOOR: articles—

* * *

Raj Kapoor was the best-known screen personality in India. He acted major roles in over fifty films, produced more than a dozen, and during the course of a thirty-five-year career directed six of the most popular films of the Hindi cinema—Awara, Shri 420, Sangam, Mera Nam Joker, Bobby, and Satyam Shivam Sundaram. The popularity of Raj Kapoor’s work derives from a paradoxical achievement: he intensified in his films both the lavishness and the social consciousness of the Hindi cinema. His films are characterized by elaborate sets, evocative music, new stars, dramatic confrontations and narrow escapes from heartbreak. At the same time he addressed poverty, injustice, and the plight of individuals insisting on their own way against the massive force of social conventions. Indian audiences responded enthusiastically to Raj Kapoor’s mixture of entertainment and serious issues; his films articulate at some level the longings of an entire people.

Raj Kapoor’s first film, Aag, is restrained by smallness of scale; the set is modest and the fiery character of the emotional triangle in the story is rendered chiefly through high-contrast lighting. But his third and fourth films (Awara and Shri 420) disclose a fully operatic style. In Awara, the key court scene is played in a deep, amply lit hall; and in both Awara and Shri 420, the houses of the rich are magnificently spacious, fitted with winding stairs, high ceilings and tall, curtained windows. For music, Raj Kapoor employed the lyricist Shailendra and the composers Shankar-Jaikishen, who specialized in brightening up traditional melodies; a number of their songs for Awara Hun, Mera Johta Hai Japani are among the most popularly known in India. Raj Kapoor also delights in soaring camera movements, as over the courtroom in Awara and under the circus tent in Mera Nam Joker. The speed and freedom of the camera contributes to the audience’s sense of dynamic progress.

Raj Kapoor’s films deal with important cultural experiences: Shri 420 is concerned with the ruthlessness confronting new migrants to the city; Awara with the malign influence of slum environments; Sangam, Bobby and Satyam Shivam Sundaram with tensions between spontaneous affection and social protocols for intimacy; and Mera Nam Joker presents the loneliness of a circus clown as an archetype for people who have been uprooted. Both plot and music invite viewers to identify with the experiences of unfortunate protagonists. Meanwhile the mise-en-scène directs the attention of viewers to the furnishings of rich houses (Shri 420 and Awara), to the mountain spectacle of various Himalayan resorts (Bobby), to a spacious temple courtyard and a daringly costumed dancer (Satyam Shivam Sundaram), and to entire acts of the Soviet State Circus (Mera Nam Joker).

Since the time of Raj Kapoor’s first films, filmmaking in India has moved toward greater generic variety and coherence. From the perspective of the new political films, Raj Kapoor’s productions seem complacent; from the perspective of the new realist films, his work seems gaudy. Nonetheless, his work is certain to be remembered for its spectacular vitality.

—Satti Khanna

KASDAN, Lawrence

Award, Berlin Film Festival, for Grand Canyon, 1992; San Sebastián International Film Festival CEC Award for Best Screenplay, for Mumford, 1999. Address: c/o Kasdan Productions, 4117 Radford Avenue, Studio City, CA 91604.

Films as Director:

1981 Body Heat (+ sc)
1983 The Big Chill (+ exec pr, sc)
1985 Silverado (+ pr, cosc)
1988 The Accidental Tourist (+ ro)
1989 I Love You to Death
1991 Grand Canyon (+ pr, co-sc)
1994 Wyatt Earp (+ pr, sc)
1995 French Kiss
1999 Mumford (+ pr, sc)

Other Films:

1980 The Empire Strikes Back (Kershner) (co-sc)
1981 Raiders of the Lost Ark (Spielberg) (co-sc); Continental Divide (Apted)
1983 Return of the Jedi (Marquand) (co-sc)
1985 Into the Night (Landis) (ro)
1987 Cross My Heart (Bernstein) (pr)
1989 Immediate Family (Kaplan) (exec pr)
1991 Jumpin’ at the Boneyard (Stanzler) (exec pr)
1992 The Bodyguard (Jackson) (pr, sc)
1997 As Good as It Gets (Brooks) (ro)
1998 Home Fries (Parisot) (pr)

Publications

By KASDAN: books—

The Art of Return of the Jedi, with George Lucas, New York, 1983.

By KASDAN: articles—

Interview in Film Comment (New York), September/October 1981.
Interview with Minty Clinch, in Films (London), March 1982.
Interview with A. Garel and others, in Revue du Cinéma (Paris), December 1985.
Interview in American Film (Washington, D.C.), January/February 1989.

On KASDAN: articles—

“Lawrence Kasdan,” in Film Dope (London), March 1984.

* * *

On the basis of relatively few films, Lawrence Kasdan has had a prestigious career as screenwriter and director, though one that is difficult to characterize easily. His early work is notable for toying humorously with established genres like the action-adventure serial, film noir, and the Western without ever going all the way into parody. That is, he was able to convey a certain 1980s “hip” or postmodern sensibility without insulting some viewers’ nostalgia for the past or ignoring popular desire for well-crafted storytelling. His less conventional dramas, like The Big Chill and Grand Canyon, experimented with large casts and explored weighty issues, while his most recent work suggests that gentle romantic comedy may be his strongest suit. Kasdan’s ironic toying with older movie genres worked splendidly in dialogue for Raiders of the Lost Ark, written under the Lucas-Spielberg aegis, and his own hyper-sultry Body Heat. The latter contained gentle, knowing allusions to a film noir past while sustaining its own snappy dialogue and suspenseful narrative, and seemed to relish its outrageously steamy setting, an erotic/violent Florida where only the most primitive air conditioners seem to have been invented. Less successful was Silverado, a kind of postmodern Western which shared with the later, lumbering Wyatt Earp a lack of both a coherent tone and effective pacing. Though Silverado’s complicated structure makes sense in outline, some of the subplots do not seem to exist in the same narrative world: for example, the struggling black family is portrayed with heavy-handed seriousness, while the Kevin Kline/Linda Hunt relationship is preposterously romantic. Curiously, Kasdan’s more recent genre films seem to have lost that bemused consciousness, those knowing winks. Wyatt Earp is utterly conventional even while seemingly schizophrenic in its inability to decide whether it is an old-fashioned, sweepingly grand Western, a cynical expose of the “real” Earp, or a dry chronicle of an historically significant life. And French Kiss is equally conventional as a romantic farce, though far more fresh and spirited than Earp. Kasdan’s less classifiable dramas have some of the same quirky humor as the earlier genre pieces. The Big Chill was variously loved or hated for its sympathetic yet satirical portrayal of the ego crises of a spectrum of 1960s activists finding themselves in the doldrums of the early 1980s. By the standards of classical Hollywood storytelling, The Big Chill is pleasingly loose in structure, with its assembly of former friends in close encounters during a long weekend; but it seemed to some viewers contrived and slick in comparison to the more low-key, low-budget film by John Sayles on the same subject, The Return of the Secaucus Seven. The Accidental Tourist, Kasdan’s only effort to date in adapting a literary text, also drew mixed reactions, but this time the debate was over its success in bringing to the screen a highly regarded novel, and over William Hurt’s extremely subdued performance. With Grand Canyon, another experiment in creating an ensemble film with several interwoven plot strands, Kasdan is again in fine form, even if he leans too heavily toward a feel-good finale. There is a wit in the very talkiness of the film, as characters continually launch into existentialistic discussions of the random violence and miracles of life, with the film producer Davis (Steve Martin) downright Shavian in his defense of ultraviolent movies (like Major Barbara’s father defending his munitions plants).

Kasdan may eventually be remembered as a starmaker. Body Heat introduced Kathleen Turner and the sultry persona she has continued to use; it offered Mickey Rourke a memorable supporting role; and it made William Hurt a new kind of leading man, with a distinctively 1980s manner, even when playing a 1940s-style victim of a femme fatale or, as in The Big Chill, an erstwhile hippie. The Big Chill boosted the careers of Glenn Close, Kevin Kline, and Meg Tilly, as Silverado did that of Kevin Costner and The Accidental Tourist that of Geena Davis. At the same time as promoting individual talents, Kasdan seems particularly skilled in directing ensemble acting, not only throughout The Big Chill and Grand Canyon, but in the glimpses of eccentric family life in The Accidental Tourist and the joint murder efforts in I Love You to Death—the latter, by the way, a farcical black comedy which many viewers found insufficiently black or comical, lacking the sly, cool wit of both earlier and later Kasdan films.

Kasdan’s visual style from film to film may be more difficult to characterize than his handling of genre and actors, though one may note consistently fluid camera movements and a determination to give each film a distinctive look and mood, while keeping a number of the same technical personnel. One remembers the blues, whites, and shadows of a sweltering Florida in Body Heat; the autumnal glow of The Big Chill; the conventional but still handsome Techniscope vistas of Silverado; the glowing landscapes of provincial France in French Kiss and Sonoma County in Mumford; and the pale colors and vacant widescreen spaces of The Accidental Tourist. Grand Canyon has so many scenes inside automobiles, with widescreen two-shots, that it makes the private vehicle seem the modern setting par excellence for meaningful dialogue.

Sometimes unfairly slighted as a mere spokesperson for aging baby-boomers when he is not a mere genre artist, Kasdan may not have established the consistently strong individual voice one seems to hear in his early films, but he remains a formidable craftsman. Mumford has a premise and outcome which many will consider stale—a young man unsure of his own identity poses as a psychologist, falls in love with one patient, is eventually exposed but only lightly punished, since he has brought so much mental health and happiness to so many lives—but the film is so deftly achieved that it becomes a pleasure to watch. The editing is crisp, the smalltown California settings are lovely without looking like postcards or The Truman Show, the dialogue is clever without sounding like a sitcom or Broadway, and the some of the actors playing patients (Jason Lee, Mary McDonnell, Hope Davis) make eccentricity genuinely amusing without condescension on the writer-director’s part. If Kasdan is indeed settling into romantic comedy as his genre of choice, one might hope for more that are as graceful as his most recent films.

—Joseph Milicia

KAUFMAN, Philip

Films as Director and Scriptwriter:

1964 Goldstein
1967 Fearless Frank
1972 The Great Northfield Minnesota Raid
1974 The White Dawn
1978 Invasion of the Body Snatchers
1979 The Wanderers
1983 The Right Stuff
1988 The Unbearable Lightness of Being
1990 Henry & June
1993 Rising Sun
2000 Quills

Philip Kaufman
Other Films:

1976  The Outlaw Josey Wales (Eastwood) (co-sc)
1981  Raiders of the Lost Ark (Spielberg) (co-story)

Publications

By KAUFMAN: articles—

Interview with Gavin Smith, in Film Comment, July 1993.

On KAUFMAN: articles—

Cattysse, Patrick, “The Unbearable Lightness of Being: Film Adaptation Seen from a Different Perspective,” in Literature/Film Quarterly (Salisbury), July 1997.

* * *

Philip Kaufman has not set any records for productivity, but the few films he has made have been intelligently and independently done. His choice of topics has been eclectic. He has adapted novels as far removed as Milan Kundera’s The Unbearable Lightness of Being and Michael Crichton’s Rising Sun. He adapted Tom Wolfe’s journalistic epic about the space program, The Right Stuff, brilliantly; he also adapted the personal writings of Anaïs Nin in Henry & June. His work has ranged from realism to fantasy: The White Dawn, for example, is an historical film about three whalers from New England marooned in the Arctic, shot in a documentary style, while Invasion of the Body Snatchers is a remake of the Don Siegel science-fiction classic, satirically updated. The satire that surfaces in some of Kaufman’s work might be considered part of his artistic “signature,” even though the satire of The Right Stuff can be traced back to Tom Wolfe’s source. The director has asserted himself when artistic differences surfaced: Kaufman quarreled with Clint Eastwood and lost on The Outlaw Josey Wales, which Kaufman originally was to have directed; he quarreled with Michael Crichton and won on Rising Sun, changing the sidekick, the villain, the balance, the tone, and the conclusion of the novel to suit his own purposes and taking the edge off Crichton’s warning about the Japanese.

Kaufman has been a risk-taker. The erotic content of Henry & June tested the limits of the MPAA Code and was the first film released with an NC-17 rating (No Children under 17 Admitted), created to remove the stigma of the old “X” rating. In terms of the candid treatment of adult relationships, this constituted an artistic breakthrough, achieved by an unconventional filmmaker who was willing to take a chance and put his career on the line. But Kaufman probably has not worried too much about his career.

Born to a cultured German-Jewish family, Kaufman grew up on Chicago’s North Side, studied history at the University of Chicago, and, after a year at the Harvard Law School, enrolled in the master’s program in history at his alma mater. Eventually a wanderlust took Kaufman and his wife Rose to the Bay Area of San Francisco, where he held various odd jobs while attempting to write a novel; he then moved to Europe, taught in Greece and Italy, and worked on an Israeli kibbutz. By 1962 Kaufman was back in Chicago, where he developed a screenplay from his unfinished novel, working with his friend Benjamin Manaster as co-writer, director, and producer.

Kaufman’s debut feature, Goldstein, made for $50,000 with friends from Chicago’s Second City, was, according to one source, loosely based on one of Martin Buber’s Tales of the Hassidim and starred Lou Gilbert as Goldstein, a parody prophet. Kaufman took his film to the Cannes Film Festival in 1964, where it shared the Prix de la Nouvelle Critique with Bernardo Bertolucci’s Before the Revolution, an incredible stroke of good fortune.

Encouraged by this success, Kaufman then wrote and directed a second Chicago film, Fearless Frank, in 1965, with Jon Voight making his film debut as a farm boy who goes to the city and falls in love with a gangster’s moll. This film also utilized the satiric talents of the Second City players but won no prizes at Cannes in 1967. In fact, Fearless Frank failed to find an American distributor until American International picked it up in 1969, after Jon Voight’s success in John Schlesinger’s Midnight Cowboy. Though Fearless Frank was not a critical success, Jennings Lang of Universal Studios invited Kaufman into Universal’s Young Directors’ Program. At Universal Kaufman then wrote and directed The Great Northfield Minnesota Raid, starring Robert Duvall as Jesse James and Clift Robertson as Cole Younger. This film opened to mixed reviews in 1972.

Kaufman adapted his next film, The White Dawn, released by Paramount in 1974, from a novel by James Houston, telling the story of three whalers who survived a shipwreck in Baffin Bay in 1896 and were rescued by Eskimos. The film, starring Warren Oates, Timothy Bottoms, and Lou Gossett, was shot in northern Canada under difficult conditions, but it was not given full support by Paramount and was not widely seen. The following year Kaufman was assigned to direct The Outlaw Josey Wales after having worked on the script for Clint Eastwood, but Eastwood soon took over the direction himself. Kaufman got credit with Sonia Chernis for the screenplay, adapted from the Forrest Carter novel Gone to Texas. In 1981 Kaufman also worked as a writer when he helped George Lucas develop the original story for Raiders of the Lost Ark, but most of his work has involved directing.

In 1978, at a time when his Hollywood career needed a boost, Kaufman had a major windfall when he was assigned to direct the remake of Don Siegel’s Invasion of the Body Snatchers for United Artists, working from W. D. Richter’s updated screenplay adaptation of Jack Finney’s novel. Kaufman moved the action to San Francisco and redefined the alien threat in a way that was disturbing, humorous, and believable. This was followed by The Wanderers, his adaptation of Richard Price’s comic novel about Italian high-school gang in the Bronx, set in 1963.

Kaufman’s greatest success was his blockbuster hit The Right Stuff, which earned eight Academy Award nominations, including Best Picture. Kaufman also earned Writers Guild and Directors Guild nominations for his satiric adaptation of Tom Wolfe’s account of the astronaut program. Kaufman has a talent for adaptation. Terrence Rafferty praised Kaufman’s adaptation of The Unbearable Lightness of Being for its fidelity “to the novel as it exists in the mind of the reader,” rather than to the novel as an autonomous entity (Kaufman changed and simplified the structure), claiming that “the movie’s most interesting character is Philip Kaufman.”

And that claim might be made for other Kaufman films as well. The adaptations are centered in the personality of the filmmaker. For example, Kaufman turned Rising Sun into his own reinvented story. His strength is in the whimsical, the satirical (The Invasion of the Body Snatchers, The Right Stuff, and Rising Sun), and in the erotic and the lyrical (The Unbearable Lightness of Being and Henry & June). Though the films themselves seem impossibly varied, his best work has a personal imprint. The style of his later films seems vaguely European, but his values, stressing individualism and integrity, are clearly American. Kaufman has not produced a large body of work, but his best work certainly merits critical attention.

——James M. Welsh

KAURISMAKI, Aki

Nationality: Finnish. Born: Orimattila, Finland, 4 April 1957. Career: Began working as co-scenarist and assistant director with his older brother, Mika Kaurismaki, 1980; co-directed Saimaa Ilmio with Mika, 1981; directed first feature on his own, Crime and Punishment, 1983; directed the music videos Rocky VI, Thru the Wire, and LA Woman, 1986; with Mika, runs own production company, Villealfa Film Productions, in Helsinki, operates art movie houses in Helsinki, and organized the Midnight Sun Film Festival. Awards: Best First Film and Script Jussi Award, and diplomas from FILMEX, Nordische Filmtagte, and Karlov Vary Festival, for Crime and Punishment, 1983; Hong Kong Film Festival Special Award, for Calimari Union, 1985; Best Finnish Film Jussi Award, for Shadows in Paradise, 1986; Berlin Film Festival OCIC Award-Honorable Mention and Interfilm Award, Best Director Jussi Award, for The Match Factory Girl, 1989; Berlin Film Festival FIPRESCI Award, for La Vie de Boheme, 1992; Italian National Syndicate of Film Journalists European Silver Ribbon, 1993; Sao Paolo International Film Festival Audience Award—Best Feature, for Drifting Clouds, 1996; Berlin Film Festival C.I.C.A.E. Award-Honorable Mention, for Juha, 1999. Address: Villealfa Filmproductions Oy, Vainamoisenkatu 19 A, SF-00100 Helsinki, Finland.

Films as Director:

- 1981 Saimaa Ilmio (The Saimaa Gesture) (co-d)
- 1983 Rikos ja Pangaustus (Crime and Punishment) (+ co-sc)
- 1985 Calimari Union (+ sc, ed, ro)
- 1986 Varjoja Paratiisissä (Shadows in Paradise) (+ sc)
- 1987 Hamlet Liikemaailmassa (Hamlet Goes Business) (+ sc, pr)
- 1988 Ariel (+ sc, pr)
- 1989 Leningrad Cowboys Go America (+ sc); Tulitikutehtaan Tytto (The Match Factory Girl) (+ sc, pr, ed)
- 1990 I Hired a Contract Killer (+ sc, pr, ed, uncredited ro)
- 1991 Those Were the Days (short) (+ sc, pr, ed)
- 1992 La Vie de Boheme (The Bohemian Life) (+ sc, pr)
- 1993 These Boots (short) (+ sc, pr, ed)
- 1994 Leningrad Cowboys Meet Moses (+ sc, pr, ed)
- 1994 Total Balalaika Show (doc) (+ pr, ed)
- 1994 Pida huvista kiinnin Tatjana (Take Care of Your Scarf, Tatjiana) (+ pr, co-sc)
- 1996 Kauas Pilvet Karkaavat (Drifting Clouds) (+ sc, pr, ed)
- 1999 Juha (+ sc, pr)

Other Films:

- 1980 Valehtelija (The Liar) (+ ro)
- 1982 Arvottomat (The Worthless) (+ ro)
- 1984 Klanni—tarina sammokoitten (The Clan—Tale of the Frogs)
- 1985 Rosso (in other capacities)
- 1983 Huhtikuu on kaukausista julmin (Manttari) (ro)
- 1985 Viimeiset rotannahat (Manttari) (asst d, ro)
- 1986 Morena (Manttari) (sound)
- 1993 Tuhlaajapoika (The Prodigal Son) (Aaltojen) (pr); Ripa ruostuu (Ripa Hits the Skids) (Lindblad) (pr)
- 1994 Iron Horsemen (Bad Trip) (Charmant) (pr, asst d, ro)
- 1997 Vaiennut kyla (Quiet Village) (Vaananen) (pr)
- 1998 Drifting Bottles (Strohl) (ro)
- 1999 Kovat miehet (Lallii) (pr)

Publications

By KAURISMAKI: articles——

Interview with B. Fornara and L. Gandini in Cineforum (Bergamo), October 1990.

Interview in Filmvilag (Budapest), no. 8, 1991.

On KAURISMAKI: articles—

Fornara, B., article in Cineforum (Bergamo), March 1989.

Causo, Massimo, article in Cineforum (Bergamo), September 1990.
The cinema of Aki Kaurismaki is a cinema of the absurd. He and his brother, director Mika Kaurismaki, have become two of the world’s most prolific and uniquely impudent moviemakers. At first, they were far outside the Finnish establishment, in that their parodies and farces lampooned the conventions of their society. Nevertheless, as they became known and respected on the international film scene, they quickly came to be regarded as the leading talents of their country’s minuscule motion picture industry. Certainly, the Kaurismaki brothers’ success helped educate cineastes to the fact that Scandinavian films do not only come from Sweden and Norway.

Aki and Mika Kaurismaki began collaborating in the early 1980s, but Aki was the one who initially established himself internationally. In 1990 alone, seven of his films were screened in various venues in New York City. His films are linked in that they are straightforward, seriocomic studies infused with a unique sense of the ridiculous. His characters are far removed from the mainstream, in some cases to the point of being isolated and completely alone; occasionally, they are on the road, roaming across landscapes in which they will be eternal outsiders. But their feelings of alienation or despondency rarely become the principal force at work on screen. Rather, Kaurismaki elicits poignancy as he charts his characters’ lives, with a special emphasis on the humor that symbolizes the utter absurdity of their situations.

A number of Kaurismaki’s heroes are dejected blue-collar loners driven to desperate acts and outrageous behavior by a repressive society. Such is the case in Ariel, a comical, existential road movie about a mineworker (Turo Pajala) who loses his job and sets out on an odyssey across Finland. Ariel offers a textbook example of the tackiest aspects of American pop culture have impacted on even the farthest reaches of Finland. His “cowboys” are a deadpan, perfectly dreadful band of rock musicians from the Finnish tundra, who embark on a “world tour” which will take them not to Madison Square Garden but across a vast small-town American wasteland.

Kaurismaki had only begun to mine the Leningrad Cowboys’ comic possibilities. He followed Leningrad Cowboys Go America, which also features characters with warped senses of their talents. Only here, they revel in their awfulness as they proudly hold the mantle as “the worst rock ‘n roll band in the world.” Leningrad Cowboys is a loopy farce that lampoons the manner in which the tuckiest aspects of American pop culture have impacted on even the farthest reaches of Finland. His “cowboys” are a deadpan, perfectly dreadful band of rock musicians from the Finnish tundra, who embark on a “world tour” which will take them not to Madison Square Garden but across a vast small-town American wasteland.

Kaurismaki had only begun to mine the Leningrad Cowboys’ comic possibilities. He followed Leningrad Cowboys Go America, which also features characters with warped senses of their talents. Only here, they revel in their awfulness as they proudly hold the mantle as “the worst rock ‘n roll band in the world.” Leningrad Cowboys is a loopy farce that lampoons the manner in which the tackiest aspects of American pop culture have impacted on even the farthest reaches of Finland. His “cowboys” are a deadpan, perfectly dreadful band of rock musicians from the Finnish tundra, who embark on a “world tour” which will take them not to Madison Square Garden but across a vast small-town American wasteland.

Kaurismaki had only begun to mine the Leningrad Cowboys’ comic possibilities. He followed Leningrad Cowboys Go America, which also features characters with warped senses of their talents. Only here, they revel in their awfulness as they proudly hold the mantle as “the worst rock ‘n roll band in the world.” Leningrad Cowboys is a loopy farce that lampoons the manner in which the tackiest aspects of American pop culture have impacted on even the farthest reaches of Finland. His “cowboys” are a deadpan, perfectly dreadful band of rock musicians from the Finnish tundra, who embark on a “world tour” which will take them not to Madison Square Garden but across a vast small-town American wasteland.

In the second half of the 1990s Kaurismaki has been less prolific as a director, yet his films remain sweet and enchanting—and are consistent in tone with his earlier work. Juha, based on an early 20th-century Finnish novel, is the story of a klutzy farmer (Sakari Kuosmanen) and his plain-Jane wife (Kati Outinen), whose union is thrown off-kilter upon the arrival of an aging, womanizing stranger (Andre Wilms). Kaurismaki chose to shoot Juha in black-and-white, and sans dialogue, which adds to the film’s unique charm, Drifting Clouds is the deadpan tale of a hapless, down-on-their-luck husband and wife (Kari Väänänen, Kati Outinen) who somehow manage to stumble into a happy ending that is as unlikely as it is pleasing. Kaurismaki’s worldview may be summed up in a bit of dialogue from the film: “Life is short and miserable. Be as merry as you can.”

—Rob Edelman
KÄUTNER, Helmut

Films as Director:

1939  Kitty und die Weltkonferenz (+ sc, lyrics)
1940  Frau nach Mass (+ sc); Kleider machen Leute (+ sc)
1941  Auf Wiedersehen, Franziska! (+ co-sc)
1942  Anuschka (+ adapt); Wir machen Musik (+ sc, lyrics)
1943  Romanze in Moll (+ co-sc, role)
1944  Grosse Freiheit Nr. 7 (+ co-sc, lyrics, role)
1945  Unter den Brücken (+ co-sc)
1947  In jenen Tagen (+ co-sc, role)
1948  Der Apfel ist ab (+ co-sc, role)
1949  Königskinder (+ co-sc, role)
1950  Epilog (Das Geheimnis der Orplid) (+ co-sc, role)
1951  Weisse Schatten (+ co-sc)
1953  Köpfn Bay-Bay (+ co-sc)
1954  Die letzte Brücke (+ co-sc, role); Bildnis einer Unbekannten (+ co-sc); Ludwig II—Glanz und Elend eines Königs (+ sc)
1955  Des Teufels General (+ co-sc, role); Himmel ohne Sterne (+ sc)
1956  Ein Mädchens aus Flandern (+ co-sc, role); Der Hauptmann von Köpenick (+ co-sc, role)
1957  Die Zürcher Verlobung (+ co-sc, lyrics, role); Montpi (+ sc, role)
1958  The Restless Years (The Wonderful Years); A Stranger in My Arms; Der Schinderhannes (+ role)
1959  Der Rest ist Schweigen (+ co-sc, co-pr, role); Die Gans von Sedan (Sans tambour ni trompette) (+ co-sc, role)
1960  Das Glas Wasser (+ sc, lyrics)
1961  Schwarzer Kies (+ co-sc); Der Traum von Lieschen Müller (Happy-End im siebten Himmel) (+ co-sc, lyrics)
1962  Die Rote (La Rossa) (+ sc)
1963  Das Haus in Montevideo (+ sc)
1964  Lausbubengeschichten
1970  Die Feuerzangenbowle

Other Films:

1932  Kreuzer Emden (Ralph) (role)
1939  Schneider Wibbel (de Kowa) (co-sc); Salonwagen E 417 (Verhoeven) (co-sc); Die Stimme aus dem Ather (Paulsen) (co-sc); Marguerite; 3—Eine Frau für Drei (Lingen) (co-sc)
1947  Film ohne Titel (Jugert) (co-sc)
1951  Nachts auf den Strassen (Jugert) (co-sc)
1955  Griff nach den Sternen (Schröth) (co-sc)
1957  Franziska (Auf Wiedersehen, Franziska) (Liebeneiner) (co-sc)
1961  Zu jung für die Liebe? (Erica Balqué) (co-sc, role)

1972  Versuchung in Sommerwind (Thiele) (role)
1974  Karl May (Syberberg) (title role)

Publications

By KÄUTNER: books—

On KÄUTNER: books—

On KÄUTNER: articles—

Obituary in Film (Paris), no. 4, 1980.
Obituary in Cinéma (Paris), June 1980.

On KÄUTNER: films—

Harmsen, Henning, Erlebte Filmgeschichte Helmut Käutner, for German TV, 1975.
von Troschke, Harald, Im Gespräch porträtiert: Helmut Käutner, for German TV, 1978.

Along with Forst and Sirk, Helmut Käutner was one of the great stylists of the cinema of the Third Reich. Admittedly the competition was extremely thin, but this in no way belittles the achievement of the director, whose best work stands comparison with Ophüls and is rooted in the same rich vein of Austro-German romanticism. In particular one notices the same concern with the passing of an era, an elegance bordering on dandyism, and what Louis Marcorelles has called “a subtle perfume of death and decadence.” As John Gillett puts it in the catalogue produced to accompany a pioneering season of Käutner’s films at London’s Goethe Institute, the work of Käutner, Ophüls, and Forst “consolidated a film-making genre notable for its attention to period detail, its elaborate costuming and art direction, and for directorial styles which used the mobile camera to achieve a uniquely filmic musical structure and rhythm.”
that meant that I was disinterested in the cinema which, since Hugenberg, had been moving in a right-wing, nationalistic direction. I really wanted to go on working in the theatre, and I had very clear-cut ideas about the theatre—others would have called it cabaret.”

His first film, Kitty and die Weltenkonferenz, a light, frothy comedy, evoked comparisons with Lubitsch, but its favourable portrait of a British minister and slightly satirical view of relations between Italy and Germany incurred Goebbels’s displeasure and the film vanished from view. His next film, an adaptation of Keller’s novella Kleider Machen Leute, in which a humble tailor finds himself mistaken for a Russian prince, could certainly be read, beneath its apparent retreat into Biedermeyer mannerism, as an allegory about Germans’ exaggerated respect for figures of power and authority and their consequent readiness to fall under the Nazi spell. However, this does not seem to have occurred to the authorities. The film has a lightness of touch and a feeling for fantasy that anticipates both Minnelli and Cocteau, and is distinguished by some marvellous swirling camerawork in the musical scenes. On the whole Käutner avoided contemporary subjects during his Third Reich period, an exception being Auf Wiedersehen, Franziska!, which deals with the strains in a newsreel reporter’s marriage caused by his numerous absences. The authorities insisted on an upbeat, flag-waving ending quite out of key with the film’s poignant, carefully nuanced atmosphere and, like Sirk in Stutzen der Gesellschaft, Käutner deliberately makes the whole thing stand out a mile. The film is also distinguished by a marvellous performance by Marianne Hoppe.

Käutner’s masterpiece is undoubtedly Romance in Moll, a highly Ophulsian adaptation of Maupassant’s Les Bijoux. Maupassant’s dark vision of life did not endear him to the literary authorities in the Reich, and if this film, though not banned, was condemned in some quarters as “defeatist” and “destructive of marriage and morals.” Käutner himself acts in the film, playing the part of a resigned, world-weary poet, a role which, his films suggest, was close to his own in real life. As Francis Courtade and Pierre Cadars put it in their excellent Histoire du Cinéma Nazi, “Everything centres on the almost palpable re-creation of this fin-de-siécle milieu in which a woman, condemned to death by her surroundings, suffers. Composition, framing, camera movement, editing, sound, remain, from start to finish, crystal clear. . . . Like Claude Autant-Lara, Käutner is fanatical over details. His direction of actors is magisterial. . . . The overall result is an exemplary reconstruction of the style and atmosphere of the original story, and one of the two or three most faithful adaptations of Maupassant.”

In spite of his difficulties with the authorities, Käutner was entrusted with an expensive and elaborate Agfacolor project in the latter days of the Reich. This was Grosse Freiheit Nr. 7, a melodramatic, bittersweet story of disappointed love set amongst the sailors’ clubs and bars of the Hamburg waterfront, with clear overtones of Carné, Clair, and in particular (through the presence of Hans Albers of Blue Angel fame) Von Sternberg. Apart from difficulties caused by bombing, Käutner also had to cope with Goebbels’s request that the film include shots of the harbour with ships flying the Nazi flag. His response was to make copious use of artificial fog in the panoramic long shots. When the film was released Admiral Dönitz complained that its representation of German sailors visiting prostitutes and drinking was damaging to the reputation of Germany in general and Hamburg in particular, and the film was banned.

Käutner’s last Third Reich film, and one of his best, was Unter den Brücken, which is set amongst the barges of the River Havel and, like its predecessor, shows the clear influence of French pre-war “poetic realism”: in particular there are distinct overtones of L’Atalante. At one time thought to be a “lost” film, Unter den Brücken finally turned up and revealed itself to be, in the words of the Süddeutsche Zeitung, “a subtle depiction of a private world, half-tones full of melancholy and a quiet sublimination of the free life . . . a story told with great sensitivity which, softly but insistently, counteracts the grimness of contemporary reality with the longing for private happiness and the right to a non-regimented self-realisation.”

Käutner’s post-war films never reached the heights of his best work in the Third Reich, though some of them are not without interest. The main problem seems to have been a rather ill-advised turn towards social realism and “problem” subjects in films such as In Jenen Tagen, Die Letzte Brücke, Himmel Ohne Sterne, and Schwarzer Kies which simply did not suit his artistic temperament. In Der Apfel ist Ab and Der Traum von Lieschen Müller Käutner attempted to bring something of his old cabaret style into the contemporary cinema, but with mixed results. In 1957 he signed a seven-year contract with Universal in Hollywood which resulted in The Restless Years (The Wonderful Years in the UK) and Stranger in My Arms. In 1959 he directed a modern-day version of Hamlet titled Der Rest ist Schweigen, but in the 1960s his time was increasingly taken up with more conventional literary adaptations (many of them for television), a direction already signalled in the 1950s with his productions of Zuckmayer’s Des Teufels General, Ein Mädchen aus Flandern, and Der Hauptmann von Köpenick. He also played the German pulp writer Karl May in Hans-Jurgen Syberberg’s film of the same name, which also included several other notables from the cinema of the Third Reich, a period which it is hard not to regard as representing Käutner’s finest hour. One German critic has suggested that his films of this period are “illuminative of an inner immigration which could express its opposition only secretly and in cyphers,” and it may well be that the need to proceed by allusion, understatement, ambiguity, and suggestion suited Käutner’s remarkable talents peculiarly well.

—Julian Petley

KAWALEROWICZ, Jerzy

Nationality: Polish. Born: Gwóźda (Gwozdziec), now part of Soviet Ukraine, 19 January 1922. Education: Film Institute, Cracow. Family: Married actress Lucyna Winnicka. Career: Assistant director and scriptwriter, 1946–51; co-directed first feature with Kazimierz Sumerski, 1952; head of Studia Kadr, from 1955. Awards: Premio Evrotecteca, Venice Festival, for Night Train, 1959; Silver Palm, Cannes Festival, for Mother Joanna of the Angels, 1961; Silver Bear, Berlin Festival, for The President’s Death, 1977.

Films as Director:

1952 Gromada (The Village Mill; Commune) (co-d)
1954 Celuloza (Cellulose) (+ co-sc); Pod gwiazda frygijska (Under the Phrygian Star) in two parts (+ co-sc)
1956 Cién (The Shadow)
1957 Prawdziwy koniec wielkiej wojny (The Real End of the Great War) (+ co-sc)
1959 Pociag (Night Train; Baltic Express) (+ co-sc)
1961 Matka Joanna od Aniolów (Mother Joanna of the Angels) (+ co-sc)
1965  Faraon (The Pharaoh) (+ co-sc)
1968  Gra (The Game) (+ sc)
1970  Maddalena
1977  Smierc Presydentu (Death of a President) (+ co-sc)
1979  Spotkanie na Atlantyku (Meeting on the Atlantic) (+ co-sc)
1982  Austeria (+ co-sc)
1989  Jeniec Europy
1989  Austeria
1982  Zakazane piosenki (asst d);
1987  Czarci zleb (The Devil’s Pass) (asst d)
1989  Jeniec Europy (asst d);
1989  Jeniec Europy (asst d);
1989  Za chto? (Why?) (+ sc)

Other Films:

1946  Jutro premiera (Morning Premiere) (asst d)
1947  Zakazane piosenki (Forbidden Songs) (asst d);
1948  Ostatni etap (The Last Stage) (asst d)
1948  Stalowe serca (Steel Hearts) (asst d);
1952  Czarcie zleb (The Devil’s Pass) (asst d)

Publications

By KAWALEROWICZ: articles—

Interview with M. Dipont, in Kino (Warsaw), October 1980.

Interview, in Film Dope (London), March 1984.

Interview with D. Heinrich, “La Pologne par le coeur,” in Cinéma 72, 10 February 1988.

On KAWALEROWICZ: books—

On KAWALEROWICZ: articles—

Jerzy Kawalerowicz,” in Film Dope (London), March 1984.

* * *

It is no simple matter to give a precise characterization of Jerzy Kawalerowicz. His work is full of twists and turns, strange shifts, and new experiments. The films of Kawalerowicz are uneven; it is as though the filmmaker, after momentary triumphs and outstanding artistic achievements, would lapse into a crisis that prepared him for yet another masterpiece. His films are long in preparation. Between individual works come lengthy pauses in which the director carefully absorbs raw material from a wide range of disciplines in order to personally work it into film form. Only in a very few directors’ works do we find such range, from the realistic film to the profound psychological drama, from the historical epic to the political drama.

Kawalerowicz has always gone his own way, and it has not been an easy path, especially when we realize that he has never turned back, never given a particular theme further development. Although he began at the same time as Wajda and Munk, he never created a work that belonged to the “Polish school of film.” After his first independent film, Celuloza (Cellulose), both a realistic portrayal and a literary adaptation, he never came back to this subject or form. In his next creative period he quickly turned out several films that are unusual analytic studies of human relationships, earnest psychological examinations of lonely people marked by war (The Real End of the Great War), isolated while travelling on an overnight express (Night), or within the walls of a cloister (Mother Joanna of the Angels).

Kawalerowicz demonstrates his creative mastery with these films. In fact, they initiated an entire trend of intimate dramas, popular with other directors several years later.

The historical epic Faraon (Pharaoh), adapted from the celebrated novel by Boleslaw Prus, is once again unusual in composition. It is a film on a grand scale, a monumental fresco, but at the same time an unusual psychological film with political and philosophical elements. In this drama of a struggle for power in ancient Egypt, the director finds room for an account of human qualities, motives, and feelings.

Emotions are the leitmotif of Kawalerowicz’s work. After the grand epic Faraon, the filmmaker attempted a return to the intimate, psychologically-oriented film. A crisis sets in. His subsequent work fails to attain the level of his earlier pieces. There is a kind of break, a respite that will bear fruit in the later, purely political film and documentary drama Death of a President. The approach taken by Kawalerowicz in this film, which is the chronicle of an actual event—the assassination of President Gabriel Natutowicz in the 1930s—served as the director’s credo. “When we studied the documents and the testimony and compiled the chronology of events, we ascertained that the drama of history, the drama of real events, is far more persuasive than what we ourselves could invent.” Captivated by the facts, Kawalerowicz relates not only a real-life event but also a common human story that is timeless. After this film, critics expected the director to continue in this same genre, in which he had shown such mastery. But once again Kawalerowicz was experimenting with new genres and forms, though outstanding literary works and actual political or historical events, shaped into provocative dramas, remain the foundation of his creative work.

—Vaclav Merhaut

KAZAN, Elia

Nationality: American. Born: Elia Kazanjoglou in Constantinople (now Istanbul), Turkey, 7 September 1909; moved with family to New York, 1913. Education: Mayfair School; New Rochelle High School, New York; Williams College, Massachusetts, B.A. 1930;
Elia Kazan

Career: Actor, property manager, then director, Group Theatre, New York, from 1933; stage director, including plays by Tennessee Williams and Arthur Miller, 1935 through 1960s; co-founder, with Cheryl Crawford, Actors’ Studio, New York, 1948; appeared voluntarily beforeHUAC, admitting membership of Communist Party, 1934–36, and naming fellow members, 1952; began career as novelist, 1961; left Actors’ Studio to direct newly formed Lincoln Center Repertory Company, 1962–64. Awards: Many awards for theatre work; Academy Award for Best Director, and Best Direction Award, New York Film Critics, for Gentleman’s Agreement, 1947; International Prize, Venice Festival, for Panic in the Streets, 1950; Special Jury Prize, Venice Festival, for A Streetcar Named Desire, 1951; Oscar for Best Director, and Most Outstanding Directorial Achievement, Directors Guild of America, for On the Waterfront, 1954; Honorary doctorates from Wesleyan University, Carnegie Institute of Technology, and Williams College; Academy Award for Lifetime Achievement, 1999. Address: c/o 432 W. 44th St., New York, NY 10036, U.S.A.

Films as Director:

1937 The People of the Cumberlands (+ sc) (short)
1941 It’s up to You
1945 A Tree Grows in Brooklyn

1947 The Sea of Grass; Boomerang; Gentleman’s Agreement
1949 Pinky
1950 Panic in the Streets
1952 A Streetcar Named Desire; Viva Zapata!; Man on a Tightrope
1954 On the Waterfront
1955 East of Eden (+ pr)
1956 Baby Doll (+ pr, co-sc)
1957 A Face in the Crowd (+ pr)
1960 Wild River (+ pr)
1961 Splendour in the Grass (+ pr)
1964 America, America (+ sc, pr)
1969 The Arrangement (+ pr, sc)
1972 The Visitors
1976 The Last Tycoon
1978 Acts of Love (+ pr)
1982 The Anatolian (+ pr)
1989 Beyond the Aegean

Other Films:

1934 Pie in the Sky (Steiner) (short) (role)
1940 City for Conquest (Litvak) (role as Googie, a gangster)
1941 Blues in the Night (Litvak) (role as a clarinetist)
1951 The Screen Director (role as himself)
1984 Sanford Meisner: The American Theatre’s Best Kept Secret (Doob) (role as himself)
1989 L’Héritage de la chouette (The Owl’s Legacy) (Marker) (role)
1998 Liv till varje pris (Jarl) (role as himself)

Publications

By KAZAN: books—

Beyond the Aegean, New York, 1994.

By KAZAN: articles—

‘The Writer and Motion Pictures,’ in Sight and Sound (London), Summer 1957.
Interview with Jean Domarchi and André Labarthe, in Cahiers du Cinéma (Paris), April 1962.
Interview with S. Byron and M. Rubin, in Movie (London), Winter 1971/72.
Interview with G. O’Brien, in InterView (New York), March 1972.
‘Visiting Kazan,’ interview with C. Silver and J. Zukor, in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1972.
“All You Need to Know, Kids,” in Action (Los Angeles), January/February 1974.

Interview with Tim Pulleine, in Stills (London), July/August 1983.

“What a Director Needs to Know,” in DGA Magazine (Los Angeles), May-June 1996.

On KAZAN: books—

On KAZAN: articles—

Changas, E., “Elia Kazan’s America,” in Film Comment (New York), Summer 1972.

Kazan Section of Positif (Paris), April 1981.

Film-Dienst (Cologne), 19 December 1995.

* * *

Elia Kazan’s career has spanned more than four decades of enormous change in the American film industry. Often he has been a catalyst for these changes. He became a director in Hollywood at a time when studios were interested in producing the kind of serious, mature, and socially conscious stories Kazan had been putting on the stage since his Group Theatre days. During the late 1940s and mid-1950s, initially under the influence of Italian neorealism and then the pressure of American television, he was a leading force in developing the aesthetic possibilities of location shooting (On the Waterfront, Wild River). At the height of his success, Kazan formed his own production unit and moved back east to become a pioneer in the new era of independent, “personal” filmmaking that emerged during the 1960s and contributed to revolutionary upheavals within the old Hollywood system. As an archetypal auteur, he progressed from working on routine assignments to developing more personal themes, producing his own pictures, and ultimately directing his own scripts. At his peak during a period (1950–1965) of anxiety, gimmickry, and entropy in Hollywood, Kazan remained among the few American directors who continued to believe in the cinema as a medium for artistic expression and who brought forth films that consistently reflected his own creative vision. Despite these achievements and his considerable influence on a younger generation of New York-based filmmakers, including Sidney Lumet, John Cassavetes, Arthur Penn, Martin Scorsese, and even Woody Allen, Kazan’s critical reputation in America has ebbed.
The turning point both for Kazan’s own work and the critics’ reception of it was almost certainly his decision to become a friendly witness before the House Un-American Activities Committee (HUAC) in 1952. While “naming names” cost Kazan the respect of many liberal friends and colleagues (Arthur Miller most prominent among them), it ironically ushered in the decade of his most inspired filmmaking. If Abraham Polonsky, himself blacklisted during the 1950s, is right in claiming that Kazan’s post-HUAC movies have been “marked by bad conscience,” perhaps he overlooks how that very quality of uncertainty may be what makes films like On the Waterfront, East of Eden, and America America so much more compelling than Kazan’s previous studio work.

His apprenticeship in the Group Theater and his great success as a Broadway director had a natural influence on Kazan’s films, particularly reflected in his respect for the written script, his careful blocking of scenes, and, pre-eminently, his employment of Method Acting on the screen. While with the Group, which he has described as “the best thing professionally that ever happened to me,” Kazan acquired from its leaders, Harold Clurman and Lee Strasberg, a fundamentally artistic attitude toward his work. Studying Marx led him to see art as an instrument of social change, and from Stanislavski he learned to seek a play’s “spine” and emphasize the characters’ psychological motivation. Although he developed a lyrical quality that informs many later films, Kazan generally employs the social realist mode he learned from the Group. Thus, he prefers location shooting over studio sets, relatively unfamiliar actors over stars, long shots and long takes over editing, and naturalistic forms over genre conventions. On the Waterfront and Wild River, though radically different in style, both reflect the Group’s quest, in Kazan’s words, “to get poetry out of the common things of life.” And while one may debate the ultimate ideology of Gentleman’s Agreement, Pinky, Viva Zapata! and The Visitors, one may still agree with the premise they all share, that art should illuminate society’s problems and the possibility of their solution.

Above all else, however, it is Kazan’s skill in directing actors that has secured his place in the history of American cinema. Twenty-one of his performers have been nominated for Academy Awards; nine have won. He was instrumental in launching the film careers of Marlon Brando, Julie Harris, James Dean, Carroll Baker, Warren Beatty, and Lee Remick. Moreover, he elicited from such undervalued Hollywood players as Dorothy McGuire, James Dunn, Eva Marie Saint, and Natalie Wood perhaps the best performances of their careers. For all the long decline in critical appreciation, Kazan’s reputation among actors has hardly wavered. The Method, which became so identified with Kazan’s and Lee Strasberg’s teaching at the Actors Studio, was once simplistically defined by Kazan himself as “turning psychology into behavior.” An obvious example from Boomerang would be the suspect Waldron’s gesture of covering his mouth whenever he lies to the authorities. But when Terry first chats with Edie in the park in On the Waterfront, unconsciously putting on one of the white gloves she has dropped as he sits in a swing, such behavior becomes not merely psychological but symbolically poetic. Here Method acting transcends Kazan’s own mundane definition.

His films have been most consistently concerned with the theme of power, expressed as either the restless yearning of the alienated or the uneasy arrangements of the strong. The struggle for power is generally manifested through wealth, sexuality, or, most often, violence. Perhaps because every Kazan film except A Tree Grows in Brooklyn and The Last Tycoon (excluding a one-punch knockout of the drunken protagonist) contains at least one violent scene, some critics have complained about the director’s “horrid vulgarity” (Lindsay Anderson) and “unremitting stridency” (Robin Wood), yet even his most “overheated” work contains striking examples of restrained yet resonant interludes: the rooftop scenes of Terry and his pigeons in On the Waterfront, the tentative reunion of Bud and Deanie at the end of Splendor in the Grass, the sequence in which Stavros tells his betrothed not to trust him in America America. Each of these scenes could be regarded not simply as a necessary lull in the drama, but as a privileged, lyrical moment in which the ambivalence underlying Kazan’s attitude toward his most pervasive themes seems to crystallize. Only then can one fully realize how Terry in the rooftop scene is both confined by the mise-en-scène (seen within the pigeon coop) and free on the roof to be himself; how Bud and Deanie are simultaneously reconciled and estranged; how Stavros becomes honest only when he confesses to how deeply he has been compromised.

—Lloyd Michaels

KEATON, Buster

Films as Director and Actor:

1920 One Week (co-d, co-sc with Eddie Cline); Convict Thirteen (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Scarecrow (co-d, co-sc with Cline)
1921 Neighbors (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Haunted House (co-d, co-sc with Cline); Hard Luck (co-d, co-sc with Cline)
1922 The Paleface (co-d, co-sc with Cline); Cops (co-d, co-sc with Cline); My Wife’s Relations (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Blacksmith (co-d, co-sc with Mal St. Clair); The Goat (co-d, co-sc with Mal St. Clair); The Playhouse (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Boat (co-d, co-sc with Cline)
1923 The Balloonatic (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Love Nest (co-d, co-sc with Cline); The Three Ages; Our Hospitality (co-d)
1924 Sherlock Jr. (co-d); The Navigator (co-d)
1925 Seven Chances; Go West (+ story)
1926 Battling Butler; The General (co-d, co-sc)
1927 College (no d credit)
1928 Steamboat Bill Jr. (no d credit); The Cameraman (no d credit, pr)
1929 Spite Marriage (no d credit)
1938 Life in Sometown, U.S.A.; Hollywood Handicap; Streamlined Swing

Other Films:

1917 The Butcher Boy (Fatty Arbuckle comedy) (role as village pest); A Reckless Romeo (Arbuckle) (role as a rival); The Rough House (Arbuckle) (role); His Wedding Night (Arbuckle) (role); Oh, Doctor! (Arbuckle) (role); Fatty at Coney Island (Coney Island) (Arbuckle) (role as husband touring Coney Island with his wife); A Country Hero (Arbuckle) (role)
1918 Out West (Arbuckle) (role as a dud gambler); The Bell Boy (Arbuckle) (role as a village pest); Moonshine (Arbuckle) (role as an assistant revenue agent); Good Night, Nurse! (Arbuckle) (role as the doctor and a visitor); The Cook (Arbuckle) (role as the waiter and helper)

1919 Back Stage (Arbuckle) (role as a stagehand); The Hayseed (Arbuckle) (role as a helper)
1920 The Garage (Arbuckle) (role as a garage mechanic); The Round Up (role as an Indian); The Saphead (role as Bertie “the Lamb” Van Alstyne)
1922 Screen Snapshots, No. 3 (role)
1924 The Hollywood Revue (role as an Oriental dancer)
1925 Free & Easy (Easy Go) (role as Elmer Butts); Doughboys (pr, role as Elmer Stuyvesant)
1931 Parlor, Bedroom & Bath (pr, role as Reginald Irving); Sidewalks of New York (pr, role as Tine Harmon)
1932 The Passionate Plumber (pr, role as Elmer Tuttle); Speak Easily (role as Professor Timoleon Zanders Post)
1933 What! No Beer! (role as Elmer J. Butts)
1934 The Gold Ghost (role as Wally); Allez Oop (role as Elmer); Le Roi des Champs Elysees (role as Buster Garnier and Jim le Balafre)
1935 The Invader (The Intruder) (role as Leander Proudfoot); Palookah from Paducah (role as Jim); One-Ran Elmer (role as Elmer); Hayseed Romance (role as Elmer); Tars & Stripes (role as Elmer); The E-Flat Man (role as Elmer); The Timid Young Man (role as Elmer)
1936 Three on a Limb (role as Elmer); Grand Slam Opera (role as Elmer); La Fiesta de Santa Barbara (role as one of several stars); Blue Blazes (role as Elmer); The Chemist (role as Elmer); Mixed Magic (role as Elmer)
1937 Jail Bait (role as Elmer); Ditto (role as Elmer); Love Nest on Wheels (last appearance as Elmer)
1939 The Jones Family in Hollywood (co-sc); The Jones Family in Quick Millions (co-sc); Pest from the West (role as a traveler in Mexico); Mooching through Georgia (role as a Civil War veteran); Hollywood Cavalcade (role)
1940 Nothing but Pleasure (role as a vacationer); Pardon My Berth Marks (role as a reporter); The Taming of the Snood (role as an innocent accomplice); The Spook Speaks (role as a magician’s housekeeper); The Villain Still Pursued Her (role); Li’l Abner (role as Lonesome Polecat); His Ex Marks the Spot (role)
1941 So You Won’t Squawk (role); She’s Oil Mine (role); General Nuisance (role)
1943 Forever and a Day (role as a plumber)
1944 San Diego, I Love You (role as a bus driver)
1945 That’s the Spirit (role as L.M.); That Night with You (role)
1946 God’s Country (role); El Moderno Barba azul (role as a prisoner of Mexicans who is sent to moon)
1949 The Loveable Cheat (role as a suitor); In the Good Old Summertime (role as Hickey); You’re My Everything (role as butler)
1950 Un Duel a mort (role as a comic duellist); Sunset Boulevard (Wilder) (role as a bridge player)
1952 Limelight (Chaplin) (role as the piano accompanist in a music hall sketch); L’incantevole nemica (role in a brief sketch); Paradise for Buster (role)
1955 The Misadventures of Buster Keaton (role)
1956 Around the World in Eighty Days (role as a train conductor)
1960 When Comedy Was King (role in a clip from Cops); The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn (Curtiz) (role as a lion tamers)
1963  Thirty Years of Fun (appearance in clips); The Triumph of Lester Snapwell (role as Lester); It's a Mad, Mad, Mad, Mad World (Kramer) (role as Jimmy the Crook)

1964  Pajama Party (role as an Indian chief)

1965  Beach Blanket Bingo (role as a would-be surfer); Film (role as Object/Eye); How to Stuff a Wild Bikini (role as Bwana); Sergeant Deadhead (Taurog) (role as Private Blinken); The Rail-rodder (role); Buster Keaton Rides Again (role)

1966  The Scribe (role); A Funny Thing Happened on the Way to the Forum (Lester) (role as Erronius)

1967  Due Marines e un Generale (War, Italian Style) (role as the German general)

1970  The Great Stone Face (role)

Publications

By KEATON: book—

By KEATON: articles—

Interview with Christopher Bishop, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1958.

Interview with Kevin Brownlow, in Film (London), no. 42, 1965.

Interview with Arthur Friedman, in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Summer 1966.

Interview with Christopher Bishop, in Interviews with Film Directors, edited by Andrew Sarris, New York, 1967.

On KEATON: books—

On KEATON: articles—

Brand, Harry, “‘They Told Buster to Stick to It,’” in Motion Picture Classic (New York), June 1926.

Bishop, Christopher, “The Great Stone Face,” in Film Quarterly (Berkeley), Fall 1958.

Buster Keaton is the only creator-star of American silent comedies who equals Chaplin as one of the artistic giants of the cinema. He is perhaps the only silent clown whose reputation is far higher today than it was in the 1920s, when he made his greatest films. Like Chaplin, Keaton came from a theatrical family and served his apprenticeship on stage in the family’s vaudeville act. Unlike Chaplin, however, Keaton’s childhood and family life were less troubled, more serene, lacking the darkness of Chaplin’s youth that would lead to the later darkness of his films. Keaton’s films were more blithely athletic and optimistic, more committed to audacious physical stunts and cinema tricks, far less interested in exploring moral paradoxes and emotional resonances. Keaton’s most famous comic trademark, his “great stone face,” itself reflects the commitment to a comedy of the surface, but attached to that face was one of the most resiliently able and acrobatic bodies in the history of cinema. Keaton’s comedy was based on the conflict between that imperviously dead-pan face, his tiny but almost superhuman physical instrument, and the immensity of the physical universe that surrounded them.

